Stern said closing arguments are not the end of the trial - but rather an important preface to deliberation of the client's fate in the jury room.

"The purpose of the summation, particularly after a trial of length, is to teach your friends on the jury how to successfully argue with your enemies on that same jury - because the 'final argument' will not take place in the courtroom but rather in the adjoining jury room," he writes.

The Nacchio trial could last up to eight weeks.

Stern gives quirky names to a number of his tips, such as the Wimbledon and Charlie Chaplin effects. Wimbledon encourages a smooth dialogue between attorney and witness during direct examination. Charlie Chaplin discourages questioning a witness from a prepared script.

"But remember that we all think, talk and write about the trial of cases much better than we could ever try them," Stern writes.

Staff writer Andy Vuong can be reached at 303-954-1209 or avuong@denverpost.com.

"Cases" excerpt

"When lawyers question from a prepared script of questions, they produce what I call the Charlie Chaplin Effect. ... In the earliest Charlie Chaplin silent films, you see a herky-jerky Chaplin who bounds across the screen in choppy steps. ... The viewer of the courtroom scene is similarly disconcerted by questioning from a script."

- from "Trying Cases to Win"

A lawyer's words to that effect

Some additional excerpts from Herbert Stern's eight-volume set of books titled "Trying Cases to Win."

The Wimbledon Effect

During direct examination, the goal is " ... to achieve the Wimbledon Effect as you argue your case right through your witness. By Wimbledon Effect I mean that the jurors' heads should be swinging back and forth between the attorney and his witness, as though the two figures were at each end of the well of the court - and the jurors were positioned between them much like spectators and, hopefully, fans in the viewer benches. ... If a lawyer on direct is standing at the end of a jury box ... with the jurors' heads swinging between him and his witness ... then this lawyer is making hay with that jury."

The Buster Keaton Effect

"Training witnesses to give long narrative answers, rather than short responsive ones to specific questions, leads to what I like to think of as The Buster Keaton Effect. In Keaton's films we see him take every step. But he takes them so quickly that we cannot comprehend them."

On lawyer and jury

"An advocate does best when he is perceived to be correct. Do not strive to be witty, or to be charming, or to be loving or even to be loved. Just be thought to be right! If you achieve that, the rest will invariably take care of itself."

On use of literary and Biblical quotations

"Analogies and quotations are always dangerous to those who invoke them, ... for nearly every such business can be turned around to bite one in the back."

On unpredictability of trial

DOJ_NMG_0136671

"Once the trial is underway all our pretrial plans, predictions and stratagems are reshaped by an unfolding reality which is never even approximately predictable. ... Nothing ever happens exactly as planned. The courtroom contest is as much a place of constant readjustments as any other of life's playing fields."

Matador metaphor

"In every bullfight the matador enjoys one great advantage over the bull. It lies not in the matador's speed or agility, for the bull is faster. ... It lies in a piece of wood that stands close to the side wall of the bull ring. ... Whenever the matador finds himself in trouble, he runs as fast as he can behind this wooden barrier until the bull passes by. ... So, too, it is in argument. ... Whenever the advocate falls under attack ... he runs behind his strongest arguments ... and lets the bull go by."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Ban On Prison Religious Program Challenged (WP)

By Peter Slevin, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

U.S. Judge Ruled Evangelical Rehabilitation Effort in Iowa Is Unconstitutional

CHICAGO -- Interested inmates at Newton Correctional Facility in Iowa receive teaching material that declares: "Criminal behavior is a manifestation of an alienation between the self and God. Acceptance of God and Biblical principles results in cure through the power of the Holy Spirit. Transformation happens through an instantaneous miracle; it then builds the prisoner up with familiarity of the Bible."

Rooted in evangelical Christianity and supported by more than $1.5 million in public funds, the method of the rehabilitation program is clear enough. A key question is its constitutionality. A trio of appellate judges, including former Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, is reviewing a lower court's decision that the program violates the separation of church and state.

People on both sides of the dispute say the outcome could influence the future of President Bush's faith-based initiative, which links government and religious institutions in efforts to solve social problems.

"This puts into jeopardy not just faith-based nonprofits in a prison setting," said Mark Earley, president of Virginia-based Prison Fellowship Ministries, whose affiliate, the InnerChange Freedom Initiative, runs the Iowa program. "I think you'd see a precipitous drop in the number of faith-based organizations willing to provide services to governments."

Barry W. Lynn, executive director of Americans United for the Separation of Church and State, which sued to stop the program, said a courthouse defeat for InnerChange "could well be the death knell for these kinds of programs, whether they're funded by state or federal money."

"Americans," Lynn said, "can't be required to submit to any religious indoctrination to get benefits, whether those people are behind bars or on the outside."

U.S. District Judge Robert W. Pratt sided with Americans United, ruling last year that the Iowa program is "pervasively sectarian." He heard testimony from prisoners of other faiths who felt unwelcome in a program that gives advantages to inmates who accept the intensive religious teachings.

Inmates deemed to be making sufficient spiritual progress live in better conditions than the general population, inhabiting cells with wooden doors and using toilets that afford privacy, a jailhouse rarity. They have more access to relatives and outside visitors and can fulfill prison requirements more quickly.

While in the program, prisoners are expected to pray daily, attend worship services and religious gatherings, and participate in weekly revival meetings. Inmates of other religions are asked "to compromise, if not completely abandon, their faiths in order to participate," Pratt ruled, citing "a constant tension" with Roman Catholic inmates.

Pratt ordered InnerChange to close its operations and repay $1.5 million to the Iowa government and prisoners whose telephone surcharges helped fund the program. He said he was careful not to pass judgment on the beliefs of the staff or the effectiveness of the religious approach, although he said he had received no credible data on recidivism rates.

His central concern, Pratt wrote, was whether the program violates the Constitutional prohibition on government showing a preference for any religious denomination.

Iowa "hopes to cure recidivism through state-sponsored prayer and devotion," wrote Pratt, 59, a Clinton appointee. "While such spiritual and emotional 'rewiring' may be possible in the life of an individual and lower the risk of committing other crimes, it cannot be permissible to force taxpayers to fund such an enterprise under the Establishment Clause."

Prison Fellowship's attorneys and witnesses told the judge that the Iowa program, located at the prison about 35 miles from Des Moines, was strictly voluntary and open to inmates of all faiths. They noted that much of the money came from private sources and reported that state money paid only for secular aspects of the program.

DOJ_NMG_0136672

Pratt ruled, however, that the overtly religious atmosphere is not "a secondary effect of the program -- it is the program." He noted that the cost of all telephone charges were billed to the state under "nonsectarian items," along with 82 percent of the local director's salary. So, too, were "Jesus is Lord" key chains.

Prison Fellowship, founded in 1976 by Watergate figure Charles Colson, runs six similar programs in Texas, Kansas, Minnesota and Arkansas, and expects to open one soon in Missouri. All are funded privately.

When Americans United filed suit, the programs in Kansas and Minnesota also took government money, but the prison group shifted them to private backing, Earley said, "just to reduce the litigation profile until things could be resolved."

Pratt's ruling is on hold pending appeal.

Among those supporting InnerChange is former attorney general John D. Ashcroft, who wrote shortly before this month's arguments before the 8th Circuit Court of Appeals in St. Louis that high recidivism rates prove that programs such as InnerChange, sometimes called IFI, are needed.

"Neither Judge Pratt nor Americans United offers a better way to stop the revolving door of prisons. They simply want to shut IFI down," Ashcroft wrote in the St. Louis Post Dispatch.

"Judge Pratt's opinion ties the hands of corrections officials who are trying to make our communities safer," Ashcroft wrote.

Anthony R. Picarello Jr., general counsel of the Becket Fund for Religious Liberty, argued the case on behalf of Prison Fellowship. He said that an affirmative ruling by the appellate panel or the Supreme Court -- particularly if the money must be repaid -- would deter faith-based organizations.

"We think Prison Fellowship did it right," Picarello said. "If at the end of the day the court agrees with them and not us, the way to resolve it is to make some clear rules about how to do it right, rather than banish and punish us."

Evidence In Inmate's Hand, Justice In His Sights (NYT)

By Ellen Barry

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

On a September afternoon in 2005, with a prison guard standing beside the operating table and another outside the door, a surgeon cut into the left hand of inmate No. 99A2254.

The doctor was trying to find fragments of a bullet among the tiny veins and ligaments of Napoleon Cardenas's middle finger. Mr. Cardenas had been warned that removing them could cause nerve damage. Another surgeon had balked at performing the operation, saying it could violate the Hippocratic oath.

But Mr. Cardenas did not care. He was convinced that under the pale scars lay evidence that would topple two convictions in a 1994 jewel heist: his and his younger brother's. Between them, they had already served 14 years in prison for the crime. Cut off my fingers if you need to, he said.

Mr. Cardenas's lawyers waited anxiously outside as the surgeon, using forceps, removed two pieces of metal. The results would not, in themselves, convince the Queens district attorney, Richard A. Brown, that the brothers were innocent. But Mr. Brown's investigator was impressed by Mr. Cardenas's eagerness to have the operation. That and a growing pile of new evidence were enough to prompt the district attorney's office to start its own yearlong investigation.

On Jan. 18, Mr. Brown asked a judge to vacate the convictions of Napoleon Cardenas and his brother Carlos in the jewel heist. In a statement, Mr. Brown said his prosecutors were "always prepared to take a hard look at a case — even post-conviction — to make certain that justice has been done."

Steven Silberblatt, one of half a dozen Legal Aid Society lawyers who worked to overturn the Cardenas brothers' convictions, put it this way: "Sometimes circumstances provide their own lie-detector test. When someone is willing to lose the use of his hand, you get the feeling they're probably telling the truth."

The case began on the evening of July 21, 1994. Police officers all over Queens were looking for four Latino men suspected of snatching three cases of Tahitian black pearls from vendors returning to their hotel in Elmhurst from a gem show in Manhattan. The vendors estimated the jewels' value at $1.5 million.

As they escaped, the thieves rushed at a man in his driveway, demanding his car. The man was an off-duty police officer, and he managed to shoot his service weapon, a 9-millimeter Glock, before he was knocked unconscious. He told detectives later that he thought he had hit a robber who was grabbing at the barrel of the gun.

Within hours, police detectives converged on the emergency room at St. John's Queens Hospital, where one of the jewelry vendors and the off-duty police officer were being treated. Napoleon Cardenas, then 24, was there, too, with his brother Carlos, 23. It was hard to miss Napoleon; he was screaming. He was being treated for a gunshot wound.

When he was questioned about his injury that night, Mr. Cardenas answered haltingly, arousing a detective's suspicion. He had shot himself, he said, in his girlfriend's living room, while handling a .380-caliber semiautomatic pistol that he had been showing to two visitors. He had no license for the gun.

DOJ_NMG_0136673

The detective put Mr. Cardenas in a lineup, but when none of the robbery victims made a positive identification, she released him. A friend cleaned up the blood in his girlfriend's apartment. The police never searched the site.

It took a few days for Mr. Cardenas to realize he might still be a suspect. He was due to serve a four-month sentence for credit-card fraud. Days before it was to begin, Mr. Cardenas fled to the Dominican Republic — a move that would damage his and his brother's defense.

"I got scared," he said recently. He had a seriously injured hand, he said, adding: "I was so skinny. I was watching these movies about what happens to people" in prison.

In his absence, the case against him took on a new life. One of the vendors called a detective days after the crime, saying he could now identify Mr. Cardenas as one of the robbers. The police visited Carlos Cardenas to ask about his brother, and began to suspect that Carlos had been involved. When the jewelry vendors returned to New York from California a year later, the police put Carlos in a lineup. One of the vendors chose someone else. Another chose Carlos.

At Carlos's trial, one of the jewelry salesmen identified him as one of the robbers. There was no physical evidence linking Carlos to the crime. But the prosecutor noted dryly that Napoleon's injury had occurred "coincidentally, I guess — just a major coincidence — with the same people, about the same time, about approximately the same area."

In May 1996, Carlos Cardenas was found guilty of first-degree robbery, second-degree robbery and grand larceny. He was sentenced to 8 1/3 to 25 years in prison.

A year later, Napoleon Cardenas surrendered in Colombia to federal marshals and returned to the United States to serve his sentence for credit-card fraud. When he was released, he faced trial in the jewel theft. In court, the off-duty police officer and one of the jewelry salesmen identified Mr. Cardenas. As in his brother's case, no physical evidence linked him to the crime, but the prosecutor noted the gunshot wound.

"You don't have a fingerprint to say 'I was there,' but everything else tells you he was there, including the bullet that went through his hand," the prosecutor told jurors. He compared the wound to dye packets rigged to explode on bank robbers.

Although Mr. Cardenas insisted that he could prove his innocence with ballistics evidence and alibi witnesses, his lawyer, Michael C. Harrison, disagreed, and focused on discrediting the government's witnesses. In 1999, Napoleon Cardenas was convicted of first-degree robbery and second-degree assault, and sentenced to 15 to 30 years.

In 2002, with his legal remedies nearly exhausted, Mr. Cardenas wrote a stinging letter of introduction to Svetlana Kornfeind, a lawyer newly assigned to his case by the Legal Aid Society: he intended, he wrote, "to prove my claim in the courts as soon as I am given the opportunity. So, I want to ask you to be honest to yourself not to me but to yourself by telling me if you have the time or not to help me."

Ms. Kornfeind was taken aback. But she scheduled a meeting with him. "We had to investigate the possibility that he was right," she said.

Mr. Cardenas seemed to specialize in driving lawyers crazy. He wrote to his trial lawyer three times a week offering strategic advice. He placed calls from prison to the police in the 110th Precinct asking for documents; if they asked, he said he was a detective. He deliberately injured himself in prison to have X-rays taken of his hand, so he could be sure that the fragments of metal were still there, he said.

"I knew I had evidence in my hand," he said. "People would laugh at me. I'd sit there and proclaim I was a political prisoner."

Once in a while, he got a break. An old friend, Eddie Padilla, visited him as he was awaiting trial on the robbery charges. They were talking about friends from the neighborhood, Mr. Cardenas recalled, when Mr. Padilla brightened. Did Napoleon know he still had part of that bullet?

Mr. Padilla had helped clean up blood in the apartment where Mr. Cardenas, still in shock, had pulled the bullet jacket out of his wound. Mr. Padilla still had the jacket. At parties, he would take it out to show friends.

Ms. Kornfeind began to construct an argument to overturn the conviction, citing the newly discovered evidence and contending that Mr. Harrison, the trial attorney, had failed to investigate Mr. Cardenas's alibi. Mr. Harrison did not respond to a request for comment for this article.

Ms. Kornfeind had the bullet jacket analyzed, and contended that the results bolstered Mr. Cardenas's story: while the Police Department then issued full-metal, copper-jacketed ammunition, this jacket was aluminum, which peeled back on contact. Full-metal ammunition would have passed through the hand intact. The tissue that dotted the jacket was his, a DNA test showed.

The next challenge was to see whether the fragments in Mr. Cardenas's hand matched the bullet jacket.

Using a tourniquet, doctors at Bellevue Hospital Center cut off the flow of blood to the hand; a "bloodless field" allows surgeons to more easily locate foreign bodies, nerves and tiny veins, said Dr. David W. Friedman, who supervised the operation. It turned out to be an easy task, since the shards were lodged above the bone, like splinters. They were removed through a tiny incision, wrapped in cotton and put in an evidence tube. The wound required only two stitches.

DOJ_NMG_0136674

Ms. Kornfeind remembers "just sailing" across town to a crime laboratory, where the fragments would be analyzed. Traces of aluminum would suggest strongly that Mr. Cardenas had been shot with the hollow-point bullet; copper would back up prosecutors' claim that he had been shot by a police service weapon.

In the end, the fragments were neither. They were shards of lead. Mr. Cardenas's lawyers contended that they still supported his innocence, since hollow-point bullets, unlike full-metal bullets, break apart on contact, said Thomas A. Kubic, an instructor at the John Jay College of Criminal Justice, who consulted on the case for the Legal Aid Society.

From the point of view of the district attorney, the ballistics evidence was inconclusive. At a hearing in 2005, a prosecutor said that the gunshot wound had not been at the center of the case against Mr. Cardenas, who was implicated by four witness identifications, "a series of lies he told hospital personnel on the night of the crime as to how he obtained the wound, and his flight from the country immediately after the crime." But Mr. Cardenas's eagerness to undergo surgery had made an impression.

The case wore on for months, while the district attorney's investigator tracked down informants. One of them convinced the investigator that others were responsible for the jewel theft. In January of this year, both brothers passed polygraph tests. That was the final hurdle.

At the hearing where the brothers were exonerated, their father, Napoleon Cardenas Sr., a 74-year-old carpenter originally from Colombia, thanked Ms. Kornfeind and Denise Fabiano, who represented Carlos.

"These are two beautiful persons," he said in an interview.

Steven Banks, attorney in chief for the Legal Aid Society, said the case showed how errors made early in an investigation get "compounded time and time again."

"It never ceases to amaze me how random it is that people get caught up in the judicial system and the related bureaucracy and can be swallowed up," Mr. Banks said.

On the day of the hearing, Ms. Kornfeind had been expecting "an explosion of something at the end," or at least the sight of her client with his handcuffs off, running into his mother's arms. But Napoleon Cardenas, now 36, would not be released for two days, while immigration officials cleared a deportation order. His brother Carlos, 35, like Napoleon a legal permanent resident, remains threatened with deportation, even though his conviction has been overturned.

Ms. Kornfeind woke up early the day after the hearing, planning to work on Napoleon Cardenas's immigration case. She pulled up the Web site for the Eastern Correctional Facility in Ulster County, and typed the familiar identification number, 99A2254. A message flashed: No such person exists.

She typed in his name, and got the same message: No such person exists.

That's when she realized what had happened. Her client was free.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Justice Dept. Starts Religious-freedom Plan (CLPD)

By Adelle Banks, Religion News Service

The Cleveland Plain Dealer, February 25, 2007

Washington- The Department of Justice has launched a "First Freedom Project" to draw more attention to protecting the religious liberties of Americans.

"Why should it be permissible for an employee standing around the water cooler to declare that 'Tiger Woods is God,' but a firing offense for him to say, 'Jesus is Lord,'?" Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Tuesday at a meeting of the executive committee of the Southern Baptist Convention in Nashville, Tenn.

"These are the kinds of contradictions we are trying to address."

The initiative includes a new Web site (www.firstfreedom.gov), an education program and a task force that will review religious freedom policies and cases.

Leaders of the Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of America, Family Research Council and Southern Baptist Ethics & Religious Liberty Commission applauded the initiative.

The Rev. Barry Lynn, executive director of Americans United for Separation of Church and State, said it was a hypocritical action by an administration that he said has tried to merge church and state.

The Rev. Bob Edgar, general secretary of the National Council of Churches, welcomed the renewed focus on religious freedom but questioned why it was announced at a gathering of a single denomination. He invited Gonzales to present the project to the March meeting of the council's Committee on Religious Liberty, and suggested it also should be presented to Muslim groups.

DOJ_NMG_0136675

A Justice Department spokeswoman declined to respond specifically to Edgar's criticism, but said, "I believe he [Gonzales] intends to talk about this to other groups."

Sorority Evictions Raise Issue Of Looks And Bias (NYT)

By Sam Dillon

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

GREENCASTLE, Ind. — When a psychology professor at DePauw University here surveyed students, they described one sorority as a group of "daddy's little princesses" and another as "offbeat hippies." The sisters of Delta Zeta were seen as "socially awkward."

Worried that a negative stereotype of the sorority was contributing to a decline in membership that had left its Greek-columned house here half empty, Delta Zeta's national officers interviewed 35 DePauw members in November, quizzing them about their dedication to recruitment. They judged 23 of the women insufficiently committed and later told them to vacate the sorority house.

The 23 members included every woman who was overweight. They also included the only black, Korean and Vietnamese members. The dozen students allowed to stay were slender and popular with fraternity men — conventionally pretty women the sorority hoped could attract new recruits. Six of the 12 were so infuriated they quit.

"Virtually everyone who didn't fit a certain sorority member archetype was told to leave," said Kate Holloway, a senior who withdrew from the chapter during its reorganization.

"I sensed the disrespect with which this was to be carried out and got fed up," Ms. Holloway added. "I didn't have room in my life for these women to come in and tell my sisters of three years that they weren't needed."

Ms. Holloway is not the only angry one. The reorganization has left a messy aftermath of recrimination and tears on this rural campus of 2,400 students, 50 miles southwest of Indianapolis.

The mass eviction battered the self-esteem of many of the former sorority members, and some withdrew from classes in depression. There have been student protests, outraged letters from alumni and parents, and a faculty petition calling the sorority's action unethical.

DePauw's president, Robert G. Bottoms, issued a two-page letter of reprimand to the sorority. In an interview in his office, Dr. Bottoms said he had been stunned by the sorority's insensitivity.

"I had no hint they were going to disrupt the chapter with a membership reduction of this proportion in the middle of the year," he said. "It's been very upsetting."

The president of Delta Zeta, which has its headquarters in Oxford, Ohio, and its other national officers declined to be interviewed. Responding by e-mail to questions, Cynthia Winslow Menges, the executive director, said the sorority had not evicted the 23 women, even though the national officers sent those women form letters that said: "The membership review team has recommended you for alumna status. Chapter members receiving alumnae status should plan to relocate from the chapter house no later than Jan. 29, 2007."

Ms. Menges asserted that the women themselves had, in effect, made their own decisions to leave by demonstrating a lack of commitment to meet recruitment goals. The sorority paid each woman who left $300 to cover the difference between sorority and campus housing.

The sorority "is saddened that the isolated incident at DePauw has been mischaracterized," Ms. Menges wrote. Asked for clarification, the sorority's public relations representative e-mailed a statement saying its actions were aimed at the "enrichment of student life at DePauw."

This is not the first time that the DePauw chapter of Delta Zeta has stirred controversy. In 1982, it attracted national attention when a black student was not allowed to join, provoking accusations of racial discrimination.

Earlier this month, an Alabama lawyer and several other DePauw alumni who graduated in 1970 described in a letter to The DePauw, the student newspaper, how Delta Zeta's national leadership had tried unsuccessfully to block a young woman with a black father and a white mother from joining its DePauw chapter in 1967.

Despite those incidents, the chapter appears to have been home to a diverse community over the years, partly because it has attracted brainy women, including many science and math majors, as well as talented disabled women, without focusing as exclusively as some sororities on potential recruits' sex appeal, former sorority members said.

"I had a sister I could go to a bar with if I had boy problems," said Erin Swisshelm, a junior biochemistry major who withdrew from the sorority in October. "I had a sister I could talk about religion with. I had a sister I could be nerdy about science with. That's why I liked Delta Zeta, because I had all these amazing women around me."

DOJ_NMG_0136676

But over the years DePauw students had attached a negative stereotype to the chapter, as evidenced by the survey that Pam Propsom, a psychology professor, conducts each year in her class. That image had hurt recruitment, and the national officers had repeatedly warned the chapter that unless its membership increased, the chapter could close.

At the start of the fall term the national office was especially determined to raise recruitment because 2009 is the 100th anniversary of the DePauw chapter's founding. In September, Ms. Menges and Kathi Heatherly, a national vice president of the sorority, visited the chapter to announce a reorganization plan they said would include an interview with each woman about her commitment. The women were urged to look their best for the interviews.

The tone left four women so unsettled that they withdrew from the chapter almost immediately.

Robin Lamkin, a junior who is an editor at The DePauw and was one of the 23 women evicted, said many of her sisters bought new outfits and modeled them for each other before the interviews. Many women declared their willingness to recruit diligently, Ms. Lamkin said.

A few days after the interviews, national representatives took over the house to hold a recruiting event. They asked most members to stay upstairs in their rooms. To welcome freshmen downstairs, they assembled a team that included several of the women eventually asked to stay in the sorority, along with some slender women invited from the sorority's chapter at Indiana University, Ms. Holloway said.

"They had these unassuming freshman girls downstairs with these plastic women from Indiana University, and 25 of my sisters hiding upstairs," she said. "It was so fake, so completely dehumanized. I said, 'This calls for a little joke.' "

Ms. Holloway put on a wig and some John Lennon rose-colored glasses, burst through the front door and skipped around singing, "Ooooh! Delta Zeta!" and other chants.

The face of one of the national representatives, she recalled, "was like I'd run over her puppy with my car."

The national representatives announced their decisions in the form letters, delivered on Dec. 2, which said that Delta Zeta intended to increase membership to 95 by the 2009 anniversary, and that it would recruit using a "core group of women."

Elizabeth Haneline, a senior computer science major who was among those evicted, returned to the house that afternoon and found some women in tears. Even the chapter's president had been kicked out, Ms. Haneline said, while "other women who had done almost nothing for the chapter were asked to stay."

Six of the 12 women who were asked to stay left the sorority, including Joanna Kieschnick, a sophomore majoring in English literature. "They said, 'You're not good enough' to so many people who have put their heart and soul into this chapter that I can't stay," she said.

In the months since, Cynthia Babington, DePauw's dean of students, has fielded angry calls from parents, she said. Robert Hershberger, chairman of the modern languages department, circulated the faculty petition; 55 professors signed it.

"We were especially troubled that the women they expelled were less about image and more about academic achievement and social service," Dr. Hershberger said.

During rush activities this month, 11 first-year students accepted invitations to join Delta Zeta, but only three have sought membership.

On Feb. 2, Rachel Pappas, a junior who is the chapter's former secretary, printed 200 posters calling on students to gather that afternoon at the student union. About 50 students showed up and heard Ms. Pappas say the sorority's national leaders had misrepresented the truth when they asserted they had evicted women for lack of commitment.

"The injustice of the lies," she said, "is contemptible."

Jump In Minority Bids To Join FDNY (NYDN)

By Jonathan Lemire, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, February 25, 2007

More than 4,500 more minority applicants took the FDNY written entrance exam this year than in 2002, giving fire officials hope that a multimillion-dollar campaign to start diversifying the department will end in success.

Fire Commissioner Nicholas Scoppetta believes the jump from 3,730 to 8,297 minority candidates proves the department is making progress.

"All the hard work we put into this campaign has paid off," said Scoppetta. "We hope once we begin hiring from this list next year, we'll have the most diverse group of candidates joining the world's greatest fire department."

But critics warned the promising numbers would be rendered meaningless if the minority applicants weren't hired.

The FDNY recruits new members only once every four years and the department's hiring process has been closely scrutinized by Justice Department investigators. Currently, the department is 91% white.

The written test was offered at several sites across the five boroughs on Jan. 20 and 21,549 applicants sat down to take the several-hour exam, officials told the Daily News.

DOJ_NMG_0136677

Of those candidates, 38.5% identified themselves as being black, Hispanic, Asian or Native American, officials said. This marks a significant increase from 2002, when 21.5% of the 17,348 applicants deemed themselves persons of color.

Though the number of white candidates dropped slightly from 13,618 in 2002 to 13,252 in January, applications from minority groups rose across the board, officials said.

Most strikingly, the number of Hispanics jumped from 2,088 to 4,026 while the number of blacks rose from 1,357 to 3,776, the statistics show. The number of women who took the test also increased, rising to 814 from 549.

FDNY officials gave credit to their outreach programs in communities of color to explain the jump in minority test-takers: Five years ago, firefighters held fewer than 300 events, a far cry from the more than 2,300 that recruiters staffed in 2006.

But the head of the Vulcan Society, the fraternal organization of black firefighters, attributed the rise in minority applicants to the FDNY altering its "exclusionary" hiring practices.

"Finally, they realize they need to reach out to all communities," John Coombs said. "We don't want to roll out the red carpet yet, for this is only one step toward the goal. What matters is who actually gets on the job."

The results of the written test have not yet been released, according to a spokesman for the Department of Citywide Administrative Services, which administers the exam. The physical test - which will be scored pass/fail for the first time - will start being offered in the coming months.jlemire@nydailynews.com

Democrats In Congress May Threaten California Redistricting (LAT)

By Nancy Vogel

The Los Angeles Times, February 25, 2007

SACRAMENTO — The new dynamic in Washington, with Californian Nancy Pelosi as House speaker, threatens to thwart an effort by state political leaders to overhaul the way voting districts are drawn.

Fresh from their victories in the November election, Democrats in Congress don't want to risk their fragile majority. Many Republicans don't want their relatively safe seats threatened either.

Their opposition promises to crimp an effort by Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, state Assembly Speaker Fabian Nuñez (D-Los Angeles) and others to change how California draws political boundaries every 10 years to accommodate population shifts.

Nuñez said he thinks he will have to exempt Congress from legislation he is crafting to have California's political boundaries drawn by a nonpartisan panel, rather than by politically driven state lawmakers.

Then only state legislative districts would be drawn independently.

Otherwise, Nuñez said, opposition from the powerful Pelosi (D-San Francisco) and others would be enough to derail his efforts.

"The best way to secure its passage is to not have a $10-million campaign against it," Nuñez said. "And Congress will wage a $10-million campaign against it."

California could threaten the slim Democratic majority by giving up the ability to draw districts advantageous to Democrats, said Rep. Zoe Lofgren (D-San Jose), chairwoman of California's Democratic delegation.

"We're finally about to deal with the Iraq war issue, we're finally taking on global climate change, energy independence — things we've been stonewalled on for a dozen years — and there's great interest that these efforts not be short-circuited," Lofgren said.

Redistricting is crucial to politicians. It determines the ratio of Democrats and Republicans in each district and thus how hard politicians will have to work for reelection.

Sometimes the process shapes their futures: The district in which someone hopes to run can be drawn to exclude his or her home. And the mapmaking can have far-reaching effects on the balance of power in state legislatures and Congress.

Nuñez said Pelosi didn't tell him directly that she would fight a redistricting initiative if it included Congress. He said he "heard it from many other people" that she and other members of Congress would campaign to kill it.

Pelosi spokesman Drew Hammill said the speaker prefers a national overhaul of the redistricting process and would need more details than Nuñez has offered before she could consider his plan.

Lofgren is writing legislation that would require every state legislature to yield redistricting authority to an independent group of citizens, as several states including Arizona and Idaho already do. Lofgren carried similar, unsuccessful legislation last year that was backed by Pelosi.

Nuñez said he understood Pelosi and Lofgren's position: "They've got to have a national view on this."

But in appeasing those powerful potential opponents, Nuñez may create another much closer to home.

Schwarzenegger spokesman Aaron McLear said the governor believes that districts for Congress, not just the Legislature, should be drafted by people who are not lawmakers.

"That's what his goal is right now," McLear said. "Comprehensive redistricting reform."

DOJ_NMG_0136678

McLear said it was unclear whether the governor would support a redistricting measure that did not include Congress.

Schwarzenegger's backing is critical. He has said he would endorse a relaxation of term limits — a pet project of the speaker's that could stretch his stay in office — only if the Legislature comes up with a redistricting overhaul.

The governor ran into resistance from Washington in 2005, when his special election agenda included a ballot initiative that would have used retired judges to draw districts. Many of Schwarzenegger's fellow Republicans in Congress urged him to abandon the measure because it could have jeopardized their party's control of Congress.

Some Democrats, including Pelosi and Rep. Howard Berman Valley Village, also opposed the measure.

They joined with a Republican, Rep. John Doolittle of Roseville, to urge the Federal Elections Commission to allow them to raise unlimited amounts of money to fight the proposal.

Voters rejected the initiative, as they have rejected four other redistricting proposals since 1982. Any overhaul the Legislature passed this year would also be subject to voter approval.

But the governor has not given up. In December, he announced support for a proposed constitutional amendment that would use an 11-member panel of politically diverse citizens to draw boundaries.

At the time, Schwarzenegger noted that in the last three general elections, only four of 459 congressional and legislative seats up for grabs in California changed party hands.

That is partly because the last time the Legislature redrew boundaries, in 2001, Republicans and Democrats agreed to maintain the existing ratio of power.

"To me that is evidence of a system that has become unresponsive and is stuck in the status quo," Schwarzenegger said last year. "We must bring competition back into the political process."

Meanwhile in Washington, not all members of the California delegation seek a congressional exemption from a redistricting change.

Rep. Kevin McCarthy, a Bakersfield Republican who pushed unsuccessfully for nonpartisan redistricting while he was in the Legislature, said voters would reject any redistricting measure that excluded Congress.

"It would be so obvious that it's self-serving," he said.

Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Los Angeles) said it's time to take the politics out of what has traditionally been a partisan exercise.

"It's gotten so political," he said. "It's become an effort to deprive the voters of the chance to express their view."

Will voters care one way or the other?

"Redistricting is something that matters a great deal to the people who hold office," said Democratic political consultant Darry Sragow, "but it's arcane. It's very much an insider issue."

"If Congress is exempt," he said, "I'm not sure it matters much to voters."

ANTITRUST:

In Big Buyout, Utility To Limit New Coal Plants (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer And Andrew Ross Sorkin

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

Under a proposed $45 billion buyout by a team of private equity firms, the TXU Corporation, a Texas utility that has long been the bane of environmental groups, will abandon plans to build 8 of 11 coal plants and commit to a broad menu of environmental measures, according to people involved in the negotiations.

The roster of commitments came through an unusual process in which the equity firms asked two prominent environmental groups what measures could be taken to win their support. The result is an about-face from the company's earlier approach to climate-change issues, and includes a goal of returning the carbon-dioxide emissions by TXU to 1990 levels by 2020.

Environmental groups said yesterday that they had never known of a financial deal with such an ambitious built-in environmental component.

Two private equity firms, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company and the Texas Pacific Group, have proposed to buy TXU in what would become the largest leveraged buyout ever.

The transaction will be put to the TXU board for a vote on Sunday.

People involved in the negotiations said that Goldman Sachs, an adviser and lender to the buyers, helped broker peace with environmental groups and sought their support for the transaction. Goldman Sachs has been one of the most aggressive firms on Wall Street about taking action on climate change; the company sends its bankers home at night in hybrid limousines.

DOJ_NMG_0136679

For the investor groups, the effort was as much about making a sound business decision to ensure the deal's completion as it was about any environmental concerns.

By bringing the environmental groups into the process, the buyers may have helped avert years of costly litigation over emissions from their plants. But they may also have raised new questions about how they will meet the energy needs that TXU intended to address by building all 11 plants; the company is said to be examining ways to expand in cleaner forms of energy. None of the parties interviewed was able to provide details.

Environmentalists said they hoped that the TXU deal would represent a turning point in the attitude of energy businesses as they adjust to what many anticipate will be a new regulatory and public-relations landscape in an era of climate change.

"We have history's largest purchase of a power company, with the new owners wanting to move the company in a direction that is consistent with a world that takes global warming seriously," said David Hawkins of the Natural Resources Defense Council, one of the two environmental groups invited to the negotiations. That group, and the other participant, Environmental Defense, which often use the courts to confront businesses, are persistent critics of TXU.

The commitments come at a time of uncertainty for utilities that are considering building coal-fired plants. They do not know if such plants will be grandfathered by Congress and excluded from future restrictions on carbon-dioxide emissions, or whether anything they build now will have to operate in a starkly different regulatory environment.

TXU will discard plans to build eight of 11 proposed new coal plants, which would have been major new sources of emissions. Those plants — which would have added more than 9,000 megawatts of new capacity, the equivalent of 3.5 percent of the nation's current coal-fired power — had been part of a planned $10 billion expansion of coal-fired electricity.

TXU, which is based in Dallas, also intends to expand the renewable energy portion of its portfolio and reduce or offset its emissions significantly, said people who were familiar with the plans.

Less than a week ago, according to Fred Krupp, the president of Environmental Defense, the two environmental groups were approached by representatives of the private-equity buyers. He said he received a call from William K. Reilly, the former Environmental Protection Agency administrator, who is advising the Texas Pacific Group.

Mr. Hawkins, who runs the climate-change program for the Natural Resources Defense Council, said that the investment team was essentially asking "what would it take" to gain environmentalists' support.

James D. Marston, who runs the Texas energy program for Environmental Defense, yesterday called TXU's plans "a turning point in the fight against global warming."

Mr. Marston had led an intense advertising campaign painting TXU as an environmental outlaw pursuing a strategy that would hurt the climate and perhaps its own bottom line, if federal policy changed and companies were charged for the carbon dioxide they emitted.

But people familiar with the investors' thinking took pains to say that the investors brought the measures to the environmental groups, and were not acting out of any fear of the groups' potential to wage a legal and public-relations campaign against them.

Young Lawyers Sue, And Little Changes (NYT)

By Jonathan D. Glater

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

COMPETITORS say that a leading company ripped down their posters and used deceptive marketing tactics; former customers say that the same company paid business rivals to close their doors. And one competitor says he fears that he was the victim of outright theft.

This is how the business of training aspiring lawyers to pass the bar exam is conducted, according to documents and testimony that have surfaced as a result of a federal lawsuit in Los Angeles. It is a business dominated by a single company that expanded, depending on whom you believe, either by squashing its competitors or by simply offering a superior product.

That company is BAR/BRI. And students who took its courses filed a class-action lawsuit two years ago contending that the company operated an illegal monopoly and overcharged them by about $1,000 each. The students, seeking hundreds of millions of dollars in damages, also said that BAR/BRI cut illegal deals with potential competitors to protect its market. But earlier this month, lawyers in the case reached a tentative settlement agreement for $49 million, which could net each student in the class about $125.

The deal, which still requires court approval, has infuriated some of the original plaintiffs in the case, who harbored such anger against BAR/BRI that they wanted to see the company broken up. BAR/BRI is a unit of the Thomson Corporation, the large information services concern, and Thomson says the accusations in the lawsuit against BAR/BRI involve activities that occurred before it bought the company in 2001. BAR/BRI's lawyers say the company has done nothing wrong and that the students' claims are meritless.

It is hard to gauge the strength of the case against BAR/BRI, because many of the filings are sealed — at the request of the defendants, the plaintiffs' lawyers say. But depositions and other court documents that have become publicly available during the course of the litigation have been laced with accusations that BAR/BRI engaged in unsavory conduct. Other claims that have emerged in the case also suggest just how petty and cutthroat the entire bar review market can be.

In a deposition for the Los Angeles case, one former competitor, Hugh Reed, contended that BAR/BRI representatives tore his company's posters off of law school walls; both he and James J. Rigos, a current competitor, contended that the company exaggerated its students' success rate on the bar exam. And Mr. Rigos said in court filings that he believed that his offices might have been repeatedly burglarized because he was a potential witness in the Los Angeles antitrust litigation.

Lawyers for BAR/BRI have denied Mr. Rigos's accusations.

Bar review programs like BAR/BRI thrive because of the tremendous anxiety provoked by the bar exam. The exam, a prerequisite to practicing law in most states, is the last major hurdle to a legal career and comes after years of legal education that can leave students with bills of more than $100,000. The exam can stretch over two or three days and requires mastery of law throughout the country and in a particular state.

More than 80,500 people took a state's bar exam in 2005, according to the National Conference of Bar Examiners; just under two-thirds — 64 percent — passed. And BAR/BRI sells at least 40,000 bar review courses annually, according to a judge hearing one of the antitrust lawsuits against the company.

BAR/BRI's review program consists of about two months of intensive pre-exam classes, given five days a week for three to five hours a day. Some students take the courses in a classroom, while others watch a video recording or listen to a podcast.

The courses are not cheap. For its review course this summer for the New York bar exam, BAR/BRI charges $2,700 a student. The company offers courses for exams in 43 states and the District of Columbia, according to court filings, and it generates about $125 million a year in revenue. Nearly half of that is profit.

The precursor of BAR/BRI, a program called the Bar Review Institute, was founded in 1967 in Illinois by Richard Conviser, who is now the chairman of the company. (Thomson declined to make Mr. Conviser available for an interview.) The Bar Review Institute was acquired in 1974 by Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, which combined it with Bay Area Review, a California bar review program, to create BAR/BRI. At first the company faced competitors in several states, but over time it has cemented its position as the dominant provider.

BAR/BRI has been caught up in antitrust litigation at least five times over the years. A suit was filed in federal court in Manhattan in 2005 by a student contending that BAR/BRI illegally tied together two course offerings — one for the state law portion of the bar exam, the other for the uniform nationwide or "multistate" portion — so that rivals offering courses covering just one area could not compete effectively. In its court filings, BAR/BRI has defended its program, which it characterized as a "full-service, integrated course."

It is the Los Angeles case, which has progressed further, that has angered some of the young lawyers who sued BAR/BRI. They complain that the proposed settlement lets the company off the hook too lightly.

"This suit said, we're going to fight for monetary damages, but we're also going to fight to keep this from happening to the people who are coming up after you, for those people who are next year's class," said Lisa Gintz, a lawyer in Baton Rouge, La., who is one of the lead plaintiffs opposed to the settlement. "With this settlement agreement, really, BAR/BRI hasn't made one change. Not one."

John Shaughnessy, a spokesman for Thomson, declined to comment in detail for this article but provided a brief statement about the settlement: "We are pleased to bring a close to this matter as the alleged actions that formed the basis of the suit occurred years prior to Thomson acquiring the business."

A SETTLEMENT must be approved by Judge Manuel L. Real of United States District Court in Los Angeles, who is hearing the case. A settlement would mean that Thomson and its co-defendant, the test preparation giant Kaplan Inc., would not have to address in open court the most serious accusation against them: that the two companies agreed in 1997 to stay out of each other's market.

The students' complaint asserted that Kaplan agreed not to compete in the bar review market and that BAR/BRI agreed not to compete in the LSAT preparation market. Both Kaplan and BAR/BRI have strongly denied this contention.

"As Kaplan has consistently stated in the litigation, our only agreement with BAR/BRI was to market BAR/BRI services to Kaplan students," Melissa Mack, a Kaplan spokeswoman, said in a statement.

Over the course of the litigation, other contentions have been made specifically about BAR/BRI.

Mr. Reed, who was interviewed by lawyers for the Los Angeles case, said he worked for BAR/BRI for about 16 years and now owns a Chicago firm that offers individualized bar exam preparation.

Shortly after he left BAR/BRI in 1989, he tried to start a company that would compete against it. In a deposition for the case last summer, he said that BAR/BRI representatives pulled down his posters on several campuses between 1991 and 1993.

DOJ_NMG_0136681

"We had information and caught people red-handed tearing down our fliers," Mr. Reed said in the deposition.

Mr. Reed, who has been involved in litigation against BAR/BRI at least three times over the years (he said that each case settled), also accused BAR/BRI of having exaggerated its "pass rate," that is, the percentage of students who took its class and passed the bar. Mr. Shaughnessy, the Thomson spokesman, declined to comment on that contention.

One of the most unusual accusations was made by Mr. Rigos, who runs a bar review course in Washington state. It is one of BAR/BRI's few remaining competitors. Mr. Rigos submitted a statement in federal court in Seattle last summer in an effort to avoid having to produce evidence and possibly having to serve as a witness for either side in the Los Angeles case. If he did so, he said, his business would incur significant costs and would reap little benefit.

Here is what he told the court: Late one evening in the fall of 2005, someone broke into his offices on Fifth Avenue in downtown Seattle. The burglar (or burglars) bypassed a laptop and made for Mr. Rigos's desktop computer, which was taken. Someone on the staff discovered the break-in the next morning and called the police. It was, Mr. Rigos said in a court filing, the office's first robbery in more than 25 years.

The second robbery came just two weeks later. Two people were caught on camera: a woman and a man in a baseball cap, Mr. Rigos said. Again, they took his computer, which this time was secured to his desk. Again, the police were called. The investigating officer, Linda K. Dolane, wrote that she found it odd that the computer had been removed despite the locks holding it in place, which were undamaged. She observed in a report, "This is suspicious because unless a person knows how to install and uninstall them there would be damage to the equipment that was being removed."

No one has been charged in the burglaries. Mr. Rigos said that it was after the robberies that he learned that he could be called as a witness by the plaintiffs in the Los Angeles antitrust case. After all, he was a competitor to BAR/BRI who possibly had evidence showing how the company did business, which could conceivably benefit one side or the other.

BAR/BRI's lawyers asked to see documents that Mr. Rigos might have and to interview him, to learn what his testimony might be. Mr. Rigos immediately suspected that BAR/BRI might somehow be behind the burglaries, and said so in a document he filed in federal court in Seattle.

"Since we haven't been broken into in 25 years, or that server stolen, you can read your own inferences there, but I know what my own inference was," Mr. Rigos said in an interview.

BAR/BRI's lawyers responded rapidly and strongly to Mr. Rigos's contention. Alan S. Gruber, a lawyer at the New York law firm of Shearman & Sterling, said in a court filing that Mr. Rigos's contention "has no basis in fact and is outrageous."

"Neither BAR/BRI nor its counsel burglarized Mr. Rigos's office to obtain the documents it seeks," Mr. Gruber added in the filing.

Mr. Gruber went on to say that Mr. Rigos's suggestion that the burglaries were somehow intended to intimidate him was "preposterous."

In his court filing, Mr. Rigos leveled other accusations against BAR/BRI.

Like Mr. Reed, he contended that BAR/BRI overstated its pass rates. He said that BAR/BRI used the threat of lawsuits to try to intimidate Mr. Rigos's company.

But, Mr. Rigos said in his statement, he wanted nothing to do with the current litigation against BAR/BRI. Costly litigation would hurt his business, he said. Besides, he said in the statement: "The students' lawsuit will probably settle, producing some refund. However, it will not likely change the industry domination and predatory practices" of BAR/BRI, he said.

THE prospect that Mr. Rigos's prediction could come true, in that the settlement with BAR/BRI could leave its market position unchanged, has led some of those students to take on the same law firm that was representing them. Ms. Gintz and two more named plaintiffs representing former BAR/BRI students in the antitrust case fired off a strongly worded 10-page memorandum to their lawyers earlier this month, accusing them of an "apparent breach" of their fiduciary duties to the class.

The law firm handling the case for the plaintiffs is McGuireWoods, whose largest offices are in Richmond, Va., and in Chicago. William Allcott, a partner speaking on behalf of the firm, said the decision to settle was made with the best interests of the class in mind, and added that if the case were to go to trial, the firm would aggressively pursue that direction, too.

"We believe that when the court hears the evidence, it is going to conclude that this is a fair, reasonable and adequate settlement for the members of the affected class," Mr. Allcott said. "If for some reason the court didn't agree with that, we're prepared to go to trial."

McGuireWoods is in a sensitive spot. The firm inherited the BAR/BRI case last year when it acquired Van Etten Suzumoto & Becket of Los Angeles.

The proposed settlement puts Eliot G. Disner, who filed the BAR/BRI case, in an even more awkward spot. Mr. Disner, a former Van Etten Suzumoto lawyer, is now a McGuireWoods partner. According to the former BAR/BRI students objecting to the settlement, Mr. Disner told them that he would seek to break up the company. Yet as a partner at McGuireWoods, Ms. Gintz said, he cannot criticize the deal his colleagues have negotiated.

DOJ_NMG_0136682

But a settlement would not be a surprising outcome. BAR/BRI has fended off other antitrust attacks. A former California competitor, American Professional Testing Service Inc., contended that BAR/BRI offered courses below cost, bribed law school administrators and tore down posters advertising its course, called Barpassers. The case, which was handled on appeal by a gifted lawyer — John G. Roberts Jr., now chief justice of the United States — was not successful.

Ms. Gintz and her fellow dissenting plaintiffs say that the case against BAR/BRI is strong, and that it is significant that the judge hearing the case denied a summary judgment motion by Kaplan, which sought to end the litigation after the evidence-gathering phase, or discovery.

"What that says is, on the surface of these pleadings, there were triable issues there," Ms. Gintz said.

Mr. Disner declined to answer questions about the current case or the settlement, deferring to Mr. Allcott, the law firm's spokesman.

Mr. Rigos, whose company was the victim of the Seattle burglary, sounded sad as he considered the state of the bar review business.

"When I got into this, when I was going to law school in Boston, back then it was really a fun business," he said, adding, "I don't know that I'm just getting older and this thing has worn me down, but it doesn't seem as much fun as it was in those days."

Hospitals Find Merger Positive (CINE)

By Peggy O'farrell, Pofarrell@enquirer.com

The Cincinnati Enquirer, February 25, 2007

Anti-trust fears downplayed

The president and CEO of St. Elizabeth Medical Center doesn't see much potential for anti-trust concerns to block a proposed merger with St. Luke Hospital.

While the proposed merger, announced Thursday, would consolidate Northern Kentucky's hospitals - one each in Covington, Edgewood and Grant County under the St. Elizabeth flag, plus two in Florence and Fort Thomas under St. Luke - consumers and insurers would still have plenty of providers to choose from, said Joseph Gross.

"There's an awful lot of competition here," Gross said. "It's a very large market."

Administrators for the hospital groups have already taken a look at potential anti-trust issues, he said, and so far, the signs are positive.

"We, and St. Luke's, are part of a larger Cincinnati health-care market, and many of the Cincinnati hospitals, the bigger ones, compete aggressively for Northern Kentucky patients," Gross said. "In the past three weeks, mailings from two Cincinnati hospitals competing for patients over here have been received throughout Northern Kentucky."

Rick Laib, chairman of St. Luke's board of trustees, pointed out that 20 percent of consumers in Northern Kentucky already go outside the region - either to Greater Cincinnati or other Kentucky providers - for health.

"We're really pretty confident there won't be an issue," Laib said.

In announcing their intention to merge, officials from the two hospitals pledged to keep all five facilities open and continue all current services.

The announcement is just the latest in an ongoing shake-up in health care in the region.

St. Luke now operates under the umbrella of the Health Alliance, the region's largest health-care group. Its board, along with trustees from Christ Hospital in Mount Auburn, are in court, seeking a judge's permission to leave the group.

The alliance, in turn, wants the judge to force the two hospitals to remain in the group.

Trustees from the two hospitals argue the alliance defaulted on the joint operating agreement that governs the network.

They further argue that operating under the alliance's control jeopardizes their charitable missions in their respective communities and takes away local control of their hospitals and health-care services.

Gail Myers, an alliance spokeswoman, said the proposed Northern Kentucky merger "doesn't change the legal case. There is no event of default that would allow these hospitals to withdraw, and we are proceeding with the case."

Gross is confident the merger will go through.

"I'm optimistic that St. Luke's will be able to convince the judge that they've met the test to get out," he said. "If that doesn't happen, I think it's just a matter of time before they get out of the alliance, even if they lose the court action, because there are a lot of factors that come in to play to make it more likely that they won't stay in the Health Alliance. They're very unhappy, for good reasons, in the alliance. Their charitable mission is being challenged. They've lost local control by being in the alliance. They've lost their support services by being in the alliance. They've lost the ability to control their destiny as a Northern Kentucky hospital."

Doctors at St. Luke and St. Elizabeth favor the merger, Gross said.

The trial is under way in Hamilton County Judge Fred Nelson's court.

DOJ_NMG_0136683

Nelson will decide the case without a jury.

The merger has been under consideration for quite some time, Laib and Gross said.

Can Video Help Save The Satellite Radio Business? (NYT)

By Ian Austen

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

If the plan to merge XM Satellite Radio and Sirius Satellite Radio is approved, one result may be less music and less talk radio beamed into cars around the country.

The reasons for that, however, will have nothing to do with regulators.

Washington will take its first look at the proposed merger on Wednesday when the House Judiciary Committee's newly formed antitrust task force meets. Besides the scrutiny of the proposed combination, the satellite radio business is facing huge changes.

The first phase of the business — beaming dedicated music, sports and talk-radio stars like Howard Stern and Opie and Anthony directly to consumers — has not proved to have a clear advantage over old technology like free radio and newer ones like the iPod. So now satellite companies are looking into what other services they can offer to make them appealing to motorists.

"The question they have to ask now is: what problems haven't been solved in the car?" said Michael Urlocker, a former wireless analyst with UBS Securities who is now the chief executive of The Disruption Group, a Toronto-based consulting company. "The lack of customer sign-ups on a profitable basis should be a sign that trying to create a better iPod than Apple is a losing proposition."

Although XM and Sirius offer radio, in theory, the systems could be adapted to distribute any kind of data. And, indeed, both companies have made limited steps in that direction. Subscribers can already choose to have selected stock quotes, as well as news and sports headlines, beamed to the tiny screens on their receivers.

Both companies beam weather data to aviators and boaters through services that cost upwards of $50 a month. Later this year, XM will extend that by beaming weather information to a hand-held unit for hikers and hunters.

But Sirius has also made tentative steps toward offering video. At trade shows, Sirius has displayed prototype systems for sending video to back-seat displays like those now used by in-car DVD players. And the company recently, if vaguely, outlined plans to deliver some form of video programming aimed at children later this year.

Late last week, a specification sheet on the Web site for DaimlerChrysler indicated that such a system would be an option on the 2008 Dodge Magnum, a station wagon. A spokesman for the automaker, however, said that the information was incorrect and would be removed. A spokesman for Sirius, Patrick Reilly, declined requests for comment.

The big question, however, is: what will be the quality of a television signal dropped from a satellite into a car moving at 60 miles an hour?

Here, a merger of XM and Sirius could actually help. Assuming that duplicate channels would be eliminated — for example, there would be no reason to continue separate channels of, say, music hits from the 1940s — a combined company would be able to open up capacity on the systems' satellites and the ground-based antennas that increase signals in urban areas. While that space could be filled with additional radio channels, several empty radio channels could be combined to transmit video.

XM's chairman, Gary M. Parsons, said that he was not willing to promise much in the way of satellite video. As he sees it, satellite radio systems would most likely be able to provide only "a minimal amount of streaming video." It may be preferable, he said, to simply download video from satellites to in-car hard drives for later viewing.

"People relate to video, so maybe they make too big a deal of it," he said. "We are not in the video business."

He does concede, however, that the combined company's future would mean more than just talk and music.

"Our view has been that we are in the business of audio entertainment," Mr. Parsons said. "But we look at how we can improve the listeners' experience in ways that flow very naturally from the high-quality data platform we have."

The future services Mr. Parsons foresees are more modest. One, invisible to users, involves using the satellites to keep the data on in-car navigation systems constantly and automatically up to date. Another is a trick the iPod learned long ago: displaying album cover art when songs are playing.

But there are limits to what even a combined satellite radio company can do. Satellite systems effectively do not allow two-way transmissions, ruling out services such as e-mail.

And without enormous reinvestment, the systems are not likely to approach the transmission speeds of WiMax, a new wireless technology being developed by Nortel Networks and others that will probably start operating within the year.

DOJ_NMG_0136684

Those systems, like cellphone networks, will pass moving users from tower to tower and offer transmission speeds comparable to high-speed, wired connections in homes. Susan Kevorkian, an analyst with IDC, said that the satellite radio connections with automakers would give them a significant advantage over WiMax, at least in the short term.

But she added that the new company might find more immediate benefits from changing the structure of radio pricing. Currently, subscribers are tied to receivers, not users. Ms. Kevorkian said that limits the willingness of people to own more than a single receiver as well as the time they spend listening to the systems.

"Satellite radio is in and of itself a compelling service," she said. "The way it's been sold to date has demonstrated that value to consumers."

Mexico Puts Conditions On Cable TV Buy (AP)

The Associated Press

AP, February 25, 2007

MEXICO CITY — Mexico's antitrust agency said Sunday it has placed a series of conditions on media conglomerate Grupo Televisa in order for it to acquire a stake in Monterrey cable TV operator Television Internacional, or TVI.

The Federal Competition Commission, or CFC, said in a news release that among the conditions, Televisa would have to offer its broadcast channels on all pay TV systems in the country, and carry the broadcast signals of others on its pay TV systems.

Televisa sought antitrust clearance last year to acquire a 50 percent stake in TVI as the country's telecommunications companies prepare for the implementation of "triple play," or the bundling of phone, Internet and television service on the same network.

Televisa is Mexico's largest broadcaster, operating four of the country's six national networks, with a roughly 70 percent share of the broadcast market.

It also runs the only satellite TV service under the Sky brand, and owns one of the largest cable systems, Cablevision, which operates in Mexico City.

Televisa Gets Conditional Approval To Buy Cable Stake (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Adriana Arai

Bloomberg, February 25, 2007

Feb. 25 (Bloomberg) -- Grupo Televisa SA, Mexico's largest broadcaster, obtained conditional approval from antitrust regulators to buy a stake in a cable company in northern Mexico it plans to use to offer telephone services.

Televisa will be allowed to buy 50 percent of Television Internacional de Monterrey on the condition that it offers its free channels to all pay-TV providers nationwide, Mexico's Federal Competition Commission said in an e-mail today. Televisa, based in Mexico City, also must carry free channels from other companies, the commission said.

``With this decision, Televisa cannot use its content as a mechanism to displace competitors," said Eduardo Perez Motta, president of the Federal Competition Commission, on a conference call. ``This will create competition in this industry."

The conditions are ``too tough" and Televisa will study what measures it can take, the company said in an e-mail today. A spokesman for Televisa in Mexico City declined to comment beyond the statement.

Televisa wants to buy cable companies to offer packaged television, phone and Internet services and compete with telephone carriers. The company owns a Mexico City-based cable operation with 497,000 subscribers and planned to buy more operators in other parts of Mexico, Executive Vice-President Alfonso de Angoitia said on a conference call last week.

Cablemas Purchase

The commission said the rules announced today will apply to any future cable acquisition and will guide its analysis of Televisa's plan to buy Mexico's second-largest cable company, Cablemas SA.

In a Feb. 21 statement, Televisa said it agreed in November to buy 49 percent of Cablemas for $258 million. The commission said today it will issue a separate ruling on the transaction.

Televisa hadn't previously disclosed the purchase of a stake in Television Internacional de Monterrey. Perez Motta said Televisa agreed to buy 50 percent of the company.

Televisa, the bigger of two broadcasters that operate in Mexico, reported 20.97 billion pesos ($1.9 billion) of broadcasting revenue for 2006. Rival TV Azteca SA had 9.58 billion pesos in revenue.

Mexican regulators published regulations in 2006 allowing cable companies to offer phone services later this year. Telephone carriers also will be allowed to provide television services.

Shares of Televisa have risen 12 percent this year, compared with a 7.8 percent increased in the benchmark Mexican stock index. The stock rose 0.5 percent to 65.68 pesos in Mexico City trading on Feb. 23.

DOJ_NMG_0136685

EU Antitrust Watchdog Silences 'pussy Cat' Criticism By Baring Teeth (AFP)

AFP, February 25, 2007

BRUSSELS (AFP) - Shortly after taking office as Europe's top competition watchdog in November 2004, Neelie Kroes vowed in the face of detractors that she would not be the "pussy cat" of big business.

Nearly half way through her five-year term, Kroes has silenced early criticism that she was too cuddly with the corporate world by not hesitating to bite business titans that squash their rivals.

Last Wednesday, the Dutch competition commissioner once again bared her teeth when she imposed the biggest fine ever in a EU cartel case by bringing an illegal club of lift makers crashing down with a penalty of 992 million euros (1.3 billion dollars).

In a typically hard-worded statement, she said the consumers would suffer from the effects of the "outrageous" cartel for years and vowed that the "the memory of this fine should last just as long" in the members' boardrooms.

The crushing fine was the latest move in a "no-tolerance" crackdown on cartels that Kroes has made a top priority of her tenure during which she has built up a team of 60 regulators devoted to trustbusting.

It also came less than a month after she hit 10 companies with a fine of 750 million euros --- the third biggest ever imposed in a cartel case -- for fixing prices and carving up the market in power generating equipment.

After busting the power equipment club, Kroes stormed that she "will not tolerate cartels in Europe and the damage that they do in any area of business."

But Kroes has not only been busy fighting cartels as she has also repeatedly taken a hardline in the European Commission's long-standing battle against Microsoft.

Kroes, a Rotterdam native and former Dutch transport minister, is no stranger to high profile showdowns.

Indeed her nomination as EU competition commissioner did not come without controversy, with EU lawmakers alleging conflict of interest due to her extensive business contacts.

Kroes, who holds a doctorate in economics and is a boardroom veteran, quickly cut her ties with the likes of big firms like Thales, Volvo and mm02 in Europe and Lockheed Martin, McDonald's and Lucent in the United States.

And as promised the 65-year-old did not hesitate "to blow the whistle," as she called it, when barely a month into the job she blocked the merger of Portuguese energy groups EDP and GDP in December 2004.

Although the commissioner has made crusading against cartels a priority, the Microsoft dossier has never strayed far from her desk.

Under her predecessor, Mario Monti, the commission fined Microsoft nearly 500 million euros for abusing its dominant market position in what became the biggest competition case ever to come before EU regulators.

But in a test of the commission's authority, Kroes' services have struggled ever since then to get Microsoft to respect the ruling.

Microsoft challenged the 2004 decision in the EU's second-highest court in April 2006 and the judges are expected to hand down a decision in the first half of the year.

Frustrated with Microsoft's defiance of some of its demands, the commission in July slapped daily fines adding up to 280.5 million euros over the six-month period of the penalty. Microsoft is appealing against the charges.

Meanwhile, the threat of further fines remains as the commission has not yet decided whether Microsoft is meeting its demands.

In a further sign the antitrust battle is far from over, Kroes' regulators are looking at a complaint from Microsoft's rivals that its new Vista operating system also threatens competition.

On the legislative front, Kroes has targeted energy sector which she says suffers from a lack of competition because gas and electricity markets are concentrated in the hands of a few companies that control supply, generation and infrastructure.

She has championed the controversial solution of "unbundling," or forcing big integrated energy companies to separate their networks from their supply and generation businesses.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

'Ahead Of His Time' (AJC)

By Dan Chapman

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, February 25, 2007

An Alternative Fuel Advocate, Jimmy Carter Feels Vindicated

Plains — As president, Jimmy Carter installed solar panels atop the White House. He championed coal and nuclear power. He taxed oil company profits. He created the U.S. Department of Energy. He introduced America to ethanol.

DOJ_NMG_0136686

Oil imports plummeted during the Carter administration. Renewable energy research skyrocketed. Cars got more miles per gallon of gas. Thermostats were lowered to 55 degrees at night.

On Feb. 2, 1977, Carter donned a wool cardigan and asked a national TV audience to conserve energy. Two months later, he likened America's struggle to reduce Middle Eastern oil imports to the "moral equivalent of war."

Was it all for naught?

Today, the United States imports almost twice as much oil as it did during Carter's final year in office. Ethanol, biodiesel, solar and other alternative fuels supply no more energy than they did in 1980. Americans drive Hummers that get 10 miles per gallon.

Pollution from cars, trucks, factories and power plants is widely blamed for endangering the climate. Conservation, according to a dismissive vice president, "may be a sign of personal virtue." U.S. troops are involved in a war in oil-rich Iraq.

The Bush administration has given "no consideration that I've ever detected for taking any sort of substantive action that would correct our growing crisis of energy," Carter said in an interview last week at his home in Plains. "Even in Iraq, there's no indication of this administration's willingness to call for sacrifice, except among the families who have servicemen and women in Iraq."

Carter spoke an hour before groundbreaking in Plains for an alternative fuel factory that will turn soybean oil into biodiesel to help lessen America's dependence on imports and, in the process, clean the environment.

He feels vindicated that energy policies he pushed 30 years before are now accepted as mainstream.

"I went into the White House with two determinations: to cut down our dependence on foreign oil; [and] to remove the unwarranted influence of oil-producing countries on our foreign policy," Carter explained. "I spent more time on the energy issue while I was president than any other thing I addressed."

The peanut farmer and globe-trotting statesman is resigned, yet chagrined that Reagan, Clinton and the two Bushes didn't do more to wean America of its oil addiction. But a generation later, Carter, 82, is finally getting his due.

"He was ahead of his time," said Joseph Romm, an energy expert at the Center for American Progress, a think tank in Washington. "Even President Bush now talks about the need to save energy. Bush is no Jimmy Carter, but at least he has been forced to pay rhetorical homage to him. Carter has been vindicated."

'Sacrifice' theme

Carter was Georgia's governor in 1973 (and "secretly planning to run for president," he said) when Arab states restricted the amount of oil sent to the United States and drivers waited hours to get gas at the pumps. It only took him two weeks upon reaching Washington in 1977 to put on the five-button, camel-colored sweater (on display at the Carter museum on Freedom Parkway), sit by the White House library fireplace and deliver the first of a half-dozen speeches on energy policy.

It wasn't his most famous speech, but it laid out the populist politician's four-year strategy to revitalize an America demoralized by war, inflation and joblessness. It also mentioned "sacrifice," a theme Carter would return to again and again.

"We must face the fact that the energy shortage is permanent," he said. "There is no way we can solve it quickly."

On April 18, 1977, Carter again gathered the electronic nation for an "unpleasant talk" vowing "painful sacrifices" in the "moral equivalent of war." The president predicted that without action world demand for oil would outstrip supply by 1980.

He laid out a series of goals to be reached by 1985: reduce the annual growth rate of energy consumption to less than 2 percent; cut gasoline consumption by 10 percent; slash oil imports from 9 million to 6 million barrels a day; increase coal production by two-thirds; insulate 90 percent of America's homes; and bring solar energy into 2.5 million households.

"The most important thing about these proposals is that the alternative may be a national catastrophe," Carter intoned. "Further delay can affect our strength and our power as a nation."

Two days later, the president submitted a 104-page energy plan to Congress with 113 specific proposals. Carter sought steep taxes — as high as $2,500 per vehicle — on the sale of cars that didn't get 27.5 mpg by 1985. He requested greater enforcement of the 55-mile-per-hour speed limit and incentives for carpooling.

Builders were required to use more insulation. Appliances, refrigerators in particular, became more energy-efficient. Homeowners received tax credits to heat water with solar power.

The president faced powerful, deep-pocketed adversaries. He eventually sought partial decontrol of all natural gas prices.

Carter also called for a tax increase on crude oil prices. He wanted U.S. prices to match OPEC's to reduce oil consumption (and imports) and increase domestic production.

The tax increase angered consumers and the oil industry and delayed passage of his ambitious energy package for 18 months. Finally, in November 1978, Carter signed the National Energy Act. It was a major victory despite Congress' rejection of the crude-oil tax.

DOJ_NMG_0136687

"Congress responded mostly favorably because there was still the specter of another oil interruption," said Jay Hakes, an expert on energy policy who directs the Carter Presidential Library. "The lessons of Carter's energy package were that there were no silver bullets. But Carter had 113 bullets."

First to mention ethanol

Carter relished last Tuesday's groundbreaking ceremony in Plains. He labeled construction of a 30-million-gallon-a-year biodiesel factory "a major step forward." An admirer called Carter "one of the founding fathers of alternative fuel."

In the early years of his presidency, though, Carter didn't seek big dollars for the development of alternative fuels. Hakes, who's writing a book on the energy policies of Richard Nixon, Gerald Ford and Carter, notes that Carter's 104-page energy plan devoted just three pages to alternatives, mostly solar energy.

Nonetheless, Carter became the first president to mention ethanol — "gasohol," actually — at a town meeting in Pennsylvania in September 1978, according to Hakes. And the president's 1979 budget requested, and received, a huge increase in alternative fuel spending from Congress. (Congress was also keen on photovoltaic cell research.) A 4-cent-per-gallon tax break also encouraged ethanol production.

Carter, an environmentalist, signed the Alaska land conservation act in 1980, protecting 100 million acres of land. It seems contradictory, then, that Carter also touted climate-harming coal as a remedy for America's addition to imported oil.

Equally confounding to environmentalists was Carter's embrace of nuclear power, even after the partial meltdown of a reactor at Three Mile Island in March 1979. The president, with wife Rosalynn and "a lot of reluctant TV cameras" in tow, visited Middletown, Pa., the day after the accident "to prove to the world that nuclear power was safe."

"I thought then, as I do now, that it's absolutely a good alternative supply of electricity," said Carter, who trained as a nuclear engineer in the Navy, while seated underneath an Ansel Adams photograph. "I feel that nuclear power is completely safe if proper safety precautions are enforced."

Carter had bigger problems that spring. High gas prices and long gas lines returned in the aftermath of the Iranian revolution. American, again, faced an unsettled energy future.

On April 5, Carter rolled out another energy plan. By executive order, the president phased out oil price controls to dampen demand for imported crude. Congress eventually passed Carter's "windfall profits tax" to recover the additional money Mobil, Exxon and other companies would've earned with higher prices.

"So the oil companies didn't profit as the price of oil went up," Carter said, with relish. "That's quite different from what it has been lately where oil companies are shaping our national policy."

Carter's tax cost oil companies $227 billion — the largest tax increase on any single U.S. industry. The revenue financed mass transit projects, coal research, loans for ethanol production and renewable-energy incentives for homeowners.

"There's no question Carter had an impact. Unfortunately, most of it was bad," said John Felmy, the American Petroleum Institute's chief economist. "It was an abuse of power to demand that companies owned by shareholders somehow should not be entitled to their hard-earned savings."

Low approval rating

On July 15, 1979, Carter delivered the most important speech of his career — the "crisis of confidence" speech — to another televised audience. Critics dubbed it "the malaise speech."

Another series of oil price boosts and gas shortages combined with a lousy economy had unsettled the nation. Carter's approval rating hovered around 25 percent. Americans were looking to Washington for guidance and hope. Apparently, they didn't get it.

"In a nation that was proud of hard work, strong families, close-knit communities and our faith in God, too many of us now tend to worship self-indulgence and consumption," Carter told the nation. "Human identity is no longer defined by what one does but by what one owns."

The president's brief uptick in the polls belied the impression that he was blaming Americans for the nation's troubles and that Washington was without answers.

"It was one of the best speeches I ever made," Carter said last week. "I was reluctant to make a speech that controversial, but I was discouraged that we couldn't get Congress to move on my major energy legislation."

In early 1980, with the caucus in corn-rich Iowa upcoming, Carter called for $1 billion to stimulate ethanol production.

But Ronald Reagan, with his "morning in America" mantra, won the election. His administration soon began killing off many of Carter's energy initiatives.

Reagan halved the Energy Department's conservation and alternative fuels budget, according to Hakes. Spending on photovoltaic research dropped by two-thirds. Yet tax breaks for ethanol actually increased, prompting a surge in ethanol plant production.

DOJ_NMG_0136688

Reagan's anti-tax, anti-government credo kicked into high gear during his second term. Energy tax credits for homeowners disappeared. With oil prices dropping, more than half of the nation's ethanol producers foundered.

Reagan rolled back fuel-efficiency standards for cars. And, in the summer of 1986, the solar panels atop the White House were taken down.

Reagan "ignored, even derogated, everything I had done," Carter said. "He spent eight years convincing people every problem in the country was my fault and that I was foolish and naive."

Despite the dismantling of many Carter's initiatives, Hakes, Romm and others credit the former president with major energy successes. Oil imports — Carter's energy crucible — dropped significantly during his administration, from 6.6 million to 5.3 million barrels a day, although higher prices and the recession played a role.

Carter boosted renewable fuel usage from 6 percent to 7 percent of the nation's energy demands. He decontrolled oil prices. Oil used to generate electricity disappeared.

Buildings, particularly in the cold Northeast, were insulated. Conservation entered the everyday lexicon. Tax incentives for renewable energy remain.

"We would be in much worse shape today without Carter, especially [regarding] the level of oil imports, greenhouse gas emissions and research on alternative fuels," Hakes said. "But we live in an age now where people want something for nothing. It remains to be seen whether we have the stomach to make the hard [energy] choices."

The United States today imports 12 million barrels of oil daily, or 60 percent of the amount consumed. Gas prices are again on the rise. Renewables still account for only 6 percent of energy use, although Bush has recently promised to boost spending on alternative fuels.

Carter said the White House won't ever ask Americans to sacrifice.

"I haven't seen this administration do anything that would dramatically reduce demand for oil in this country," the ex-president said.

What should Bush do?

"Abandon Exxon and Halliburton and do what's good for this country and good for the American people," Carter responded.

And the likelihood of that happening?

"Zero."

The Truth About Coal (NYT)

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

Last Wednesday, members of the Rainforest Action Network, a scrappy little advocacy group, assembled in New York outside the Citigroup Center, where Merrill Lynch has a branch office. Dressed in top hats, carrying bags of coal and calling themselves “Billionaires for Coal,” the group was protesting what it felt was the hypocrisy of a giant investment bank that proclaims a devout commitment to “environmental excellence” even as it provides financing for dirty power plants.

Merrill is a lead underwriter for TXU, a Dallas-based utility that plans to build a dozen coal-fired power plants in Texas that will add significantly to atmospheric concentrations of carbon dioxide, the main global warming gas. Though Merrill was the protesters’ target, Citigroup must have been feeling queasy. It has also trumpeted its environmental virtues and is among TXU’s lead underwriters.

There are at least two points to be made here. One, obviously, is there is a difference between talk and reality. Much of corporate America now appears to be out in front of the Bush administration in facing up to global warming. Some big players like Pacific Gas and Electric and DuPont seem seriously committed to mandatory controls on carbon dioxide emissions — in sharp contrast to the administration’s voluntary approach.

Others, notably big investment banks, are still doing what comes naturally: seizing opportunities, whether or not those opportunities fit their green posturing. TXU can fairly claim that its plants, outfitted with the latest technology, will emit fewer pollutants that cause smog and acid rain than the clunkers that have been around for 50 years. But these plants will still be using the same basic technology — burning coal, with no ability to capture and dispose of immense amounts of carbon dioxide. That’s distressing from a global warming perspective. It is also distressing because cleaner, if costlier, technologies are available that could capture greenhouse gases before they enter the atmosphere (that is, if TXU or the private equity group that is negotiating to buy the utility were willing to make the investment).

Which leads to the second point: There is a need to put a price on carbon to force companies to abandon older, dirtier technologies for newer, cleaner ones. Right now, everyone is using the atmosphere like a municipal dump, depositing carbon dioxide free. Start charging for the privilege and people will find smarter ways to do business. A carbon tax is one approach. Another is to impose a steadily decreasing cap on emissions and let individual companies figure out ways to stay below the cap.

DOJ_NMG_0136689

Barbara Boxer and Jeff Bingaman, the two senators who will have the most to say about climate change legislation, warned in a recent op-ed piece in The Dallas Morning News that companies like TXU that are racing to complete conventional coal-fired plants (nearly 150 are on the drawing board) will not be grandfathered under any new emissions law. Like any other company, they will be forced to meet their assigned carbon targets — which could be an expensive proposition. A surer way to prevent the construction of these plants is not to warn about such a law, but to pass it.

Marked For Duty (WP)

By Blaine Harden, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

Navy Pursues Dolphin, Sea Lion Patrols in Puget Sound

BAINBRIDGE ISLAND, Wash. -- If they are allowed to police parts of Puget Sound, this is how Navy-trained dolphins and sea lions are expected to nab terrorists in wetsuits:

Using its sonar, a dolphin locates a swimmer approaching Naval Base Kitsap-Bangor, where Trident submarines with long-range nuclear missiles are based. Swimming through the water in spurts of up to 30 mph, the dolphin seeks out and bumps the swimmer with a "nose cup." The device releases a strobe that rises to the surface. An armed Navy security team speeds toward the flashing light.

Alternatively, a sea lion collars swimmers around the piers of the naval base. Sea lions have excellent underwater hearing and, with their large eyes, can see underwater five times as well as people. Carrying a C-shaped leg cuff in its mouth, a sea lion dives, approaches the swimmer from behind and snaps the cuff around one ankle.

Swimmers participating in the training exercises often do not know where the cuff came from and almost never see the sea lion, the Navy says. After the cuffing, the sea lion darts away and a security officer uses a rope to haul in the swimmer.

"This is a mature technology and has been used on a bunch of occasions," said Tom LaPuzza, a spokesman in San Diego for the Navy's Marine Mammal Program, which announced last week that it wants to deploy dolphins and sea lions in Puget Sound.

To bring its technology north, however, the Navy must finesse its way around climatological, legal and political obstacles.

The water in Puget Sound is at least 10 degrees cooler than Atlantic bottlenose dolphins are used to in San Diego or in their native Gulf waters. So when the Navy tried to bring the dolphins north in 1989 and 1993, judges in Seattle agreed with animal rights groups that the dolphins might be harmed. One judge ordered the Navy not to move the dolphins until it studied the health consequences.

And public attitudes in the area toward the use of marine mammals for military purposes are downright icy.

"It is a cruel absurdity," said Jan Bailey, a licensed wildlife rehabilitator who met with a dozen concerned friends and neighbors recently at a community center on Bainbridge Island.

Hoping to embarrass the Navy, Bailey and her group are deploying their own "silly absurdity." They are knitting sweaters and mittens for the dolphins and preparing to deploy the dolphin-loving masses in the Pacific Northwest to attend public hearings next month on the Navy's plan.

Concern generated by the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks has compelled the Navy to give the Puget Sound plan another try, LaPuzza said. He said Defense Department studies make it clear that the Navy must improve its water-based defenses for the Bangor base, home port for 12 submarines.

The Navy considered using combat swimmers and computer-controlled remote vehicles, LaPuzza said, but human swimmers can't match dolphins and sea lions. Comparable machines have not yet been configured, although the Navy is working on it.

The Navy has been training dolphins since the Vietnam War. Dolphins patrolled San Diego harbor in 1996 during the Republican National Convention. Sea lions and dolphins were sent in 2003 to stop swimmers off Bahrain. The Navy has about 100 dolphins and sea lions, most of them in San Diego. About 20 protect Naval Submarine Base Kings Bay in Georgia.

To comply with the federal judge's order to study the effect of cold water on bottlenose dolphins, the Navy has in recent years transported them to waters off Maine, Alaska and Scandinavia.

"The animals did fine," LaPuzza said, but he noted that they spent most of their time in heated enclosures. In Puget Sound, the animals would have heated pens and would be exposed to cold water in short shifts.

But skeptics such as Naomi A. Rose, a marine mammal scientist for the Humane Society of the United States, said that dolphins, a highly social and intelligent species, should not be held captive for any reason. She particularly objects, on ethical grounds, to their being used for military purposes.

"They are not reliable soldiers," she said. "They think they are just having fun."

DOJ_NMG_0136690

Rose said the Navy's marine mammal center in San Diego provides the best veterinarian care in the United States. But keeping dolphins in captivity in a noisy harbor and transporting them around the world causes too much stress, she said. Citing a U.S. government database, she said captive dolphins live about as long as their wild cousins, but no longer. Given that Navy dolphins have medical care, abundant food and protection from predators, Rose said it is worrisome that they do not live longer. She blames stress. The lifespan of a dolphin in the wild is about 30 years.

The Navy says that Rose is wrong and that its dolphins do live considerably longer than creatures in the wild. Everyone agrees that sea lions live longer in the Navy program, mostly because they are protected from sharks and killer whales.

In the four decades that the Navy has been training dolphins -- and taking them on periodic "open ocean walks" where they are free to escape -- nine dolphins have done just that. Rose suggests that the dolphins went AWOL because they preferred life in the wild. The Navy disagrees.

"The way we look at it is they got lost and they are trying to find us as hard as we are trying to find them," LaPuzza said. The disappearances stopped 10 years ago when the Navy outfitted its dolphins with electronic tracking devices called pectoral fin pingers.

A decision on whether Navy dolphins and sea lions will come to Puget Sound is expected to take at least a year. While they wait, dolphin admirers on Bainbridge Island will knit.

"We are looking for neoprene yarn," Bailey said.

Murder On Indian Reservation Offers Glimpse At Broader Violence (LOMPREC)

By Kim Curtis

Lompoc (CA) Record, February 25, 2007

MANCHESTER-POINT ARENA RANCHERIA, Calif. - Marcos Escareno's neighbors say he was raised amid a culture of violence on this tiny American Indian reservation. And residents say the disportionate number of shootings, stabbings and other incidents often go unreported because of a mistrust of law enforcement and a fear of retribution.

At 14, Escareno is the youngest person ever charged as an adult with murder in Mendocino County after he allegedly pointed a hunting rifle into a van window on Feb. 6 and shot Enoc Cruz Salgado, his sister's 21-year-old boyfriend. He has not entered a plea and is being held on $550,000 bail.

Some of the roughly 250 people who make up the Manchester-Point Arena band of Pomo Indians say it was merely an extreme example of the violence that has plagued their tribe. Tribal Chairman Nelson Pinola blames drug and alcohol abuse, combined with a lack of social services on the rugged North Coast where the rancheria is located.

"How do you fix that?" said Pinola, a sheriff's lieutenant in neighboring Sonoma County. "If we could fix it on a reservation, I'd sure like to copyright it."

Although the shooting death of Cruz Salgado was the first homicide at Manchester-Point Arena since 1992, the earliest year for which records were available, violent crimes such as assault, battery, child abuse and shootings occurred here at a higher rate than in the surrounding county.

On the rancheria, the rate of violent crime was about 26 per 100 residents between 2001 and 2006 _ 2 1/2 times that of the surrounding county, where the violent crime rate was 10.3 per 100 people, according to records from the Mendocino sheriff's office, whose jurisdiction excludes the county seat of Ukiah.

Nationally, American Indians experienced a per capita rate of violent crime twice that of the U.S. population as a whole, according to a 2004 report from the U.S. Department of Justice.

Despite the high crime rate, residents insist violence on the reservation is underreported because of suspicion of outsiders, fear of reprisal attacks and concerns about alienating themselves in the community.

One of Escareno's neighbors told The Associated Press he heard gunshots and witnessed other elements of Cruz Salgado's slaying, but he did not tell police because of the tight-knit culture of silence that prevails here.

The man was one of several tribal members who spoke only on condition of anonymity because they fear retribution in the form of attacks on their families or being ostracized by tribal leaders. Each described it as a place where drug abuse, alcoholism and child neglect are rampant, while stabbings and fights occur regularly without ever being reported to authorities.

Lisa Poupart, an associate professor of American Indian studies at the University of Wisconsin, Green Bay, said the reluctance to report crimes is not unusual among native tribes and may stem from a fear of reinforcing stereotypes of "the drunken Indian ... the savage Indian."

"I think there's reluctance among American Indian people to talk about our social problems," said Poupart, a member of the Ojibwa tribe who has studied violence among American Indian families and the unwillingness to report it. "A large part of that silence is about American Indian people not wanting to reinforce an already damaging opinion of Indians."

DOJ_NMG_0136691

The Manchester-Point Arena Rancheria (rancheria is California's designation for a small Indian reservation), is just a few miles off Highway 1, where thousands of sightseers cruise the rugged coastline and admire towering redwoods. But the settlement, a mix of modest single-family homes and decrepit trailers, is hidden from tourists' view.

The median household income is just $23,000 and nearly 30 percent of families live below the poverty level, according to U.S. Census figures. Trash and abandoned cars litter vacant lots near a long-neglected tangle of rusted playground equipment.

Escareno has lived most of his life here, about 140 miles north of San Francisco. His street, Garcia Court, is a cul-de-sac of simple, wooden houses with small yards.

Authorities were already familiar with the family. In 2004, Escareno's mother, Mary Logan, pleaded guilty to beating one of her daughters with a strap, according to court records. The girl, who was wearing a heavy coat, was unharmed, but the incident was reported to Mendocino County Sheriff's deputies.

Escareno, who was 12 at the time, and his two older sisters were removed from their mother's house by Child Protective Services. It's unclear how long the children were in foster care. A CPS spokeswoman refused to comment, citing confidentiality requirements.

Logan received probation and was ordered to attend parenting classes, but she got into another scrape with the law just four months later. She was accused of knocking a man to the floor at a community center dance and hitting him with a beer bottle, according to court records. No charges were filed in that case.

While police won't discuss his criminal history, Marcos was already scheduled for a court appearance on an undisclosed juvenile matter at the time of Cruz Salgado's murder. Several acquaintances also recall violent run-ins with the boy, including one neighbor who said Escareno kicked out her taillights for no apparent reason.

Its part of a pattern on the reservation say neighbors, including the man who says he witnessed the crime: Small, unreported acts of violence multiply and magnify.

"If you let the little things go, it builds up to this," he said, "shootings and stickings."

Poupart said stemming the violence requires that members of the community speak up without fear of being attacked or ostracized themselves.

"This signifies an imbalance and that community has to find balance again," Poupart said. "If not, it perpetuates the cycle that brought about this violence in the first place."

During a court appearance earlier this month in Ukiah, Escareno, who turns 15 in March, shook his head, cried and wiped his face with his shirt sleeve as a judge read the charges. His mother refused to comment outside court, except to say that her son had never been in trouble and she had no idea what happened.

As of Thursday, the family still had not hired a lawyer. Escareno qualified for prosecution as an adult under a 1995 law that lowered the age limit for such prosecutions from 16 to 14.

Pinola, the tribal chairman who lives off the rancheria, in Santa Rosa, said he's optimistic Cruz Salgado's killer will be brought to justice.

"I have the utmost confidence they'll do an adequate investigation," he said. "My job as chairman is to ensure they follow through, solve the crime and make the reservation safe."

A service of the Associated Press(AP)

One of Escareno's neighbors told The Associated Press he heard gunshots and witnessed other elements of Cruz Salgado's slaying, but he did not tell police because of the tight-knit culture of silence that prevails here.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

All Aboard Air Force 2 Reported OK (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 25, 2007

Vice President Dick Cheney's plane from Sydney headed for Singapore today, with the White House saying it was a scheduled refueling stop and that Air Force Two had not been diverted.

Australian Prime Minister John Howard had said earlier that the plane was being diverted to Singapore because of unspecified problems.

White House spokeswoman Emily Lawrimore said there was a problem with a generator but it posed no safety threats and the aircraft and everyone on board were fine. Cheney had been visiting Australia as part of a trip to thank war allies Japan and Australia. She would not say whether Cheney was U.S. bound.

Cheney Wraps Up Japan, Australia Visit (AFP)

DOJ_NMG_0136692

AFP, February 25, 2007

US Vice President Dick Cheney wrapped up a week-long visit to Japan and Australia, a mission to reassure two strong allies buffeted by Washington's strategies for Iraq and North Korea.

Amid a growing chorus calling for the withdrawal of US-led troops from Iraq, Cheney assailed unnamed critics he described as wanting the allies to "turn our backs" on Iraq and Afghanistan and allowing them to become terrorist havens.

In Tokyo, Cheney met with Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe and in Sydney with staunch Iraq war ally Australian Prime Minister John Howard and opposition leader Kevin Rudd, who has called for Australian troops in Iraq to come home.

In Sydney on Saturday, Cheney also issued a warning to Iran, saying that Washington favours a diplomatic approach to resolving concerns over Tehran's atomic programme but refusing to rule out the use of force to prevent the Islamic republic from obtaining nuclear weapons.

"It would be a serious mistake if a nation like Iran were to become a nuclear power," Cheney warned during a joint press conference with Howard. "All options are still on the table."

During the six-day trip, the vice president also defended a landmark nuclear pact with North Korea but insisted the United States was not blindly trusting Pyongyang to abide by its terms.

He pulled out all the stops to allay Japanese concerns about the deal and used his only speech in Australia to soothe worries that Washington was blindly trusting the Stalinist member of US President George W. Bush's "axis of evil" to implement the agreement.

"We go into this deal with our eyes open. In light of North Korea's missile tests last July, its nuclear test in October and its record of proliferation and human rights abuses, the regime in Pyongyang has much to prove," he said.

"Yet this agreement represents the first hopeful step towards a better future for the North Korean people," Cheney said.

Cheney also coupled praise for China's role in securing the accord with a stark warning that Beijing's swift military build-up and its satellite-killer test last month clashed with its hoped-for image as a peaceful world power.

"Last month's anti-satellite test, and China's continued fast-paced military build-up are less constructive, and are not consistent with China's stated goal of a 'peaceful rise'," Cheney said.

China shot down one of its own orbiting weather satellites in space with a ballistic missile, provoking an international outcry amid fears that the rising power could potentially target satellites used for defence.

In Tokyo, Cheney promised US help to Japanese families whose loved ones were abducted by North Korea -- a volatile issue many cite to explain Japan's refusal to fund the new nuclear accord with Pyongyang.

"I know it means a great deal to the Japanese people," Cheney told the parents of Megumi Yokota, who was whisked away on a North Korean ship in 1977 when she was 13.

"I can identify, in fact the whole world can identify, with the emotion of this tragedy. We will do what we can to help," he added, according to a senior aide travelling with the vice president.

Cheney used the trip to make a full-throated defense of the war in Iraq and the new US plan to pacify Baghdad, which has drawn opposition in the United States, as key ally Britain announced a troop draw-down.

With Democrats in Washington and a majority of the US public pushing for a US withdrawal, Cheney warned that hastily quitting Iraq would unleash terrorists and sectarian violence on the Middle East and the world.

"The notion that free countries can turn our backs on what happens in places like Afghanistan, Iraq, or any other possible safe haven for terrorists is an option we simply cannot indulge," said Cheney.

Governors Worry Over Money For Child Health Program (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 24 — As the National Governors Association began its winter meeting, 13 governors expressed alarm on Saturday that they were about to run out of federal money for a popular program that provides health insurance to children.

They appealed to Congress and the Bush administration for swift action to protect hundreds of thousands of children who could lose benefits. The full association is poised to endorse that appeal.

In a letter to the Democratic and Republican leaders of Congress, the 13 governors said that “health insurance for some of our states’ most vulnerable citizens is in jeopardy.”

“Without quick Congressional action,” the letter said, “our states, all facing federal shortfalls, will be forced to make harsh decisions affecting the lives of thousands of families.”

Such decisions could include freezing enrollment, restricting eligibility, increasing premiums charged to low-income families or reducing benefits like dental and vision care.

DOJ_NMG_0136693

Seven of the 13 governors who signed the letter were Republicans. They included Gov. Sonny Perdue of Georgia, chairman of the Republican Governors Association; Gov. Tim Pawlenty of Minnesota, vice chairman of the National Governors Association; and Gov. Haley Barbour of Mississippi, a former chairman of the Republican National Committee.

The Democrats warning of shortfalls in their states were Govs. John Baldacci of Maine, Rod R. Blagojevich of Illinois, Chet Culver of Iowa, James E. Doyle of Wisconsin, Martin O'Malley of Maryland and Deval Patrick of Massachusetts.

The program in question, the State Children's Health Insurance Program, covers more than six million children in families that have too much income to qualify for Medicaid but not enough to buy private insurance.

Gov. Janet Napolitano of Arizona, a Democrat, noted that "many states have expanded, or have proposals to expand, eligibility" for the child health program. "The president's budget is problematic in that regard," Ms. Napolitano said.

In his budget this month, President Bush proposed reducing federal payments to the states for coverage of children with family incomes exceeding twice the poverty level. By contrast, Ms. Napolitano is trying to expand eligibility by raising the income limit in Arizona to 300 percent of the poverty level, from 200 percent.

In New York, Gov. Eliot Spitzer, a Democrat, wants to increase the limit to 400 percent, from 250 percent. (A family of four is considered poor if its annual income is less than $20,650.)

Congress is conducting a comprehensive review of the program, which was created in 1997 with bipartisan support and is up for renewal. By most accounts, the program has been effective, reducing the number of uninsured children by about 25 percent, to 8.3 million in 2005.

The 13 governors said their states needed immediate short-term assistance and could not wait for Congress to revamp the program.

Georgia has announced it will "discontinue enrollment" in its program, known as PeachCare for Kids, on March 11.

In an interview, Dr. Rhonda M. Medows, commissioner of the Georgia Department of Community Health, said the state had a federal allotment of $165 million this year and would need $131 million more to continue serving the 273,000 children on the rolls.

Senator Saxby Chambliss, Republican of Georgia, said these children could "have the insurance safety net jerked out from under them" unless Congress acts.

The federal government spends $5 billion a year on the Children's Health Insurance Program. Mr. Bush wants to continue that level of spending, and he is seeking an "additional allotment" of $4.8 billion over the next five years.

That is considerably less than what states would need to continue their programs with current eligibility rules and benefits. New estimates from the Congressional Budget Office show that the states face shortfalls of $700 million this year and a total shortage of $13.4 billion from 2008 to 2012.

To eliminate these shortfalls, the federal government would need to increase payments to the states by $14.1 billion. But the budget office said 40 percent of the new spending would be offset by savings elsewhere — specifically, in Medicaid.

Karen A. Smigielski, a spokeswoman for the Minnesota Department of Human Services, said her state had a federal allocation of $48.6 million this year, would run out of money in July and would need $15 million to continue the program as it is.

Francis X. Rullan, a spokesman for the Mississippi Division of Medicaid, said his state would exhaust its federal allocation this summer.

In a separate letter to Congress, the National Governors Association criticized a Bush administration proposal to cut federal Medicaid payments to public hospitals and nursing homes. The White House says the changes are needed to ensure the "fiscal integrity" of Medicaid and to curb "excessive payments."

The association denounced the proposal, saying it "will result in cuts of approximately $5 billion in federal Medicaid spending over five years." Moreover, governors said the proposal usurped the states' authority to decide how to finance their share of Medicaid.

OTHER NEWS:

Citizenship Requests Soar Before Changes (LAT)

By Anna Gorman, Jennifer Delson

The Los Angeles Times, February 25, 2007

Citizenship applications are skyrocketing in Southern California and across the nation, as green card holders rush to avoid a proposed fee increase, a revised civics test and possible changes in immigration law.

DOJ_NMG_0136694

Applications filed in Los Angeles and six surrounding counties shot up to 18,024 in January from 7,334 in the same month last year, a 146% increase, according to U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services. Nationwide, the number hit 95,622, up from 53,390, a 79% increase.

The jump — both locally and nationwide — is the largest in a decade, officials said. The numbers of applications first spiked last March with mass immigrant rights rallies and saw the most dramatic increase after the new year.

The filings are expected to continue as Congress prepares to restart the debate on immigration reform.

"Every time we have this much talk of immigration in the news and on the Hill, we get a lot more interest," said CIS spokeswoman Marie Sebrechts. "We tend to see a surge in applications."

After last year's marches, immigrant rights advocates launched a campaign to produce 1 million new citizens and registered voters. They fell far short of their goal by the November election, but advocates said they were pleased with the number of immigrants who are applying for naturalization.

"People are really invested in the entire debate," said Angelica Salas, executive director of the Coalition for Humane Immigrant Rights of Los Angeles. She said many immigrants have asked themselves, "How am I going to protect myself in this country if I am not a U.S. citizen?"

There are an estimated 8 million permanent legal residents who are eligible to apply for citizenship. An additional 12 million illegal immigrants are believed to reside in the United States.

This month, community groups and faith-based organizations are gearing up for another citizenship drive before the proposed new fees and exam would take effect.

The new effort is called, "Ya Es Hora. ¡Ciudadania!" (It's time. Citizenship!) and features media blitzes and workshops to help educate immigrants about the process.

Citizenship application and fingerprint fees would increase from $400 to $675 in June under the CIS proposal, Sebrechts said. And a new test, which would require a better understanding of the nation's history and democratic principles, is set to take effect next year.

"There is a new urgency in the community," said Arturo Vargas, executive director of the National Assn. of Latino Elected and Appointed Officials. "Folks are saying, 'I'd better apply now.'"

William Ramirez, a legal resident from El Salvador, has been eligible to apply for citizenship since last February. When he heard about the new fees, he immediately sought help from the immigrant rights organization, Hermandad Mexicana, in Los Angeles to complete his application.

"If I can do it now, why wait?" said Ramirez, 44, of La Puente. "It's going to save me a lot of money."

Ramirez said he planned to seek legal residency for his wife and young child, now in the country on tourist visas, and is eager to cast his first ballot. "I can do better for my people," he said. "I can help with my vote."

Rancho Cucamonga resident Irene Gonzalez, 32, emigrated with her parents from Mexico when she was 6. After two decades as a green card holder she filed her application for citizenship last week.

When she was younger, Gonzalez said, she felt as though becoming a U.S. citizen would be a betrayal of her native Mexico. Now, she says, "I want to have that peace of mind that I am a citizen and I have every right to be in this country."

Who may apply

Green card holders — legal permanent residents — can apply for citizenship after living five years in the United States, or three years if they are married to a U.S. citizen. They must pass civics and English tests, be of "good moral character" and take an oath of allegiance.

CIS must raise application costs because it does not have a regular budget allocation. Rather, it relies almost entirely on fees to support itself and is facing a budget shortfall, Sebrechts said. The agency plans to switch from paper to electronic filing, which she said would make the application process more efficient and secure.

On Saturday,potential citizens throughout Southern California went to schools, community colleges and other locations, including a Mexican restaurant in Lynwood, for help in completing their applications. Kidworks, a Santa Ana faith-based community center, sponsored one of the workshops.

"In light of the climate right now," said Ava Steaffens, chief executive officer, "it's necessary to give people the tools to become full-fledged citizens."

Some local colleges have seen citizenship class attendance more than double in the last six months. For example, at Los Angeles Southwest College, class attendance has jumped from 180 to 400 since the fall, said Marian Ruane, a program coordinator at the school.

Garden Grove resident Mariana Garcia, 34, who marched for immigrant rights in Santa Ana last year, has been eligible to apply for citizenship for more than two decades after emigrating from Mexico. She said the desire to vote was the main reason she wanted to become a citizen.

DOJ_NMG_0136695

"We've seen so many people say that immigrants contribute nothing and take too much," she said. "We need to be voters to make a statement to the contrary."

Media campaign

Spanish-language media is also playing a part in encouraging citizenship and registering voters. La Opinion, a Los Angeles newspaper, recently ran a full-page advertisement explaining how to apply. Univision's KMEX television station has dedicated significant airtime to promoting citizenship workshops.

Popular radio deejay Eddie "El Piolin" Sotelo began an on-air contest called "Who Wants to be a Citizen?" Listeners from around the country can win trips and cash prizes by answering questions from the citizenship exam: What are the three branches of the U.S. government? Who signs bills into law? What is the Fourth of July?

With disco music playing in the background, Sotelo stood in Univision's Glendale studios last week and talked with Pedro, a Mexican immigrant in Phoenix. He directed Pedro to choose from four envelopes, each containing a question and a prize, and told him he could call a friend for help.

Pedro chose #2, and Sotelo recited the question in Spanish: What is the head executive of a state government called? A. President. B. Governor. C. Mayor.

When Pedro responded, Sotelo teased him. "D? I only gave you three: A, B and C," Sotelo said.

"B — de Burro," Pedro repeated loudly.

"Correct!" Sotelo cheered, his arms waving. "Congratulations!"

Then Pedro opened the envelope to see what he had won.

"Three-hundred dollars!" Sotelo cheered. "You won a day's work!"

Pedro laughed and corrected him: "Two days."

Influencing the future

Increased citizenship could influence politics nationally and locally if the new citizens register to vote and get to the polls, said Leo Chavez, a political anthropology professor at UC Irvine.

"As more immigrants vote, it will be harder to attack immigrants," Chavez said. "They will be the constituency."

Anti-illegal immigration groups, however, say they are not especially concerned about the surge in citizenship applications and what influence it might have on the national debate.

"It's not clear that the impact is what some immigrant rights advocates think it might be," said Steven Camarota, director of research for the conservative Center for Immigration Studies in Washington, D.C. "On a policy issue like immigration, there is a lot of diversity of views.... The group does not speak with one voice on this issue."

How To Keep America Competitive (WP)

By Bill Gates

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

For centuries people assumed that economic growth resulted from the interplay between capital and labor. Today we know that these elements are outweighed by a single critical factor: innovation.

Innovation is the source of U.S. economic leadership and the foundation for our competitiveness in the global economy. Government investment in research, strong intellectual property laws and efficient capital markets are among the reasons that America has for decades been best at transforming new ideas into successful businesses.

The most important factor is our workforce. Scientists and engineers trained in U.S. universities -- the world's best -- have pioneered key technologies such as the microprocessor, creating industries and generating millions of high-paying jobs.

But our status as the world's center for new ideas cannot be taken for granted. Other governments are waking up to the vital role innovation plays in competitiveness.

This is not to say that the growing economic importance of countries such as China and India is bad. On the contrary, the world benefits as more people acquire the skills needed to foster innovation. But if we are to remain competitive, we need a workforce that consists of the world's brightest minds.

Two steps are critical. First, we must demand strong schools so that young Americans enter the workforce with the math, science and problem-solving skills they need to succeed in the knowledge economy. We must also make it easier for foreign-born scientists and engineers to work for U.S. companies.

Education has always been the gateway to a better life in this country, and our primary and secondary schools were long considered the world's best. But on an international math test in 2003, U.S. high school students ranked 24th out of 29 industrialized nations surveyed.

Our schools can do better. Last year, I visited High Tech High in San Diego; it's an amazing school where educators have augmented traditional teaching methods with a rigorous, project-centered curriculum. Students there know they're expected to go on to college. This combination is working: 100 percent of High Tech High graduates are accepted into college, and 29 percent major in math or science. Contrast that with the national average of 17 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0136696

To remain competitive in the global economy, we must build on the success of such schools and commit to an ambitious national agenda for education. Government and businesses can both play a role. Companies must advocate for strong education policies and work with schools to foster interest in science and mathematics and to provide an education that is relevant to the needs of business. Government must work with educators to reform schools and improve educational excellence.

American competitiveness also requires immigration reforms that reflect the importance of highly skilled foreign-born employees. Demand for specialized technical skills has long exceeded the supply of native-born workers with advanced degrees, and scientists and engineers from other countries fill this gap.

This issue has reached a crisis point. Computer science employment is growing by nearly 100,000 jobs annually. But at the same time studies show that there is a dramatic decline in the number of students graduating with computer science degrees.

The United States provides 65,000 temporary H-1B visas each year to make up this shortfall -- not nearly enough to fill open technical positions.

Permanent residency regulations compound this problem. Temporary employees wait five years or longer for a green card. During that time they can't change jobs, which limits their opportunities to contribute to their employer's success and overall economic growth.

Last year, reform on this issue stalled as Congress struggled to address border security and undocumented immigration. As lawmakers grapple with those important issues once again, I urge them to support changes to the H-1B visa program that allow American businesses to hire foreign-born scientists and engineers when they can't find the homegrown talent they need. This program has strong wage protections for U.S. workers: Like other companies, Microsoft pays H-1B and U.S. employees the same high levels -- levels that exceed the government's prevailing wage.

Reforming the green card program to make it easier to retain highly skilled professionals is also necessary. These employees are vital to U.S. competitiveness, and we should welcome their contribution to U.S. economic growth.

We should also encourage foreign students to stay here after they graduate. Half of this country's doctoral candidates in computer science come from abroad. It's not in our national interest to educate them here but send them home when they've completed their studies.

During the past 30 years, U.S. innovation has been the catalyst for the digital information revolution. If the United States is to remain a global economic leader, we must foster an environment that enables a new generation to dream up innovations, regardless of where they were born. Talent in this country is not the problem -- the issue is political will.

The writer is chairman of Microsoft Corp. and co-chairman of the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation. His wife is a director of The Washington Post Co.

Christian Right Labors To Find '08 Candidate (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 24 — A group of influential Christian conservatives and their allies emerged from a private meeting at a Florida resort this month dissatisfied with the Republican presidential field and uncertain where to turn.

The event was a meeting of the Council for National Policy, a secretive club whose few hundred members include Dr. James C. Dobson of Focus on the Family, the Rev. Jerry Falwell of Liberty University and Grover Norquist of Americans for Tax Reform. Although little known outside the conservative movement, the council has become a pivotal stop for Republican presidential primary hopefuls, including George W. Bush on the eve of his 1999 primary campaign.

But in a stark shift from the group's influence under President Bush, the group risks relegation to the margins. Many of the conservatives who attended the event, held at the beginning of the month at the Ritz-Carlton on Amelia Island, Fla., said they were dismayed at the absence of a champion to carry their banner in the next election.

Many conservatives have already declared their hostility to Senator John McCain of Arizona, despite his efforts to make amends for having once denounced Christian conservative leaders as "agents of intolerance," and to former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani of New York, because of his liberal views on abortion and gay rights and his three marriages.

Many were also suspicious of former Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts; members have used the council as a conduit to distribute a dossier prepared by a Massachusetts conservative group about liberal elements of his record on abortion, stem cell research and gay rights. (Mr. Romney has worked to convince conservatives that his views have changed.)

And some members of the council have raised doubts about lesser known candidates — Gov. Mike Huckabee of Arkansas and Representative Duncan Hunter of California, who were invited to Amelia Island to address an elite audience of about 60 of its members, and Senator Sam Brownback of Kansas, who spoke to the full council at its previous meeting, in October in Grand Rapids, Mich.

DOJ_NMG_0136697

Although each of the three had supporters, many conservatives expressed concerns about whether any of the candidates could unify their movement or raise enough money to overtake the front-runners, several participants in the meetings said.

Finally, in a measure of their dissatisfaction, a delegation of prominent conservatives at Amelia Island tried to enlist as a candidate Gov. Mark Sanford of South Carolina, a guest speaker at the event. A charismatic politician with a clear conservative record, Mr. Sanford is almost unknown outside his home state and has done nothing to prepare for a presidential run. He firmly declined the group's entreaties, people involved in the recruiting effort said. A spokesman for Mr. Sanford said he would not comment.

"There is great anxiety," said Paul Weyrich, chairman of the Free Congress Foundation. "There is no outstanding conservative, and they are all looking for that."

Mr. Weyrich, a longtime member of the council, declined to discuss the group or its meetings. The council's bylaws forbid members from publicly disclosing its membership or activities, and participants agreed to discuss the Amelia Island meeting only on the condition of anonymity.

For eight years and four elections, President Bush forged a singular alliance with Christian conservatives — including dispatching administration officials and even cabinet members to address council meetings — that put them at the center of the Republican Party.

But in the aftermath of the stinging defeats in the midterm elections, and with discontent over the Iraq war weighing heavily on the public, some Christian conservatives worry that they may find themselves on the sidelines of the presidential race.

Both Mr. McCain and Mr. Romney have worked hard to pitch themselves to Christian conservatives — Mr. McCain by delivering speeches at venues like Mr. Falwell's Liberty University or a recent abstinence-promotion event, Mr. Romney by leading the charge for a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage. But neither has won over many of the movement's leaders.

The conservative concern may also be an ominous sign for the Republican Party about the morale of a core element of its political base. Conservatives warn that the 2008 election could shape up like 1996, when conservatives faced a lesser-of-two evils choice between a Republican they distrusted, former Senator Bob Dole, and a Democrat they disdained, President Bill Clinton. Dr. Dobson of Focus on the Family later said in a speech to the council that he voted for a conservative third-party candidate that year rather than pull a lever for Mr. Dole.

The Council for National Policy was founded 25 years ago by the Rev. Tim LaHaye as a forum for conservative Christians to strategize about turning the country to the right. Its secrecy was intended to insulate the group from what its members considered the liberal bias of the news media. In recent years the group has brought together a cross-section of the right from Edwin J. Feulner to Wayne LaPierre of the National Rifle Association.

In addition to doubts about their ability to generate enough money and momentum, each candidate who addressed the group also faces initial skepticism from one faction or another on issues like immigration, trade, taxes and foreign affairs.

"Right now there is still a vacuum among conservative Republicans," said Gary Bauer, a Christian conservative who was a Republican primary candidate in 2000. Conservatives, he said, "want a more provable conservative who also is demonstrating that they can put together the resources necessary to prevail." He declined to comment on the Amelia Island meeting.

A spokesman for Mr. Brownback said he would not comment on the senator's presentation to the council, citing its rules about strict confidentiality. Several others who attended his speech said he received heavy applause for his emphasis on restricting abortion and amending the Constitution to ban same-sex marriage. But foes of illegal immigration objected to his support for a temporary guest worker program, and some faulted him for touching only briefly on the threat of Islamic terrorists, an increasingly central focus of the council and many social conservative groups since the Sept. 11 attacks.

(People who attended the Amelia Island event said Rick Santorum, the former senator from Pennsylvania, delivered a well-received address to the council about what he called the gathering threat of radical Islam.)

In an interview, Mr. Hunter, the ranking Republican on the House Armed Services Committee and a supporter of Mr. Bush's plan to send more troops to Iraq, said the need for a strong national defense was the centerpiece of his speech. That defense, he argued, should include cracking down on illegal immigration, building a wall along the Mexican border and renegotiating foreign trade deals to protect American manufacturing. "We are losing the arsenal of the democracy," he said.

But several people at the council meeting said his stance on trade alienated the business wing of the Republican Party, compounding his substantial fund-raising challenges.

Mr. Huckabee, a Southern Baptist minister who was the head of the Arkansas Baptist convention before becoming governor, has the advantage of strong personal ties to many council members. Many prominent evangelical Christians consider him a friend, and he has appeared several times as a guest on Dr. Dobson's popular Christian radio program.

DOJ_NMG_0136698

In an interview, Mr. Huckabee said he believed his roots in the evangelical world helped set him apart from his rivals. “I am not going to them,” he said. “I am coming from them.” He said he did not remember speaking about his opposition to abortion or same-sex marriage, “although I am sure that I must have.” He said he emphasized education, among other issues, and talked about a continuing war “with a radical form of Islamic fascism,” which he called “a bastardization of religion.”

But many conservatives, including several participants in the Amelia Island meeting, said Mr. Huckabee faced resistance from the limited-government, antitax wing of their movement. Some antitax activists fault Mr. Huckabee for presiding over tax and spending increases. (He says the only tax increase resulted from a public referendum.)

In the interview, though, Mr. Huckabee said he was now leaning toward signing a pledge not to raise income taxes that is presented to all the candidates by Mr. Norquist of Americans for Tax Reform.

Mr. Norquist said he remained open to any of the three candidates who spoke to the council or to Mr. Romney. He argued that with the right promises, any of the four could redeem themselves in the eyes of the conservative movement despite their past records, just as some high school students take abstinence pledges even after having had sex.

“It’s called secondary virginity,” Mr. Norquist said. “It is a big movement in high school and also available for politicians.”

Romney Misstates Past Bush View On Abortion (POL)

By Mike Allen

The Politico, February 24, 2007

Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney said this week that President Bush “was pro-choice before he became pro-life,” an assertion the Romney campaign now acknowledges was inaccurate. The remark was based on a magazine article Romney had read, his campaign said.

The comment came as Romney struggled to explain to Republican presidential primary voters the evolution of his views on abortion since he described himself as “pro-choice” when he ran for U.S. Senate in Massachusetts in 1994. Now, Romney says on his campaign Web site: “I am pro-life. I believe that abortion is the wrong choice except in cases of incest, rape, and to save the life of the mother.”

In interviews and speeches, Romney has said that his view changed after the question of stem-cell research came to the fore in the Massachusetts legislature in 2004. His advisers point out that he has not tried to have it both ways or weasel on his stance.

Romney made the comment about the president during a 15-minute interview on Thursday with the Spartanburg (S.C.) Herald-Journal. Here is the exchange, which was recorded and is posted on the Campaign 2008 blog on the newspaper’s Web site:

Question: “Bloggers like to call it ‘flip flopping,’ the way you've changed your views on issues like abortion over the years. I've heard the story about stem cell research that caused you to change your mind on abortion and come to your current position. But will conservatives here buy that? Doesn't that give off the impression that you'll do whatever it takes to win?”

Romney: "Ronald Reagan was pro-choice, and became pro-life. I understand that George W. Bush was pro-choice before he came pro-life. Zell Miller was pro-choice before pro-life. And I was effectively pro-choice before I became pro-life. I don't think anyone questions the commitment on the part of those other gentlemen for pro-life principles. And, in my case, you don't have to take my word for it. You can look at my record as governor, because I made the move to pro-life some time ago. I've been governor. I've had several bills that came to my desk that raised the question of abortion or life, and I came down on the side of respecting the sanctity of human life every time.”

The White House said Bush has always been "pro-life." During the presidential race of 2000, Dan Bartlett – then a spokesman for the Bush campaign, now the White House counselor – was asked about a quotation from a Texas newspaper in 1978 suggesting Bush’s position had been unclear. Bartlett told The Washington Post: “The governor was pro-life before he ran for Congress, during his run for Congress and after he ran for Congress.” A White House official said Friday that Bartlett's quote is still accurate today.

Romney's campaign said the comment was off the cuff and was based on a National Review article, which remained on Romney's Web site Saturday morning, asserting that "George W. Bush ran as a pro-choice politician in his 1978 congressional campaign."

Organizers for Romney have criticized Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., one of his opponents in the primary, for being insufficiently zealous in opposing abortion.

Romney has been working to retool his image on the issue since at least 2001, when he came to Salt Lake City as president of the organizing committee for the 2002 Winter Olympics. The Salt Lake Tribune reported in July 2001 that he wrote in a letter to the editor of the paper: “I do not wish to be labeled pro-choice. … I have never felt comfortable with the labels associated with the abortion issue. Because the Olympics is not about politics, I plan to keep my views on political issues to myself." Romney was objecting to an earlier article in the paper reporting that he might seek office in Utah after the games. It included the sentence: “Romney is pro-choice.”

DOJ_NMG_0136699

Romney Family Tree Has Polygamy Branch (AP)

By Jennifer Dobner, Glen Johnson

AP, February 24, 2007

While Mitt Romney condemns polygamy and its prior practice by his Mormon church, the Republican presidential candidate's great-grandfather had five wives and at least one of his great-great grandfathers had 12.

Polygamy was not just a historical footnote, but a prominent element in the family tree of the former Massachusetts governor now seeking to become the first Mormon president.

Romney's great-grandfather, Miles Park Romney, married his fifth wife in 1897. That was more than six years after Mormon leaders banned polygamy and more than three decades after a federal law barred the practice.

Romney's great-grandmother, Hannah Hood Hill, was the daughter of polygamists. She wrote vividly in her autobiography about how she "used to walk the floor and shed tears of sorrow" over her own husband's multiple marriages.

Romney's great-great grandfather, Parley Pratt, an apostle in the church, had 12 wives. In an 1852 sermon, Parley Pratt's brother and fellow apostle, Orson Pratt, became the first church official to publicly proclaim and defend polygamy as a direct revelation from God.

Romney's father, former Michigan Gov. George Romney, was born in Chihuahua, Mexico, where Mormons fled in the 1800s to escape religious persecution and U.S. laws forbidding polygamy. He and his family did not return to the United States until 1912, more than two decades after the church issued "The Manifesto" banning polygamy.

"When you read the family's history, you realize how important polygamy was to them," said Todd Compton, a Mormon and independent historian who wrote a book about the polygamous life of the church's founder, Joseph Smith. "They left America and started again as pioneers, after they had done it over and over again previously."

B. Carmon Hardy, a polygamy expert and retired history professor at California State University-Fullerton, said polygamy was "a very important part of Miles Park Romney's family."

Hardy added: "Now, very gradually, as you moved farther away from it, it became less a part of it. But during the time of Miles Park Romney, it was an essential principle of the Romney family life."

Other Mormons have run for the White House, including Romney's father in 1968 and Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, in 2000. But Mitt Romney's stature as a leading 2008 contender has renewed questions about his faith and its doctrines.

At the same time, polygamy remains a part of current events.

HBO is airing a television series, "Big Love," that features a man in Utah — where the Mormon church is based — with three wives. Self-proclaimed "Mormon fundamentalist" Warren Jeffs, formerly on the FBI's 10 most wanted list, is facing multiple felony charges for sex crimes related to underage marriages among members of his breakaway church's 10,000 members in Utah and Arizona, who openly practice polygamy.

Romney has joked about polygamy, saying in various settings that to him, "marriage is between a man and a woman ... and a woman and a woman." But in serious moments he has called the practice "bizarre" and noted his church excommunicates those who engage in it.

An introductory film played at his fundraisers and campaign appearances features his wife, Ann, talking about their 37-year marriage. Romney himself notes they started as high school sweethearts.

This month, Ann Romney tried a different tack, taking a lighthearted jab at her husband's main Republican competitors, Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani, as she introduced Romney at a Missouri GOP dinner.

The biggest difference between her husband and the other candidates, Ann Romney said, is that "he's had only one wife."

McCain has been married twice; Giuliani three times.

The Romney campaign had no comment for this story.

Joseph Smith, who founded the Mormon church in 1830, quietly introduced polygamy. He believed it had roots in the Old Testament and was necessary to reach the highest salvation in heaven. Smith is believed to have had 33 wives.

Brigham Young expanded the practice after the church's migration from the Midwest to Utah, which began in 1846. He is said to have had 55 wives. Historical texts show Young also asked Orson Pratt to publicly proclaim the church's belief in polygamy in 1852.

In 1862, while Utah was a territory, President Abraham Lincoln signed the Morrill Anti-Bigamy Act, banning plural marriage. In 1882, Congress also passed the Edmunds Act, an anti-polygamy law. That was followed in 1887 by the Edmunds-Tucker Act, which disincorporated the church and threatened to seize its nonreligious real estate as part of the crackdown on polygamy.

DOJ_NMG_0136700

In 1890, Mormon President Wilford Woodruff issued "The Manifesto," in which he declared the church no longer taught or permitted plural marriages.

Nonetheless, the law of polygamy — Smith's revelation that God authorized polygamy — remains in Article 132 of the church's Doctrine and Covenants. In addition, Mormon widowers who remarry today believe they will live in eternity with their multiple wives.

Mormon genealogical records, among the most detailed and complete of any religion, show that two of Mitt Romney's great-great grandfathers, Miles Romney and Parley Pratt, had 12 wives each.

Compton, the polygamy scholar, disputes that. He believes Miles Romney only had one wife because the records do not show the dates for his other 11 marriages or any offspring from them.

Miles Romney and his one clearly documented wife, Elizabeth Gaskell, had 10 children. Among them was Miles Park Romney, one of Mitt Romney's great-grandfathers.

Miles Park Romney had five wives. With his first wife, Hannah Hood Hill, he had 11 children. Among them was Gaskell Romney, Mitt Romney's paternal grandfather.

Hannah Hood Hill's autobiography offers an eyewitness account of the Romney family's polygamous past. Hardy, the Cal-State historian, found it amid research for his upcoming book, "Doing the Works of Abraham: Mormon Polygamy."

Hood Hill wrote of Miles Park Romney: "I felt that was more than I could endure, to have him divide his time and affections from me. I used to walk the floor and shed tears of sorrow. If anything will make a woman's heart ache, it is for her husband to take another wife. ... But I put my trust in my heavenly father, and prayed and pleaded with him to give me strength to bear this great trial."

Miles Park Romney's final marriage, to Emily Eyring Smith, came in 1897, more than six years after "The Manifesto."

Gaskell Romney, Mitt Romney's grandfather, was not a polygamist. He married Anna Amelia Pratt, the daughter of polygamists and the granddaughter of Parley Pratt, the apostle with 12 wives. Their marriage took place Feb. 20, 1895, in Dublan, Mexico.

Gaskell Romney had moved to Mexico with his parents in 1884 amid the proliferation of U.S. laws prohibiting "unlawful cohabitation." Anna Pratt was born in Utah, but had emigrated to Mexico and lived in one of nine Mormon colonies established over the border.

Gaskell Romney and Anna Pratt had seven children, including George Wilcken Romney, the former Michigan governor. He lived with his parents in Mexico until 1912, when the family returned to the United States.

George Romney married Lenore LaFount, who does not appear to have polygamy in her family tree. The couple, now deceased, had four children, including Mitt Romney.

Clinton Fights To Keep Impeachment Taboo (WP)

By Anne E. Kornblut, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

After Spat, Campaigns Know to Expect Swift Reprisal for Any Hint of the Scandal

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton has a new commandment for the 2008 presidential field: Thou shalt not mention anything related to the impeachment of her husband.

With a swift response to attacks from a former supporter last week, advisers to the New York Democrat offered a glimpse of their strategy for handling one of the most awkward chapters of her biography. They declared her husband's impeachment in 1998 -- or, more accurately, the embarrassing personal behavior that led to it -- taboo, putting her rivals on notice and all but daring other Democrats to mention the ordeal again.

"In the end, voters will decide what's off-limits, but I can't imagine that the public will reward the politics of personal destruction," senior Clinton adviser Howard Wolfson said Friday, when asked whether the impeachment is fair game for Clinton's opponents. Earlier in the week, Wolfson dismissed references to President Bill Clinton's conduct as "under the belt."

But the reality, of course, is that the impeachment was conducted very much in public.

As Clinton aides spent several days batting down insults made by David Geffen, the Hollywood mogul who raised questions about the former president's personal behavior and praised Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) in a provocative interview, the intra-party brawl suggested that the scandal remains something of a tripwire for Clinton.

Although she has spent the past seven years establishing her own identity as a public servant, Clinton has been embracing the more popular aspects of her husband's presidency more widely as she mounts her own campaign, with frequent references to their time together in the White House and their joint legacy.

And as she has invoked the good Bill Clinton, she has risked invoking the bad, several Democratic strategists said.

DOJ_NMG_0136701

"She's using him in this campaign, so why can't somebody else use him?" asked a veteran of Democratic presidential politics who is not currently aligned with a candidate but who, like numerous other Democrats, spoke on the condition of anonymity for fear of angering the Clintons. "She's just made him fair game. He's part of her strategy, so why can't he be part of one of her opponents'?"

The turmoil of the later Clinton years has been a theme of national politics since it occurred: George W. Bush ran in 2000 on a promise to "restore honor and dignity to the Oval Office," while Vice President Al Gore campaigned as a solid family man, distancing himself from the impeachment ordeal.

For the 2008 campaign, it is an automatic subtext of the Obama candidacy. Presenting himself as a relative political newcomer untainted by the warfare that culminated in Clinton's impeachment, Obama in his most recent book, "The Audacity of Hope," described the battles of the 1990s as "the psychodrama of the Baby Boom generation." Without specifically mentioning the Monica Lewinsky scandal in an interview last October, Obama praised Bill Clinton for bridging party divides on certain issues but said the former president was in other ways "trapped by his own biography."

Still, the entire episode had been largely airbrushed from the public Democratic dialogue about the 1990s -- particularly Hillary Clinton's -- until last week.

And Clinton advisers express confidence that any explicit attempt to revive the scandal would instantly backfire, particularly among Democratic primary voters who were outraged by the Republican investigation into her husband when it first occurred. (One Clinton official said donations to her campaign spiked when the Geffen interview was published.) The former first lady's popularity ratings have never been higher than when her husband's affair with a young intern burst into the open and cast her in the role of victim. After a successful Senate bid, she became a colleague, and even an ally, with some of the Republicans who had sought to unseat her husband -- seemingly putting the whole thing to rest.

But the issue has lingered at the edges of the nomination battle, starting with Clinton's quip about her experience with "evil and bad men" at a forum last month in Iowa on her debut trip to the early-caucus state. While many in the audience assumed she was referring to her husband, several Clinton advisers said it was more likely a dig at Kenneth W. Starr, the independent counsel in the inquiry into Bill Clinton, or Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.), who as House speaker vigorously pursued impeachment -- in either case still a reference to that rancorous time.

In his interview with Maureen Dowd of the New York Times, Geffen, a onetime Clinton fundraiser, gave voice to fears privately held by some Democrats that Republicans intend to revisit past Clinton issues and try to dig up new ones.

"I don't think anybody believes that in the last six years, all of a sudden Bill Clinton has become a different person," Geffen said. Speaking of Republicans' view of the former first lady, he said: "I think they believe she's the easiest to defeat."

Geffen also attacked Hillary Clinton on other fronts, including her vote to authorize the war in Iraq and subsequent refusal to apologize for it, and he described the Clintons as deceitful.

The Clinton campaign's response was fast and unyielding: Advisers issued a statement demanding that Obama renounce his ties to Geffen, who had just thrown the Illinois senator a $1.3 million fundraiser. When Obama refused, and an Obama spokesman issued a statement pointing out that Geffen had once been the Clintons' guest in the Lincoln Bedroom of the White House, Clinton officials pushed back once more. They accused Obama of failing to live by the principles of positive campaigning he proclaimed. Obama later said he had not authorized his campaign's statement.

Advisers to both Clinton and Obama spent the latter part of last week deconstructing the tussle; each camp publicly argued that its candidate had won the round and that the other side had suffered.

But privately, both sides admitted to "learning lessons" from the brawl. One Clinton adviser said that some outside supporters had expressed misgivings about helping to keep the story alive, even though the senator and her inner circle of aides signed off on a forceful response from the start. On the Obama side, advisers expressed regret for running with a response from which the candidate later distanced himself.

Supporters of both Obama and Clinton indicated that they had little appetite for keeping the debate alive.

Greg Craig, a prominent Washington lawyer who represented Clinton during the Senate's inquiry and is now supporting Obama, declined to echo Geffen's concerns about the Clintons as a reason for his defection.

"You're not going to get me to talk about Hillary in any kind of negative way -- I know that's the topic of the day," Craig said in an interview last week. "I think Obama is uniquely qualified by temperament and experience, as well as by judgment, to lead the country and to bring us together."

Former senator Thomas A. Daschle (D-S.D.), who was minority leader in 1999 when Clinton was acquitted in that chamber, also endorsed Obama, in an announcement last week. But Daschle, too, limited himself to a citation of Obama's credentials in explaining his decision, comparing Obama to the Kennedys of the 1960s and saying in an interview that he hoped to have found a "new leader that will have that kind of effect on young people."

DOJ_NMG_0136702

And on the Clinton side, one adviser expressed confidence that "attacking Bill Clinton is a losing strategy," borrowing a phrase from the 1990s. The adviser noted that Clinton remains highly popular among Democratic activists. Close supporter James Carville said that mentioning the impeachment would be tantamount to political suicide. "Nothing is off-limits, but it would be awfully stupid," Carville said. "What do you think attitudes among Democrats are about impeachment and Ken Starr? This is not a Washington dinner party here. This is an election, a nominating process, among Democrats."

Beware The Dreaded 'Clinton Machine' (LAT)

By Jonathan Chait

The Los Angeles Times, February 25, 2007

IT IS AN odd article of faith among conservatives that Hillary Clinton is a sure-fire lock to win the Democratic presidential nomination. You can hardly turn on Fox News without hearing some pundit assure viewers that Clinton is the runaway favorite. But this belief says more about them than it does about her. The belief in her invincibility is a product of their deepest fears.

After all, it's not as though conservatives think that Clinton is a brilliant, natural politician. Nobody does — as a backslapper and as a public speaker, she's decidedly average. When they try to talk about why Clinton inevitably will roll over her primary competition, they usually invoke the dreaded "Clinton machine." A recent Wall Street Journal editorial, for instance, asserted that Clinton is the clear favorite but offered little evidence to support this other than the existence of "those Clinton legions — of fundraisers, union chiefs, party bosses, think tank operatives, media consultants."

Conservatives rarely make clear exactly how this dreaded machine is supposed to mow down the competition. Other candidates have fundraisers, union supporters, media consultants and the like.

Is the idea that Clinton's team is so battle-tested from her husband's presidency that it knows how to play the game far better than the competition? It's a plausible theory, but so far it doesn't seem to be working out that way.

A week ago, South Carolina state Sen. Robert Ford, a Clinton supporter, declared that having a black man at the top of the Democratic Party would doom the entire ticket. That, of course, was just the thing Barack Obama wanted — a chance to stand up for the right of African Americans to run for president. "When folks were saying, 'We're going to march for our freedom,' they said, 'You can't do that,' " he said in his next speech. "When somebody said, 'You can't sit at the lunch counter…. You can't do that.' " It was the highlight of Obama's speech, all thanks to a blundering attack by a Clinton surrogate.

Then there is the continuing controversy surrounding Clinton's 2002 vote to authorize the Iraq war. Clinton's advisors have apparently decided that she will never apologize for the vote, as doing so would make her look weak in the general election. Which may be true, except that her war vote is hounding her everywhere she goes, the first primaries are nearly a year away and the war keeps getting worse.

So Clinton looks extremely vulnerable. Why do so many conservatives insist that she's a lock to get the nomination?

A few of them have a strong vested interest in the Hillary Clinton boogeyman. There's an enormous amount of money to be made in scaring the pants off of conservatives about Clinton. Last year, conservative pundit John Podhoretz published the fear-mongering screed "Can She Be Stopped?" "Hillary Rodham Clinton will become the next president of the United States unless you Republicans can find a way to stop her," he warned. I'm guessing the way of stopping her involved, among other things, buying Podhoretz's book.

The bigger factor, I think, is that conservatives are spooked by the Clintons. They had Bill Clinton on the ropes when they took control of Congress after the 1994 elections. He beat back their revolution. They had him again a few years later when they caught him with his pants down and made his misbehavior a theme of the 1998 midterm elections. Instead, Democrats won seats.

In the Republican mind, there must have been some sort of Clinton voodoo at work. The public was on their side, they believe, yet through some sort of nefarious dark political art, he turned the tables on them.

The conservative hatred of the Clintons has always had around the edges a certain fear of the supernatural. A famous 1993 American Spectator cover story depicted Hillary Clinton as a witch. A witch is an object of hatred, of course, but also a creature with dark and frightening powers.

In reality, the public never really was on the Republicans' side. Yes, they gave them control of Congress in 1994, but a majority of Americans opposed the deep cuts in popular social programs that the GOP agenda required. And yes, the public was disgusted by Bill Clinton's adultery, but a majority likewise opposed impeachment all along. Stopping these wildly unpopular things didn't require magic or even a fearsome political machine.

And Then There Was One (WP)

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

More presidential candidates agree to reveal their big fundraisers. Still missing: Sen. Clinton.

DOJ_NMG_0136703

THIS COULD be the first presidential campaign since Watergate to be financed entirely with private funds. The two major--party nominees alone may raise and spend $1 billion combined. Under these circumstances, the inadequacy of campaign finance disclosure rules becomes even more glaring.

While campaigns are required to report the names of individuals who contribute the maximum $2,300, they don't have to provide the really important information: Who are the well-connected fundraisers helping them bring in big bundles of cash? That's why we've been suggesting that the presidential candidates should release voluntarily the identities of their big bundlers and, within some range, the amounts they raised. In the past few days, two leading contenders, Democrat John Edwards and Republican Rudolph W. Giuliani, agreed to provide such disclosure. They join Democrat Barack Obama and Republicans John McCain and Mitt Romney, who had already made that promise.

You may have noticed one prominent figure absent from this picture: Hillary Rodham Clinton. Ms. Clinton, who raised almost $40 million for her Senate reelection campaign, has assembled a formidable fundraising machine. Her campaign is tasking its biggest bundlers with bringing in $1 million or more. Her campaign solicits "Hillraisers" to enlist online and set their own fundraising goals. In other words, the campaign is fully aware of how much individual fundraisers collect on its behalf. But voters remain in the dark about the identities of those to whom candidate Clinton -- or President Clinton -- might be beholden.

To ask for this information is not to suggest malfeasance or corruption on the part of Ms. Clinton's campaign or any other. It is simply to reassert the fundamental premise of campaign finance disclosure: that it is essential to a healthy, transparent system to know the identities of those underwriting political candidates. No one would accept a system in which donors could secretly write $1 million checks to candidates. No one should accept a system in which fundraisers can secretly send candidates $1 million they've collected in other people's checks.

During the 2000 campaign, when George W. Bush developed what seemed at the time like an audacious system of fundraisers known as Pioneers, who collected at least $100,000, his campaign balked for a time at releasing the names, then agreed to disclose them. This is one area in which Ms. Clinton would be wise to follow the model of the president she hopes to succeed.

Edwards Draws Packed House In Salem (NHUL)

By Jim Devine

New Hampshire Union Leader, February 25, 2007

SALEM – More than a hundred supporters packed the home and living room of a Corinthian Drive home yesterday to pose questions and hear more about John Edwards' Presidential primary run.

Edwards described his plan for universal health care as a solution to make health care spending more effective in the country while making it available for all Americans by repealing Bush tax cuts made for Americans earning more than $200,000 a year.

"Universal health care is not cheap," Edwards said. "I'm not saying it isn't. But I think it's critical for America to remain strong in the long run."

Edwards said his plan would cover preventative care, chronic care and long-term care while driving down administrative costs that account for 40 cents on every dollar spent on health care in America.

Joan Crimlisk of Derry said she was familiar with Edwards from his 2004 run but his plan for health care reform has attracted her attention as she's begun looking at different candidates trying to make themselves known in the Granite State.

"I'm interested in how he defines universal health care," she said. "I'm more interested in him this time around."

Fielding questions in a living room packed with curious citizens as well as ardent supporters, Edwards told voters the one thing they can expect from him would be firm positions in areas of health care reform, renewable energy sources and the country's Iraq policy.

"There will not be a voter in America that doesn't know where I stand on anything," Edwards said while answering a question on how his campaign will differ from the Kerry-Edwards campaign of 2004.

"They will know exactly what I think we should do in Iraq ... They will know exactly what I think America needs to do to re-establish itself as a force of good in the world," Edwards said.

Mark Brockmeyer of Windham said the defined message speaks volumes over other candidates in the race.

"He's got definitive positions. That's refreshing," Brockmeyer said.

Although he still had open questions of Edwards' future tax policies and how he'll manage to push major issues like universal health care and energy reform through a Senate with at least 40 Republicans, Brockmeyer said Edwards' driven and defined platform is an attractive feature as a candidate.

Edwards Pushes Universal Health-care Plan (NTEL)

DOJ_NMG_0136704

By Kevin Landrigan

Nashua Telegraph, February 25, 2007

NASHUA – Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards fired back at primary rival Hillary Clinton, who questions the need for raising federal income taxes to pay for universal health care.

Edwards is the only major candidate to present a comprehensive plan that requires employers to offer coverage or pay into an insurance fund. Government-run health-care markets would guarantee coverage to individuals who can't afford private insurance.

He didn't mention the New York senator by name, but his remarks followed those of Clinton, who recently said Americans already spend 16 cents of every dollar on health care and that more revenue may not be necessary.

"If somebody comes in here and says they are going to give universal health care and it's not going to cost anything, they may have a bridge in Brooklyn they want to sell you,'' Edwards said during a house party at the home of Nashua Democratic Sen. David Gottesman and his wife, Jean.

Edwards would repeal the Bush tax cuts for those making more than $200,000 a year to finance his proposal, which economists say would cost up to $120 billion a year.

"I have worked on this for a long time," Edwards said. "You cannot do universal health care and not have it cost money. It can't be done. It will cost money. It has to come from somewhere.''

Edwards later told reporters the only other option is putting the nation deeper into deficit, and he said he isn't willing to do that.

Clinton said while campaigning two weeks ago she's listening to ideas on how best to extend health coverage to the 47 million Americans who lack it.

"I find it hard to believe we can't use the money we already spend to insure everybody,'' Clinton said at a town hall-style forum in Berlin. "Yet everybody comes out with these plans and say we need more money to pay for it.

"I am not ready to concede that.''

During an interview Saturday, Edwards said Americans want to begin leaving war-torn Iraq and Congress must aggressively use its power of the purse to bring that about.

"They want us to start leaving Iraq,'' Edwards said. "There are probably differences in views in America about how we do it, what period of time, but I think it's clear Americans want us to start leaving Iraq.

"It actually is the best policy.''

Edwards, a former North Carolina senator, urges Congress to cap funding of U.S. troops in Iraq at 100,000, which would force the removal of up to 50,000 soldiers.

Complete withdrawal of all troops in Iraq could occur in a year, he said.

"I would use all the constitutional power that Congress has; no more non-binding resolutions, no more speeches, no more debate,'' Edwards said.

"Let's stop this president from making an number of horrible mistakes.''

Edwards finished fourth in the 2004 presidential primary in New Hampshire and later became nominee John Kerry's running mate.

The candidate's wife, Elizabeth, made a surprise appearance Saturday. Days after the 2004 race ended, she was diagnosed with breast cancer.

"These conversations over the next 11 months are going to be really important,'' Elizabeth Edwards told the group.

Gottesman and fellow Nashua Democratic Sen. Joseph Foster were with Edwards in 2004 and are sticking with him.

"You see, I'm not shopping,'' Gottesman said. "I am committed to a mission to make this man the next president of the United States.''

Edwards became the third major Democratic candidate to begin house-party campaigning in the first-in-the-nation-primary state.

Clinton hosted two in Nashua and Manchester, and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama followed the next day with one in Nashua.

Battling a stubborn cold, Edwards, 53, weathered parties at the homes of lawyers in Nashua, Concord and Salem.

An hour before Edwards arrived, the Gottesman home on Indian Rock Road was crammed with more than 100 people.

Edwards dodged television cameras and endured a few ill-timed, cell-phone calls in between answering six questions on the war in Iraq, health care, energy, the federal budget, aid for the homeless and U.S. policy toward Iran.

"What I like best about that phone call is it was timed perfectly with what my health care was going to cost,'' Edwards joked.

Under the Edwards plan, individuals would have the choice of taking the employer's coverage or the government-managed care.

Taxpayer subsidies would support health coverage for families making up to $100,000 a year.

DOJ_NMG_0136705

He would mandate lower administrative costs and greater use of technology, including medical billing.

Edwards said all plans would include preventive, catastrophic and long-term health-care coverage to include parity for mental and physical conditions, dental and eye-care benefits.

Edwards kept up a whirlwind pace of campaigning, and at the Nashua home, he struggled to remember where he had been while speaking to a cleaning woman who lived in a homeless shelter.

“This is embarrassing,’’ Edwards said. “I’ve been to too many places. I’m sorry.’’

A few moments later, Edwards came up with the locale himself.

“Nashville, Tennessee,’’ he said, laughing.

Al Gore, Rock Star (WP)

By William Booth, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

Oscar Hopeful May Be America's Coolest Ex-Vice President Ever

LOS ANGELES -- In the annals of vice presidential history, tonight will be something different. In his black tux, the man known to his most fervent fans as "The Goracle" will arrive by hybrid eco-limo and, surrounded by fellow Hollywood greenies Cameron Diaz and Leonardo DiCaprio, will stroll down the red carpet at the Academy Awards to answer the immortal question: "Al, who are you wearing?"

What a year it has been for Al Gore and his little indie film.

"An Inconvenient Truth," the 100-minute movie that is essentially Gore giving a slide show about global warming, is the third-highest-grossing documentary ever, with a worldwide box office of $45 million, right behind blockbusters "Fahrenheit 9/11" and "March of the Penguins."

"AIT," as Team Gore calls it, is also the hot pick tonight for Best Documentary, and if its director, Davis Guggenheim, wins an Oscar, he plans to bring Gore along with him to the stage to accept the golden statuette and perhaps say a few words about . . . interstitial glacial melting? (More likely, Gore will deliver a favorite line about "political will being a renewable resource.")

In the year since his film premiered at the Sundance Film Festival, to a standing ovation, Gore has gone from failed presidential contender -- and a politician who at times gave new meaning to the word cardboard -- to the most unlikely of global celebrities.

Incredible as it may seem, Al Gore is not only totally carbon neutral, but geek-chic cool. No velvet rope can stop him. He rolls with Diddy. He is on first-name basis, for real, with Ludacris. But what does this mean? And how did it happen? Did Gore change? Or did the climate -- political, cultural, natural -- change around him?

In an e-mail exchange with The Goracle himself, "AG" typed to The Washington Post that the Oscar craziness and pageantry of the film premieres has been fun (his word) "but I'm old enough to know that a red carpet is just a rug, so I've been able to enjoy that part of it without losing perspective."

Just a rug, people. Because, Gore continued (this was on Friday during a break from his tux fitting): "Actually, for me, the most moving moments have been in conversations with people who have told me that the movie had a big impact on the way they think and feel about our moral responsibility to protect the Earth."

"He is more popular now than he ever was in office, and he knows it," says Laurie David, one of the producers of "Inconvenient Truth" and a Hollywood environmental activist (and wife of "Seinfeld" co-creator Larry David) who has traveled around the world promoting the film with Gore. "He's a superhero now."

Before the film? He was more Willy Loman than Green Avenger. After his loss in 2000, a battered Gore began to schlep around the country, often solo, flying coach, giving his ever-evolving slide show about climate change, a threat that Gore, now 58, says he has felt strongly about since his Harvard days.

After the film? Says director Guggenheim, "Everywhere I go with him, they treat him like a rock star."

Guggenheim is not being hyperbolic. Take the Cannes Film Festival: Al Gore was mobbed. By French people. He was a presenter at the Grammy Awards, alongside Queen Latifah, where he got one of the biggest welcomes of the night. "Wow. . . . I think they love you, man. You hear that?" the current Queen asked the former veep. Earlier this month, the ticket Web site at the University of Toronto crashed when 23,000 people signed on in three minutes to get a seat to hear Gore do his thing on the oceanic carbon cycle. At Boise State, Gore and his slide show sold out 10,000 seats at the Taco Bell Arena, reportedly "faster than Elton John."

Remember that this is the same Al Gore who even today interrupts himself to explain that while he supports the use of ethanol to reduce greenhouse gas emissions, please, he is not talking about regular ethanol; he is talking about "cellulosic ethanol" (made from wood chips rather than cornstarch).

DOJ_NMG_0136706

Also remember that "An Inconvenient Truth" was not on anybody's short list for theatrical release, let alone an Oscar. "I think I was the only person crazy enough to want it," says John Lesher, president of Paramount Vantage, which purchased the film at Sundance. "Everybody else had already passed on it, to be honest, but I thought if we do our job right, this could be a zeitgeist moment."

The film distributor's greatest challenge? "To convince people that it wasn't going to be boring," he says. "We didn't want to sell spinach." His greatest asset? "Al Gore. There was no hiding him."

Lesher explains that, from a marketing and branding perspective, Gore was lugging some very heavy baggage. "Democrats felt disappointed in him, and Republicans didn't like him," he says. "But it worked." How come? What comes through in the film, Lesher says, "is here is this person who has gone through this incredible adversity" -- Florida recount, Supreme Court decision, bye-bye White House -- "and this is what he decides to do," the one-man slide show, "and so you see this massive integrity."

And nobody worked for the film harder than Al Gore, Lesher says: "He was an amazing collaborator, and unlike everyone else in Hollywood, he did everything he said he would do, which is unique in my experience."

Gore worked the premieres in Edinburgh, Helsinki, Oslo, Stockholm, Sydney, Hong Kong, Amsterdam, Zurich, Brussels, Berlin and Tokyo. In France, he not only attended the film opening, but presented his 90-minute Apple Keynote lecture to the National Assembly. He did the slide show at the United Nations, the American Geophysical Union, and before conservative activist Grover Norquist's regular Wednesday meeting.

"I am trying to reach out to people in every effective way that I can find," Gore wrote in his e-mail. "In the process, I have had the chance to work with really interesting people from all walks of life." Meaning: eggheads and rappers, movie moguls and prime ministers, and, recently, Bon Jovi. "So, pop culture is an important part of the message delivery system, but far from the only part."

Gore's book, based on the film, has sold 850,000 copies worldwide and translation rights for 24 languages. In Spain, Prime Minister Jose Luis Rodriguez Zapatero told Gore that the DVDs of the film would be shown in the public schools, following similar proclamations in Scotland and Norway. And speaking of Norway, earlier this month Gore was nominated for a Nobel Peace Prize for his work to alert the world to the dangers of climate change.

"People ask him all the time what does he attribute his recent success to and Gore tells them 'reality,' " says Larry Schweiger, a friend and president of the National Wildlife Federation, who is a leader of Gore's Alliance for Climate Protection, a foundation that seeks to bring evangelicals, hunters, farmers and entrepreneurs to the cause. "They used to ridicule him. They called him a tree-hugger. They don't do that anymore."

Guggenheim explains: "People say to me that Al Gore is so different now. Why wasn't he like this when he ran for president?" Meaning that Gore now appears relaxed, confident, happy, and not stiff, robotic, pinched. "They say Al has changed. But I don't think so. We've changed. The setting has changed. He's the same. When you're running for office, you're a target every moment you are in front of the camera. Now, he's in a different place and we see him in a different way."

There might be something to this. Earlier this month in Los Angeles, accompanied by booming house techno bass beat, Gore announced his plan for a global "Live Earth" day of mega-concerts this summer, to be held simultaneously on all seven continents, with 100 of the world's most popular musical acts -- Snoop Dogg, Kelly Clarkson, Bon Jovi, Korn -- to promote awareness about climate change. Gore was surrounded by a grinning Cameron Diaz (she hugged him) and a nodding Pharrell Williams, the rap-producing impresario, and though Gore perhaps went on for a few paragraphs too long about how many tons of carbon a day are entering the oceans, the riser of international press and paparazzi were clearly gorging on the glamorama. Gore was his usual earnest self. A nerd? Maybe, but he was the nerd with Cameron and Pharrell, talking about the carbon cycle and the Red Hot Chili Peppers. It was the mixology -- high-wattage celebrity and energy-efficient light bulbs -- that helps the medicine go down.

"Is being president better than this?" muses Simon Rosenberg, head of the New Democratic Network. "I think what Gore's figured out how to do is something that a lot of people want to do. He's living a life of great freedom and pursuing his interests, and he's having an impact on public policy. He's been able to start a bunch of companies and do the movie and he's got this great life right now."

"I agree" Gore typed, "that the Zeitgeist has begun to change. I think it reflects the increased popular will to confront and solve this crisis. It's an extraordinary experience to see this issue -- which the conventional wisdom used to say was politically marginal -- become central for so many people. As it should. I also think that people see candidates through a different lens, and that is a factor. But I also think there is at least a grain of truth to the old cliche that 'what doesn't kill you makes you stronger.' So maybe I've gotten a little stronger in the last six or seven years."

Gore is escaping the fate of most former politicians, says Matt Bennett, a consultant for Democrats who worked closely with Gore during his vice presidency. "Usually defeated -- or allegedly defeated -- party nominees become pariahs. Look at Mike

DOJ_NMG_0136707

Dukakis or John Kerry. Or they just go out to pasture like Bob Dole. Gore has pulled off a feat unknown in modern times, which is to completely rehabilitate his image in the public mind very quickly."

Bennett credits savvy handling by people around Gore, including the documentary-makers. And he says the world is catching up with Gore. "Look, this guy was a visionary. He was right about everything, even the stuff he was ridiculed for," Bennett says. "He was right about the Internet, he was right about the first Gulf War, he was sure as hell right about the Iraq war. And he was right about global warming."

At the "Live Earth" press conference, Gore once again affirmed that he is not planning to enter the 2008 presidential fray, though this has not stopped the lefty blogosphere from imagining the jaw-dropping holy cow if The Goracle announces his run on Oscar night. That, say Gore's most intimate insiders, is most definitely not going to happen.

As for whom Gore will be wearing, his people reveal: It'll be Ralph Lauren.

For Gore, Acceptance Speech 101: Keep 'Em Laughing (POL)

By Helena Andrews

The Politico, February 24, 2007

Former Vice President Al Gore just might win an Oscar Sunday for his documentary, "An Inconvenient Truth." If he does, that means an acceptance speech – and let's face it, Gore's no Billy Crystal.

So before Al uncrumples and reads from a dinner napkin outlining a dissertation on climate change, a few of Washington's funniest phrase-turners offer this prudent advice:

Keep it short, keep it light and keep 'em laughing.

Given the enormous spotlight, Gore could have more at stake than just bombing before the crowd of Prius-driving, energy-saving-bulb-using, Versace-swathed starlets in Hollywood.

After all, he hasn't completely ruled out a 2008 presidential run.

So The Politico polled several of Washington's best-known wordsmiths to ask what Gore should say in an acceptance speech.

For openers, how about: "It's nice to be handed a statue that's as animated as I am," suggested Amy Kramer, a freelance Democratic writer.

Or: "I'm just grateful they didn't recount the votes," emailed Ben Clarke, a writer for Republican political strategist Frank Luntz who was also on former majority leader Sen. Bill Frist's speech squad.

The jokes about missing ballots didn't stop there.

"I'd like to thank everybody who voted for me. But I have one question: Where the hell were you people seven years ago?!" joked Michael Long, a director at the White House Writers Group, a Washington-based political strategy firm.

"Thank yous" are a prerequisite for any acceptance speech, especially at the granddaddy of them all, when everyone wants to claim 2.3 milliseconds of fame. But journalist Matt Labash of the conservative Weekly Standard put a new twist on the traditional acknowledgements.

"He should thank us, the polluters," wrote Labash in an email. "If I wasn't leaving my car on while running into Safeway, doing my small part to melt the polar icecaps, where is Al Gore?"

Mark Katz, the former commander of Bill Clinton's "comedy war room," wasn't too busy to offer instruction to his "old friend" Al.

He said that whatever happens on Sunday, Gore should build up to the following scene:

While holding his hard-won golden man overhead, Gore bellows, "So if James Baker wants to take this victory away from me, he will have to pry it from my COLD, DEAD HANDS!!"

Katz was referring, of course, to Baker's role in the 2000 presidential election recount in Florida, and actor and former NRA president Charlton Heston's defiant words to Gore about gun rights.)

Meanwhile, no one can resist the global warming jokes.

Radio producer Buckley Carlson sent The Politico this gem:

"Apologies for being late, Tipper and I were held hostage on a JetBlue flight out of Washington. A blizzard kept us on the tarmac for 18 hours. I'm telling you, this global warming stuff is really wreaking havoc on our transportation system."

Whether or not Gore will "get too political" on Sunday remains to be seen. But either way, he should avoid the embarrassing your-time-is-up violins and go the way of Jane Fonda.

As she told the Academy in 1972, "There's a great deal to say, but I'm not going to say it tonight."

Beware Of Celebrities Bearing Gifts (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

DOJ_NMG_0136708

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

FOR presidential hopefuls, the Hollywood fund-raiser used to be as smooth as an A.T.M. withdrawal: duck in at night, after the East Coast news cycles have closed. Leave in the morning with a hefty check and the soft reflected glow of a few Oscar winners.

The events did not, typically, result in headlines about the "brawl," "throwdown," or "rumble in the Hollywood jungle" that greeted Barack Obama's first foray onto the scene last week.

You can't begrudge the movie-loving public a great story line. David Geffen, an entertainment industry billionaire power broker and onetime cheerleader for Bill Clinton, not only herds big Hollywood names to a hot-ticket fund-raiser for Mr. Obama, but insults Hillary Rodham Clinton and the former president on the eve of the party. And, as though they were obliging the celebrity tabloids, the Clinton and Obama campaigns jump in the mud right after him.

It was not a happy ending for anyone. Mr. Obama's reputation for being above politics was soiled. And Mrs. Clinton came off as quick to fight.

But, really, can anyone be surprised? Given the well-known potential downside, presidential candidates might be expected to treat Hollywood stars the way studios now treat Tom Cruise — with a bit more distance.

But for candidates, especially those competing for the Democratic nomination, Hollywood is too important to put at arm's length.

There is the deep pockets factor. But there is another key consideration: There is no better place than Hollywood to attain that magical aura of Superstardom. Hollywood money helps encourage other sources of money, which leads to bigger campaign chests, which leads to an aura that the candidate is invincible.

The only problem: keeping big, independent-minded personalities like Mr. Geffen from putting a rip in that superstar image.

Ten years ago, the Hollywood Women's Political Committee disbanded. The members said they were tired of being treated like cash machines and were enraged at how much money had corrupted the political process.

That group may be no more, but the Hollywood cash dance lives on. In fact, celebrities now pay political consultants to advise them on candidates.

In 2004, John Kerry took in $3.5 million from people identifying themselves as in television, movies or music, up from the $1 million that Al Gore took in when he was the Democratic nominee in 2000, according to the Center for Responsive Politics. While Republicans have traditionally done worse in Hollywood, President Bush also earned more from those donors in 2004 than he did in 2000 — $1.4 million up from about $830,000.

That money becomes a kind of early election return. "There are all sorts of invisible primaries going on here," said Stuart Stevens, a Republican consultant working for John McCain who has also been a producer and writer for television. "One of them is for money, and one of them is for inevitability. Hillary Clinton wants to be inevitable."

A high-profile fund-raising event for Mr. Obama seriously dents that aura of invincibility.

"This hurts her in the money primary and in the inevitability primary," said Mr. Stevens of Mr. Obama's reception. "The fact that they're in love with her husband and not doing it for her is not a good sign. It gives other people permission to do the same — Wall Streeters, hedge-fund types. They figure, if the hip, cool people aren't doing it, I don't have to do it."

Indeed, some believe the support for Senator Obama is probably not deep, wide or even informed.

"A lot of these Hollywood donors are measuring prospects for box office success, if you will," said Eli Attie, a former chief speechwriter for Mr. Gore who was also a writer and producer on "The West Wing." "It's not that they know Obama's record or know what he'd do as president or think he'd be better or smarter than Hillary Clinton. It's more that he seems like he could be a tough contender. "

Outside the Hollywood bubble, however, this conceit — that money and celebrity may be enough to crown The Nominee — can seem like, well, a conceit.

"The voters almost feel like they have a duty to reject that kind of endorsement," said Art Torres, the chairman of the California Democratic Party and a former state senator. "They're thinking, 'What do I care what that movie star thinks?' I'm going to make up my own mind."

A CBS News poll taken this month before the Geffen remarks found the public evenly split on the question of whether celebrities should get involved in politics: 48 percent said they should stay out; 47 percent said they should get involved.

"One of the problems Democrats have had," said Mr. Stevens, the Republican consultant, "is not being able to manage this."

In 2004, the Democratic Party sent celebrities to swing states like Ohio to canvass voters. "People in Ohio, just like people in New Jersey, don't want somebody from California to come tell them how to vote — 'I'm here to save you,' " said Mr. Attie. "It has a negative missionary arrogance."

DOJ_NMG_0136709

Of course, some stars do add some measure of credibility. Celebrities like Tom Hanks and Denzel Washington are considered all-American enough to help any candidate.

Other stars realize that they have limitations.

“George Clooney, you don’t ever see him hit a wrong note,” Mr. Stevens says. “He understands he can help raise money, but he also understands there’s a line to cross where he’s not going to be telling people how to vote.”

Then again, some stars get involved unwillingly. Stephen Rivers, who has worked for politically active stars including Jane Fonda, recalled the 1988 Senate campaign in New Jersey, where the Republican, Pete Dawkins, was under fire for exaggerating his war record, and successfully changed the topic by invoking Ms. Fonda as the ultimate liberal antiwar bogeywoman. Mr. Dawkins’ campaign demanded that the Democrat, Frank Lautenberg, return $5,000 from a women’s group in Hollywood that the Republicans insisted was “controlled” by Ms. Fonda. Soon, Republicans warned, Mr. Lautenberg would be taking foreign policy advice from the woman whom some on the right deride as Hanoi Jane.

Not that it worked. Mr. Dawkins lost.

In any case, celebrities may not care much about their affect on a politician’s future. They may just want to act altruistically. Or, like so many donors everywhere, it might be all about them.

“People want to say, ‘Oh, just because they have all this money, who are they to act like they know what they’re talking about,’ ” said Ken Sunshine, a public relations consultant who has represented Ms. Streisand and Leonardo DiCaprio.

“But they have rights, like any citizen, to speak their minds.”

Hope Outrunning Experience In Primary Race (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman

The Los Angeles Times, February 25, 2007

WASHINGTON — Michelle Obama bristled at charges that her husband was not experienced enough for the presidency.

"We've heard this spewed from the lips of rivals every phase of our journey: He is not experienced enough, he should wait his turn," she recently told supporters of Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), who at 45 is serving his first Senate term. Only political insiders, she said, would look at his life accomplishments "and dare to have the audacity to say he is not ready."

Experience — and how to measure it — has become one of the first big debating points of the 2008 presidential race.

In one of the curiosities of the Democratic primary, some of the candidates with the most experience in national politics are at the bottom of the early popularity surveys. By contrast, Obama, with a mere three years on the national stage, is this year's campaign-trail sensation.

And so Sen. Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut (with 33 years in the House and Senate) has been trying to heighten the importance of Washington knowledge, making a constant refrain of his claim that President Bush proves the dangers of on-the-job training in the White House. "I think people do care about experience," Dodd said.

Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico (15 years in the House, two years as U.N. ambassador, three years as energy secretary) touts his "unparalleled experience." And Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (35 years in the Senate) has said of his campaign rivals: "It's not so much whether I can compete with their money, but whether they can compete with my ideas and my experience."

Even former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, who served a single term before opening a White House bid in 2004, has brought his twist to the issue. Asked at an event last month how he differed from Obama, Edwards said: "Experience. I've been through a presidential campaign."

Advocates for Obama, as for other candidates who are positioning themselves as outsiders to Washington's political culture, like to say that the range of their life experiences makes them more fit for office than those who have spent their careers in government. In Obama's case, that resume includes stints as a community organizer, law professor, civil rights attorney and eight-year member of the Illinois state Senate.

Obama's allies also assert that a wealth of government experience did not make Vice President Dick Cheney or former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld any wiser in confronting the nation's problems. And Obama launched his campaign from Springfield, Ill. — a city identified with Abraham Lincoln — perhaps to remind voters that one of the country's greatest presidents had little Washington experience before he reached the White House. (Lincoln had served one House term and 12 years in the Illinois Legislature.)

Among conservative voters, experience is prized. "Republicans generally believe, particularly conservatives, that we are electing a wartime president, so experience will be critical," said GOP political consultant Christopher Barron. "It's one of the reasons you continue to see someone like Rudy Giuliani over-performing among conservatives who disagree with him on a litany of social issues."

DOJ_NMG_0136710

Giuliani, a former New York City mayor and federal prosecutor, built a national reputation as a steady leader after the Sept. 11 attacks. He leads in several early polls of Republican voters.

Democratic voters have been more willing to sacrifice experience for other qualities, such as a candidate's ability to inspire the public, some analysts say. "The essential tension in the race is between hope and experience," Jennifer Duffy of the nonpartisan Cook Political Report said of the Democratic primary campaign. "Every 25 years or so, we elect a president who gives us hope."

With the latest CBS News poll showing that only 26% of Americans think the country is moving in the right direction, Duffy said, this may be an election in which inspirational candidates triumph.

To some degree, history bears out the idea that too much Washington experience can harm a candidate's image. "The irony is that the longer you serve in the U.S. Congress, the lower odds are you can get elected president," said UCLA political scientist Mark A. Peterson. "Nobody since John F. Kennedy has gone from the legislative branch to the White House."

Members of Congress sometimes talk in an arcane language of amendments, earmarks and resolutions that makes them less than approachable to voters. Ross K. Baker, a political scientist at Rutgers, says Sen. John F. Kerry, who had represented Massachusetts for 20 years, lost his audience at a 2004 Democratic primary debate in the first moments when he trumpeted the fact that he had introduced an amendment to a Biden bill.

Still, some historians argue that prior Washington experience is helpful to a president, even though several who had limited contact with the federal bureaucracy did well.

"With Lincoln as the exception, what you find is that the experienced do perform better," said Bruce Schulman, a political historian at Boston University.

The willingness even to entertain selecting an outsider for the nation's highest office may be a trait that the United States shares with few other countries. "If you go to England or France or Germany, rarely is it conceivable to see heads of government and ministerial positions without extensive government experience," Peterson said. "This is deeply rooted in the nature of modern American politics."

"There's a schizophrenia of the American political mind," said Jamie McKown, political scientist at the College of the Atlantic in Bar Harbor, Maine. "We want to have a beer or a cup of coffee with the candidates, but if they can't point out Tajikistan on a map, we're suspicious. We want them to be everyday people and superhuman."

Bill Clinton, a former governor and attorney general of Arkansas, won the White House in 1992 running against more-seasoned political resumes with his formidable communications skills — an ability to act both as just "one of the guys" and a policy-loving Rhodes scholar.

"Either you prove to be an effective or ineffective campaigner," Baker said. "That's the difference: the extent to which you can connect with voters."

Some think that Obama's fresh face will help him on that front.

"Most voters want something new," said Democratic consultant Donna Brazile, who managed then-Vice President Al Gore's presidential campaign in 2000. "They want less D.C. experience and more good values."

Governors See Influence Wane In Race For Presidency (WP)

By Dan Balz, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

Despite Trend of Success, Not One Is a Front-Runner

In one of the fastest-starting presidential campaigns in history, one group of politicians has not kept pace: the nation's governors.

The most successful route to the White House in recent elections has run through the governors' mansions, but in the 2008 campaign, state chief executives are struggling to fight their way into the top tier of candidates in both the Republican and Democratic races.

This weekend, two events highlighted the lack of gubernatorial influence in the opening stages of the 2008 campaign. The first was Friday's announcement by former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack that he was dropping out of the Democratic race less than three months after formally launching his campaign.

The other was yesterday's opening of the winter meeting of the National Governors Association, where few attendees expressed any desire to get involved on behalf of a presidential candidate.

Pennsylvania Gov. Edward G. Rendell (D) said that because of the heavily front-loaded nomination calendar, he and others may have more to lose than gain by picking a candidate now.

"Why risk ticking off the eventual nominee when there's no value to it?" Rendell asked.

DOJ_NMG_0136711

One Republican governor, who spoke on the condition of anonymity to talk more freely about the GOP race, said that in the absence of a strong front-runner in the traditional sense, any of the leading candidates could end up faltering, making an early endorsement far riskier than it was when Republican governors got behind the candidacy of George W. Bush in the 2000 campaign.

"They realize those guys running for president need you just as much in October as they need you now," he said. "So if you think this is a very fragile playing field, then it would be smart to wait."

Governors from states with early contests where endorsements might count heavily are, for now, staying neutral. Both Iowa Gov. Chet Culver (D) and New Hampshire Gov. John Lynch (D) plan to stay neutral at this point and are more focused on preserving their states' roles at the front of the process. They met yesterday to discuss the 2008 calendar, rather than the candidates.

The Democratic contest is now dominated by senators, with New York's Hillary Rodham Clinton and Illinois' Barack Obama the candidates drawing the most attention. Challenging them, particularly in several early states, is former North Carolina senator John Edwards. Two veteran senators, Delaware's Joseph R. Biden Jr. and Connecticut's Christopher J. Dodd, hope to capitalize if the front-runners stumble.

Just one governor is in the Democratic race: New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, who is seen as a long-shot candidate despite one of the deepest resumes of anyone in the field.

Vilsack wasn't even the first former governor to fall out of the Democratic race. Last fall, after receiving a rush of attention as a potential contender but before he could even announce his candidacy, former Virginia governor Mark R. Warner said he was not interested in seeking the presidency in 2008.

Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh had planned to use his record as governor as a central selling point in his campaign. But the Democrat got out of the race last December, just a few weeks after establishing a presidential exploratory committee.

The Republican race has followed a similar path. The two leaders in the polls are Arizona Sen. John McCain and former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani. Former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney, who passed up running for a second term to seek the presidency, is seen by some party insiders as the third candidate in the GOP top tier, but he is not well know nationally at this point.

The GOP field includes two other former governors. One is Wisconsin's Tommy G. Thompson, who was one of the most innovative state executives of the 1990s. The other is Mike Huckabee of Arkansas. Both face uphill bids.

Rendell said the absence of more strong governors in the two fields may be nothing more than an anomaly in this campaign cycle. If California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger were not constitutionally prohibited from running or if former Florida governor Jeb Bush had a name other than Bush, either would be considered a top-tier candidate in the GOP field, he said.

On the Democratic side, the governors of vote-rich New York and Ohio were only just sworn into office, and several potential candidates from other battleground states faced challenging reelection campaigns in 2006 and opted out of the presidential race. "You can't run for president and run for reelection," Rendell said. "You have to make the choice that Governor Romney made."

So far only a handful of governors have endorsed presidential candidates. McCain has the support of Minnesota Gov. Tim Pawlenty and Utah Gov. Jon Huntsman Jr., while Romney has the support of Missouri Gov. Matt Blunt. No governor has announced support for Giuliani. Among Democrats, Obama has the support of Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine, while Clinton has not yet rolled out the endorsement of any Democratic governor.

Montana Gov. Brian Schweitzer (D) is among those who are in no hurry to pick a candidate. "I like a lot of them," he said. "I like Bill Richardson a lot. Hillary's taking up the oxygen and a lot of the money in all the rooms. Barack could be the transformational leader that everybody's looking for. Maybe it's him. Edwards, he might be the one to come up through the middle. So give it a few months."

In Democratic Campaigns, Six Degrees Of Tom Daschle (WP)

By Chris Cillizza, Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

The easygoing former Senate majority leader never seemed like a party boss. But lo and behold, Daschleites are everywhere. Former Daschle staffers or Daschle-era Senate leadership aides populate all the major Democratic presidential campaigns. A particular beneficiary: Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, who won Daschle's endorsement last week. The South Dakota Democrat, defeated in 2004 by GOP Sen. John Thune, said Obama "personifies the future of Democratic leadership in our country."

Vilsack's Departure Makes Iowa Interesting

DOJ_NMG_0136712

Former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack's decision to drop out of the presidential race late last week surprised many observers who expected him to stick it out at least through his home-state caucuses. Vilsack was always seen as a long shot for the Democratic nomination, but his departure still makes an impact on the field he leaves behind.

Here's a look at a few of the biggest winners and losers as a result of Vilsack's departure:

WINNERS

Iowa: With Vilsack out, there's no chance that the caucuses will be a repeat of 1992, when the presence of native son Tom Harkin turned the race into a non-entity. No candidate left in the field can excuse failing to make a splash in the Hawkeye State -- meaning what happens there now really matters.

Bill Richardson: Richardson is the only candidate left on the Democratic side with executive experience. There's a reason no senator has been directly elected to the White House since 1960. In that time, four governors have won the nation's highest office.

Chris Dodd: Dodd needed a break to make a real run at the nomination, and Vilsack's departure might just be it. The Connecticut senator should surprise some people with his cash haul at the end of the first quarter and is slowly but surely positioning himself to take advantage of a stumble by the front-runners.

Process: Vilsack dropped from the race 10 months before a single vote will be cast. His stated reason? Money. The public is largely unaware of the process of raising the cash and building a staff, but fundraising continues to matter more and more in weeding out the field.

LOSERS

Tom Vilsack: Insiders always wondered why Vilsack got into the race at all, and his decision to get out so quickly does little to enhance his chances at being picked for the national ticket. Remember, Vilsack was on the veep shortlist for Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) for 2004. Hard to see how he helped his chances at that slot for 2008.

Nevada: With Vilsack out of the race, second-tier candidates looking to make the big leap will probably devote most of their limited resources to making a move in Iowa. The Nevada caucuses, set for five days later, will be an afterthought.

Policy: Vilsack was a leading voice in the so-called "ideas primary," putting forward a series of detailed issue proposals including an overhaul of energy policy. It didn't save him.

Stuck In The Mud (WP)

By Frank Luntz

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

How Can the GOP Get Moving Again? Drop the Dirty Politics and Get Real.

"Don't be afraid to see what you see," Ronald Reagan once said.

Today, many of his disciples are choosing not to see the obvious. Republicans in Congress cannot regain their majority merely by relying on a coalition of traditional conservatives and evangelicals. They must reach out to what I call "the fed-ups" -- a large and growing constituency of independent voters who have held the balance of power in every election since 1992, and will hold it again in 2008.

It was only 14 years ago that nearly 20 million voters rejected both Bill Clinton and George H.W. Bush in favor of H. Ross Perot, a little man with big ears and a big idea. Perot's principal claim on their allegiance in the presidential election of 1992 was his insistence that government should be competent, sensible and honest about its finances. His supporters were mad as hell and weren't going to take it anymore. Those voters -- 19 percent of the electorate -- demonstrated that there was a potent political movement of fed-up Americans.

Two years later, millions of Perot voters switched to the Republicans and helped them grab control of Congress. They stayed with the GOP for a decade because the party represented "good government." But red ink budgets, earmarked appropriations for bridges to nowhere, endless ethics scandals and a debacle of a war made them mad once again. In 2006 they deserted the GOP in droves and turned control of Congress back to the Democrats.

How incredible that the antidote to what ails the Republicans can be found in the words of a famous Democrat. In his tragic run for the presidency in 1968, Sen. Robert F. Kennedy said, "Some men see things as they are and say, 'Why?' I dream of things that never were and say, 'Why not?' " The magnificent poetry of that challenge -- to do more and to do better -- is at the core of who we are as a society, what we want for America and for ourselves. Here is the reason why the Republican Party has faded from relevance in the past two years.

Despite its many problems, the United States remains a nation of dreamers. The American psyche is genetically wired to see possibilities. Faith in the future is in our DNA. It's why we historically vote for the more positive, hopeful, upbeat candidates.

DOJ_NMG_0136713

Yet my recent public opinion research has recorded unprecedented anxiety about the country's direction. Just 34 percent of the voting public believe that the America of tomorrow will be better than the America of today, while 57 percent think it will be worse.

This explains why so many people have lost patience with the current U.S. leadership. It is no wonder that 52 percent of voters in my election night survey said they were "mad as hell" about politics and politicians. Can you blame them? It doesn't matter whether you are a Republican or a Democrat, the outlook is grim: a war with no end in sight, rising costs of health care, borders that are poorly patrolled, schools that are failing, manufacturing that is disappearing, and a culture that is coarsening.

Congressional Republicans didn't seem to notice in 2006, and certainly didn't seem to care. For the all-important swing voter in the center -- the current version of those 19-plus millionPerot voters -- Republicans came to represent the politics of hypocrisy and failure. They didn't have a message. They didn't have an agenda. They didn't have a purpose. And so on Election Day, these voters -- now about 16 percent of the electorate -- went elsewhere.

It is unfortunate that the Republican Party is currently dominated by hyperpartisan, gut-punching professional politicians and expert technicians whom I wouldn't want to face at the dark end of the electoral alley. They specialize in the flawless execution of "wedge" politics. That may have worked well in past elections, but no longer. The latest gimmick is "branding" -- a Madison Avenue technique -- to reverse the Republican slide. But political parties are not brands, slogans are not a replacement for ideas and you don't sell leaders the way you sell widgets.

Many rank-and-file Republicans agree. But the party apparatus still doesn't get it. Over the years, I have become unpopular with the GOP hierarchy by telling the apparatchiks what they needed to know, not what they wanted to hear. Nowadays my work is far from the day-to-day grind of political partisanship. But if I were still in the thick of it, my guidance would be just 20 words long: Be bold, return to basics, stop telling, start asking, focus on results, abolish "earmarks" and embrace a permanent balanced budget.

Shortly after the Republican landslide of 1994, Rep. Jim Nussle of Iowa said: "I hope none of us lose the backbencher point of view. We should always look to make changes." Nussle was one of a cadre of passionate Republican reformers who railed against Democratic improprieties. (He gave up his House seat to run unsuccessfully for governor of Iowa last year.) The Republican Party still has its share of outsiders, crusaders, people unwilling to accept politics or governing-as-usual. I think of lawmakers such as Rep. Paul D. Ryan (Wis.) and Sen. Jon Kyl (Ariz.), who want to get back to balanced budgets, fiscal accountability and causes that appeal to centrist voters.

They understand that Republicans lost the majority because Americans wanted change. But they need to step up now, speak out and demand a public role in reforming the party and Washington in the same way that former House speaker Newt Gingrich (Ga.) demanded that well-meaning but failed Republican leaders step aside in 1994.

There are some hopeful signs.

Both the early front-runners for the GOP presidential nomination in 2008 have appeal beyond the party's base of conservative supporters. Arizona Sen. John McCain tapped into the old Perot constituency in his bid for the nomination in 2000, and former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani is doing that now.

In Florida, a group of Republican legislators stepped back from partisan bickering to try something novel: They asked the people for ideas.

Florida House Speaker Marco Rubio challenged his colleagues to create an agenda for the future with "100 Innovative Ideas" from ordinary people around the state. Instead of fundraisers, they held "idea raisers." Republicans, Democrats and independents were all welcome -- any idea that advanced the principles of good government and political accountability was considered.

It wasn't a political ploy. They released their "100 Innovative Ideas for Florida's Future" after the election. And Republican legislators got back in touch with constituents.

But what did national Republicans do as the new Congress convened and Democrats began pushing through their "Six for '06" proposals in the first 100 hours? They called a news conference not to present counter-proposals to guide the minority over the next two years, but to complain that the Democrats were treating them unfairly. They objected that the committee process was being skirted and members were denied opportunities to offer amendments.

Were Republicans standing up for retirement security, control over health-care decisions or economic freedom? No. They were upset over who was or was not allowed to offer amendments on the floor. (Note to Republicans: Americans don't care.)

The path to a GOP majority must be paved with solutions to the real problems of real people. Republicans should talk about expanding health savings accounts and educating Americans about the benefits they offer. They should commit to sunsetting government programs every four years unless continuing them can be justified. They should pledge the investment necessary to develop renewable fuels and alternative energy. They should challenge Democrats to tackle the burgeoning tax code and fight for tax simplification on behalf of hardworking taxpayers.

DOJ_NMG_0136714

Republicans need a spirited, intellectually based rebuttal to every piece of Democratic legislation and an alternative to every policy -- not a new parliamentary maneuver.

My polls show that Democrats now hold a perceived advantage with voters not just on reducing deficits and balancing the budget but on an issue long seen as a GOP strength: ending wasteful spending. That alone should jar Republicans into taking a fresh approach.

Step one should be the abolition of earmarks for hometown and home-state projects. Nothing will undermine the lobbyist culture more than a clear and definitive statement that there will never again be a highway project like the Alaskan "bridge to nowhere."

Step two is to once again stand for accountability, a principle abandoned in the last Congress. If Republicans are serious about demonstrating that they understand what America wants, they will support a balanced-budget amendment -- but with an important twist: The declining Social Security surplus couldn't be used as a numbers game to "reduce" shortfalls, and there would be a clause making it difficult to raise taxes.

Republicans lost their congressional majority because they lost touch with what Americans really want. As a pollster, I rarely hear voters call for smaller government. They tell me that they want more efficient and more effective government. (Note to Republicans: There is no starker symbol of Washington's inefficiency and ineffectiveness than the federal government's inability to control our borders and prevent illegal immigration.) Last year, Republicans campaigned locally and lost nationally. Relying on local issues to define elections at a time when national matters dominate public concerns is a losing strategy. With 20 months until the next election, Republicans have a responsibility as the minority party, as the opposition party, to prove themselves as once again worthy of public trust. They must adopt a bold agenda to mirror the public's desire for bold change. Anything less and they will fail not only themselves but also the country.

Frank Luntz, a corporate communications adviser, was pollster for the GOP's 1994 "Contract With America" and advised House and Senate Republicans from 1994 through 1999. He is the author of the new book "Words That Work: It's Not What You Say, It's What People Hear" (Hyperion).

Politics For The Disengaged (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

In a wonderful example of life imitating art, a group of serious political pros has taken the plot line of "The West Wing" and turned it into the most intriguing gambit yet seen for the 2008 election.

As fans of the now-canceled NBC drama know, the closing episodes showed newly elected Democratic President Matt Santos offering the position of secretary of state to his defeated Republican rival, Sen. Arnold Vinick. The Great Reconciliation not only brought Jimmy Smits and Alan Alda together for the closing shows but also satisfied the audience's hunger for national harmony in a time of bitter partisanship.

That's also the motivation for the creators of Unity08, a scheme announced last week to put forward an alternative ticket for the next presidential race, joining a Democrat and a Republican or headed by an independent pledged to forming a bipartisan administration.

The founders of Unity08 include Hamilton Jordan and Jerry Rafshoon, key players in Jimmy Carter's campaign and presidency, and Doug Bailey, a longtime adviser to Republican moderates and now publisher of the Hotline, a political newsletter.

The one leading sponsor who has held public office is Angus King, elected twice as an independent as governor of Maine. He came to see me last week, along with two impressive college students, Lindsay Ullman of Yale and Zach Clayton of the University of North Carolina, who represent Unity08's target audience of young people.

The sincerity of their motivation is as striking as the odds against their success.

Their hope is to harness the power of the Internet -- already demonstrated as a fundraising and recruiting tool in the 2004 campaigns of Howard Dean and others -- to mobilize the vast numbers of Americans who say they dislike their current political choices. A poll they commissioned found that 70 percent of Americans are dissatisfied with politics today and a similar percentage think politicians do not care about the views of people like themselves.

To provide an outlet for those alienated people, the Unity08 sponsors plan an Internet nominating convention in 2008. People who sign on can vote for the bipartisan ticket of their choice -- or an independent who would present a slate for a bipartisan administration.

Then those electronic "delegates" would be charged with qualifying the nominee for a place on their state ballots -- an often-arduous task for a third-party candidate.

DOJ_NMG_0136715

The practical difficulties facing the venture are enormous. Persuading prominent figures to submit their names for consideration will not be easy. King suggested to me that if such a mechanism had been in place in 2000, Colin Powell might have run for president as an independent and been elected.

That is possible, but it would be a huge risk for Republicans or Democrats who have been elected to a position of responsibility to abandon their party and run under the Unity08 banner.

The electronic nominating convention would take place early in 2008 -- at a time when voters would know the concept but not the makeup of the Unity08 ticket. How many would participate is an open question. And the task of qualifying the nominee for the ballot in 50 states and the District of Columbia is one that has been a tough struggle for other third-party efforts.

Both polling and practicality suggest that the notion of an Internet-generated third ticket would have its greatest appeal to younger Americans. Ullman and Clayton, former presidents of the National Association of Student Councils, certainly are right when they say that many of their contemporaries are frustrated by the spectacle of both parties catering to entrenched interest groups and ideological extremes. Even though a senator from his home state, John Edwards, was on the Democratic ticket, Clayton said many of his friends "didn't like the choices and didn't vote" in 2004.

There may be more than a whiff of elitism in the Unity08 manifesto, which explicitly puts down social issues, such as abortion and gay marriage, that are important to many voters, while emphasizing education, the environment, health care and energy. But there undoubtedly is a hunger in the land for consensus and an end to partisanship.

A more straightforward answer would come from a credible independent presidential candidacy or an agreement by credentialed figures from the two parties to form a ticket. The rigmarole of an Internet convention could give way, then, to an actual campaign.

But meantime, those of you who share the wish for some alternative can find out more at http://www.unity08.com .

davidbroder@washpost.com

Growing A Third Party (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

Somewhere in America, there are 35,000 people looking at the preliminaries to the 2008 presidential race from a different perspective than that of millions of their fellow citizens.

They are the people who have signed up so far to participate in Unity08, the effort to launch a bipartisan third-party campaign with the first Internet nominating convention in history. I wrote about this unusual venture when it was launched last year by Hamilton Jordan and Jerry Rafshoon, both formerly of Jimmy Carter's White House; Angus King, the former independent governor of Maine; and Douglas Bailey, a veteran Republican consultant and political adviser.

I contacted Bailey recently to ask what had happened to this bold gamble, and he was the source of that 35,000 figure for the number of people who have lent support to the scheme. They obviously have a long way to go before they can claim to be a viable political force, but they are making slow, steady progress.

When I called Bailey, it had been just a week since the group announced that anyone who was interested could sign up at http://www.unity08.com as a voting delegate to a national convention planned for June 2008. Most of the sign-ups came before that formal start, Bailey said, in response to last year's publicity about the formation of Unity08.

"The need [for a third party] is as great as it's ever been," Bailey said. "The partisan bickering in Washington continues nonstop, and the contest for the nominations in both parties is likely to make it worse."

He pointed to two problems that many of us have decried. "The leading candidates in both parties have suggested they will decline federal matching funds and plan to spend unlimited sums," he said. "They expect the bundlers -- the people collecting for them -- to raise a million dollars each, and what do they [the bundlers] expect in return?"

Second, Bailey said, "the likelihood is that the nominees of both parties will be determined by the first three or four primaries, which means that 99 percent of the people who will vote in November will have absolutely no say in the names that are on the ballot. It's not surprising that they may be looking for an alternative."

None of that is implausible. But where does the alternative come from? Bailey and his partners have an answer, but the process they have in mind still strikes me -- as it did when it was first outlined -- as extremely cumbersome.

In a few weeks, they will outline provisional rules for their own nomination process, determining how candidates will qualify and how the voting will be conducted. The goal is to pick either a political independent for president or to form a ticket with both a Democrat and a Republican. Feedback will be welcomed before the rules are made final, he said.

Then comes the hard part. Thirty-nine states allow a new party to petition its way onto the presidential ballot, without having a named candidate, but the deadlines and numbers of signers required vary widely. The first test will be whether Unity08 attracts enough volunteers and money to carry out that effort.

DOJ_NMG_0136716

And then comes the challenge of recruiting a candidate or candidates for Unity08 to back. If its organizers had a compelling person already lined up, their task would be much easier, but they do not.

I suggested to Bailey that the underlying premise of this campaign -- the need to cure the partisanship of Washington -- might be undercut if the Republicans and Democrats nominated people who are not closely associated with those partisan battles -- mentioning Rudy Giuliani, Mitt Romney and Mike Huckabee on the GOP side and Barack Obama and Bill Richardson among the Democrats.

"To the degree that the nominees of the two parties recognize that bipartisan leadership is essential, then it shows the political process has made a self-adjustment, and that is good," he said. "But the usual game is to target the base of your party, rile it up with wedge issues and ignore the middle.

"If they do that again, we will be ready. It is possible the parties can right the ship themselves, but I don't have a lot of confidence in that happening."

Perry Muscle Flexing Falls Flat (HC)

By R.g. Ratcliffe

Houston Chronicle, February 25, 2007

Controversial executive orders spur lawmakers to exercise their own authority

AUSTIN — Gov. Rick Perry has time and again tried to increase his powers either through legislation or executive fiat.

But Perry's five-year drive to add some muscle to Texas' weak governor system hit a brick wall last week.

First, a state district judge ruled that Perry lacked the power to tell state administrative law judges by executive order to speed up hearings in TXU Corp.'s request for coal-fired electric plant permits.

The next day, a House committee approved a bill to overturn Perry's executive mandate that all sixth-grade girls be vaccinated against a sexually transmitted virus that causes most cervical cancers.

"On the vaccine, the Legislature was relatively insulted about that," said House Appropriations Chairman Warren Chisum, a Republican who has been allied with Perry in the past. "They just felt it was important to exercise their authority as a Legislature."

Perry spokesman Robert Black said the governor has done nothing more than try to be the chief executive of Texas.

"The executive branch agencies in this state have a lot of power, but they look to the governor for leadership," Black said.

Since he became governor in 2000, Perry has issued 65 executive orders. Most are the usual gubernatorial mix of disaster declarations, study task forces and flags flying at half-staff to honor the dead.

However, more than either of the previous two governors, Perry also has used executive orders to expand the power of his office, and his executive order mandating vaccinations against the human papillomavirus is not the first that over-stepped the Legislature.

At least four times, Perry has issued executive orders for state agencies to adopt policies that failed to pass in the Legislature — including a bill by Chisum to speed up the hearings process on air pollution permits such as the one involved in the TXU case.

In three other orders, Perry took provisions of education legislation that had failed in 2005 special sessions and ordered the Texas Education Agency to implement them.

One was a requirement that school districts spend no less than 65 percent of their budgets on classroom instruction. School districts had been instrumental in killing the so-called 65 percent rule in the Legislature.

In another order, Perry one-upped a joint select legislative committee investigating efficiency and spending by higher education in the wake of dissatisfaction over tuition increases. Perry ordered state colleges and universities to perform efficiency studies and report to him.

And he also used an executive order in January to essentially re-create a criminal justice policy agency that he had vetoed out of existence in 2003. The agency had advised the Legislature on crime trends and whether new prisons would be needed. The new incarnation is a division of his office rather than an independent agency.

There also were some that it would have been hard to find detractors for, such as the executive order telling the Department of Public Safety to establish an Amber Alert system for notifying the news media about the kidnapping of children.

Chisum said legislators did not get upset over some of the earlier executive orders because they "weren't as important" to lawmakers in general.

"When you did the vaccine, that was statewide. It affected everybody. You can take on little groups, but you can't take on the whole group," he said.

The post-Reconstruction Constitution of 1876 was designed to make the Texas governor weak to decentralize power.

The constitution divides executive powers in Texas between the governor, the lieutenant governor, the secretary of state, the comptroller, the land commissioner and the attorney general. Five of the offices are elected statewide.

DOJ_NMG_0136717

"That makes the governor different from the president of the United States," said Houston attorney David Kahne, one of the lawyers who won the judicial ruling blocking Perry's executive order in the TXU case.

Kahne said the president appoints a Cabinet and is in charge of the federal government. The Texas governor has only partial control, he said.

University of North Carolina political science professor Thad Beyle ranks Texas as having among the 11 weakest governorships, largely because many of the state's powerful executive offices are elected and not appointed. Perry's power rating improves when his party's current dominance is factored in.

Perry's spokesman described that as splitting hairs. He said the governor appoints the education and human services commissioners and the governing boards of most agencies.

"Whether it's on a piece of parchment that says executive order or whether it's a phone call with a directive to one of his appointees ... , the result is the same: Under Gov. Perry, the directive has been followed," Black said.

Others have triedPerry is not the first modern governor to try to expand the powers of his office.

During his tenure as governor, George W. Bush issued 41 executive orders.

None specifically expanded the governor's power, though two expanded the powers of his secretary of state to deal with foreign nations. His first secretary of state, Tony Garza, is now ambassador to Mexico.

The late Gov. Ann Richards issued 65 executive orders during her four years in office. None could be interpreted as expanding her authority.

But Richards was a major proponent of expanding the governor's powers. She tried to get the Legislature to do it in 1991 by making state agency heads serve at her pleasure.

The executive directors of most state agencies are hired by citizen governing boards that are appointed by the governor. But members of the boards can be removed only by a two-thirds vote of the Legislature, so they are not required to follow a governor's directives.

"Calling the bureaucracy into account requires a governor with the power to hire and fire executive directors," Richards said.

The Legislature consolidated 58 state agencies and gave Richards some additional authority, but it refused to give her direct control of the state bureaucracy.

Perry sought that exact same power in 2003. Again, the Legislature refused to give a governor that additional power.

State Rep. David Swinford, R-Dumas, had carried an omnibus bill that would have consolidated agencies and given the governor more direct control of the bureaucracy.

He said the 130-year-old provisions of the state constitution do not match a modern Texas.

"The constitution, the way it was drawn, there's a lot of things you have to react to a lot quicker now. We have 23 million people," Swinford said.

Swinford said many legislators opposed the bill because there "may have been distrust of all governors."

'Delusions of grandeur'?Perry did convince the Legislature to eliminate the state's economic development agency and make it a division of his office. He also signed into law a bill requiring the state's health and human services commissioner and his 45,000 state employees to answer to the governor.

"That example of when the Legislature gave him more power hasn't worked that well," said state Sen. Rodney Ellis, D-Houston, referring to problems implementing the privatization of state welfare programs.

Ellis was a leader of the opposition to expand Perry's powers in the 2003 Legislature. Ellis said Perry has been able to take a certain amount of additional power without asking because Republicans control the Legislature, hold every statewide office and Perry is the "titular" head of the Texas Republican Party.

"He hasn't had to work with the Legislature in the way that Ann Richards had to or even George W. Bush had to," Ellis said. "He probably figured he could just keep playing on that field and nobody would ask any questions."

Ellis said Perry's six years in office and his past successes created an aura of power, despite having won re-election with just 39 percent of the vote.

"In the case of Gov. Perry, perhaps he has some delusions of grandeur," Ellis said. "Regardless of the percentage you won by, you've been there so long you begin to get comfortable and think that you can just steamroll your way through the process."

Real Tests For Real Children (NYT)

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

The No Child Left Behind Act required the states to raise educational standards and test student performance, in exchange for federal aid. But things have not worked as Congress planned. Instead of moving toward the educational excellence that the country needs to compete in the global economy, many states opted for dumbed-down tests and deliberate sleight of hand to create the fraudulent appearance of progress.

DOJ_NMG_0136718

As a result, states that perform well with their own watered-down exams do shockingly poorly when their students take the far more rigorous federal test known as the National Assessment of Educational Progress. A report this month by the bipartisan Commission on No Child Left Behind highlights this problem and calls for the development of more rigorous tests and national standards in reading, language arts, math and science.

States would then be offered the options of embracing the national standards and tests, building new ones based on the national model or keeping their existing standards and tests. States that chose not to embrace the national standards would have to submit their tests and standards to federal evaluation — to see how they compare to the national model — and the results would be reported to parents and the general public.

This proposal, which would have been shot down in previous years, is finding a great deal of sympathy in Congress. That is good news, given the work that has to be done to ensure that all of America's children can compete in the world.

Taking Elections Public (WP)

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

Good government -- at $28 million, it's a bargain.

LAST YEAR, Maryland candidates for public office at the state level raised $93.6 million for their campaigns, up 69 percent from 2002, the previous gubernatorial election year. The scramble for cash required to mount a plausible race for the state Senate or House of Delegates doubtless discourages potential candidates, monopolizes the time of those who do run and builds cynicism in voters' views of their elected officials. So why isn't public financing of elections a hotter issue in Annapolis?

The common excuse is cost. The Senate president, Thomas V. Mike Miller Jr. (D-Calvert), has declared himself opposed to spending taxpayers' dollars on politicians. That's a fine populist sentiment, but in fact the cost of a sensible public financing proposal for legislative races (not statewide offices) is modest -- an estimated $28 million in the course of a four-year election cycle. A bill before the General Assembly is modeled on rules already working well in Maine and Arizona. And public funding's advocates make the not implausible argument that the scheme would pay for itself soon enough as lawmakers, less beholden to special interests and corporate contributors, trimmed pork-barrel spending and tax breaks for the favored few.

Similar legislation passed the House last year. Under its terms, to become eligible for public funding candidates would first prove their viability by collecting several hundred small contributions -- $5 or more -- in a legislative district. If they accepted public funding, House candidates in contested races would then be eligible for $80,000 in public funds and pledge to spend no more; Senate candidates in contested races would qualify for $100,000. The system would be completely voluntary. Candidates could opt out, forgo the state allotment, and proceed to raise and spend money without limit; if they did so, however, their opponents who opted in would be compensated with additional state funding.

Incumbents are unlikely to vote for the measure if they believe it will cost them their jobs. But there is so far little evidence of that outcome. In Arizona and Maine, where public financing has been in place since 2002, it has resulted in more contested races -- but no loosening of incumbents' grasp. In both states, where growing numbers of candidates have chosen to take public financing, upward of 90 percent of incumbents seeking reelection won their races last year. But even without altering the incumbent-favoring dynamics of state elections, there is every reason to think that the result -- a legislature whose members owe less to entrenched, deep-pocketed interests -- will be a fairer, more impartial and better government.

Iran Urges Talks On Nukes, Not War (WT/AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini, Associated Press

The Washington Times, February 25, 2007

TEHRAN -- The Iranian foreign minister said yesterday the United States was in no position for another war and maintained that negotiations -- not threats -- were the only way to resolve the standoff over its nuclear activities.

Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki was responding to Vice President Dick Cheney, who renewed Washington's warning to Iran earlier yesterday that "all options" were on the table if Tehran continues to defy U.N. demands to halt uranium enrichment.

Mr. Mottaki said the U.S. could not afford to settle its differences with Iran by starting a third war after Afghanistan and Iraq.

"We do not see America in a position to impose another crisis on its taxpayers inside America by starting another war in the region," Mr. Mottaki told reporters.

The United States and several of its Western allies fear that Iran is using its nuclear program to produce an atomic weapon -- charges Iran denies, saying its aim is to generate electricity.

The International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) reported on Thursday that Iran had ignored a U.N. Security Council ultimatum to freeze its uranium-enrichment program and had expanded the program by setting up hundreds of centrifuges.

DOJ_NMG_0136719

Enriched to a low level, uranium is used to produce nuclear fuel, but further enrichment makes it suitable for use in building an atomic bomb.

The IAEA report was released after the deadline Wednesday of a 60-day grace period for Iran to halt uranium enrichment. Iran has repeatedly refused to halt enrichment as a precondition to negotiations about its program.

Mr. Mottaki urged the U.S. and its allies to return to dialogue when they are scheduled to meet in London next week.

"The only way to reach a solution for disputes is negotiations and talks. Therefore, we want the London meeting to make a brave decision and resume talks with Iran," Mr. Mottaki said.

Gov. Bill Richardson, of New Mexico and a Democratic presidential candidate, yesterday also urged the Bush administration to negotiate directly with Iran.

"Saber-rattling is not a good way to get the Iranians to cooperate," Mr. Richardson wrote in an op-ed piece in The Washington Post. "But it is a good way to start a new war."

Iran, Mr. Richardson wrote, "will not end their nuclear program because we threaten them and call them names."

Separately, Iran's elite Revolutionary Guards said it killed 17 mercenary fighters on its border with Turkey and accused the United States and its allies of seeking to provoke tensions along the country's frontiers.

In a statement, the Guards said 17 "counterrevolutionary mercenaries" were killed, the official Islamic Republic News Agency (IRNA) reported yesterday.

The Guards chief, Gen. Yahya Rahim Safavi, said the United States, Britain and Israel were seeking to incite tension on Iran's borders to undermine its government, IRNA reported.

"Iran's enemies, through hiring some mercenaries and with their wishful thinking, want to create instability but ... the armed forces will strongly suppress anti-revolutionaries and rebels who are dependent to foreigners," Gen. Safavi was quoted as saying.

Diplomats Say U.S. Intelligence On Iranian Nukes Is Thin (LAT)

By Bob Drogin, Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, February 25, 2007

VIENNA, Austria -- Despite growing international concern about Iran's nuclear program and its regional ambitions, most U.S. intelligence shared with the U.N. nuclear watchdog agency has proved inaccurate and none has led to significant discoveries inside Iran, diplomats here said.

The officials said the CIA and other Western spy services have provided sensitive information to the Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency at least since 2002, when Iran's long-secret nuclear program was exposed. But none of the tips about supposed secret weapons sites provided clear evidence that the Islamic Republic is developing illicit weapons.

"Since 2002, pretty much all the intelligence that's come to us has proved to be wrong," said a senior diplomat at the IAEA. Another official here described the agency's intelligence stream as "very cold now (because) so little panned out."

The reliability of U.S. information and assessments on Iran is increasingly at issue as the Bush administration confronts the emerging regional power on multiple fronts: its expanding nuclear effort, its alleged support for insurgents inside Iraq and its backing of Middle East militant groups.

The CIA still faces harsh criticism for its pre-war intelligence errors on Iraq. No one here argues that U.S. intelligence officials have fallen this time for crudely forged documents or pushed shoddy analysis. IAEA officials, who openly challenged U.S. assessments that Saddam Hussein was developing a nuclear bomb, say the Americans are much more cautious in assessing Iran.

American officials privately acknowledge that much of their evidence on Iran's nuclear plans and programs remains ambiguous, fragmented and difficult to prove.

The IAEA has its own concerns about Iran's nuclear program, although agency officials concede they have found no proof that nuclear material has been diverted.

Iran's radical regime began enriching uranium in small amounts last August in a program it insists will provide fuel only for civilian power stations, not nuclear weapons.

On Thursday, the IAEA released a report declaring that Iran had expanded uranium enrichment and defied a Security Council deadline to suspend nuclear activities. In the meantime, the agency is locked in a dispute with Tehran, the Iranian capital, over additional information and access to determine if the program is peaceful.

In November 2005, U.N. inspectors leafing through a box of papers in Tehran discovered a 15-page document that showed how to form highly enriched uranium into the configuration needed for the core of a nuclear bomb. Iran said the paper came from Pakistan, but has rebuffed IAEA requests to let inspectors take or copy it for further analysis.

DOJ_NMG_0136720

Diplomats here were less convinced by documents recovered by U.S. intelligence from a laptop computer apparently stolen from Iran. American analysts first briefed senior IAEA officials on the contents of the hard drive at the U.S. mission here in mid-2005.

The documents included detailed designs to upgrade ballistic missiles to carry nuclear warheads, drawings for subterranean testing of high explosives, and two pages describing research into uranium tetrafluoride, known as "green salt," which is used during uranium enrichment. IAEA officials remain suspicious of the information in part because most of the papers are in English rather than Farsi, the Iranian language.

Iran's representative to the IAEA, Ali Asghar Soltanieh, dismissed the laptop documents as "fabricated information." Iran, he said, has produced 170 tons of "green salt" at a uranium conversion facility in Esfahan that is monitored by the IAEA.

"We are not hiding it," he said in an interview. "We make tons of it. These documents are all nonsense."

The U.S. government is not required to share intelligence with the IAEA, and relations between Washington, D.C., and the U.N. agency are at times testy. In March 2003, ElBaradei embarrassed the White House when he told the Security Council that documents indicating that Saddam's regime in Iraq had sought to purchase uranium in Niger were forged. The Bush administration subsequently opposed ElBaradei's re-appointment as IAEA chief.

While it confronts Iran's nuclear ambitions, the Bush administration also has tried to finger Iran as a supplier of munitions and training for insurgent groups in neighboring Iraq.

But the quality of its information has limited this effort, as well.

U.S. officials recently compiled evidence purporting to show that the Iranian Quds Force, an elite unit of the Iranian Revolutionary Guards, has supplied Iranian-made weapons to Shiite militia that have attacked U.S. forces in Iraq.

After U.S. officials unveiled the evidence to reporters in Baghdad two weeks ago, however, Secretary of Defense Robert M. Gates and other Pentagon officials scrambled to retreat from the incendiary claim that the "highest levels" of the Tehran government were directly involved.

"I don't know if it goes to the highest levels of the government," Army Lt. Gen. Ray Odierno, the officer in charge of daily operations in Iraq, told Pentagon reporters Thursday. "What we do know is that the Quds Force has had involvement with some extremist groups in Iraq."

Washington, D.C., has sought to pressure Tehran into halting the supply of so-called "explosively formed projectiles" that are able to penetrate heavily armored vehicles. The projectiles represent only a small percentage of roadside bombing attacks in Iraq but they are far more lethal than ordinary explosives.

Administration officials also cite a growing effort by Hezbollah, an Iranian protege and ally based in Lebanon, to aid anti-American Shiite forces in Iraq.

U.S. military officials contend that Hezbollah has provided training in Lebanon to hundreds of members of the Mahdi Army, which is controlled by radical anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. A smaller number of Hezbollah forces reportedly have entered Iraq through Syria to provide such training.

Given the lack of clear evidence, Iran's strategic goals in Iraq are a matter of debate and concern has spread about its growing influence there. Although Iran is Persian and Iraq is Arab, both have majority Shiite populations, who have kept close religious, economic and cultural ties for centuries. Iran's rulers view the United States as meddling in their backyard, or at least in a natural part of their sphere of influence.

Some outside experts believe Iran seeks to keep America tied down indefinitely in Iraq and actively will resist a settlement there for fear Washington will next turn its guns on Tehran.

Ali Ansari, an expert on Iran at St. Andrew University in Scotland and author of "Confronting Iran," counters that Iran and America share some interests.

Iran is "looking for a stable Iraq," he said. "They want an Iraq that is not fragmented. But the difference would be that they don't want an Iraq that is militarily strong. They want an Iraqi government that is elected democratically, which means a Shiia Iraq."

But Sunni-dominated governments in Egypt, Jordan and especially Saudi Arabia have pushed the U.S. to expand Sunni representation in Iraq's leadership as a way of countering Tehran. Some experts fear that a nuclear-armed Iran will spark a regional arms race.

John Negroponte, former director of national intelligence, told a House committee last month that Iran has extended its "shadow in the region" since the U.S. ousted hostile regimes on its borders: Afghanistan's Taliban and Saddam's government in Baghdad.

Iran also has increased regional political leverage, he said, due to increased oil revenues, electoral victories by Hamas in Palestinian territories, and Hezbollah's "perceived recent success in fighting Israel" in Lebanon.

DOJ_NMG_0136721

Iran and Syria since have resupplied arms to Hezbollah, including stocks of long-range missiles that could reach deep into Israel, U.S. officials contend.

Washington lists Hamas and Hezbollah as terrorist organizations.

The administration has also become alarmed at Iran's increasing efforts to support Hamas following the group's victory in Palestinian elections in January 2006. That worry lies behind an $86 million U.S. plan to build up the security forces of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' presidential guard and National Security Force.

Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, has exploited the growing confrontation with Washington, D.C., to gain much needed political support at home. Nationalist sentiments run deep in Iran and the claim that Tehran has the same right to nuclear power as other nations has become a rallying cry that undermines the government's domestic critics.

"None of us can accept the suspension of these activities because people consider this our legal right," said Akbar Alami, an independent lawmaker. "All the political parties agree with this. We cannot stop."

Ahmadinejad's fiery rhetoric and defiance of the West also has burnished his credentials as a populist leader in other Islamic nations. That has raised alarms in Sunni governments around the region that Iran's brand of militant political Islam, possibly backed by the prestige of being a nuclear power, is on the march.

"The Americans are worried about enriched uranium and the Arabs are worried about enriched Shiism," said Mamoun Fandy, senior fellow for gulf security at the London-based International Institute for Strategic Studies. Iran's growing power, he said, "threatens every existing political order in the region."

Staff writers Paul Richter and Peter Spiegel in Washington, D.C., contributed to this report.

Fighting Iran -- With Patience (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

Nuclear weapons have a way of forcing presidents to reverse policies thought to be carved in stone. So it was with Ronald Reagan and the Soviet Union, and so it may be now with George W. Bush and the two surviving members of the "axis of evil."

To the outrage of some supporters and the mockery of his critics, President Bush has blessed a tentative, quarter-loaf diplomatic deal aimed at curbing North Korea's nuclear arsenal. And he has a shot at reaching a modus vivendi with Iran on nuclear proliferation as well -- if he disregards both the outrage and the mockery, as he should.

"There is movement behind the scenes," a European diplomat who closely follows Iran told me last week. "The Iranians are nervous and want to get engaged." Details of a confidential Iranian proposal that has been circulating in Brussels and Tehran for four months support the view that there could be an opening on the Iranian front despite the angry rhetoric from Iran triggered by last week's new indictment of its nuclear ambitions by the International Atomic Energy Agency.

Bush vigorously ruled out rewarding bad behavior by foreign adversaries in his first term. Saddam Hussein's manipulation of the international community was a driving force in Bush's labeling Iraq, along with North Korea and Iran, as irredeemably evil in 2002 and invading Iraq a year later.

But now Bush countenances providing economic and diplomatic rewards to North Korea, and ultimately to Iran, to reduce the threat of nuclear weapons in the hands of two regimes that behave as badly as anyone could want. The bravado of the first Bush term has been replaced by a sadder and quieter way of doing business abroad as Iraq has sapped U.S. capabilities and political cohesion.

The sense of a U-turn is reinforced by Bush's reliance this time on the negotiating skills of his diplomatic corps and on European and Asian partners to reach, enforce and pay for the projected deals, which would serve as twin tombstones for a brief era of U.S. unilateralism.

The change on North Korea is described by former administration officials as a strategic decision by the president to start "to pry the lid off" of that starving, tyrannized remnant of the Cold War by offering Pyongyang a path for peaceful change. Cooperation in the six-party negotiations would also help stabilize China's relations with Japan and the United States, in this view.

The president reportedly surprised Chinese President Hu Jintao during their lunch at the White House last April by suggesting that, if the nuclear impasse could be resolved, the time was right for a formal peace treaty to end the Korean conflict. And when North Korea defied Chinese "advice" by conducting a nuclear test in October, China became more engaged in pulling Pyongyang back to the negotiating table.

Unfortunately, Bush cannot rely on Russia to play a similarly helpful role with Iran. President Vladimir Putin seems willing to take enormous risks with global stability for short-term, largely commercial reasons. And divisions in Iran's leadership make the reaching of a "mutual suspension" accord -- under which Tehran will suspend enriching uranium in return for the suspension of U.N. sanctions -- more difficult.

DOJ_NMG_0136722

But U.S. and European policy should play on those divisions, which have visibly surfaced as President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad rants on in full-throated belligerence while officials closer to Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, Iran's supreme leader, offer proposals that have the virtue at least of identifying the chief remaining obstacles to a deal.

Last autumn, Iran's Ali Larijani told European Union negotiator Javier Solana that Iran could accept the Russian-E.U. proposal for an international consortium to enrich and reprocess nuclear fuel for Iran -- if the enrichment and reprocessing were done on Iranian soil.

A diplomatic device known as a nonpaper (so its existence can be denied) and dated Oct. 1, 2006, describes a "gentlemen's agreement" by the two diplomats to use the proposal "to help open the way to negotiations." When I telephoned him in Berlin last week, Solana affably but deftly warded off questions about the nonpaper, then added: "Nothing has been agreed. Nothing has been put forward in formal terms."

Precisely. The Iranian condition is unacceptable to Washington. But the fact that it was put forward at all suggests that the pressures generated by the U.S. Treasury's campaign to limit finance and export credits to Iran and condemnation by the United Nations are taking a toll on the Iranians -- as these tools did on North Korea.

Bush seems to have decided to employ strategic patience in seeking a verifiable nuclear deal with North Korea and to have taken a long-range view of regional stability. He should do no less with Iran, however much manufactured outrage or contrived mockery it provokes, in Tehran or in Washington.

UN's ElBaradei To Visit North Korea For Talks On Nuclear Accord (BLOOM)

By Seyoon Kim

Bloomberg, February 25, 2007

Feb. 24 - International Atomic Energy Agency Director-General Mohamed ElBaradei accepted an invitation from North Korea to visit the country in March for talks on its nuclear program, the United Nations atomic agency said.

``I see this as a step toward the denuclearization of the North Korean Peninsula," Elbaradei was quoted as saying in a statement from the IAEA. ``We will discuss issues of mutual concern and how we can implement the agreement reached at the six-party talks about the shut-down and eventual abandonment of the Yongbyon nuclear facility, including the reprocessing facility."

North Korea invited officials from the United Nations atomic agency to visit in the coming weeks for talks on its nuclear program and on plans for inspections after pledging to end the pursuit of weapons in exchange for aid. ElBaradei may visit with a team of nuclear inspectors during the week of March 12, agency spokesman Peter Rickwood said yesterday.

North Korea's agreement to halt its development of nuclear bombs was also met with U.S. and Japanese promises of steps to normalize their relations with the country.

The accord was announced Feb. 13 after talks involving South Korea, the U.S., Japan, China and Russia. Under the agreement, the North will receive economic aid equivalent to 50,000 metric tons of heavy fuel oil and a further 950,000 tons if it disables its Yongbyon nuclear reactor.

The six-nation talks gained new importance after the North's nuclear test in October. The UN Security Council then banned sales of military equipment and luxury goods to the country. The Stalinist nation also test-fired seven missiles in July, one of them the long-range Taepodong 2.

North Korea's Welcome Opening (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 25, 2007

IT WAS AN INVITATION he couldn't refuse. Last week, North Korea asked Mohamed ElBaradei, director of the International Atomic Energy Agency, to Pyongyang to discuss dismantling its nuclear facilities. The invitation arrived a day after the IAEA announced that Iran is moving faster than expected to enrich uranium, in defiance of the United Nations.

The IAEA, the imperfect yet indispensable nuclear watchdog agency, is imperfect in the way that all bureaucracies are imperfect; it can be slow, legalistic and equivocal. But as a keeper of the international nuclear order, it is better than the alternatives — a conclusion even the Bush administration appears to have accepted.

The IAEA has not always enjoyed such access, or such a reputation. North Korea kicked out IAEA inspectors in December 2002, then fired up its plutonium plant and, less than five years later, claimed a successful test of a nuclear bomb. Two weeks ago, North Korea signed the precursor to what could, if all goes much better than expected, eventually turn into a nuclear disarmament deal.

Under the pact, Pyongyang must shut down its Yongbyon nuclear reactor, allow IAEA inspectors back into the country and, within 60 days, disclose all its nuclear materiel and operations. In return, Pyongyang will get a dribble of heavy fuel oil, to be followed by more oil and aid if and when it begins to dismantle its nuclear facilities.

DOJ_NMG_0136723

Although it's encouraging that Pyongyang has invited ElBaradei, the key test will be whether it discloses anything meaningful about its nuclear operations — which U.S. officials believe include stockpiles of bomb-ready plutonium and a program to enrich uranium. More critical still will be whether the famously secretive North Koreans will allow IAEA inspectors the access that will be required to verify their claims.

ElBaradei infuriated the Bush administration before its 2003 invasion of Iraq by refusing to endorse the U.S. view that Saddam Hussein had a functioning nuclear weapons program. He was eventually proved correct, of course, and in 2005 was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize (an award that was also an obvious rebuke to President Bush).

In Iran, however, IAEA reports have tended to support U.S. claims about Tehran's suspicious nuclear activities. Whether these reports have prompted a change in the U.S. attitude, or whether the change is the result of a larger shift in the administration's perspective on the IAEA, is hard to tell. Whatever the reason, the agency's renewed relevance in Washington is welcome.

All this said, ElBaradei and Bush disagree on Tehran. The U.S. generally favors a more hard-line approach, while the IAEA is more willing to negotiate. But these are policy disputes. The IAEA's strength is more practical. It is powerless to force nations to allow its inspectors to go where they are not wanted, nor can it catch determined cheats. But it has earned credibility for honestly reporting what its inspectors find and where they are not permitted to look. For this alone, its return to North Korea will be useful.

The Stuff Sam Nunn's Nightmares Are Made Of (NYT)

By Michael Crowley

The New York Times Magazine, February 25, 2007

By now we can too readily imagine the horror of terrorists exploding a nuclear weapon in a major American city: the gutted skyscrapers, the melted cars, the charred bodies. For Sam Nunn, however, a new terror begins the day after. That's when the world asks whether another bomb is out there. "If a nuclear bomb went off in Moscow or New York City or Jerusalem, any number of groups would claim they have another," Nunn told me recently. These groups would make steep demands as intelligence officials scrambled to determine which claims were real. Panic would prevail. Even after the detonation of a small, crude weapon that inflicted less damage than the bomb at Hiroshima, Nunn suggested, "the psychological damage would be incalculable. It would be a slow, step-by-step process to regain confidence. And the question will be, Why didn't we take steps to prevent this? We will have a whole list of things we wish we'd done."

Nunn thinks of those things every time he picks up a newspaper. When, for instance, he reads about the arrest of a Russian man who, in a sting operation, tried to sell weapons-grade uranium — a reminder of a possible black market in nuclear materials and of the poor security at facilities in the former Soviet Union. Or when he sees news about Iran's efforts to build a nuclear bomb, which could set off a wave of nuclear proliferation in the Middle East and thus significantly raise the possibility that terrorists will someday acquire a bomb. And despite the apparent diplomatic breakthrough with North Korea earlier this month, in which the North Koreans agreed to begin dismantling their nuclear facilities in return for fuel and other aid, Nunn, who finds the deal encouraging, remains concerned since North Korea's unpredictable, cash-starved dictatorship still retains perhaps half a dozen nuclear bombs, and the ingredients to make more.

A decade after leaving the United States Senate, where he spent years as chairman of the Armed Services Committee, Nunn posed one, overriding question about his list of things we'll wish we had done if a doomsday should ever come: "Why aren't we doing them now?" In a sense, his own answer has been to help found and run the Nuclear Threat Initiative, a Washington-based foundation largely bankrolled by Nunn's friends Ted Turner and Warren Buffett. In what may be the most ambitious example of private dollars subsidizing national security, the N.T.I. is trying to fill in the gaps where government is failing to reduce nuclear threats. In other words, to do the things now that we would otherwise wish we had done.

The war in Iraq has understandably consumed America's foreign-policy energies. But it occludes what Nunn and many others, on both the right and left, regard as a deepening worldwide nuclear crisis. Despite its willingness to confront North Korea, the U.S., Nunn insists, still does not fully grasp the nuclear dangers it faces. "We are at a tipping point," he says. "And we are headed in the wrong direction." As he sees it, the trouble is, in a defense establishment that once war-gamed the end of the world a thousand different ways, there has been a shortage of thinking about what the right direction looks like or how to take it. It is a situation that has led Nunn, who once extolled nuclear weapons as a guarantor of American safety, to reassess decades of hawkish cold-war thinking, to reconsider his most fundamental beliefs about whether the country would be safer in a world with any nuclear weapons at all.

Sam Nunn's nuclear nightmare begins with a character like Oleg Khinsagov. Last month, the International Atomic Energy Agency revealed that officials in the former Soviet republic of Georgia had arrested Khinsagov, a 50-year-old Russian fish and sausage trader, for attempting to sell 100 grams of highly enriched uranium to a Muslim buyer who, Khinsagov had been told, represented "a serious organization." The price: $1 million. Khinsagov, who was caught in a sting operation, had nowhere near enough material for a bomb, but he claimed to have far more at his apartment. (Whether he actually did is unclear.) An American laboratory analysis indicates that the material most likely originated at a Russian nuclear facility.

DOJ_NMG_0136724

To some, Khinsagov's arrest was a success story, a sign that recent efforts to crack down on nuclear smuggling are producing results. Nunn is not so sanguine. He says that nuclear smugglers who get caught — the international agency counts 18 confirmed cases involving highly enriched uranium and plutonium since 1993 — are usually unsophisticated amateurs. "It's the ones we don't see that worry me," he says.

It is a worry that he shares with Ted Turner, the billionaire philanthropist and founder of CNN whose donation of $250 million in Time Warner stock enabled the Nuclear Threat Initiative to open for business in 2001. Turner long dreaded a nuclear holocaust, but he assumed the threat had fizzled out with the end of the cold war. "I was getting ready to celebrate the millennium in 2000 because it looked like humanity was going to make it," he told me, when we spoke last month. "And if we could do that, maybe we could make it to 3000. I figured that we had nuclear disarmament." And then he saw a report on "60 Minutes" about lax security in the former Soviet Union. There were 20,000 warheads and stockpiles of uranium and plutonium capable of making another 40,000 or more warheads scattered across 11 time zones, whose safety too often depended on lackadaisical guards, shabby locks and defective security cameras. There was another related problem: large quantities of uranium that could be used to make bombs were being stored at some 130 civilian nuclear reactors around the world, often under even more slipshod security. A small group of terrorists might break into such a facility and if they had basic engineering and chemistry skills could probably forge a crude nuclear bomb out of a grapefruit-size 30-pound lump of highly enriched uranium (to say nothing of a much simpler radioactive "dirty" bomb).

Turner considered establishing an organization to revive the dormant nuclear-disarmament movement. But foreign-policy specialists he met with persuaded him to focus on more realistic, incremental change. A mutual friend connected Turner with Nunn, who was then practicing law at an Atlanta firm. According to one person familiar with N.T.I.'s founding, who does not want to be named because he works with N.T.I. and does not have permission to speak on its behalf, "There was this very prolonged dance where people were trying to come up with ideas that were exciting enough for Turner but sensible enough for Nunn," who was uncomfortable with Turner's passion for disarmament, a movement Nunn had long considered irresponsible.

Nunn and Turner found common ground, however, in a narrower mission: responding to the threat of "loose nukes," or the possibility that nuclear weapons and materials might be smuggled out of the former Soviet Union and find their way into malevolent hands. They settled on having the Nuclear Threat Initiative spend millions of dollars on everything from annual reports written by Harvard academics on the loose-nukes problem to filming a docudrama about a nuclear-terrorism crisis. Above all, the foundation would finance direct-action programs to secure nuclear materials around the world, in coordination with the U.S. and foreign governments.

It was one such program that led Nunn and Turner to a warehouse in Ust-Kamenogorsk, an industrial city in eastern Kazakhstan, in October 2005. They were there to size up an effort, paid for in part by N.T.I., to "blend down" 6,400 pounds of highly enriched uranium — enough to make dozens of bombs — into a form that couldn't be used in weapons. The uranium was spent fuel from a decommissioned nuclear power plant situated near the Iranian border. A few years earlier, he had made the following offer to Kazakhstan's president: N.T.I. would provide its expertise to relocate and then blend down the uranium, and it would pay half of the $2 million cost to do so. By the time Nunn and Turner toured the Ulba Metallurgical Plant, the project was close to completion. A portion of the uranium had not yet been blended down, however, and it lay stored in 20 or so tubes in a corner of the warehouse. Nunn and Turner stood and gazed solemnly at it. "Here was the potential, right there in that little corner, in the hands of the wrong people, to wipe out cities around the world." Nunn says. "That's a pretty stark realization."

N.T.I. intervened in Kazakhstan, Nunn explains, because the U.S. government did not act first. It's not the only such example: in mid-2002, more than 100 pounds of highly enriched uranium — stored in portable canisters that emit little radiation — was lying at the Vinca Institute of Nuclear Sciences, a civilian research reactor in Belgrade. The security there would have been no match for even a small terrorist squad. And Islamic militants operated in the region. Clearly Vinca was a high-priority problem. Yet even though the first American plans to rescue the material were drawn up during the Clinton administration, no action had been taken a year after Sept. 11. The obstacle was bureaucratic: in return for giving up the uranium, the Serbian government demanded help cleaning up Vinca's spent reactor fuel. That qualified as an environmental cleanup, however, which the U.S. lacked the authority to pay for. So N.T.I. stepped in and covered the $5 million cleanup fee. It wasn't until August 2002 that a motorcade of technicians and machine-gun-toting commandos finally transferred the uranium from the Vinca Institute to a cargo plane that flew it to Russia to be blended down.

"If there's anything that most Americans would think the government would happily chip in for, it's getting highly enriched uranium out of a place where it could fall into terrorist hands," says Matthew Bunn, a former nuclear-arms official in the Clinton administration who is now at Harvard and whose work is partly financed by N.T.I. "Yet" — in Vinca — "the government could not get this done without N.T.I.'s money."

DOJ_NMG_0136725

A small-town lawyer and politician who won an underdog campaign in Georgia in 1972, Nunn quickly made his name in Washington as a defense-policy wonk. Thanks to an intimidating expertise on defense affairs and a bespectacled air of judicious authority, Nunn was "looked upon with awe" by colleagues in both parties, says Pete V. Domenici, the Republican senator from New Mexico. Such was his authority, in fact, that he comfortably rebuffed offers from George H. W. Bush and Bill Clinton to serve as secretary of defense, knowing that he wielded even more power from his longtime perch as chairman of Senate Armed Services. Nunn used that influence to consistently pro-military ends. During the 1970s, he fought with liberal Democrats seeking to cut defense budgets and ultimately forced Jimmy Carter to accept substantial increases in defense spending. Nunn also strongly defended the value and morality of nuclear weapons. The nuclear-freeze movement, in his mind, was naïvely utopian. "We had to have a nuclear deterrent," he says today. "Not only that, but a first-use policy," which refers to the U.S.'s stated willingness in certain circumstances to strike first with nuclear weapons.

Nunn considered a run for president in 1988, and his name surfaced again after Michael Dukakis's crushing defeat in November of that year, which further persuaded centrist Democrats that they needed a Southern moderate as a candidate. But that talk ground to a halt after Nunn opposed the first gulf war. He urged at the time that sanctions and diplomacy be given more time and, in January 1991, voted against the Senate's war resolution. A sign went up on a Georgia highway calling him "Saddam's Best Friend," and some suggested that he was cynically appealing to liberal Democratic primary voters. As it happened, however, opposing such a short and easy war probably ruined Nunn's shot at the White House. In Washington, his vote was considered a colossal political blunder. "He got a lot of political flak," says his friend Al From, the chairman of the moderate Democratic Leadership Council. "It probably hastened his decision to retire from politics." (Nunn's vote "profoundly influenced the next generation of senators that confronted plans for the second invasion" 11 years later, says a former Clinton defense official who advises Congressional Democrats. White House officials even invoked Nunn's "mistake" as they lobbied Congress to vote for war.)

By the mid-1990s, the cold war was over and the stature of defense gurus diminished. Moreover, politics on Capitol Hill were changing. The rise of fierce, Gingrich-style cultural politics made life uneasy for all Southern Democrats. In 1993, Nunn resisted Bill Clinton's attempt to allow gays to serve openly in the military, prompting a gay-rights spokesman to brand him a "Jesse Helms Democrat." Washington was growing far less hospitable to a moderate with little taste for the blood sport of partisan politics. "The premium is on stirring up your base," he says now. When Nunn announced his retirement in 1995, even the Republican Strom Thurmond urged him to stick around. Nunn was just 58 when he left the Senate. For more than 20 years, his life had been defined by the cold war and the fight against Communism. That cause was over.

Nunn first became alarmed by the threat of loose nukes during his last Senate term. A year after the Soviet Union began to collapse in 1990, he passed legislation with his friend Richard Lugar, the Republican from Indiana, that dedicated hundreds of millions of dollars annually in the Pentagon budget to the dismantling of surplus Soviet nuclear weapons, upgrading security at nuclear sites in the former Soviet Union and finding jobs for its nuclear scientists lest they be tempted to work for terrorists or would-be nuclear powers. Since 1991, the Cooperative Threat Reduction program — or simply Nunn-Lugar, as it is generally known — has spent more than $10 billion on its mission, and it is considered a triumph of forward-looking lawmaking.

Even so, huge quantities of weapons and material remain in what Nunn considers perilously unsafe conditions. Only about half of the buildings containing nuclear material in the former Soviet Union have undergone post-1990 security upgrades to install things like perimeter fences, cameras and radiation-monitors to prevent theft. And 134 tons of excess plutonium, which the Russians are willing to destroy, are just sitting in storage. Progress in addressing these problems has been stymied in part by conservatives in the last Republican Congress who bristled at the notion of sending American tax dollars to a Russian military that, they said, should pay for its own fences and cameras. Cooler relations between Russia and the United States have stalled matters further. Russian military officials are less willing to let Americans poke around their nuclear sites and assess security conditions. And the uncompromising diplomacy of the Bush administration has played a role too. American and Russian officials recently fought over arcane rules that would govern a program to dispose of that 134 tons of excess plutonium. The lead United States negotiator demanded extremely broad guarantees for U.S. contractors involved in the work, including freedom from liability even in the event of intentional spillage of nuclear material. The standoff delayed the program for more than a year, until Bush and Vladimir Putin finally hammered out a solution at a summit last fall.

One of the few points of agreement between George Bush and John Kerry during the presidential campaign in 2004 was that preventing a terrorist nuclear attack is among America's very highest priorities. But many critics on both the left and right argue that the Bush administration has lacked a sense of urgency toward the threat of loose nukes. Kenneth Adelman, a former Reagan-era arms-control official and a Pentagon adviser under George W. Bush, recently recalled a private meeting with Donald Rumsfeld days after his swearing in as defense secretary. "He was very skeptical of the Nunn-Lugar program," Adelman told me.

DOJ_NMG_0136726

"That wasn't the kind of thing he thought the Department of Defense should be doing. He had it in his head that it was a wimpy thing to have the Pentagon involved in."

Some Bush allies maintain that the real blame lies with Russia's increasingly belligerent leader. "I believe there are still many installations where the security of materials is still not to the high level that we would hope," John Wolf, who served as assistant secretary of state for nonproliferation in Bush's first term, told me. "Somebody ought to look into Mr. Putin's eyes and down to his soul and say, 'You're putting the fate of the world at risk by your unwillingness to take action.' "

Last September, Nunn and N.T.I.'s president, a former Energy Department official in the Clinton administration named Charles Curtis, flew to Vienna to meet with Mohamed ElBaradei, the director general of the International Atomic Energy Agency. ElBaradei admires Nunn, whom he calls "a shining example" in the fight against a potential nuclear catastrophe — presumably not least because N.T.I. has given ElBaradei's agency more than $1 million to upgrade its monitoring of nuclear material worldwide. Part of the reason for Nunn's visit was to discuss a major new N.T.I. proposal: the creation of an international nuclear fuel bank.

This was the foundation's response to an unsettling wave of countries showing interest in new or expanded nuclear capabilities. Several nations, including Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Morocco and Algeria, say they might want to develop civilian nuclear power. Meanwhile, South Africa, Brazil, Canada, Argentina and Australia all talk of creating home-grown uranium-enrichment programs — ostensibly for power but potentially also for military ends. "What I see is a new wave of countries not necessarily trying to develop nuclear weapons but nuclear-weapons capability — the ability to process or enrich plutonium or uranium," ElBaradei told me recently. "And I know, and you know, that if a country is capable of doing that, they are virtually a nuclear-weapon state."

The idea behind an international fuel bank is to make it possible for nations to generate nuclear power without developing a nuclear-weapons capability. Iran, for instance, has rejected offers from Russia to manage its uranium supply on the alleged grounds that it doesn't want to be dependent on Russia's political whims for its energy needs. The fuel bank would render such complaints obsolete and make transparent who is using energy programs as a cover for military ambitions. If a country has access to a reliable fuel supply, why would it need its own enrichment program?

For Nunn, this is the logical next phase in the fight against loose nukes: preventing the creation of new nukes that could become loose someday. ElBaradei has predicted that as many as 30 or 40 countries could begin trying to develop nuclear capability in coming years. And while traditional policies of deterrence may keep future nuclear states in check, every new bomb factory necessarily means there is more dangerous nuclear material in the world. "I see the two going together," Nunn says. "The more countries that have this fissile material, the more likely the risk of a diversion or theft of fissile material becomes."

America was lucky to survive the cold war, Nunn told an audience in Washington last month. "I don't believe if you get another 7, 8, 10 countries with a nuclear weapon that you're going to be so lucky."

It is very likely that North Korea's success in building weapons and Iran's steady progress toward that goal have only encouraged other nations to get into the nuclear game. But, Nunn believes, the United States, mired in Iraq and strained in its relations with former allies, has never had less leverage to counter them. Nunn says that the current Iraq war (which he also opposed) has distracted U.S. officials, undermined the credibility of any U.S. military threat it might bring to bear on North Korean or Iran and "dealt a severe blow to the leadership credibility we need in the world."

In this view, American credibility is an essential part of persuading other nations to stop or reverse their nuclear programs. One way to enhance American credibility, according to this line of thinking, is for the United States to decrease its own nuclear stockpile. Yet the Bush administration has not only not moved to significantly reduce that stockpile, it is also exploring new nuclear technologies (like bunker-buster mini-nukes). "I think we have very badly failed to meet our responsibilities," Brent Scowcroft, George H. W. Bush's national security adviser and Nunn's friend, told me. "I think it is the sort of neoconish notion that it is our job to dominate the world and that the way you dominate it is by pushing ahead on new nuclear stuff."

Nunn complains that the Bush White House also subordinates nonproliferation to other goals. As an example, he cites the deal the administration cut with India last year. It created a legal exemption allowing American companies to conduct trade with India's nuclear-power industry even though India is not a party to the 1968 Non-Proliferation Treaty. Nunn publicly called for Congress to impose conditions on the deal — specifically, a provision requiring that India halt production of new fissile material for weapons. A worldwide treaty barring the creation of all new fissile material is near the top of Nunn's wish list, and he saw the deal with India as a fine opportunity. But in the end, the Bush administration, which is eager to cultivate India as a regional ally, got its way. "We missed that opportunity," Nunn says. "We should not have entered into that agreement."

The Bush administration is not without its achievements or its defenders. Persuading Libya to abandon a nascent nuclear program in 2003 is one of its least-heralded triumphs. The recent deal with North Korea, if it holds up, could be another success story. The Global Threat Reduction Initiative, a program set up by the Energy Department to remove nuclear material from civilian nuclear reactors around the world, has been widely commended. (Nunn, who is not prone to boasting, says people "at very high levels" have told him that the example set by the Vinca operation in Serbia was a crucial impetus behind the creation of the new program.) Meanwhile, conservatives note that the sorts of international treaties embraced by Nunn but spurned by Bush have historically failed to blunt the nuclear ambitions of states like India and Pakistan and, now, possibly Iran. Hence American power and the deterrent threat of brute force remain the best way to confront the dangers of proliferation. "If you want to discourage countries from acquiring nuclear weapons," Richard Perle, the former Reagan arms-control official, says, "make it clear that once they get a nuclear weapon, it is something they can't use directly because we will annihilate them."

DOJ_NMG_0136727

Nunn, for one, remains unconvinced. The North Korea deal, he says, came about after the Bush administration shifted tactics from its confrontational, axis-of-evil posture to intensive multilateral diplomacy. While Nunn says he applauds the administration for changing direction on North Korea — "You have to talk to countries unless you're going to leave yourself with one resort, which is military force," he says — Perle's vision of deterrence is ineffective if a nuclear weapon is stolen or transferred from a state to a terrorist group with no fixed address to incinerate. It is potential threats like these that have led Nunn to shift his focus from locking up loose nukes to grander ideas, like the international fuel bank.

At the same time, he has had to enlist new allies. Ted Turner's initial donation of $250 million to the Nuclear Threat Initiative came in the form of Time Warner stock, which lost 70 percent of its value before N.T.I. sold it off. N.T.I. might have gone under by now had Nunn not enlisted another wealthy angel, Warren Buffett. Nunn has known Buffett for years through his service on the Coca-Cola corporate board — Nunn estimates he spends 30 to 50 percent of his time serving on several corporate boards, including those of Coca-Cola, Dell and Chevron — and Buffett has long been concerned about the risk of nuclear terrorism.

"One thing you learn in the insurance business is that anything that can happen will happen," Buffett told me. "Whether it's the levees in New Orleans or the San Francisco earthquake, things that are very improbable do happen." Buffett once gave Nunn a formula that the latter likes to repeat: assuming a 10 percent chance of a nuclear attack in any given year, the odds of surviving 50 years without an attack are less than 1 percent. If the odds of an attack can be reduced to 1 percent per year, however, the chances of making it 50 years without a nuclear detonation improve to better than even. Buffett also told Nunn that if he ever had "a big idea" for reducing the chances of nuclear terrorism, he should call. After Nunn proposed the fuel-bank project, Buffett backed the effort with a pledge of $50 million — on the condition that at least one government contributes $100 million in cash or nuclear fuel within two years. Buffett is now N.T.I.'s chief underwriter, promising to donate $7 million annually to the foundation through 2009. (Fund-raising generates the rest of N.T.I.'s money.) "I told Sam we're not going to have something as important as his effort disappear because of the actions of a stock," Buffett says. "As long as Sam's involved, I'll be involved. I promise you that."

For his part, ElBaradei is ecstatic that Buffett stepped forward. But he also regards it as a damning reflection on the seriousness with which the world is taking nuclear proliferation. "It's discouraging, to say the least, for my organization to go and pass the hat to seek funding for these problems when everyone agrees that this is the No. 1 security threat," ElBaradei says. "Governments are not putting money where their mouths are."

Last month, Nunn wrote an op-ed article in The Wall Street Journal with former Secretaries of State Henry Kissinger and George Schultz and former Secretary of Defense William Perry that sent waves through the foreign-policy establishment. Its title was "A World Free of Nuclear Weapons." The article declared that, after the cold war, "reliance on nuclear weapons for [deterrence] is becoming increasingly hazardous and decreasingly effective." Deterring terrorist groups has become nearly impossible, and the peacekeeping value of nuclear weapons is more and more outweighed by the risk of their possible use. Therefore, the authors wrote, it is time to pursue the goal of "a world free of nuclear weapons." To seek abolition, in other words.

The language used in the op-ed — for example, the claim that abolition is "consistent with America's moral heritage" — struck some as an echo of 1980s liberal critiques that treated nuclear deterrence as a moral abomination. "Many people said this was a leftist view, a pacifist view of the world, to come and say we need to move to a new abolition of nuclear weapons," ElBaradei told me shortly after the piece was published. On the other hand, Nunn's byline on the article seems to have buoyed those who have long called for weapons reductions. "Here is a man who was known as the leading Democratic hawk in the Senate saying we have got to recapture this vision of eliminating nuclear weapons," Joseph Cirincione, a nuclear-proliferation expert at the liberal Center for American Progress, says. "Not just reducing nuclear dangers but eliminating these weapons. It was a shot in the arm to everyone who's been trying to correct the disastrous policies of the last six years."

Nunn says that some people were stunned by his new stance. "How could you endorse this?" he has been asked. Ronald Reagan believed passionately in the principle of disarmament, but few in Washington's foreign-policy establishment have ever shared that view. Brent Scowcroft, for one, calls abolition "a fantasy. But even if you could do it, that's dangerous. I just think that we have invented nuclear weapons, and we cannot disinvent them. And a world where everybody gets rid of their nuclear weapons means that anybody that cheats can become a superpower in a short period of time. And I just think that's a very dangerous world."

DOJ_NMG_0136728

Nunn acknowledges this danger and admits that any realistic disarmament plan would have to allow the U.S. to quickly reconstitute weapons if a threat emerged. But he has come to believe the greater danger is continuing on our current path. "I think we have to turn it around," he told me a few weeks ago. "You literally can't get there" — to a safer world, that is — "from here."

Nunn concedes that any path to complete disarmament would be long and slow. He says that the U.S. could begin by finally starting to make substantial cuts in its nuclear forces, and by ratifying a 1996 international nuclear-test-ban treaty that Congress has refused to ratify, and by working to halt the production of new fissile material everywhere. But only a sweeping vision of a world free from the bomb can start such a process, Nunn says. "I don't believe the steps are possible without the vision."

It has been a long journey to this point. Twenty years ago, he says, the Wall Street Journal article "would not have been possible. I would not have been in that mood at that stage, and I said so." Today, in fact, Nunn finds himself unexpectedly aligned with the original abolitionist vision that he only recently urged Ted Turner to de-emphasize. It is a vision many Democrats say Nunn could bring into a future Democratic administration, possibly as secretary of state or defense. (In a recent speech to the Council on Foreign Relations, Hillary Clinton cited Nunn and the N.T.I. as her inspiration for a bill to create a White House nuclear-terrorism adviser.)

But Nunn knows it could be another 20 years — probably more — before such a vision can be realized, if at all. "You can probably only get to the achievement with the next generation," he says. "Probably none of the people who signed that will be able to see it through. But the world has to see that direction. Perhaps then a younger generation will see that the goal is achievable."

Michael Crowley is a senior editor at The New Republic.

Correction: February 24, 2007

An article on Page 50 of The Times Magazine this weekend, about Sam Nunn, head of the Nuclear Threat Initiative and former chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, misstates the name of a company on whose board he serves. It is Chevron, not ChevronTexaco. The article also misspells the surname of a former secretary of state with whom Nunn and others wrote a recent op-ed article for The Wall Street Journal. He is George P. Shultz, not Schulz. And the article misspells the surname of the director general of the International Atomic Energy Agency in several references. He is Mohamed ElBaradei, not ElBaredei.

Post-Putin (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times Magazine, February 25, 2007

Sergei B. Ivanov walked in late to the holiday performance of the army's Academy of Song and Dance. He sat in a seat saved for him between a mop-haired boy and a girl with a fluffy white ribbon in her hair. He watched, stiffly tapping his foot, as Soldier Ivan danced with fairies on his way to saving the children's New Year's presents from the old witch Baba Yaga. Grandfather Frost Russia's Santa Claus arrived in the end, of course, with gifts for the children in the audience, sons and daughters of Russia's military men. The soldier/actor's voice boomed as he introduced "a very big present," "our wonderful guest": Ivanov, then the country's minister of defense (and soon to be named first deputy prime minister), the man who might well be the next president of Russia.

"Dear friends," Ivanov began, his voice tinny by comparison. His face appeared pinched, his lips as thin as the hair parted sharply on the left. Pale, trim, dressed in a dark suit with an open collar, he looked like a secret agent. Which, in fact, is what he was in Finland and Kenya (and maybe in Sweden and England), working for the K.G.B. as the Soviet Union was collapsing. As history shows, a former intelligence officer might be just what Russia wants in a leader.

"It is very pleasant for me today to share your holiday because all adults — and even the minister of defense — were kids sometime," he went on, awkwardly. "And I remember it well: the smell of fir-tree needles, the fir tree, the smell of mandarins" — famous for ripening in the depth of Russia's winter — "the fir-tree decorations, which I could not wait to get out of the box and help the adults decorate the New Year tree. I will never forget it." He is not a natural politician, at least not a politician skilled in the glad-handing, smooth-talking art of campaigning for elected office. He grew up in a country — the Soviet Union — where that was irrelevant.

It might still be. Ivanov, who is 54, is a leading contender to become only the third elected president in Russia's history, replacing Vladimir V. Putin, the steely, steady president who, according to the country's adolescent Constitution, must step down early in 2008 after two full terms in office. At least he is presumed to be a contender, just as there is presumed to be an election, scheduled for March 2, 2008.

DOJ_NMG_0136729

Ivanov has never expressed the desire to be president — neither in public nor, as far as anyone who knows will tell, in private. Neither has Dmitri A. Medvedev, the other first deputy prime minister and the other presumed-to-be-leading candidate. Nor have Valentina I. Matviyenko, the energetic governor of St. Petersburg; Vladimir I. Yakunin, another former K.G.B. agent who heads the state-owned Russian Railways; Sergei S. Sobyanin, a former governor and the president's chief of staff; Dmitri N. Kozak, the presidential envoy to the turbulent Caucasus; Boris V. Gryzlov, the speaker of the lower house of Parliament; Sergei M. Mironov, the chairman of the upper house; or Sergei V. Chemizov, director of the state arms-marketing monopoly who served as an intelligence officer with Putin in East Germany.

All have been mentioned as possible successors to Putin, not because they have said anything or even distinguished themselves in any particular way but because they are close to Putin. All, with the exception of Sobyanin, are old friends and allies from his hometown, then Leningrad, now St. Petersburg. No one knows for sure who might emerge as a candidate, because Putin himself will decide, and he has given no indication yet of his final choice. What is certain is that whomever he selects will become the next president of Russia.

Putin's problem — and it is of his own making — is that it has become impossible to imagine anyone else in charge. His genuine popularity, nourished by the czarlike aura cultivated around him, has smothered any chance for an alternative national leader to emerge, even one of his own choosing. There is a reason that the coming vote is not called the "2008 election" as often as it is the "2008 problem."

Post-Soviet Russia is still a young country, one attached to a very old history of hereditary and, more recently, nonhereditary transfers of power. The new Russia has had, arguably, only one truly competitive presidential election, meaning that the outcome was not clear beforehand. That was in 1996, when the country's first president, Boris N. Yeltsin, held off a challenge from the Communist leader, Gennadi A. Zyuganov, after a tainted campaign and vote that nonetheless had the blessing of the democratizing West. An ailing Yeltsin simply anointed Putin his successor, plucking an unknown and untested figure from the secret services to be his prime minister in August 1999 and then four months later to be acting president.

Putin had never been elected anything in his life. And yet he went into his first election in March 2000 as the incumbent (albeit as acting president) and cruised through the process with all the trappings of power, including decisive control of most of television. He beat Zyuganov comfortably in the first round with 52 percent of the vote (bolstered perhaps, as The Moscow Times reported, by ballot stuffing in some regions).

By 2004 he faced a diminished crop of candidates, second-tier party leaders who either expressed support for Putin's re-election or foundered in oblivion, barred from television appearances and harassed by such government tactics as untimely fire inspections at campaign rallies. It was a rout, one so skewed in favor of Putin — who, officially, won 71 percent — that it became farcical.

Putin has unquestionably transformed the country, righting it, to a degree, after its perilous stagger through the 1990s, when chaos, crime and corruption raged, but he has done so by creating an authoritarian system that is only nominally democratic (in that Russia still holds elections, as the Soviet Union did). He reined in elected governors from the provinces and their representatives in Moscow. He chased into exile or into prison prominent businessmen seen as political challengers. He pulled all of the national television networks back under state control. He so imposed the Kremlin's will on the legislative bodies that they are now controlled by political parties lacking any real identity except as vassals of Putin. He has been accused of creating a Soviet Union Lite or, alternatively, a new imperial Russia, with himself as a 21st-century czar, a unifying figure above politics, beyond criticism, in absolute control. His supporters dispute this, but there is no question that he has consolidated virtually all political and, increasingly, economic power into his hands, or at least into the hands of the small cadre of aides whom he has entrusted as stewards of the country's natural resources and strategic enterprises.

Kremlin Inc. has become the name for the hybrid system Putin created: capitalism with an authoritarian face. The search for his replacement has started to look less like a political campaign and more like a boardroom struggle to select a new C.E.O. As at most corporations, the process is out of the public eye, the result presented to shareholders as a fait accompli. And like most executives, Putin is susceptible to choosing someone most like himself. "I don't think it's going to be a radical change," Ivanov said in December.

Announcing one's own candidacy is, in fact, tantamount to declaring one's open opposition to the Kremlin, to the smooth transition of power, to Putin himself. Even the parliamentary opposition is wary of doing that. So far in this quasi-election season only two people have done it: a former prime minister, Mikhail M. Kasyanov, and, improbably, Aleksandr V. Donskoi, the youthful mayor of Arkhangelsk, a small port city on the White Sea.

Both promptly came under the scrutiny of prosecutors, even as the mass media piled on in the way they never do with today's authorities, certainly not the likes of Putin, Ivanov or Medvedev. Kasyanov was accused of arranging the shady privatization of a luxury summer house on the Moscow River, Donskoi of falsifying a university diploma when he first ran for mayor two years ago.

DOJ_NMG_0136730

On the day in November when I first met Donskoi in Moscow, intrigued by the audacity of his decision to run for president of all Russia, investigators raided his office up in Arkhangelsk. As we spoke, his wife, Marina, and an aide answered insistent phone calls from home and relayed progress reports. "I realize all the responsibilities," Donskoi, a supermarket tycoon, told me. "I understand there could be difficulties, including physical threats. It's already taking place."

A month later he was back visiting Moscow and called a sparsely attended news conference to denounce an intensifying campaign against him. He denied having falsified his diploma and went on to explain, among other things, his interest in "gypsy hypnosis." Marina Donskaya interrupted him, having lost patience with the pressure. "He's not gay!" she shouted, referring to slurs that had been appearing in the Arkhangelsk press. "He impregnated me."

By February, prosecutors had opened three cases against him. Donskoi, only 36 years old, unknown outside of Arkhangelsk and perhaps better off for it, would stand little chance in a real campaign to be the leader of a country as sprawling, complex and deeply troubled as Russia. That's not the point. The point is that Putin's Russia does not dare to hold an open competition for the highest office in the land — one where even a long shot like Donskoi could at least make a case for himself. That, more than anything else Putin has done, is the biggest threat to democracy.

"All of us believed in the new, democratic Russia," Kasyanov, the other upstart candidate, told me. He served as Putin's prime minister from 2000 to 2004, representing the continuity from the presidency of Boris N. Yeltsin. On the eve of his re-election, though, Putin sacked him, setting him adrift in political obscurity to ward off prosecutors, so far successfully. From an office tower in southern Moscow, Kasyanov now runs a consultancy devoted mostly to his campaign. A large telescope stands beside an enormous plate-glass window. It points at the Kremlin.

"There is no possibility for a free and fair election," he said, his tone evoking those democrats and liberals who once occupied positions of influence inside the Kremlin during the 1990s but now sound simply discouraged. "Right now there is an issue of the survival of the democratic state."

Last year, Putin said that he had been thinking about his replacement from the moment he became president in 2000, but Operation Successor, as it has been called, began in earnest in November 2005, when the Kremlin announced that Putin had given promotions to two of his closest aides, loyal men he brought to Moscow with him when he began his rise to power in the 1990s: Dmitri Medvedev and Sergei Ivanov.

Medvedev had previously served as his chief of staff and chairman of a huge state-owned utility, Gazprom, which he still is. He became first deputy prime minister, a newly created position under Prime Minister Mikhail Y. Fradkov, a jowly bureaucrat whose three years in office have been notable for a lack of influence. Ivanov, Putin's comrade and eventual superior in the Soviet K.G.B., became deputy prime minister — a rung below Medvedev — having served as head of the state security council and, significantly, the first civilian minister of defense in Russia's (and the Soviet Union's) history. Like Putin, neither has ever been elected to office.

While it was never stated, the significance was clear: both were being groomed for higher office. When I asked Aleksandr Y. Lebedev, a former K.G.B. officer, member of Russia's lower house of Parliament and one of the world's richest men, about Operation Successor, he suggested I watch television. His advice recalls the old cold warriors analyzing the array of Soviet leaders on Red Square's grandstand: Kremlinology on the nightly news. Lebedev could tell that Putin's mind was not yet made up. "You can take a chronometer," he said when we met in November. "If one is given seven minutes, the other will be given seven minutes."

The news is not as propagandistic as it was in Soviet times, but it has also ceased to be a forum for a national discussion or debate on matters involving politics and Putin personally. He is never criticized. His two anointed aides receive the same deference. Ivanov and Medvedev now appear almost as often as Putin and certainly more than their nominal boss, Prime Minister Fradkov. They preside over meetings of ministers, make statements, explain to ordinary Russians the duties the president has assigned to them. Anything critical — say, questions about the exoneration of Ivanov's son, Aleksandr, after his car struck and killed a pedestrian — never appears.

Few Ivanov or Medvedev events pass unheralded. Ivanov's appearance at the army's holiday concert was utterly inconsequential, yet it appeared on the evening news programs on all three state networks anyway. Rossiya, one of the state channels, even repeated an expanded version on its prime time news. Two children asked him to let the troupe perform for the military in Vladikavkaz, the southern city that has served as the staging base for troops waging war in Chechnya. Of course, Ivanov promised — as long as the performers on the stage beside him agreed. (The performance had already been scheduled.) Not long after the New Year, the troupe performed in Vladikavkaz and again was featured on the news, along with a reminder of the man who had made sure it happened.

Ivanov seems, in person, far more pragmatic and less prone to nationalistic declarations than his public statements would lead you to expect. At a dinner in late December with foreign reporters, he outlined a reasoned view of geopolitics and his own goals for modernizing Russia's military. Ivanov rose through the ranks of the K.G.B. and its successor agencies, including the foreign intelligence service and the Federal Security Service. Still, ever since he met Putin in 1977 while both were studying to be K.G.B. officers — "I don't want to go into the details," he said — his public prominence has owed itself to Putin's rise to power.

DOJ_NMG_0136731

When it came to his own future, he demurred. "I do not think about it," he said. "You may not believe it, but I don't. The presidential campaign hasn't started," he added, crossing himself as the Russian Orthodox do, "and I hope it won't start for a long time."

It was hard to believe this diffidence when, a few weeks later, I joined him on a visit to an artillery training base and a MiG testing facility in Kolomna, two hours southeast of Moscow. He touted his plan to create family advisory councils to combat abuse and corruption and his negotiations to sell the newest MiG 35 to India. Both are ostensibly chores of Ivanov's current job, but his trip to a youth hockey championship in a small city, Sudogda, sponsored by a youth sports organization that he created, called New Generation, was nothing more than image building. It was all on the news again, with Ivanov appearing in one instance before a military recruiting poster. "Make Your Choice," it said.

Ivanov is portrayed as a hard-liner, part of the clan of Putin aides known as the siloviki, or people of power. Medvedev is the (comparatively) liberal, democratic reformer, from the clan representing the modernizing businessmen. Both are oversimplifications, since their singular positions are entirely dependent on their close, personal relations with and loyalty to Putin, who is unquestionably in charge. Having (apparently) launched Operation Successor, he later suggested that there could be still more candidates. "Yes, that's possible, especially since the list is not very long," he said in Shanghai last June. Pressed if it could be a dark horse, someone unknown, someone like he was under Yeltsin, he threw out more bait. "Completely unknown?" he said. "Not really. Such people are known to everyone, but their names are simply not mentioned."

Valentina I. Matviyenko has, in fact, been mentioned — as someone who could be the first woman to rule Russia since Catherine the Great. She has been governor of St. Petersburg, Russia's second city, since Putin removed her predecessor and cleared the way for her election in 2003. A former apparatchik in the Communist Party, she became a diplomat, serving as ambassador to Malta when the Soviet Union was falling apart and then to Greece during Yeltsin's presidency, before becoming a deputy prime minister in 1998. As governor, she has demonstrated unwavering loyalty to Putin, even when he ended direct elections of governors like her following the Beslan siege in 2004. In a magazine interview at the time, she declared that Russians were not ready for experiments with electoral democracy. "The mentality of the Russian demands a lord, a czar, a president," she said.

When I met her in December, Matviyenko expressed disdain for electoral politics. Her own election campaign in 2003 she called "the most difficult point in my life," and she deplored the "dirty side" of elections: money and lies, understandably, but also what she derided as the "million promises" made by her opponent, as though campaign promises were somehow inappropriate. She said that legislative bodies should be elected, but executive power could not risk elections. "This is because, unfortunately, if a mistake is made during the elections, it would be practically impossible to correct it during the official's term," she told me in her office inside Smolny Institute, built in the 19th century as a school for the daughters of Russian nobility.

She is no longer accountable to the voters, to the people. Putin's post-Beslan decree means that she, like governors or presidents of Russia's 88 regions, serves at his will, ratified by the local legislative assembly. (Not one has balked at any of Putin's choices.) When I asked her about 2008 and her own prospects as a candidate, she said she would take herself out of the running: she had work yet to do in St. Petersburg. To end speculation, she explained, she would resign, which she in fact did two days later. She then petitioned Putin for a vote of confidence. He obliged a day later, reappointing her to a new term. On Dec. 20, the city's Parliament, following a speech by another of Putin's potential successors, Sergei Sobyanin, voted 40 to 3 to confirm the president's choice. Matviyenko began a new term as governor that will last until the end of 2011, when, unless something revolutionary happens in the meantime, Putin's chosen successor will reconsider her appointment.

Her reappointment showed how seamlessly Putin has imposed order on the unpredictable whims of electoral politics, removing chance, surprise and competition. "People do not want any more revolutions," Matviyenko told me in the Smolny Institute, which Lenin chose as his headquarters during the Bolshevik revolution and where he lived and worked in two modest rooms, preserved to this day as they were in 1917. "People want the quiet development of the country, stable development, without shake-ups. They would like to see a president who can guarantee the succession of power."

By late January, according to the buzz, a front-runner had emerged. Dmitri Medvedev led a large delegation of Russians to the World Economic Forum, the annual gathering of the world's business and political elite in Davos, Switzerland. Compared with Ivanov, Medvedev remains largely unknown outside Russia. He is only 41 years old, a boyish lawyer, co-author of a textbook on civil law and lecturer at St. Petersburg State University's School of Law, Putin's alma mater. He has served as an aide to Putin for 15 years now, ever since both worked for St. Petersburg's governor, Anatoly A. Sobchak, who was among the most vocal advocates of democracy and economic reforms even before the Soviet collapse. His rise to the second-highest post in government is inseparable from Putin's rise to the presidency. Davos was his foreign coming-out party, one so successful that analysts in Moscow declared Operation Successor complete.

DOJ_NMG_0136732

"Russia is a country that, in the 20th century, was subjected to hard trials, revolutions, civil war, world wars and economic collapse," Medvedev said in Davos, concluding a detailed exposition in Russian of Putin's economic and political policies with a passage in stilted but fluent English. "Today we are building new institutions based on the fundamental principles of full-fledged democracy."

On an icy day earlier this month, I followed him on one of the routine working visits so prominently featured on the nightly news — in this case to Veliki Novgorod, the ancient Russian city 300 miles northwest of Moscow. The trip included visits to a children's clinic, a new subdivision and a mortgage center, all beneficiaries of the "national projects." He basked in the praise of the officials he met, but he also faced polite queries on the need for more financing and on certain unintended consequences of the national-project policy. It seemed very much like Dmitri Medvedev's Listening Tour. At a meeting with regional leaders and businessmen, he heard that prices for construction materials in the region skyrocketed following the government's plan to build affordable housing. At Children's Clinic No. 3, renovated for the first time in 30 years, a nurse noted that only three babies had been born who were actually eligible for the new grants intended to stimulate the birth rate and halt the country's alarming population decline.

Medvedev jotted notes, fidgeted, shuffled papers; he often speaks to the floor or table in front of him. Physically, he is not an imposing figure: short and compact, and having lost weight over the last year, he is very much like Putin. He commands detail like his mentor, and with increasing confidence.

At the clinic, Medvedev acknowledged that much work remained to be done, but he boasted that the "national projects" were working. "This kind of quick rehabilitation of medical institutions has never occurred in history," he said in remarks broadcast that night.

The one thing not mentioned until the end of the day was Medvedev's future. His aide, Zhanna Odintsova, even took polite exception when I suggested the trips had the feel of a political campaign. She also told me that while I could attend the day's last event — a roundtable interview with journalists from the neighboring regions — I did not "have the right to ask a question." So I planted my question with a willing colleague, Alyona Khozova, a correspondent with Ren TV in Vologda.

After an hour of questions about the national projects, about his hobbies (he swims every evening and tries to teach his son to distinguish right from wrong) and about his plans to visit various regions, Khozova asked the final question. "Lately the topic of a successor to Vladimir Putin has been circulating," she began.

That was as far as she got. Medvedev cut her off with a laugh. "I am not now working on anything directly," he said. "I am engaged completely with those affairs that we just discussed. And I like this work. It surprises me in a good way. I experience a kind of 'drive,' if you will, from these activities and will take that which I have received to its logical conclusion."

Putin's greatest legacy would be a smooth succession of power, still a rare occurrence in a country with the violent, authoritarian past that Russia has. History might ultimately judge him as Russia's George Washington, the man who did not let the possibility of retaining personal power overrule a young country's laws and democratic principles. Still, there are those who wish that he would stay, that the Constitution would be amended to allow him to run for a third term he would undoubtedly win. He could do so easily, given the unwavering obsequiousness of Parliament. Regional Parliaments across Russia have drafted referendums on the issue from Primoriye on the Pacific Coast to Chechnya, the battered ruin of a republic whose war for secession Putin has effectively crushed, at the cost of tens of thousands of lives.

"We think that Putin should complete both the political and economic reforms that he began and should have at minimum two more terms — three or four more terms," the speaker of Chechnya's Parliament, Dukuvakha B. Abdurakhmanov, told me by telephone in mid-January. Chechnya's petition by that point had already garnered the support of two dozen of Russia's regions, raising the possibility the issue could yet come to a vote in the Parliament. "The number of terms should not decide the end of his presidency, but rather his age and health."

Putin continues to demur, even as he opens the door for speculation. "As for myself, as I have said, the Constitution — even though I like my work — the Constitution does not give me a right to stand for a third consecutive term," he said in an annual televised call-in program in October. His use of "consecutive" prompted many to believe he might yet come back for re-election in 2012.

Part of what fuels the uncertainty surrounding the succession is what Putin will do once a second term ends. He will be only 55. It is hard to imagine him slipping into quiet retirement. Speculation abounds that he intends to remain an unelected power, overseeing the country from behind the scenes. He could take over a party (though he has yet to join one), become the speaker of Parliament or emerge as the leader of the as-yet unrealized union of Belarus and Russia. Rumor has long had it that he could take over Gazprom, the huge state gas and oil company, now one of the world's largest corporations and still growing. He could reap the rewards that his authoritarian capitalism has brought Russia, though he once said he was not a businessman by temperament.

DOJ_NMG_0136733

On Feb. 1, Putin held his annual full-dress press conference and swatted aside repeated questions about his successor and his future. “There will be no successor,” he said. “There will be candidates for the post of president of Russia.” He did not mention Medvedev, Ivanov or the others, not once, which prompted a new round of speculation that the speculation about Medvedev and Ivanov had, perhaps, been misplaced. Pressed, he would say only that he reserved the right to express a choice. “But I will do it only when the election campaign starts,” he said.

By strict letter of the law, campaigns in Russia last only 30 days. Putin could put off his endorsement, as it were, until the last minute. In the meantime, he is keeping people guessing. On Feb. 15, he unexpectedly promoted Ivanov to the same rank as Medvedev, giving Russia two first deputy prime ministers and shifting the buzz yet again.

Opposition to Putin exists. In December, Andrei N. Illarionov, a former economic adviser of Putin’s until he resigned more than a year ago to protest the government’s authoritarianism, described the succession process as something out of the Middle Ages. “It does not matter what kind of successor one is, smart or not too smart, a pleasant one or not too pleasant,” he said at a news conference. “It does not matter. The choice between this and that makes no sense. One thing matters. It is that the transfer of power to one’s heir should not happen in a modern, civilized and normal country.” There are candidates who will run against Putin’s chosen heir, representing the greatly diminished Communist Party or the Liberal Democratic Party, whose nationalist leader, Vladimir V. Zhirinovsky, has long ago ceased opposing the Kremlin. But they will enjoy none of the advantages of Putin’s heir, and they will lose.

Still, Valentina Matviyenko might be right. Russians are not in a revolutionary mood now that the country is more stable, now that salaries and pensions are paid, now that consumers can indulge in everything Europeans can — except political choice.

In December, the authorities refused to grant a permit for a march organized by Other Russia, an amalgam of disaffected political organizations, including one created by Garry Kasparov, the former chess champion who retired in 2005 to wage a lonely campaign to make Russia politically free. The authorities authorized only a rally, to be held on Triumphal Square. Four days before it, the interior ministry’s counterterrorism police raided Kasparov’s office and seized posters advertising the march. As I approached on the morning of the rally, truckloads of soldiers lined every street in the area; a helicopter hovered overhead. Street sweepers, snowplows and buses blocked the main street while soldiers stood in formation, two layers deep.

Inside a fenced area were perhaps 2,000 protesters; organizers’ estimates of 4,000 or more were exaggerated. The organizers later said that hundreds of participants had been stopped at checkpoints on the roads or at train stations. Those who made it included aging liberals of Mikhail S. Gorbachev’s Glasnost, now 20 years past, and radical youth, including the committed members of two organizations, the National Bolsheviks, known for stunts like being arrested while occupying government offices, and the Red Youth Vanguard, whose red-and-black flag incorporates an AK-47. The police and soldiers on hand outnumbered them by four to one or more.

“They are afraid that one day we will say, ‘Enough,’ ” Kasparov yelled from the back of a flatbed truck with a Dolce & Gabbana billboard as a backdrop. His voice was drowned out by the chopping thud of the helicopter overhead. He led a chant — “We need the Other Russia,” after the movement’s name — but the chants faded after a couple of rounds.

One Cold War Was Enough (WP)

By Sergei Lavrov

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

There has been much misinterpretation in the West since President Vladimir Putin's recent speech at the Munich Conference on Security Policy. From the reaction of some Western journalists and politicians, one would think that the Russian president wished to ignite a blast of anti-American rhetoric to spark another Cold War. Defense Secretary Robert Gates got it right when he responded by asserting that "one Cold War was quite enough." Indeed it was, so let's not declare -- or look for a pretext to declare -- a new one. At a time when Russia is ready and eager to play a positive role in world affairs and integrate into the global economy, it does far more harm than good to treat Russia as a hostile nation whenever Moscow and Washington disagree.

What Putin actually said in Munich was not new. He said nothing that we have not discussed directly with the Bush administration and that is not whispered in political circles in Europe and elsewhere. He made these statements at a conference because he wanted to get the world's attention to begin a dialogue about what kind of world we want for our children and ourselves. Putin believes, as do many others, that the world cannot be dictated to by a single country. History shows that this has been attempted repeatedly but has never worked. Recent unilateral actions have not resolved problems but actually exacerbated them and created new hotbeds of tension.

If you read the president's entire speech, you will see that Putin was neither attacking the United States nor proposing Russia as a counterbalance to U.S. unilateralism. Instead, he called for a world with many centers of influence where different interests work together, multilaterally, to shape a common denominator on global issues. The recent six-nation agreement on North Korea's nuclear program proves that this pragmatic approach can work.

DOJ_NMG_0136734

In fact, Putin offered more instances of mutual agreement between the United States and Russia than examples of discord. As he noted, we are strong partners on counterterrorism and nuclear nonproliferation. We have a common stake in ensuring global energy security as agreed to at the Group of Eight summit last July in St. Petersburg.

Our American colleagues tell us that the United States needs Russia and other key countries to help resolve numerous regional conflicts. Against this background, America's unilateral actions look puzzling. It's also ironic that Putin's speech was deemed threatening. Russian citizens ask themselves: Who threatens whom? With the Warsaw Pact dissolved for more than 15 years, why does NATO still spread toward Russian borders? What should Russia believe when the United States seeks to place anti-missile systems in Eastern Europe? And instead of joining efforts to counter global threats, should our two countries really be engaged in searching for deficiencies in each other's domestic life?

As Russians struggled with the chaos and weakness that dogged us in the first post-Soviet years, some might have gained the impression that our voice would never be heard on the world stage. A stronger, more vibrant Russia has emerged from the rubble of the 1990s. Our economy continues to expand and diversify; our people look forward to the progress and prosperity that our new society can deliver through technological innovation and social programs. And a growing middle class benefits from the robust business climate that attracts more and more foreign investments: In 2006, for example, net inflow of capital to Russia surpassed $40 billion.

It only makes sense that we would hold our own views and expect them to be taken seriously, whether they concern vital security matters or terms of economic interaction. We are strongly committed to democracy, and we will not compromise the right of the Russian people to decide things for themselves and be heard on international issues.

In any relationship, disagreements arise. But observers make a grave error when they mistake the honest and open airing of concerns as some sort of casus belli. President Bush rightly emphasized the other day that, while differences exist between our two countries, "there's also a relationship in which we can find common ground to solve problems." Russia is ready to work with the United States on an equal and mutually respectful basis.

Another Cold War? Certainly not. A democratic world in which a strong Russia coexists with a strong United States, as well as a strong Europe, China, India, Brazil and others? That is Vladimir Putin's vision -- and it is well worth considering.

The writer is foreign minister of the Russian Federation.

Missile Fantasies (WP)

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

The administration's rush to deploy missile defenses in Europe brings a sinister response from Russia.

THE EMERGING debate over the deployment of U.S missile defenses in Central Europe is based on a series of false pretenses. The Bush administration pretends that it is sensible to invest $225 million next year in preparing to install ground-based interceptors and radar systems in Poland and the Czech Republic to defend against an attack from Iran, even though the glitch-plagued defense system hasn't yet proved workable and Iran doesn't have a missile that could reach the United States or Europe. The Polish and Czech governments, eager to deepen strategic cooperation with the United States, pretend that they will benefit from hosting the systems, even though they have little reason to worry about threats from the Middle East and the Bush administration has been slow to reward their past collaboration in Afghanistan and Iraq.

The prize for cynical posturing, nevertheless, goes to Russia, which in the past few days has suddenly advanced a claim that it knows to be false: that the deployment of the antimissile system would weaken the Russian nuclear deterrent. As Russian President Vladimir Putin and his generals know, even if U.S. interceptors in Poland could function according to the Bush administration's scheme -- which they can't, and won't anytime soon -- they would not be capable of stopping a single Russian intercontinental ballistic missile, much less the massive force that remains at Moscow's disposal. U.S. officials have met with Russian counterparts on at least 10 occasions to explain this.

Mr. Putin and his generals nevertheless are threatening that Russia might respond to the U.S. missile defenses by redeploying intermediate-range missiles that were banned from Europe by a 1987 treaty. An even more sinister comment came Monday from the commander of Russian missile forces, who said that if Poland and the Czech Republic hosted the U.S. rockets and radars, they would be targeted by Russia's strategic missiles. This crude attempt at intimidating Moscow's former Soviet satellites predictably produced a defiant response from the two governments and probably eliminated any domestic opposition to an otherwise questionable venture. As Czech Foreign Minister Karel Schwarzenberg put it, "The Czechs will now think the shield is even more necessary."

The Bush administration's pushing of this initiative, which would not result in the deployment of any interceptors in Europe before 2010, is probably motivated by the same political impulses that have driven missile defense since 2001. Administration officials are determined to create a program so literally set in concrete that it can't be stopped or reversed by future presidents -- as was the missile defense program of President George H.W. Bush. Whether the technology actually works or a threat exists that justifies the rush never seems to matter much.

DOJ_NMG_0136735

Such sandbagging justifies close scrutiny by Congress of the Pentagon's $10 billion funding request for missile defense in next year's budget, including the funds for Poland and the Czech Republic. But the Russian gamesmanship is more worrisome. On the opposite page today, Mr. Putin's foreign minister denies any interest in confrontation. But at the same time Mr. Putin may use the U.S. defense program as an excuse to revive a major piece of the Soviet nuclear arsenal with which to threaten NATO members in Europe. It's hard to think of a quicker way to revive the Cold War.

Rivals On Legal Tightrope Seek To Widen Freedoms In China (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

BEIJING — Li Jinsong and Li Jianqiang are Chinese trial lawyers who take on difficult political cases, tangle with the police and seek solace in the same religion, Christianity.

But like many who devote themselves to expanding freedoms and the rule of law in China, the two spend as much time clashing over tactics and principles as they do challenging the ruling Communist Party.

The two Mr. Lis are part of a momentous struggle over the rule of law in China. Young, well educated and idealistic, they and other members of the so-called weiquan, or rights defense, movement, aim to use the laws and courts that the Communist Party has put in place as part of its modernization drive to constrain the party's power.

The informal network of rights defenders may be the only visible force for political openness and change in China at a time when the surging economy and the country's rapidly expanding global influence have otherwise strengthened party leaders. The authorities have refrained from suppressing it entirely, at least partly because it operates carefully within the law and uses China's judicial system, as well as the news media, to advance its aims.

Yet nearly 18 years after the June 4, 1989, crackdown on pro-democracy protesters in Beijing, China quickly crushes any organized opposition. Rights defenders face the delicate task of coordinating their actions and expanding their collective influence when they remain autonomous, rudderless and, very often, rivalrous.

The two Mr. Lis have feuded about how to handle big court cases. When they met the Bush administration's China specialists in the White House last November, they argued about whether top leaders like President Hu Jintao were basically benevolent. A joint interview on Radio Free Asia devolved into a shouting match over whether rights defenders could work with party leaders or should actively oppose them.

As their confrontation grew, Li Jianqiang, the more combative of the two, wrote a manifesto that called China a "super jail" and described its leaders as "ruthless dictators." He listed Li Jinsong's name as the lead author and posted it on the Internet.

Li Jinsong, who takes a much softer line, said the essay, which circulated widely, so enraged China's top leaders that it derailed a major appeals court victory in his highest-profile case, involving China's "barefoot lawyer," Chen Guangcheng. The essay may also have given the police in Shandong Province an excuse to send some thugs who assaulted him, he said. Li Jianqiang acknowledged a few weeks later that he wrote the essay himself. But he said it amounted to a minor mistake and dismissed claims that it had a direct impact on the court case.

They and the dozens of other advocates who consider themselves rights defenders have had notable victories, mostly by calling attention to problems at the local level that more senior officials move to fix. They have exposed corruption, illegal land seizures and labor and environmental abuses that have prompted policy changes or at least made many Chinese more aware of the concept of human rights.

As China's only consistent homegrown critics of government abuses, they have received attention from the international news media and human rights groups. President Bush invited several rights defenders to the White House last spring.

Yet they are, as the nationalist leader Sun Yat-sen lamented about Chinese opposition groups in an earlier era, "grains of sand." They divide into camps on the fundamental question of whether to try to improve the current Communist Party-run system by supporting well-intentioned party leaders, or to seek an end to Communist rule. "Some of us are waiting for a good emperor, some kind of Gorbachev, to come and fix the system," Li Jianqiang said. "Many of the rest of us think that is a waste of time. We need to be building a civilization outside the Communist Party."

Change From Within

That debate is a delicate one for a group whose basic goals — helping people exercise the rights granted to them, at least on paper, by an authoritarian government — at least nominally overlap with those of the party's leadership.

China's top leaders, committed to attracting foreign investment and making the country a respected world power, have promised to conform to human rights norms and to run the country "according to law."

DOJ_NMG_0136736

The Communist Party often does not subject itself to the laws it enacts, prompting cynicism about its real intentions. But many rights defenders say they can help bring about meaningful change because the party and government bureaucracy is not monolithic.

Top party leaders, according to this way of thinking, hope to use the legal system and the news media to check abuses of power at the local level, which they view as threats to their own popularity and longevity.

The defining moment came in 2003. Prime Minister Wen Jiabao seized on a case of a migrant worker beaten to death by the police that had been championed by rights defenders. He abolished vagrancy laws that gave the police the authority to round up migrants at will.

Rights defenders concluded that grass-roots organizing and the tactical use of local courts could allow them to circumvent local fiefs in China's authoritarian bureaucracy and appeal directly to more enlightened leaders at the top.

"China is slowly transforming itself from rule of man to rule of law," Li Jinsong said. "I believe that this process has the support of the top leaders. They face resistance within the system, and they need outside help."

But this view, once widespread, has fallen out of favor among other rights defenders. Li Jianqiang calls it a "peasant mentality" because farmers since feudal times have looked to the emperor, presumed to be benevolent, to solve problems they say are caused by venal local officials.

He contends that President Hu, who once talked as though he wanted to expand constitutional rights and strengthen the legal system, has more recently done the reverse.

In internal party speeches, Mr. Hu has called on officials to guard against "color revolutions" of the kind that swept Central Asia and Central Europe, which officials here attributed to a potent combination of civic and social organizations and foreign forces. Mr. Hu has clamped down on lawyers and journalists and tightened the party's control over the courts.

Gao Zhisheng, one of the most outspoken rights defenders, was arrested and convicted of subversion last year, though he was given a suspended sentence because the authorities said he provided information about other dissidents. Another rights defender, Guo Feixiong, was arrested and faces charges of illegal business activity. A third, Guo Guoting, fearing police intimidation or possible prosecution, fled to Canada.

"The strategy of submitting petitions and using legal actions to draw the emperor's attention is a proven failure," Li Jianqiang said. "It ends up encouraging rule by man, not rule of law."

Same Name, Two Paths

Li Jinsong and Li Jianqiang became lawyers in 1994. Both are Christians. The similarities do not run much deeper.

Li Jianqiang, 42, lives in the east coast city of Qingdao. He eagerly discusses politics and the law. He relates his run-ins with China's police or State Security officials like war stories. He has an impish smile.

As an employee of the Qingdao city government, he joined public protests in favor of democracy in 1989. When the military shot student protesters in Beijing on June 4, 1989, local governments moved to weed out people who had supported the students. Mr. Li lost his job.

He returned to school to study law, but never shed his reputation as a troublemaker. He took on cases involving accusations of police or government malfeasance, but he said he was often harassed by local authorities. Increasingly, he found it difficult to represent clients in his home province, Shandong.

So he became itinerant. He defended a journalist accused of leaking state secrets in Hunan Province and a writer accused of posting subversive materials on the Internet in Hubei Province. Recently, he sued local authorities in Zhejiang Province after they demolished a Christian church that the government had not sanctioned.

He met other young lawyers who called themselves rights defenders. He became a Christian in 2005, he said, when some of them introduced him to the religion. He worships in an unofficial "family" church in Qingdao.

"I decided we have a spiritual vacuum in our society that only God can replace," he said.

Li Jinsong, 41, practices law in Beijing. He often wears dark business suits over dark shirts. That, along with a courteous and deferential manner, gives him the air of a priest. But he frowns and speaks in clipped phrases when asked to discuss his personal background, including his religion. He said he began attending a government-authorized Protestant church in 1988.

"It's not something I deny, but not something I like to talk about publicly," he said softly.

Though he practices commercial law, he has also defended "vulnerable people," as he calls them. He helped migrant workers force a transportation company to stop raising ticket prices before a major holiday, when migrants scramble to return to their hometowns in the countryside. A Beijing court compelled the Finance Ministry to revise an administrative ruling against one of his clients in 2001, a milestone case that some saw as confirming a right to sue government entities.

But it was a case in Li Jianqiang's home province, Shandong, that made Li Jinsong well known in legal circles. He became the lead lawyer for Chen Guangcheng, a self-trained legal expert who, despite being blind since a childhood illness, championed peasants in legal actions against local authorities.

DOJ_NMG_0136737

In 2005, Mr. Chen sought to organize a class-action lawsuit on behalf of hundreds of peasants forced to have abortions or undergo sterilization procedures after local officials in Linyi City, Shandong, failed to meet their official population-control quotas. The police put him under house arrest, and prosecutors later indicted him on charges of destroying property and disrupting traffic. Relatives and supporters say the charges were concocted to punish him.

Li Jinsong and other rights defenders used a publicity campaign to increase the pressure on local officials to treat Mr. Chen fairly, while alerting top leaders in Beijing to what they and many others said was an embarrassing abuse of authority at the local level.

Li Jianqiang, though not personally involved, criticized the strategy at the time. He wrote in an open letter that Li Jinsong had made "stupid mistakes" that backed the local authorities into a corner and did little to help Mr. Chen.

Both men, it appeared, had reasons to think they were right. Mr. Chen's prosecution and trial, in a county court, made a mockery of China's official judicial procedures. Local thugs prevented Li Jinsong from entering Mr. Chen's village to interview witnesses. They flipped over his car when he visited. The day before the trial, the local police detained a fellow lawyer on a pretense. The verdict: guilty, and a harsh prison sentence of four years and three months for Mr. Chen.

Li Jinsong's luck changed sharply on appeal. Last October, a higher court in the city of Linyi overturned the verdict and ordered a new trial. Mr. Li and other rights defenders hailed it as a major victory. They saw the hand of more senior officials at work.

"There are some leaders who I believe are conscious of what was happening and wanted to see a fair result," he said. "We saw their intervention in this case."

A Visit to America

China's rights defenders have developed a reputation for being a force for legal, evolutionary change. In the United States, foundations and religious groups that support grass-roots activities here have backed them.

One pioneer in that effort is the China Aid Association, a religious group based in Midland, Tex., that has ties to the Bush administration. The association monitors conditions for Christians and supports rights defenders, many of whom are Christian.

Last November, the China Aid Association invited the two Mr. Lis and two other rights defenders to visit Midland and Washington. The two did not know each other well. Li Jianqiang's criticism of the handling of the Chen case did not endear them to each other. But Li Jinsong said he looked forward to the trip.

"I thought we might come to understand each other better if we met outside China," he said.

Instead, their debate intensified. After prayer sessions in Midland, in the offices of members of Congress and at foundations where they meet potential donors, the two Mr. Lis offered conflicting versions of what should be done to advance the rule of law in China. They disagreed on whether the United States should encourage political change or support top leaders who wanted to carry out such changes.

Li Jinsong, still elated about the appeals court victory in Mr. Chen's case the month before, often cited the case to support his view that the top leaders had good intentions.

Though the two lawyers smiled and stood side by side for photographs in front of the White House and State Department, they said they argued with each other when they met the Bush administration's China experts inside. When they appeared together for a broadcast on Radio Free Asia, their differences burst into the open.

Li Jinsong said during the broadcast that he had urged donors and Bush administration officials to steer aid to Communist Party officials "who do good," as well as to rights defenders hoping to improve things from the outside.

He said he wanted "to express my appreciation" for President Hu, Prime Minister Wen and Vice President Zeng Qinghong.

"These three leaders do not want to see abuses and would not tolerate them if they knew about them," he said.

Li Jianqiang said he and Li Jinsong had a "basic disagreement." Top leaders, he said, have more responsibility, not less, for human rights abuses.

He said that during the 1990s, when President Jiang Zemin was in power, there were relatively few arrests of dissident writers. Today, with Mr. Hu in charge, there are many more, he said.

"There are a larger than usual number of unjust arrests," Li Jinsong acknowledged. "But I am sure that if the top leaders knew about them, the people would be set free."

"That is nonsense," Li Jianqiang responded. "The leaders play deaf and dumb and pretend they have a real legal system."

A Prayer for China

After their meetings in Washington, Li Jinsong got the news that Chen Guangcheng's second trial, as ordered by the appeals court, would convene in a few days. He had to cut his trip short and catch the first flight home.

Just after he departed, Li Jianqiang, who stayed on in the United States, wrote an essay he titled "A Prayer for China." It said, in part, "In this free, God-blessed land, where we received a friendly reception by the American government, we must not forget our pitiable homeland."

DOJ_NMG_0136738

He said China would not have a better future without "systemic change" in politics and culture. "Our government clasps chains on the people and enslaves them. In our one-party dictatorship, the law is little more than an ornament, and the rights in the Constitution are laughable lies."

On Nov. 27, the same day Mr. Chen's second trial took place in Shandong, Li Jianqiang posted the letter on a popular overseas Web site. The names of the four rights defenders on the trip were listed at the bottom. Li Jinsong's came first.

Under pressure a month later, Li Jianqiang wrote a second letter, which he also posted online, saying he made a mistake listing Li Jinsong's name. Li Jinsong said the damage was done.

Mr. Chen's second trial was only slightly less of a mockery than the first, in the eyes of Mr. Chen's supporters. A crucial witness, who Mr. Li said was prepared to testify to providing false evidence against Mr. Chen after the police tortured him, was arrested on the eve of the trial. Three days later, the court issued the same verdict it had in the first trial, sentencing Mr. Chen to four years and three months in prison.

Li Jinsong and several other supporters of Mr. Chen say Li Jianqiang's essay may have hurt Mr. Chen's chances of a favorable verdict. Officials in Shandong used the essay to claim that Mr. Chen's supporters had been infiltrated by foreign forces seeking to undermine the Communist Party, they said.

A senior law professor and government adviser in Beijing, who is not connected to the Chen case, said he attended a meeting shortly after Mr. Chen's second trial in which top judicial officials, including Luo Gan, a member of the Politburo Standing Committee who oversees the judicial system, discussed the case. It was cited as an example of how "hostile forces" had used the courts to provoke social unrest, said the law professor, who asked not to be identified because the meeting was secret.

"We had hoped the second trial would be a fair trial," Li Jinsong said. "But the essay undercut those who wanted such a result."

Li Jianqiang acknowledges that the essay was his attempt to signal a common stance among rights defenders where none existed. But he said it could not have had the impact Li Jinsong claimed. Having been posted online the same day the trial took place, it could hardly have influenced the trial itself, he said. And he said he considered it unlikely that it prompted central government leaders to dictate a different verdict.

"In our system, the decision to convict is made before the trial, not after," he said.

Instrumental or not, the letter shows how the rights defense movement is struggling to maintain a sense of purpose amid an intensifying police crackdown and a string of public defeats.

In late December, Li Jinsong traveled to Shandong to prepare another appeal. He never reached his destination.

After entering the province, his overnight bus from Beijing was stopped on a public highway and boarded by thugs. They singled out Mr. Li and a colleague, dragged them from the bus and rained blows on their heads and bodies. They left them bloodied on the sidewalk and sped off.

Li Jinsong was treated for minor injuries. He said the local police ignored his attempt to file a complaint.

Mr. Li debated with friends whether he should try to return to Shandong to attend the appeal hearing. In the end, he did not have to decide. The judges met privately, with no lawyers present. This time, they backed the local court, sending Mr. Chen to prison.

The Three Futures Of China (LAT)

By James Mann

The Los Angeles Times, February 25, 2007

CHINA'S ANTI-SATELLITE missile test last month is merely the latest in a series of recent events that force us to question where the world's most populous country is heading. What will its political system look like in, say, 25 years?

This question will grow in importance as members of the new Democratic congressional majority — and some presidential candidates — take up the themes of economic populism. One Democratic candidate, John Edwards, has already said he doubts that he would support permanent normal trade relations with China if the matter came to a vote today. And China's future will be debated again during the Summer Olympics in Beijing next year.

It is possible to envision three scenarios for China. One can be called the Soothing Scenario: that China's authoritarian political system is bound to open up, or even that it is already evolving toward political liberalization.

Another scenario holds that China is so fundamentally unstable that it is headed for some sort of political cataclysm or economic nosedive, or both. Call this the Upheaval Scenario.

And then there is what I call the Third Scenario: that China's one-party political system will not change in any fundamental way. This view holds that China will remain an authoritarian regime over the long term.

The problem with the current U.S. debate about China is that, in public at least, political, business and financial leaders tend to talk almost exclusively about the Soothing Scenario. Some critics of our China policy warn about the Upheaval Scenario.

DOJ_NMG_0136739

But the Third Scenario gets far less attention — even though it is perhaps the most likely. After all, China's authoritarian political system is the status quo, and there are powerful forces at work to prevent any far-reaching change in it.

The Soothing Scenario is rooted in economic determinism. Under this view, China's increasing prosperity, its expanding trade with the rest of the world and the massive foreign investment in the country will undermine its authoritarian system and lead inevitably to political liberalization.

That is what leaders of both political parties have regularly told the American people. Over the last decade, it has become virtually obligatory for presidential candidates to voice some version of the Soothing Scenario, usually concentrating on the reassuring premise that our trade with China will transform its politics. "Trade freely with China, and time is on our side," candidate George W. Bush declared in 1999. President Clinton told Chinese President Jiang Zemin in 1997: "You're on the wrong side of history." Clinton maintained that economic changes in China would "increase the spirit of liberty over time…. I just think it's inevitable, just as inevitably the Berlin Wall fell."

The idea that China is inevitably headed for far-reaching change has become a staple of U.S. thinking in large part because it has served the interests of important constituencies. In the late 1970s and the 1980s, the belief benefited the U.S. national security establishment, which had aligned itself with China against the Soviet Union. The notion that Chinese leader Deng Xiaoping was reforming his country's political system helped defuse congressional opposition to U.S. military cooperation with China's communist regime.

In the 1990s, as trade and investment in China became increasingly important, U.S. companies were asked why they were so eager to do business with a regime that had, in 1989, ordered troops to fire on unarmed civilians. The Soothing Scenario offered an answer: Trade and the workings of "history" would inexorably liberalize China's political system, whether Chinese leaders wanted it or not.

But to believe that the spread of McDonald's and Starbucks will change China's political system is to indulge in the old mistake of thinking that the Chinese are becoming like us. Bringing in McDonald's has nothing to do with whether a government is willing to tolerate organized political opposition.

And to assume that China's emerging urban middle class will be the vanguard for far-reaching political liberalization is to ignore the fact that this is the one group — beyond the Chinese Communist Party itself — that has the strongest interest in preserving the status quo.

Proponents of the Soothing Scenario often argue that China will evolve from a repressive regime into a democratic one in roughly the same way that South Korea and Taiwan did two decades ago. But the comparison doesn't work. China has vast expanses far removed from the relatively open traditions of the country's coastal areas. Visitors who declare that China will develop like Taiwan and South Korea, based on their visits to Beijing and Shanghai, are like foreigners who travel only to New York City and Boston and conclude that the United States will behave like Western Europe.

But the biggest problem with the Soothing Scenario is that it fails to explain how the smooth transformation will take place. China's political system is still organized along Leninist lines. When, how and why will its leaders be persuaded to give up power? What if China's growing economy gives the country's leaders an ever-stronger stake in preserving the current system?

The Upheaval Scenario, including predictions of a possible breakup or collapse, is regularly advanced whenever there are short-term signs of instability in China — labor strikes, rural unrest, riots, environmental disasters. There are, however, plenty of reasons to be skeptical of such forecasts. It is too easy to overemphasize the appearance of chaos in China and to miss the reality of the country's enduring, underlying cohesion.

That leaves the Third Scenario: that China's leaders will continue to prevent any organized political opposition and keep controls over the media and the judiciary. (A few days ago, Luo Gan, a member of the Chinese Communist Party's Politburo Standing Committee, reaffirmed that judges have no right to independence, saying, "The correct political stand is where the party stands.") Only small-scale reforms, such as carefully limited village elections, would be permitted — and only as long as they do not disturb the one-party monopoly on power.

Why should Americans care about China's future? For several reasons. For one thing, it would be nice if the country's 1.3 billion people could freely choose their leaders, limit their government's power and hold it accountable. This would ensure greater political stability for China.

A China that evolved along the lines of the Third Scenario would not necessarily be a military threat to the U.S. However, it would continue to pose problems for democratic values throughout the world. In recent years, China has supported deeply repressive regimes in Myanmar, Zimbabwe, North Korea, Uzbekistan and Sudan. If democracy hangs in the balance in Russia, there is little question that China would favor an authoritarian state over one with genuine political opposition.

To see how these three scenarios play out, consider how they might apply to the 2008 Olympics. The Soothing Scenario is the one that China will try to televise to the world before and during the Olympics. Chances are that in the run-up to the Games, the Chinese leadership will take steps to show how the country is opening up.

DOJ_NMG_0136740

The Upheaval Scenario is the one the Chinese leadership fears: the possibility of social unrest that would disturb the Games. There will be plenty of groups with grievances against the government eager to attract worldwide attention during the Olympics, and Chinese authorities will not want to use force against them. The result would almost certainly be a massive effort by China's internal security apparatus to head off demonstrations and to keep would-be protesters out of Beijing.

Will we see signs of the Third Scenario at the Olympics? Not many. The best time to see whether China will really open up or remain authoritarian will be in the year or two after the visitors go home. I believe that China's current one-party system will endure far into the future.

JAMES MANN is author in residence at the Paul H. Nitze School of Advanced International Studies at Johns Hopkins University and the author of "The China Fantasy," published this month.

Taiwan Premier Su Announces Presidential Bid (AFP)

AFP, February 25, 2007

Taiwan Premier Su Tseng-chang announced he will seek the ruling Democratic Progressive Party's nomination for the 2008 presidential race.

"Taiwan's history is turning to a new page. The 2008 presidential election is about to come," said Su, nicknamed the "electric fireball" because of his small stature and lack of hair.

"I have prepared myself. Now I want to sincerely tell my countrymen that I'll run for the next presidency. I implore full support of party members and countrymen," he added.

The 60-year-old, a former human rights lawyer and popular co-founder of the pro-independence Democratic Progressive Party (DPP), emphasised Taiwan's sovereignty.

China regards Taiwan as part of its territory, to be reunified by force if necessary. Taiwan and China split in 1949 at the end of a civil war.

"For the future of Taiwan, we have to unite together and stride forward," Su said.

The DPP has been pressing for independence, whereas the leading opposition Kuomintang (KMT) calls for improved ties with Beijing.

Su became the third DPP heavyweight to make public his presidential bid, following former premier Frank Hsieh, who stood down as premier a year ago, and DPP chairman Yu Shyi-kun.

These three, and Vice President Annette Lu, dubbed "three kings and one queen," are seen as the most prominent presidential contenders from the DPP.

The DPP earlier this month jumpstarted its nomination process for the 2008 presidential polls following opposition leader Ma Ying-jeou's unexpected announcement that he will run for president.

DPP members who seek official nomination must register with the party from March 5-9 to enter a party primary vote. The candidates will then compete against each other in public opinion polls.

The final outcome -- with the primary accounting for 30 percent and public surveys 70 percent of the results -- will be announced on May 30.

KMT leader Ma last week declared his presidential bid after being indicted for corruption.

Ma resigned as KMT chairman after he was accused of misusing some 11 million Taiwan dollars (about 333,000 US) in expenses when he was Taipei mayor.

No Change On Sanctions After Abbas Trip (AP)

By Angela Charlton, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 25, 2007

Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas ended his European tour Saturday without persuading any country to end crippling economic sanctions based on his power-sharing deal with the rival Islamic militant Hamas.

The bright spot in his trip was a promise Saturday from French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy to work with a government that includes Hamas and Abbas' more moderate Fatah party. His comments were more positive than those of other European leaders during Abbas' four-country tour. But Douste-Blazy made no commitments on resuming aid frozen since Hamas won parliamentary elections a year ago.

Europe's governments remained firm: Any new Palestinian government must recognize Israel's right to exist before direct international aid can resume.

"I encouraged Mr. Abbas to persevere in his efforts to quickly form a national unity government," Douste-Blazy told reporters.

DOJ_NMG_0136741

If the government is formed according to the power-sharing deal worked out in the Islamic holy city of Mecca last month, "France will be ready to cooperate with it," Douste-Blazy said. "And our country will plead on its behalf within the European Union and with other partners in the international community."

Abbas, who also traveled to Britain, Germany and Belgium, welcomed the pledge from France. But it was unclear how far France could go in supporting the Palestinians without the backing of the rest of the EU or other members of the Quartet of Middle East peace negotiators: the United States, Russia and the U.N.

Half of the Palestinian Authority's budget came from foreign assistance until much of it was frozen last year over Hamas' refusal to recognize Israel, renounce violence and accept existing peace agreements with Israel. The power-sharing deal skirts those demands.

"We hope that the embargo will be lifted," Abbas said after meeting French President Jacques Chirac on Saturday. "If not ... the Palestinian people would continue to suffer and the sanctions would continue to cause damage."

European leaders cautiously welcomed the power-sharing deal, an effort to end clashes between Hamas and Fatah that have left more than 130 dead since May.

But EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana told Abbas in Brussels that the EU would not make a decision on aid until a new Palestinian government has taken office.

In Gaza, four Palestinians were killed and 37 were injured in a family feud late Friday and early Saturday, threatening the calm that has accompanied the Mecca deal. Gaza remains volatile because families of some of those killed in months of clashes still seek revenge.

Palestinian parliament speaker Ahmed Baher, of Hamas, said in Gaza on Saturday that the government would be formed by the first week of March.

Israel has ruled out talks on a final peace deal with Abbas if he goes ahead with the coalition government.

But Abbas insisted he still had hope in the peace process despite an inconclusive meeting with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice earlier this week.

"We cannot say that there is something hopeless. It is indispensable that we reach agreement with the Israelis," he told reporters in Paris.

Abbas said he would push for the release of captured Israeli soldier Gilad Shalit before the new government is formed. Shalit's capture by Palestinian militants last June sparked weeks of fighting between Palestinians and Israelis. Chirac and Douste-Blazy urged his release Saturday.

Israeli Troops Raid Nablus, Start Curfew (AP)

AP, February 25, 2007

Dozens of Israeli jeeps and armored vehicles raided the West Bank city of Nablus Sunday and placed tens of thousands of Palestinians under curfew.

The army said troops had on Saturday, at the start of the operation to arrest suspected militants, uncovered an explosives laboratory in the city and that soldiers had been shot at in several places and returned fire. No injuries were reported on either side.

About 80 jeeps backing several bulldozers entered the city, witnesses said. The bulldozers pushed rubble into piles on main roads to make them impassable, they said. Troops placed about 50,000 people under curfew in the center of Nablus and closed the main entrance to the city, witnesses said.

Jeeps blocked entries to two main hospitals in the city, said a doctor, Ghassan Hamdan.

Schools and a university in the city announced that they had canceled studies due to the curfew.

5 Palestinians Die In Gaza Feud (NYT)

By Isabel Kershner

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

JERUSALEM, Feb. 24 — Five Palestinians were killed and more than 40 wounded in fighting between clans on Friday and early Saturday in Khan Yunis, a town in the southern Gaza Strip. Though the clashes were being portrayed in the Palestinian news media as a feud between families, they also took on a factional hue, since one of the families is identified with Hamas and the other with its political rival, Fatah.

The deaths raised fears of a possible round of revenge killings and renewed factional fighting between Hamas and Fatah after two weeks of relative calm. The fighting between Hamas and Fatah, which had killed almost 100 people in the Gaza Strip since December, eased after leaders of the groups signed an agreement in Mecca, Saudi Arabia, on Feb. 8 to share power in a proposed national unity government.

DOJ_NMG_0136742

The latest round of violence in Khan Yunis started late Friday with the fatal shooting of Muhammad Ali Ghalban, 27, a member of the Iz al-Din al-Qassam underground that is linked to Hamas, according to Palestinian news reports. Hamas said Mr. Ghalban was killed by armed men from the Kawareh family. The reports said the killing was apparently an act of revenge for the death of a Kawareh relative in factional fighting a month ago. A few hours later, Hazem Kawareh, 30, a Fatah supporter, and a passerby, Ismail Sabah, 73, were killed, according to Israeli and Palestinian news reports. Palestinian news reports listed the two other fatalities as Ghada Kawareh, 28, and Salama Abu Shabab, 55, although details of the killings were not provided.

Israeli forces also discovered a bomb-making factory in the West Bank city of Nablus during an overnight operation that ended Saturday, an army spokesman said. Five pipe bombs, two gas balloons, materials for bomb making and large quantities of shrapnel were found in the factory, situated in the Old City market area. Palestinians threw a grenade and opened fire on the soldiers, and one member of Islamic Jihad was arrested, the spokesman said.

The army spokesman also confirmed that the Egyptian police on Friday found a ton of explosives in the Sinai desert, near the border with the Gaza Strip. The discovery came as Egyptian forces scoured the area for Palestinian militants thought to have come to Sinai from Gaza with the intention of attacking Israeli tourists at resorts in the desert peninsula. Several Palestinians were arrested earlier in the week in the northern Sinai carrying explosives belts. Israeli authorities have warned Israeli tourists to leave Sinai resorts immediately.

On Friday, two Qassam rockets were launched from the Gaza Strip in the direction of Israeli communities across the border. They fell in open areas and caused no injuries. That brings the number of Qassam rockets launched from Gaza in the past week to 12, according to the Israeli Army, despite a cease-fire that was declared in November.

At a news conference in Jerusalem on Wednesday, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said Israel "would not restrain itself forever" in the face of the Qassam fire. "Israel's patience is being tested too often. In the end, we will respond and reach out to those responsible," he said, without specifying any timetable for action.

The Israeli Channel 2 television broadcast excerpts from an interview with King Abdullah II of Jordan on Friday, in which he suggested that the Israeli-Palestinian conflict was at a critical crossroad and that he believed this "really is the last opportunity for peace for all of us."

Prodi Gets A Second Chance To Lead Italy (NYT)

By Ian Fisher

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

ROME, Feb. 24 — Romano Prodi was given a second chance to lead Italy's government on Saturday, though allies and enemies worried that his still-fragile coalition would remain divided and vulnerable to another collapse.

"It's a weak solution," Daniele Capezzone, a leader of the Radical Party, which is allied with Mr. Prodi, told the ANSA news agency. "Within a month we risk finding ourselves in the same situation."

On Wednesday, Mr. Prodi resigned after far-left members of his diverse coalition killed a Senate vote on the government's foreign policy.

Since then, he has forced party leaders into line, even though the underlying ideological splits remain in place, as does his razor-thin majority in the Senate.

President Giorgio Napolitano, after two days of consultations with political leaders, concluded that there was "no concrete alternative" and on Saturday asked Mr. Prodi to try again. Now Mr. Prodi must win votes of confidence in Parliament, scheduled for late next week.

He is expected to have little trouble in the lower chamber, the House of Deputies, where he enjoys a wide majority. But Mr. Prodi would make no firm predictions about the Senate, despite gaining the support of a center-right leader once allied with Mr. Berlusconi, Marco Follini.

"Today I'm more relieved," Mr. Prodi told reporters after meeting with Mr. Napolitano here in Rome. Asked if he thought he could win the confidence vote in the Senate, he said, "The debate will be next week, and we will see."

Many political analysts predicted that he would scrape by, with the help of honorary senators appointed for life who lean to the political left. A different question, however, was surviving his five-year term, with the Senate deeply divided on the budget, political overhaul and issues including whether Italy should keep troops in Afghanistan or support the expansion of an American military base in Vicenza, in northern Italy.

Those last two issues are particularly contentious among the far-left members of his coalition, and they were the reason two senators abstained from the foreign policy vote on Wednesday, bringing down the government.

On Thursday, Mr. Prodi secured from his allies an agreement on a program of 12 "nonnegotiable" points, aimed at both giving him more autonomy and moving the coalition closer to the political center.

DOJ_NMG_0136743

Still, opposition leaders called it a bandage that would only "prolong the agony," as one said Saturday, before another collapse and the need for new elections. They had been urging Mr. Napolitano to sideline Mr. Prodi completely and appoint a caretaker government of technocrats.

"I don't believe this left can ever find the agreement to operate well in the direction of the reforms that this country needs," Silvio Berlusconi, the former prime minister and leader of the center-right opposition, told members of his party on Saturday.

Venezuela Spending On Arms Soars To World's Top Ranks (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

CARACAS, Venezuela, Feb. 24 — Venezuela's arms spending has climbed to more than $4 billion in the past two years, transforming the nation into Latin America's largest weapons buyer and placing it ahead of other major purchasers in international arms markets like Pakistan and Iran.

Venezuelan military and government officials here say the arms acquisitions, which include dozens of fighter jets and attack helicopters and 100,000 Kalashnikov assault rifles, are needed to circumvent a ban by the United States on sales of American weapons to the country.

They also argue that Venezuela must strengthen its defenses to counter potential military aggression from the United States.

"The United States has tried to paralyze our air power," Gen. Alberto Muller Rojas, a member of President Hugo Chávez's general staff, said in an interview, citing a recent effort by the Bush administration to prevent Venezuela from acquiring replacement parts for American F-16s bought in the 1980s. "We are feeling threatened and like any sovereign nation we are taking steps to strengthen our territorial defense," he said.

This retooling of Venezuela's military strategy, which includes creation of a large civilian reserve force and military assistance to regional allies like Bolivia, has been part of a steadily deteriorating political relationship with the United States.

The Bush administration has repeatedly denied that it has any plans to attack Venezuela, one of the largest sources of oil for the United States. But distrust of such statements persists here after the administration tacitly supported a coup that briefly removed Mr. Chávez from office in 2002.

Venezuela's escalation of arms spending, up 12.5 percent in 2006, has brought harsh criticism from the Bush administration, which says the buildup is a potentially destabilizing problem in South America and is far more than what would be needed for domestic defense alone.

The spending has also touched off a fierce debate domestically about whether the country needs to be spending billions of dollars on imported weapons when poverty and a surging homicide rate remain glaring problems. Meanwhile, concern has increased among Venezuela's neighbors that its arms purchases could upend regional power balances or lead to a new illicit trade in arms across Venezuela's porous borders.

José Sarney, the former Brazilian president and a leading senator, caused a stir this week when he was quoted in the newspaper O Globo as describing Venezuela's form of government as "military populism" and "a return to the 1950s," when Venezuela was governed by the army strongman Marcos Pérez Jiménez.

"Venezuela is buying arms that are not a threat to the United States but which unbalance forces within the continent," Mr. Sarney said. "We cannot let Venezuela become a military power."

Still, officials in the administration of President Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva of Brazil have been hesitant to publicly criticize Venezuela's arms purchases.

The issue remains delicate after the Brazilian company Embraer lost a deal to sell military aircraft to Venezuela because the planes included American technology.

After turning unsuccessfully to Brazil and Spain for military aircraft, Venezuela has become one of the largest customers of Russia's arms industry.

Since 2005, Venezuela has signed contracts with Russia for 24 Sukhoi fighter jets, 50 transport and attack helicopters, and 100,000 assault rifles. Venezuela also has plans to open Latin America's first Kalashnikov factory, to produce the Russian-designed rifles in the city of Maracay.

A report in January by the Pentagon's Defense Intelligence Agency pegged Venezuela's arms purchases in the past two years at $4.3 billion, ahead of Pakistan's $3 billion and Iran's $1.7 billion in that period.

In a statement before the House Intelligence Committee, Lt. Gen. Michael D. Maples, the director of the Defense Intelligence Agency, called attention to Mr. Chávez's "agenda to neutralize U.S. influence throughout the hemisphere," contrasting Mr. Chávez with the "reformist left" exemplified by President Michelle Bachelet of Chile.

DOJ_NMG_0136744

Beyond Russia, Venezuela is also considering a venture with Iran, its closest ally outside Latin America, to build a remotely piloted patrol aircraft. Gen. Raúl Isaías Baduel, the Venezuelan defense minister, recently told reporters that the project to build 20 of the aircraft could be used to bolster border surveillance and combat environmental destruction in Venezuela. Venezuela is also strengthening military ties with Cuba, sending officers and soldiers there for training.

Supporters of the arms buildup contend that under Mr. Chávez, who has been in power for eight years, Venezuela has spent proportionately less on its military in relation to the size of its economy than the United States or than other South American countries like Chile and Colombia.

In 2004, the last year for which comparative data were immediately available and before Venezuela's arms buildup intensified, overall defense spending by Venezuela, including arms contracts, was about $1.3 billion and accounted for about 1.4 percent of gross domestic product, compared with 4 percent in the United States and 3.8 percent in Colombia, according to the Stockholm International Peace Research Institute, which tracks military spending.

Doubts persist as to how powerful Venezuela's armed forces have become in a regional context, even as they acquire new weapons. Military experts here say pilots in the air force still need training to start flying their new Russian fighters. And in terms of troop strength, Venezuela's 34,000-soldier active-duty army still lags behind the armies of Argentina and Brazil, with about 41,400 and 200,000 members respectively, according to GlobalSecurity.org, a Web site that compiles data on military topics.

Pro-Chávez analysts also say the president is less adventurous in relation to military policy outside Venezuela than predecessors like Luis Herrera Campíns, who supported Argentina in the Falklands War in 1982 to detract attention from a decline in oil revenue and climbing inflation.

But critics of the arms purchases say they are being made with little participation from or discussion with the National Assembly, which recently allowed Mr. Chávez to govern by decree for 18 months.

Ricardo Sucre, a political scientist at the Central University of Venezuela, said that the lack of transparency of the weapons contracts had heightened concern that Mr. Chávez could be arming parts of the army, the new civilian reserve and partisans like the Frente Francisco de Miranda, a pro-Chávez political group, that would be loyal to him in the event of fractures within the armed forces.

General Muller Rojas, the president's military adviser, said concern about the arms purchases was overblown, pointing to reports that Venezuela was considering an acquisition of nine diesel-powered submarines from Russia for about $3 billion.

He said the navy had "aspirations" for more submarines, but that no "concrete plan" for such a large contract had been developed.

"We simply have an interest in maintaining peace and stability," General Muller Rojas said, describing the Caribbean as a crucial to its military influence. "We have no intent of using the Venezuelan armed forces to repress human rights."

Chavez Says Bush's Latin America Tour Doomed To Failure (AP)

AP, February 24, 2007

CARACAS, Venezuela (AP) — Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez said Saturday that he saw U.S. President George W. Bush's upcoming tour to Latin America as a diplomatic offensive aimed at isolating his leftist government.

Chavez said that Bush's planned trip was "without a doubt" aimed at dividing the region and containing Venezuela's influence.

"But it's too late. I think the U.S. president now has nothing to find in Latin America. It is an offensive destined to the abyss of failure," Chavez told a news conference.

Chavez said he respected the decision by other Latin American nations to "receive this little gentleman," but in Venezuela, "we will never receive him. Never. Because we know what he is. This is nothing personal."

Chavez has become one of Washington's fiercest critics and regularly blames U.S.-style capitalism for poverty and inequality in the region.

"The strategy of the U.S. government has always been ... to divide Latin America," he said, including Bush's last visit to Argentina for the 2005 Summit of the Americas when the U.S. leader tried unsuccessfully to promote a hemisphere-wide free trade area.

"I saw him leave with his tail between his legs — the imperialist superpower," he said.

The March 8-14 tour, which will take Bush to Brazil, Uruguay, Colombia, Guatemala and Mexico, is the most extensive to the region since the U.S. leader to office six years ago and is being seen in the region as an attempt to reverse years of neglect, as well as counter Chavez's influence

Chavez is a close ally of Cuba's Fidel Castro who has spread his country's oil wealth to ideological allies like Bolivia, Nicaragua and Ecuador in the form of preferential oil deals and loans.

DOJ_NMG_0136745

The White House has said Bush's trip is aimed at underlining the U.S. government's commitment to the region and advancing democracy and its benefits, including health, education and economic opportunities.

Civilians Flee New Fighting In Capital (WT)

By Mustafa Haji Abdinur, Agence France-Presse

The Washington Times, February 25, 2007

MOGADISHU, Somalia -- Thousands of terrified civilians poured out of the Somali capital yesterday after heavy fighting between Ethiopian troops and gunmen overnight left at least 10 persons dead.

Some residents scrambled into passenger vans while most just grabbed household items and left on foot for the relative calm of the surrounding countryside, where food is scarce.

"I was very scared yesterday after I heard the heaviest explosion ever in the capital," said Adan Dirir Bare, a resident of southern Mogadishu.

"I had insisted a lot on staying in Mogadishu, but not now."

A mother of five, Sahro Ali Mohamed, said houses in her Mogadishu neighborhood were deserted.

"People cannot endure the heavy artillery and mortar exchange that kills people every time," she said as she left with her family in tow.

Five children were among the dead from clashes late Friday, apparently killed when caught in crossfire, witnesses said.

The International Committee of the Red Cross yesterday issued a plea to all warring parties to comply with the rules of international humanitarian law to protect civilians.

It urged them "to take constant care in the conduct of military operations to safeguard the lives and dignity of the civilian population."

Last week saw some of the heaviest fighting in the capital since late December when a hard-line Islamist movement was driven out by the interim Somali government and its Ethiopian allies.

The government and the Ethiopians blame remnants of the Islamist movement for stoking the violence.

A top Somali army commander yesterday accused unnamed foreign countries of funding the insurgency.

"The assailants are loyal to those who want to create violence in the capital and they are being funded by foreign countries," Said Dhere told reporters.

"We know who is behind the attacks, and we will crack down on them soon."

In the past, Somalia has blamed Ethiopia's arch foe Eritrea for funding the rebel fighters.

Analysts say Somali President Abdullahi Yusuf Ahmed has failed to create a government that includes elders and warlords from powerful sub-clans suspected of organizing the raids.

Rival militias of clan warlords carved up Somalia after dictator Mohamed Siad Barre was ousted in 1991.

Somalia is awaiting the deployment of an 8,000-strong African Union force to try to help the transitional government restore order in Mogadishu. The deployment was approved Tuesday by the U.N. Security Council.

But the AU has so far managed to raise only half of the required peacekeepers, with troop pledges from Nigeria, Burundi, Malawi and Ghana as well as Uganda.

In a statement posted on a suspected Islamist Web site, a group calling itself the Popular Resistance Movement in the Land of the Two Migrations, which is accused of threatening peacekeepers, vowed to carry out more attacks.

"We vow to welcome ammunition from heavy guns, exploding cars and young fighters determined to carry out martyrdom operations against these troops," the statement said.

Uganda's Deputy Defense Minister Ruth Nankabirwa said Friday that Uganda was now waiting for air transport from Algeria to begin its deployment.

Senegal's High Unemployment Is Top Election Issue (WP/AP)

By Rukmini Callimachi, Associated Press

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

DAKAR, Senegal, Feb. 24 -- The seaside highway, one of the Senegalese president's bold building initiatives, winds past the scruffy shop where Barry Mamadou, a 62-year-old tailor, and his two sons eke out a living sewing scraps of cloth into curtains.

It is a beautiful highway, Mamadou said, no doubt about it.

"But I can't eat the road," he said, explaining why, having twice voted for President Abdoulaye Wade, he is now siding with one of 14 opposition candidates in Sunday's presidential election.

DOJ_NMG_0136746

Wade's projects include the new sea-hugging highway, a second major airport and a pan-African university. Yet in a country where half the population of 12 million is unemployed, some Senegalese say they would settle for a decent job and three meals a day.

"There seems to be a disconnect between ideas that on paper look good and what is actually happening on the ground," said Alex Segura-Ubiergo, the International Monetary Fund's representative in Senegal.

Wade, 80, who spent three decades in the opposition and ran four times for president before winning by a landslide in 2000, said his critics are missing the larger picture.

"I am a man in a hurry because Africans are not in a hurry, and the chasm that divides us from the West is big and is getting bigger. So we need to run faster to catch up. We can't fix the divide by going slowly," he said Thursday in an interview at the presidential palace.

The West sees this mostly Muslim country as an oasis of progress on a continent beset by authoritarian rule, corruption and grinding poverty. The government has never been overthrown in a coup, and many corporations have moved here. Wade has the advantage of incumbency and a fragmented opposition, but opinion polls are banned in election seasons, so predictions are difficult. If no one tops 50 percent of the vote, a runoff will be held.

But whatever the outcome, jobs are the leading issue.

Ibrahima Seck, 31, an engineering graduate, was a machinist at a chemical plant that recently shut down. Now he hawks knockoff perfume on the streets of the seaside capital.

Each perfume bottle nets him $2, and days can go by without a sale. His goal: to save about $1,000 for a ticket on a perilous 900-mile voyage by wooden boat to Spain's Canary Islands and a better life in Europe.

The surge of West Africans trying to reach Western Europe on sometimes perilous journeys is among the biggest stains on Wade's last seven years in office. Hundreds have died, yet at least 31,000 people undertook the voyage last year from West Africa.

"What the old man promised us, he didn't do," Seck said of Wade. "I need a real job, not a nice road. Not an airport. As soon as I save enough money, I will take the boat, even if it means losing my life."

Wade points to an annual growth rate of almost 5 percent, compared with 1 percent during the 40 years of socialist rule before he won office, and to job-creating initiatives such as raising crops whose oil can be used for biofuels.

But infrastructure has deteriorated. Electricity cuts are far more frequent because power plants are aging and oil prices are rising.

While inflation overall has remained low, the price of some basic commodities has spiked. The cost of a 13-pound canister of cooking gas, for example, rose 57 percent last year.

Wade's government has also been criticized by human rights groups for jailing opponents, including, for a time, his former prime minister, Idrissa Seck, now one of the candidates running against him. Another contender in Sunday's race is 68-year-old Moustapha Niasse, a veteran opposition leader who was Wade's first prime minister.

In Mbeki's South Africa, Change Has Come, Slowly (WP)

By Craig Timberg, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, February 25, 2007

KHAYELITSHA, South Africa -- The road in front of Princess Rini's leaky, wooden shack has been paved. There is a primary school and a library down the street. And though three of the outdoor taps the government built nearby are broken, a twist on the fourth brings forth copious clean water.

"It's changing, a little bit, a little bit," said Rini, 38, a widow with short, braided hair who moved to Khayelitsha, among Cape Town's poorest and most dangerous townships, a decade before apartheid ended in 1994. "It's better than before."

The reason: "It's Thabo Mbeki," she said.

Inequality remains extreme in South Africa, with sharp divisions along lines of race and class. But Mbeki, who could become a lame-duck president as soon as December, when the ruling African National Congress has elections for party leader, has already crafted a legacy of fiscal stability and modest racial progress that, advisers say, he is working furiously to protect as rivals vie to replace him.

Mbeki is seeking to maintain control by competing for a third term as party leader, a move that would help him handpick the next president. But analysts say the outcome is far from certain in a year they call the most politically tumultuous since apartheid.

In these battles, the slow pace of change is perhaps Mbeki's most glaring weakness. Rush hour in Cape Town, southern Africa's original European colony and still a bastion of white privilege, is swollen with luxury cars speeding past dilapidated townships. Executive suites in downtown skyscrapers remain dominated by the small white minority.

DOJ_NMG_0136747

"We have not succeeded at de-racializing the economy," said Willie Esterhuyse, a retired Afrikaner philosophy professor who became a friend and adviser to Mbeki. "After liberation, nothing changed. . . . The racism is embedded in the physical nature of the country."

Although the racial order has proved dauntingly resilient, a strong economy has provided benefits to all levels of society.

Rini said she could not imagine ever living in the lush white neighborhood where she works one day a week, earning $57 for the month, and she craves steadier employment and a concrete home with plumbing. But she said she is grateful for the improvements to her neighborhood and for the $27 monthly government grant she receives to help support her youngest child.

Of Mbeki's government, she said its programs were "better than nothing."

Mbeki's advisers acknowledge that his cerebral approach to the presidency will never generate the enthusiasm many South Africans felt for Nelson Mandela, the charismatic first president of the post-apartheid era. But Mbeki, who was deputy president during those years, was the intellectual force behind policies that have allowed the country to become fiscally sound while gradually providing homes, water, electrical connections and grants to millions of the poorest South Africans.

Esterhuyse, who was an emissary for the apartheid government when he first met Mbeki in the late 1980s, said that even then Mbeki was "the guy in the engine room" capable of bringing ANC ideals to reality.

He became president in 1999, for the first of two five-year terms allowed by the constitution, but soon was embroiled in controversy when he questioned the scientific consensus on the cause of AIDS and, in the opinion of activists and many global leaders, moved too slowly on providing antiretroviral drugs. His international standing, analysts say, never entirely recovered.

In South Africa, he has developed a reputation as ruthless in backroom dealings, brittle in the face of criticism and emotionally remote in public appearances. His anti-populist instincts have become so hardened that even when he agrees to the demands of critics, as he eventually has on such sensitive matters as AIDS and South Africa's rampant violent crime, he has refrained from crowd-pleasing gestures of empathy for victims.

In a speech to Parliament this month, Mbeki said tartly, "There will be no empty theatrical gestures, no prancing on the stage and no flagellation, but we will continue to act against crime, as decisively as we have sought to do throughout the years of our liberation."

By contrast, he has consistently displayed passion for redressing the enduring racial divide, a subject he often calls the "national question." But on that goal, advancement is least clear.

Government programs requiring businesses to diversify their ownership have turned a small number of politically connected men and women into millionaires. And the number of blacks in top management jobs has increased from 13 percent in Mbeki's first full year in office to 27 percent, according to government statistics.

But unemployment among blacks tops 30 percent, and in many townships more than half of adults lack work.

Equally daunting is the legacy of Bantu education, which during apartheid sought to keep blacks as second-class citizens trained mainly for menial jobs. The 2001 census found that nearly half of black South Africans have no formal education or left school at the primary level.

"There's been a lack of creativity in how do you deal with poverty, how do you deal with unemployment," said William Gumede, author of "Thabo Mbeki and the Battle for the Soul of the ANC," speaking from London, where he is studying. "The remaining underclass is really going nowhere."

Property values have risen sharply for white South Africans, and the Johannesburg Stock Exchange regularly reaches new highs. South African companies have moved aggressively to other African countries, Asia and beyond.

Yet even as government receipts soar, South Africa's schools remain understaffed, and many of its public hospitals and clinics are overwhelmed.

Mbeki's approach to such woes is inherently cautious, based on his belief that major changes are possible only if the economy is made strong, his advisers said.

That response has not satisfied many ANC activists, and several of the candidates seeking to replace Mbeki -- including his fired former deputy Jacob Zuma -- draw support from those demanding more generous jobs programs, protection from overseas competition or other initiatives that might quickly improve the lives of the poor.

The most dramatic changes under Mbeki, however, are found not among the poor or the rich, but among the burgeoning black middle class, which increasingly has access to shopping, housing and jobs that long were the exclusive preserve of whites.

The impact of these new consumers has surprised even businesses, which have struggled to keep up with demand for electricity, gasoline and consumer goods, said Joel Netshitenzhe, Mbeki's top policy adviser, speaking in Pretoria.

"If there's a real tsunami in South Africa, that's it," he said. "Demand is growing so fast that businesses can't cope."

Solomzi Yapi, 41, who one recent day was hiking up a steep, sandy hill here in hopes of shrinking the belly that grew with his own prosperity, said he sees the economic changes as he drives his Volvo sedan through black townships, selling life insurance. Each passing year, he said, brings more customers with the means to buy his policies -- a change he attributes to Mbeki.

DOJ_NMG_0136748

"He does not care how people perceive him," Yapi said. "He's a good administrator."

Yet breaking down racial barriers has come more slowly than Yapi expected when apartheid ended.

"I thought everything was going to be a very sharp turn . . . that we were going to have mixed much more than we've mixed now," he said. "Back then, I was naive. I didn't know anything about politics. We knew a lot about apartheid, not governance."

But a visit to a McDonald's restaurant three years ago convinced him change was coming, he said. All of the managers and the other customers were white. Everyone cooking or working the cash registers was black. But as he ordered his food and ate it, the service was courteous and his visit there caused no stir -- something unimaginable under apartheid.

It amounted to progress, he said, in South Africa.

'They Think They've Been Cursed By God' (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, February 25, 2007

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia

President Bush's budget request this month proposes that the U.S. cut spending on global maternal and child health programs to $346 million, or just $1.15 per person in the U.S.

To understand what the cuts mean, meet Simeesh Segaye.

Ms. Simeesh, a warm 21-year-old Ethiopian peasant with a radiant smile, married at 19 and quickly became pregnant. After she had endured two days of obstructed labor, her neighbors carried her to a road and packed her into a bus, but it took another two days to get to the nearest hospital.

By then the baby was dead. And Ms. Simeesh awakened to another horror: She began leaking urine and feces from her vagina, a result of a childbirth injury called obstetric fistula.

Ms. Simeesh's family paid $10 for a public bus to take her to a hospital that could repair her fistula. But the other passengers took one whiff of her and complained vociferously that they shouldn't have to share the vehicle with someone who stinks. The bus driver ordered her off.

Mortified, Ms. Simeesh was crushed again when her husband left her. Her parents built a separate hut for her because of her smell, but they nursed her and brought her food and water.

In that hut, she stayed — alone, ashamed, helpless, bewildered. She barely ate, because the more she ate or drank, the more wastes trickled down her legs.

"I just curled up," she said. "For two years."

Ms. Simeesh was, in a sense, lucky. She wasn't one of the 530,000 women who die each year in pregnancy and childbirth — a number that hasn't declined in 30 years. Here in Ethiopia, a woman has one chance in 14 of dying in childbirth at some point in her life.

For every woman who dies in childbirth worldwide, another 20 are injured. But because the victims are born with three strikes against them — they are poor, rural and female — they are invisible and voiceless, receiving almost no help either from poor countries or from the developed world.

So Ms. Simeesh huddled in a fetal position on the floor of her hut for two years, thinking about killing herself. Finally, last month, Ms. Simeesh's parents sold all their farm animals and paid a driver to take her to the hospital in a vehicle with no other passengers present to complain.

So now Ms. Simeesh is lying in a bed here in the Addis Ababa Fistula Hospital (www.fistulafoundation.org). The hospital is run by an Australian gynecologist, Dr. Catherine Hamlin, whom I've written about before. Dr. Hamlin is the Mother Teresa of our age.

The doctors here will try to repair the fistula, but first they must strengthen Ms. Simeesh, who is skeletal. Her legs have withered and are permanently bent into a fetal position, so that she can't straighten them or move them.

In the U.S., neither Democrats nor Republicans have ever shown great interest in maternal health. But it's an issue that deserves far more support, partly because we know exactly what to do to bring down maternal mortality and morbidity: Sri Lanka and Honduras have both shown how poor countries can drastically cut rates of death and injury.

And in the breakaway Somaliland region of Somalia, an extraordinary woman named Edna Adan Ismail runs her own obstetric hospital and trains midwives, underscoring how women's lives can be saved even in the most difficult environments. Ms. Edna struggles one moment to deliver a breech baby, and the next to round up surgical masks. She is helped by a group of Americans, Friends of Edna Hospital (www.ednahospital.netfirms.com), who raise funds and scavenge supplies. (To see Ms.

DOJ_NMG_0136749

Edna, Ms. Simeesh and others in this column, please visit the video I have posted on my blog at www.nytimes.com/ontheground.)

Dr. Hamlin and Ms. Edna deserve the Nobel Peace Prize for showing the world how to turn the tide of maternal mortality and morbidity, and for offering comfort to some of the most forlorn people in the world. At a time when we're proposing further cuts in our negligible budget for maternal and child health, I was deeply moved by the sight of Ruth Kennedy, a British midwife at the fistula hospital, comforting Ms. Simeesh and bringing a lovely smile to her lips.

"They think they've been cursed by God," Ms. Kennedy explained. "And we tell them that they haven't been cursed by God and that they're beautiful and that the only reason that they got a fistula is because we failed them as health professionals."

Containment Makes A Comeback (LAT)

By Ian Shapiro

The Los Angeles Times, February 25, 2007

Containment is back.

Over the last 12 months, commentators as varied as George Will, MIT political science professor Barry Posen and Thomas Friedman have all suggested that containing a nuclear-armed Iran might be preferable to attacking it.

Last month, Kenneth Pollack of the Brookings Institution joined in with a study advocating a return to a policy of containment in Iraq — even though he had been one of the most vocal supporters of the 2003 invasion on the grounds that containment was failing.

Even James Baker's Iraq Study Group proposed in its December report that the U.S. should work with Iran and Syria to contain the Iraqi conflict.

Containment is a Cold War idea, articulated by historian and diplomat George Kennan in the late 1940s in his famous Foreign Affairs magazine article "The Sources of Soviet Conduct," (which he published under the pseudonym "X"). Kennan, who had been stationed at the U.S. Embassy in Moscow, argued that as long as the Soviet Union did not attack us, we should not attack it — but should rely instead on economic sticks and carrots, on intelligence and diplomacy and on promoting the health and vitality of the capitalist democracies to win the Cold War.

Yes, Kennan wrote, the Soviets were eager to increase their sphere of influence, but U.S. policy should nevertheless be built on "long-term, patient but firm and vigilant containment of Russian expansive tendencies." With time, he believed, the dysfunctional Soviet system, overextended beyond its own borders, would collapse of its own accord.

History proved him right.

But that was then and this is now. Containment (which was also our policy toward President Saddam Hussein of Iraq during the Clinton years) fell into disfavor in the run-up to the Iraq war, when the Bush administration denounced it as inadequate to meet the threats of the post-9/11 world. If Al Qaeda is attacking and nuclear terrorists are roaming the globe and rogue governments are providing them with weapons, the administration argued, only radical measures — preemptive war and forcible regime change — can protect us.

This was the modern equivalent of the "rollback" policy (to push the Soviets out of Eastern Europe) proposed by John Foster Dulles and Dwight Eisenhower in the 1952 election campaign (but abandoned as impracticable when they came into office the following year).

So what's the truth? Is containment in fact obsolete, as the Bush administration would have it? Numerous parallels suggest that it is not.

After World War II, for instance, Kennan knew that national security would have to be managed with scarce resources as troops were demobilized and military budgets cut. Trying to dominate the world would be impossibly expensive. It made more sense, Kennan thought, to work for a world that no one could dominate. That's why he welcomed the rise of Titoism as a challenge to Soviet hegemony, recognizing that competition within the world communist movement worked to our advantage.

This lesson is lost on the Bush administration, which had giant budget surpluses to play with just a few years ago but is now facing an Iraq war debt well in excess of a trillion dollars and massive budget deficits as far as the eye can see.

Instead of following the Kennan model and pitting our adversaries against one another, the administration encourages them to make common cause at every turn. The "axis of evil" speech in the 2002 State of the Union address is a stunning example. The senseless alienation of Iran when the moderates had the upper hand there and were cooperating in Afghanistan made no sense for the United States.

Kennan believed that the way to win hearts and minds was by demonstrating the superiority of democratic capitalism on the ground. Hence his support for the Marshall Plan to consolidate democratic success in Europe as fast as possible.

This too is medicine for our time because Islamic fundamentalism shares with communism the lack of a viable political economy. Where fundamentalist movements have come to power in Afghanistan and Iran, the results have been disastrous.

DOJ_NMG_0136750

Islamic fundamentalism poses no competitive threat to democratic capitalism. That's why so much of the population of Iran (as distinct from the country's leadership) is strongly pro-Western in values and orientation.

Kennan was convinced that arguing with the Soviets was a waste of time. The United States should focus, he believed, on what our enemies did rather than what they said, assuming they would act in response to their interests, not to our arguments. And it works.

*

THINK OF LIBYA, where Moammar Kadafi responded to the incentives (and disincentives) of containment despite his anti-Western invective. In the late 1990s, containment (including economic sanctions) led him to stop sponsoring terrorism, turn over the Lockerbie bombers for trial and pay compensation to British and French victims of Libyan-sponsored terrorism.

Instead of Iraq being the model for Iran, Libya should be. But allies of the administration see it differently and are pushing the modern equivalent of rollback, suggesting that we should attack Iran to stop its nuclear weapons program.

True, in some respects, Kennan's doctrine needs to be modified for a world that is no longer bipolar, in which there may be multiple adversaries operating in different places. This requires the creation of regional security alliances. Kennan opposed the creation of NATO on the grounds that it would militarize the conflict with the Soviets unnecessarily. But, as Col. Joseph Nunez of the U.S. Army War College has argued, we now need NATO-like organizations on every continent to contain terrorist groups and sectarian conflicts in failed states.

Kennan also had little time for international organizations such as the U.N., believing that they would be swept aside in any real conflict between the U.S. and the Soviet Union. But in the globalized world of the 21st century, such international organizations are essential for peacekeeping, international law enforcement and legitimization of intervention when containment requires it.

It is ironic that the two areas in which Kennan's views are most outdated and wrongheaded — working with regional allies and international institutions — are the two areas in which the Bush administration follows his lead.

Kennan died two years ago at 101. But his doctrine of containment should not be buried along with him.

Containment is not obsolete. The Bush doctrine is.

IAN SHAPIRO is a professor of political science and director of the MacMillan Center for International and Area Studies at Yale University.

DOJ_NMG_0136751

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, February 26, 2007 7:58 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	FW: Attorney General's News Briefing for Saturday, February 24, 2007
Attachments:	agnb070224.pdf; agnb070224.doc

From: Bulletin News Network [mailto:Justice-Editors@BulletinNews.com]
Sent: Monday, February 26, 2007 7:45 AM
To: Ames, Andrew; Schwartz, Arthur; Miller, Asa G; Meadows, Bessie L; Gordon, Beth; Roehrkasse, Brian; Sellmyer, Charlotte; Magnuson, Cynthia; Talamona, Gina; Schreiber, Jayne; Block, Jonathan; Smith, Kimberly A; Sampson, Kyle; Williams, Linda Fitzgerald; Friedrich, Matthew (OAG); Beck, Michael (OAG); Sours, Raquel; Walker, Shelia M; Scolinos, Tasia; Washington, Tracy T
Cc: cgilmore@bulletinnews.com; jhertsch@bulletinnews.com; jmcintyre@bulletinnews.com; mgabor@bulletinnews.com; swalker@bulletinnews.com
Subject: Attorney General's News Briefing for Saturday, February 24, 2007

Saturday's Attorney General's News Briefing is attached.

Website: You can also read today's briefing, including searchable archive of past editions, at http://www.BulletinNews.com/justice.

Full-text Links: Clicking the hypertext links in our write-ups will take you to the newspapers' original full-text articles.

Interactive Table of Contents: Clicking a page number on the table of contents page will take you directly to that story.

Contractual Obligations and Copyright: This copyrighted material is for the internal use of US Department of Justice employees only and, by contract, may not be redistributed without BulletinNews' express written consent.

Contact Information: Please contact us any time at 703-749-0040 or Justice-Editors@BulletinNews.com. Use of this email address will automatically result in your message being delivered to everyone involved with your service, including senior management. Thank you.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Canadian Court Rules Against Indefinite Detention Of Terrorism Suspects 2
Schoomaker Plays Down Value Of Catching Bin Laden 3
Padilla Co-Defendants Seek Separate Trial 3
Judge Orders Psychological Evaluation Of Illinois Terror Suspect 3

Homeland Response:

Minnesota Man Sentenced To 10 Years For Courthouse Bomb Plot 3
FBI Investigating Mayo Clinic Scientist Over Potassium Cyanide Purchase 3
TSA Unveils New Body Scanning Machine 4

War News:

Democratic Efforts To Rewrite War Authorization Cast As Certain To Fail 4
Gates Calls Walter Reed Conditions "Unacceptable." 5
Arrest Of Shiite Politician's Son By US Troops Stirs Uproar 6
US Disappointed In Lack Of Iraqi Progress In Integrating Baathists 7
Bachmann Backs Down From Comments About Iranian Partition Plan For Iraq 7
Americans Underestimate Iraqi Death Toll 7
Civilian Staffing Shortages Said To Hinder Iraqi Reconstruction 7
Active Troops Who Oppose War Profiled 7
Watada Is Charged Again 7
WSJournal Lauds Prince Harry's Deployment 8
More UK Troops Headed To Afghanistan 8

DOJ:

Eighth US Attorney Announces Resignation 8

Corporate Scandals:

DOJ Launches Probe Of KB Homes Stock Option Grants 8
SEC Probing Citigroup Associates Deal 9

Criminal Law:

Pennsylvania Murder Suspect Seeks To Avoid Death Penalty. 9
FBI Releases Sketch Of West Virginia Child Rape Suspect 10
Former Alabama Mayor Sentenced To 10 Years In Prison 10
Florida Lawyer Convicted Of Obstruction In Keys Bribery Probe 10
Gunman Who Abducted Florida Boy Still At Large 10
Four Florida Cops Caught In FBI Mob Sting 10
Veteran FBI Analyst Sentenced To Seven Years For Sex With Child 11

Civil Rights:

Some Christian Groups Critical Of DOJ Religious Freedom Initiative 11
FBI Could Reopen Dozens Of Civil Rights Cold Cases 12
Judge Lifts Federal Supervision Of Little Rock Schools 12
Rhode Island AG Says Sister's Union Did Not Influence Gay Marriage Ruling 13
NYTimes Applauds New Jersey Court's Decision On Gay Students 13

Antitrust:

KKR, TPG Close In On Mammoth Deal For Texas Power Company 13
FCC Expected To Hit Univision With Record Fine 15
VMware Goes Up Against Microsoft 15
NYTimes Urges Caution In Review Of Satellite Radio Merger 16
Experts Say Music Consumers Will Not Be Immediately Affected By MP3 Patent Ruling 16

Environment:

Bush Touts Alternative Fuel Vehicles 17
BP Settles Two Suits Over 2005 Refinery Blast 17

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
Location Of Suspected Mexican Drug Kingpin's Arrest At Center Of Legal Dispute 17
ATF Says Homemade Pipe Bombs Often Lethal 18

Immigration:
Decision To Allow Mexican Trucks On US Roads Meets Opposition 18

Tax:
IRS Urged To Pursue eBay Sellers 19

Congress-Administration:
Administration's Proposed Medicaid Cuts Draw Governors' Criticism 19
Cheney Refuses To Retract Criticism Of Pelosi's Stance On Iraq 20
Committee Chairmen Featured In Democrats' Fundraising Blitz 20
Travelers' Advocates Skeptical Of Proposed Federal "Bill Of Rights" Legislation 20
NYTimes Seconds Justice Kennedy On Higher Judiciary Salaries 20

Other News:
Stocks Close Week On "Down Note." 20
Several Governors Proposing Large Spending Hikes 21
No Voting Machine Errors Found In FL13 Audit 21
Citing Money, Vilsack Quits Presidential Race 21
Giuliani, McCain Both Lead Clinton In Rasmussen Matchups 22
With Spat With Clinton Still Fresh, Obama Campaigns In Texas 23
Clinton Says Husband Would Have Diplomatic Role Under Her Administration 23
South Carolina Democratic Official To Run Richardson State Campaign 24
Biden Says Iraq Issue, First Four States Key To His Chances 24
Gore Oscar Win Could Revive Presidential Campaign Talk .. 24
Leading GOP Presidential Contenders Grapple With Abortion Issue 24
McCain Suggests His Iraq Stance Could End His Political Career 24
Nevada GOP Decides Against Early Caucus 25
Napolitano Says Democratic Nominee Will Be Competitive In Arizona 25
Candidates Begin "Quadrennial Groveling" To Early State Opinion Leaders 25
Schwarzenegger Will Not Rule Out Senate Run, Will Back GOP Presidential Nominee 25
Research On Adult Stem Cells Comes Into Question 26
In Australia, Cheney Reiterates Stance On China, North Korea, Iran 26
US, Allies To Push For New UN Sanctions Against Iran 26
El-Baradei Says North Korea Wants Renewed Nuclear Inspections 27
Pakistan Says Waziristan Al Qaeda Team Killed US Diplomat 27
Pakistan Tests Nuclear-Capable Missile 28
Turkey Charges Kurdish Politician With "Inciting Hatred." 28
US, Russia Not Among Cluster Bomb Ban Signatories 28
UK Interested In Hosting US Missile Defense System 28
Prodi Lines Up Support Ahead Of Likely Return To Premiership 28
Chavez Conducts "Frenetic" Regional Diplomacy To Buttress Standing 29
Hong Kong's Tsang Said To "Juggle" Roles 29

The Big Picture
Headlines From Today's Front Pages 29

Washington's Schedule
Today's Events In Washington 30

TERRORISM NEWS:

Canadian Court Rules Against Indefinite Detention Of Terrorism Suspects. The New York Times (2/24, A1, Austen, 1.16M) reports, "Canada's highest court on Friday unanimously struck down a law that allows the Canadian government to detain foreign-born terrorism suspects indefinitely using secret evidence and without charges while their deportations are being reviewed. … The three men who brought the case are likely to remain jailed or under strict parole because the court suspended its decision for a year to allow Parliament to introduce a law consistent with the ruling. The AP (2/23, Duff-Brown) reports, "The court said the men and their lawyers should have a right to respond to the evidence used against them by intelligence agents and noted that a law in Britain allows special advocates to review sensitive intelligence material."

DOJ_NMG_0136754

The Washington Post (2/24, A10, Struck, 690K) reports, "Supporters of the men hailed the ruling as a victory for civil rights but acknowledged that it did not entirely sweep away the procedures for holding suspects without trial that critics here have called 'Canada's Guantanamo North.' … Stockwell Day, the government's minister of public safety, said in Ottawa that 'in general, the Supreme Court upheld the security certificates. We will look at the changes the court said are necessary.'"

Schoomaker Plays Down Value Of Catching Bin Laden. The Washington Post (2/24, A8, 690K) reports, "The Army's highest-ranking officer said Friday that he was unsure whether the U.S. military would capture or kill Osama bin Laden, adding, 'I don't know that it's all that important, frankly.'" Outgoing Army Chief of Staff Peter Schoomaker "pointed to the capture of Saddam Hussein, the killings of his sons, Uday and Qusay, and the killing of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi as evidence that the capture or death of al-Qaeda's leader would have little effect on threats to the United States." While President Bush had "reaffirmed the goal [of catching bin Laden] last September in a prime-time speech ... Schoomaker's remarks echoed comments last year by Vice President Cheney, who seemed to play down the value of capturing or killing bin Laden."

Padilla Co-Defendants Seek Separate Trial. The New York Times (2/24, A13, Sontag, 1.16M) reports, "As a competency hearing for Jose Padilla gets under way in federal court…his co-defendants in a terrorism conspiracy case are seeking separate trials because of what they fear is the taint of his notoriety as the accused 'dirty bomber.'" Padilla "was never charged with the plot to use a radiological dirty bomb that senior administration officials initially accused him of hatching. But Adham Amin Hassoun and Kifah Wael Jayyousi, Mr. Padilla's co-defendants, say 'spill-over prejudice' would be inevitable. They have filed separate motions to sever their cases from Mr. Padilla's, the latest in a series of challenges that are complicating the government's efforts to prosecute the case."

Judge Orders Psychological Evaluation Of Illinois Terror Suspect. The Rockford Register Star (2/24, Wiser) reported, "A 22-year-old Genoa man whom authorities accuse of plotting to kill holiday shoppers with hand grenades will have to undergo psychological evaluation before the case against him proceeds. U.S. District Judge David H. Coar ordered the evaluation of Derrick Shareef during a court hearing Friday in the Dirksen federal courthouse. Shareef's attorney, Michael Mann of Maywood, requested the evaluation." The Register Star noted, "Authorities said Shareef revealed his plans to an informant who was working with the Federal Bureau of Investigation's Joint-Terrorism Task Force." The AP (2/24, Robinson) added, "Assistant U.S. Attorney Jake Ryan did not object to the examination. Coar said the competency examination should be performed within 30 days and set April 6 for a hearing on the results."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Minnesota Man Sentenced To 10 Years For Courthouse Bomb Plot. The St. Paul Pioneer Press (2/24, Gurnon) reported, "A Kenyon, Minn., man who threatened to blow up the Rice County Courthouse was sentenced in federal court in Minneapolis on Thursday to 10 years in prison." Allan Talmage Weatherford "pleaded guilty in September to possession of a destructive device. When officials searched Weatherford's 160-acre farm in 2005 and 2006, they found nearly 50 firearms, including a .50-caliber military sniping rifle, as well as an explosive device and two propane tanks filled with a mixture of fertilizer and petroleum — the same combination used in the Oklahoma City bombing." The Pioneer Press added, "He planned to target the courthouse and the county law enforcement center, officials said."

FBI Investigating Mayo Clinic Scientist Over Potassium Cyanide Purchase. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (2/24, Browning) reported, "A research scientist and associate professor of medicine at the Mayo Clinic in Rochester is under investigation by the FBI for purchasing potassium cyanide for use as 'a chemical weapon' in connection with a domestic dispute, according to a federal search warrant unsealed this week in St. Paul." Sreekumar Raghavakaimal is charged "with felony terroristic threats, felony false imprisonment, gross misdemeanor interference with a 911 emergency call, and misdemeanor domestic assault, according to Julie Germann, the prosecutor in the case." The Star Tribune notes that "Raghavakaimal's estranged wife said they had argued over a ring he wanted returned."

DOJ_NMG_0136755

TSA Unveils New Body Scanning Machine. The New York Times (2/24, A1, Giblin, Lipton, 1.16M) reports, "X-ray vision has come to the airport checkpoint" in Phoenix "courtesy of federal aviation security officials who have installed a new device that peeks underneath passengers' clothing to search for guns, bombs or liquid explosives. The new body scanning machine…will screen only volunteers, at least initially. Transportation Security Administration officials want to make sure the machine is reliable and fast enough to replace the traditional pat-down — and that it does not provoke too many protests. Security officials examining the head-to-toe images work in a closed booth, hidden from public view, agency officials said. Special 'privacy' software intentionally blurs the image, creating an outline of a body that is clear enough to see a collarbone, bellybutton or weapon, but flattens details of revealing contours."

ABC World News (2/23, story 7, 2:00, Nauert, 8.78M) ran a report on the "controversial x-ray scanner that peers right through a person's clothing," demonstrating its use and the images produced. Nauert said TSA "plans to roll out the new x-ray at Los Angeles and New York's JFK airports. It that goes well, the Backscatter may be headed to airports across America."

WAR NEWS:

Democratic Efforts To Rewrite War Authorization Cast As Certain To Fail. As Senate Democrats led by Sen. Joseph Biden push a plan to rewrite the 2002 congressional authorization for the use of force in Iraq, Republicans warn that the proposed changes would put heavy demands on US forces in the field. Reports cast the measure as dead on arrival, unlikely to get the 60 votes needed to break a certain filibuster, and sure to be vetoed by President Bush even if it could. While CBS led with the story and ABC and NBC also ran reports near the top of their newscasts, only the Washington Times among major newspapers puts it on the front page.

The CBS Evening News (2/23, lead story, 2:15, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported Democrats "are trying a new strategy in their battle with President Bush over the war in Iraq. After failing to push through a non-binding resolution opposing the war, Senate Democrats are now out to force the President to change the way the war is being fought." CBS (Axelrod): "Democrats looking for a politically effective way to oppose the war think they've found a winner: rewriting the four-year-old resolution that gave President Bush the power to put troops in Iraq in the first place. The idea started with Sen. Joe Biden." Biden: "That mission is finished, done. There were no weapons, Saddam's gone, they are in compliance." Axelrod: "Democrats want a narrower mission: denying terrorists a safe haven in Iraq, and training Iraqi troops to secure their own country. Fewer U.S. troops would be needed, and the drawdown could start early next year. Lee Hamilton, who co-chaired the Iraq Study Group, says this is the Democrats' best chance to oppose the war but avoid divisive arguments on supporting the troops."

NBC Nightly News (2/23, story 2, 1:30, Gregory, 9.87M) called it "kind of do-over, a rewrite of the resolution they approved in 2002." But most Democrats "appear unwilling to cut off war funding as the President requests another $100 billion for Iraq and Afghanistan." Today the White House asserted that though the war has changed, the President has the sole authority to set the strategy." NBC's Tim Russert said, "The Democratic base is strongly against this war. They want something other than a non-binding resolution. They want action. ... The problem: Republicans will filibuster and the Democrats do not have the 60 votes to break that filibuster." And on ABC World News (2/23, story 3, Gibson, 8.78M), George Stephanopoulos said, "Even if they had the votes for this, there is no wait the President would sign it."

The AP (2/23, Loven) reports Senate Democrats said their "next challenge to President Bush's Iraq war policy would require the gradual withdrawal of U.S. combat troops beginning within 120 days. The draft legislation also declares the war 'requires principally a political solution' rather than a military one." But the "odds against it ever becoming law are high, and the White House and Senate Republicans were quick to denounce it."

The New York Times (2/24, A6, Stolberg, Broder, 1.16M) reports, "Some Democrats acknowledge that they are in a sticky situation as they try to map out a strategy that will appease the antiwar left, which is pushing for conditions on war financing, without alienating moderate Democrats and Republicans who fear being painted as unsupportive of the troops. ... As they search for consensus, Democrats must also worry about a wild card in the debate" in the form of Independent Democrat Joseph Lieberman, "a strong supporter of the war who has hinted that he might become a Republican if Democrats go too far in trying to rein in Mr. Bush."

DOJ_NMG_0136756

The Washington Times (2/24, Ward, Dinan, 88K) says on its front page that Republicans "rejected the Democrats' plan to withdraw Congress' 2002 vote to invade Iraq." The Washington Post (2/24, A4, Murray, 690K) reports Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell "warned yesterday that a new Democratic effort to repeal the 2002 Iraq war resolution would meet the same fate as two previous efforts to limit President Bush's authority: blocked by procedural obstacles, unless Democrats relent to GOP terms. ... He warned that Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, the U.S. military commander in Iraq, would 'have to surround himself with lawyers' to comply with the new resolution that senior Democrats are drafting."

Biden Says Bush "Misusing" Authority Under 2002 Authorization. Biden said on CNN's The Situation Room (2/23, Blitzer), "The President's authority, the way he is using it, he's misusing it. The rationale for him being in Iraq no longer exists. We went there, gave him authority to take out weapons of mass destruction, which never existed; take down Saddam, who is dead' and force compliance with the UN resolutions that are already enforced. … We've got to redefine the mission. It's a process. We got to bang it away. Carl Levin and I are working hard with our leadership to try to make this case. We may not get it initially, but we will eventually." Blitzer: "Have you done any check to see if there is an historic precedent whereby the Congress has authorized the president to use force in one specific engagement and then withdrawn that authorization?" Biden: "To the best of my knowledge, there hasn't been one, but there has never been a president as irresponsible in the use of that force as this president has been. So this is a new precedent."

On MSNBC's Hardball (2/23, Matthews), Biden said, "What I propose and Carl Levin is joining me, or I am joining him, is a resolution that repeals the authority he was given, what authority he was he given to deal with weapons of mass destruction, take down Saddam Hussein if need be, and force compliance with UN resolutions that Saddam Hussein was violating. All three of those goals are met and now the President is plunging us further into a civil war where there is self-sustaining sectarian violence. And he is taking us down a very, very dangerous path."

Gates Calls Walter Reed Conditions "Unacceptable." NBC Nightly News (2/23, lead story, 3:00, Yang, 9.87M) reported, "Today the very top of the military's chain of command got involved in dealing with the disturbing treatment of outpatients here at Walter Reed Army Medical Center." Defense Secretary Robert Gates "called it unacceptable treatment for those who've given so much for their country." Gates: "They should not have to recuperate in substandard housing, nor should they be expected to tackle mountains of paperwork." Yang: "At Walter Reed, it's been…a frantic mission of damage control. … But not everyone's on the same page. Yesterday, the Army's surgeon general, a former Walter Reed commander, said the news coverage has been unfair." The New York Times (2/24, A10, Cloud, 1.16M) says "the Post reports prompted several days of damage control by Army and Pentagon officials that have veered between acknowledging the situation and playing it down."

ABC World News (2/23, story 5, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported Gates "visited Walter Reed Medical center to see for himself the conditions there. He announced the formation of a review board that would report back in 45 days. ... He called the situation unacceptable." The CBS Evening News (2/23, story 3, :20, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported Gates "went there today following reports of substandard living conditions, including mold and roaches. Gates said hospital officials will be held accountable for the, quote, unacceptable conditions."

On its front page, the Washington Post (2/24, A1, Vogel, 690K) reports Gates "also warned that senior military leaders could be disciplined based on the findings of the review group. ... The Senate Armed Services Committee has tentatively scheduled hearings on the facility for March 6." The Los Angeles Times (2/24, Barnes, 850K) reports, "The review ordered by Gates will focus on rehabilitative care and administrative procedures at Walter Reed and the National Naval Medical Center." Defense officials "have said that there are no allegations of systemic problems at Bethesda or other military hospitals, but Gates said the commission would be able to examine all military hospitals." The AP (2/23) reports that despite Gates's promise to hold officials "accountable," "no one in the Army chain of command has so far offered to resign."

Army Attempted "Preemptive" Briefing Before WPost Expose. In a critical piece, Washington Post (2/24, 690K) columnist Howard Kurtz reports differences of opinion between the Army and the press: "The Post last week gave the Army six days to respond to the paper's investigation ... The Army's public affairs office used the time to summon journalists from other news organizations to a briefing at which Walter Reed's commander responded to the findings -- in an article that had not yet been published." Los Angeles Times reporter Peter Spiegel said, "It made us feel very uncomfortable that we were being set up to be the Army's public affairs arm." Post reporter Dana Priest complained about the Army's behavior, "Do you think I'm going to be willing next time to give you that much time to respond, if you're going to turn around and tell my competitors?"

DOJ_NMG_0136757

WPost Says DOD "Responding Quickly" To Many Problems. The Washington Post (2/24, 690K) editorializes, "After a week of terrible publicity, the Defense Department seems to be responding quickly to many of the problems The Post found in a four-month investigation at Walter Reed Army Medical Center. But so far, the most disturbing problem uncovered in The Post's series is getting the least public acknowledgment from generals and journalists alike. ... Post reporters found that the stresses on outpatients at Walter Reed included not only their physical recovery, dank rooms or long waits but also the difficulty they have in getting fair disability compensation. … Veterans too seriously wounded to return to active duty should get the benefits they deserve without having to beg for them."

Arrest Of Shiite Politician's Son By US Troops Stirs Uproar. ABC World News (2/23, story 4, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "An incident in Iraq is threatening to complicate U.S./-Iraqi relations. The Bush Administration has gone to great lengths courting one of Iraq's most powerful Shiite leaders, but today US troops arrested his son and held him for 11 hours after he entered Iraq from Iran. The US ambassador was very apologetic."

The New York Times (2/24, A1, Oppel, 1.16M) reports, "American troops seized and then released the eldest son of Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, perhaps the most powerful Shiite political leader in Iraq, after he crossed the border from Iran into Iraq on Friday morning. ... Allies of the Hakim family denounced the detention as a serious insult, and a senior adviser to the family asserted that American forces also had assaulted several guards. The Hakims control the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, the backbone of the Shiite political alliance that has dominated politics during the occupation."

The Los Angeles Times (2/24, Berthelsen, 850K) reports Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad "quickly apologized for the incident." Hakim "complained of being treated roughly at the hands of the soldiers, including being blindfolded as he was transported to a military base and having his underwear searched once he arrived there." The Times adds, "News of Hakim's arrest drew widespread attention Friday, a day of relative calm in Iraq. Police patrols discovered the bodies of five men shot to death around the capital, a daily toll far lower than usual."

The Washington Post (2/24, A12, Londono, 690K) reports the senior Hakim, "who met with President Bush during a visit to Washington in December, spent many years in exile in Iran and has close ties to that country." The Washington Times/AP (2/24, Murphy) reports, "Even though the U.S. ambassador issued a rapid apology, the decision to hold Amar al-Hakim risks touching off a backlash from Shi'ite leaders at a time when their cooperation is needed most."

Crackdown Said To Be "Curbing Violence." The Financial Times (2/24, Negus) reports, "US officials claim their forces are slowly expanding their presence in the capital and curbing the sectarian violence that left tens of thousands dead last year. Many Iraqis, however, say that fighting has continued unabated, while a high-profile rape case linked to the crackdown has heightened tensions between the Sunni and Shia communities. ... Iraqi officials claim the sectarian death toll has already fallen as a result of the increased troop presence ... Maj Gen Caldwell and other commanders, however, have cautioned that it is too early to call the operation a success, and that the true impact will not be seen for months."

Car Bombing Kills Four In Baghdad. The AP (2/24) reports, "Car bomb blasts hit parts of Baghdad on Saturday in attacks apparently targeting security forces involved in an ongoing campaign to restore order in the capital. At least four civilians were killed and nearly 10 injured, police said."

Stryker Team Called Crucial To Security Plan. The Los Angeles Times (2/24, Susman, 850K) reports about Army Spc. Aurelio Cazares and his Stryker unit, "There aren't many things that worry him as he steers the 22-ton troop carrier ... through Baghdad's streets. ... Nothing, though, can guarantee protection from some of the armor-piercing explosives plaguing U.S. forces in Iraq. Since August, three men from Cazares' 3rd Stryker Brigade Combat Team, from the Army's 2nd Infantry Division, have died in such attacks. ... Since U.S. and Iraqi forces put a new Baghdad security plan into high gear last week, the Stryker team has been at the forefront of sweeps and patrols, some lasting 20 hours at a stretch. For the soldiers of the brigade, it has meant little sleep and the majority of their waking hours inside the dark, cramped interiors of the Strykers, whose bulk, speed and armor have made them the vehicle of choice in Baghdad's riskiest operations." The Times admiringly describes the vehicle's assets: "The Strykers reach a speed of 65 mph and are relatively quiet as they trundle through the streets, giving them a stealth quality other troop carriers lack. In addition to their armor, they are surrounded by a cage-like shield designed to repel rocket-propelled grenades."

DOJ_NMG_0136758

US Disappointed In Lack Of Iraqi Progress In Integrating Baathists. The Los Angeles Times (2/24, Richter, 850K) reports on its front page, "Serious new divisions have emerged between the Bush administration and its Iraqi allies over the Baghdad government's refusal to enact a reform that the White House considers crucial to its new strategy for bringing the country's violence under control. ... legislation that would ease rules barring former members of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party from government service has been blocked by the country's Shiite-dominated parliament." US officials had "repeatedly expressed confidence that Nouri al-Maliki, the prime minister, would work for passage of 'de-Baathification' reform. However, they now have begun to express disappointment at the Iraqi stalemate. ... The dimming prospects for reform hold troubling implications for the administration's new strategy on Iraq, which relies heavily on political reconciliation between Sunnis Arabs and Shiites as a way to stem the sectarian violence."

Bachmann Backs Down From Comments About Iranian Partition Plan For Iraq. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (2/24, Black, 395K) reports Rep. Michele Bachmann "claimed two weeks ago to know of an Iranian plan for the partition of Iraq in which Iran would control half the country and set it up as 'a terrorist safe haven zone' and a staging area for attacks around the Middle East and on the United States. The existence of such a plan has not been suggested publicly by the Bush administration or other officials." Bachmann "retracted the first [statement by her] in several important respects."

Americans Underestimate Iraqi Death Toll. The AP (2/23, Benac) reports that polled Americans "woefully underestimate the number of Iraqi civilians who have been killed." While "Seventeen percent in the poll know someone [from the US] who has been killed or wounded in Iraq," "The number of Iraqis killed, however, is much harder to pin down, and that uncertainty is perhaps reflected in Americans' tendency to lowball the Iraqi death toll by tens of thousands. ... The U.N. Assistance Mission for Iraq reports more than 34,000 deaths in 2006 alone. Among those polled for the AP survey, however, the median estimate of Iraqi deaths was 9,890."

Civilian Staffing Shortages Said To Hinder Iraqi Reconstruction. In a story on its front page today, the Washington Post (2/24, Chandrasekaran, 690K) details efforts to fully staff Provincial Reconstruction Teams (PRTs) and other civilian slots in Iraq. "Almost four years after the United States set about trying to rebuild Iraq, the job remains overwhelmingly unfinished." PRTs like those in Diyala "are often understaffed and underqualified -- and almost unable to work outside the military outposts where they are hunkered down for security reasons. Today, there are just 10 of the 30-person teams operating in all of Iraq." President Bush's "new plan" to double the number of PRTs "is running into what [some] officials familiar with their work described as the problems that have plagued the U.S. government effort from the start: Turf wars between federal agencies. Outright refusal to fill certain vital posts by some departments. A State Department in charge of the teams that just doesn't have any agronomists, engineers, police officers or technicians of its own to send to Iraq."

Active Troops Who Oppose War Profiled. The CBS Evening News (2/23, story 2, 2:20, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "There is new opposition to the war tonight, and it comes from the very Americans fighting it, men and women in uniform. Hundreds of them are very publicly asking Congress to stop it." CBS (Logan): "The fight in hostile Anbar province has been more deadly for U.S. forces than anywhere else in Iraq. ... That's part of the reason over 1,000 servicemen and women have done something normally unthinkable for the military -- protest a war they're in the middle of fighting. Their interviews will be on '60 Minutes' this Sunday. ... They've all sent a petition called Appeal for Redress to their individual members of Congress, letting them know that staying in Iraq will not work, and it's time for U.S. troops to come home."

Watada Is Charged Again. The AP (2/24, Johnson) reports the Army refiled charges Friday against First Lt. Ehren Watada, "who refused to serve in Iraq, about two weeks after his first court-martial was declared a mistrial." Watada's attorney "said he would seek to have the charges dismissed as a violation of the Constitution's protection against double jeopardy." The Los Angeles Times (2/24, 850K) carries an abbreviated version of this article.

DOJ_NMG_0136759

WSJournal Lauds Prince Harry's Deployment. The Wall Street Journal (2/24, 2.04M) editorializes that while "Cornet Harry Wales is probably not a latter-day King Henry V," it is "hard not to be struck by the sight of a European royal who wants something more from life than to appear regularly in the pages of Hello! ... The Prince's decision is all the more courageous given that he will surely become a prime target for jihadists seeking a trophy kill. No less admirable is the Prince bucking the antiwar tide of British public opinion."

More UK Troops Headed To Afghanistan. The Washington Times/AP (2/24, French) reports, "Britain said yesterday it would send additional troops to southern Afghanistan in response to NATO's call to bolster forces in the region, days after the country said it plans to withdraw 1,600 troops from Iraq in coming months. ... The Defense Ministry refused to confirm reports in the British press that an additional 1,000 troops were to be sent. ... In particular, the reluctance of France, Spain, Italy, Germany and Turkey to provide more combat troops has caused frustration among nations on the front lines." Meanwhile, Taliban commander "Mullah Dadullah said the extra weapons the Taliban were being supplied -- he did not say from where -- included the ability to bring down the NATO and U.S. helicopters crucial to their operations in this rugged, mountainous country."

New Al Qaeda Video Purports To Show Attack. The AP (2/23) reports, "Al Qaeda posted a 56-second video Friday of rockets being fired at what it claimed was a U.S. military base in Afghanistan. The tape appeared to be the latest in a series of videos that the terror network has released to convey that its insurgents are faring well in the Afghan war. ... Its authenticity could not be independently confirmed."

Afghans Perceive Decline Since 2005. The Washington Post (2/24, A11, Witte, 690K) reports in a pessimistic article, "Conditions in Afghanistan have deteriorated markedly since 2005, with rising violence, government corruption and misguided U.S. efforts contributing to growing unease among the population, according to a report released yesterday based in part on 1,000 interviews with ordinary Afghans. Although there were bright spots -- a better overall economy and more rights for women -- the report's authors found diminishing security as the Taliban steps up its attacks, a discredited justice system and a severe lack of basic services such as electricity." The report by CSIS and USAID "found that Afghans tend to be more negative in their outlook than official statistics or media accounts would suggest."

DOJ:

Eighth US Attorney Announces Resignation. The Washington Post (2/24, A2, Eggen, 690K) reports Margaret Chiara, the U.S. attorney in Grand Rapids, Michigan, "announced her resignation yesterday, the latest in a wave of forced departures of federal prosecutors who have clashed with the Justice Department over the death penalty and other issues. ... Sources familiar with the case confirmed that she was among a larger group of prosecutors who were first asked to resign Dec. 7." The Post notes that the "firings" have been "criticized by lawmakers in both parties and have prompted proposals in Congress to restrict the ability of Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to appoint interim prosecutors indefinitely. The New York Times (2/24, A10, Johnston, 1.16M) reports Chiara is a Republican who "took office in 2001 after twice being elected a county prosecutor. She had also served as policy director of the Michigan Supreme Court."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

DOJ Launches Probe Of KB Homes Stock Option Grants. The Wall Street Journal (2/24, A3, Forelle, Corkery) reports, "Federal prosecutors in Los Angeles are scrutinizing stock-options backdating at home builder KB Home, according to people familiar with the matter. These people say prosecutors appear interested in the conduct of former Chief Executive Officer Bruce Karatz and former human-resources chief Gary Ray." The Journal continues, "A lawyer for Mr. Ray, Mark Beck, says he is 'attempting to persuade [the prosecutor] that Gary Ray did not engage in any wrongdoing and certainly no conscious wrongdoing.'" The Journal adds, "It isn't clear precisely what the prosecutors are examining. Last year the Los Angeles-based company said an internal investigation found that Mr. Karatz had backdated his own option grants to increase his pay. He agreed to leave the company and forfeit about $13 million in gains from the backdating, becoming one of the highest-profile and best-paid CEOs to be forced out in the options scandal. Mr. Ray, whom KB Home has said participated in the backdating with Mr. Karatz, also left. … Company spokeswoman Caroline Shaw said the Department of Justice is looking into past stock-option grant practices at KB Home, but has told the company itself that it is 'not a target of this investigation.' She added, 'KB Home has and intends to fully cooperate with any government agency looking into this matter.'"

DOJ_NMG_0136760

The AP (2/24) reports, "The company last month acknowledged that the Securities and Exchange Commission had launched a formal investigation into its options practices." The AP adds, "KB Home is one of at least 200 companies to disclose SEC, DOJ or internal investigations, according to an Associated Press review. … KB Home's former chief executive Bruce Karatz, along with its executive vice president and chief legal officer, were forced to step down late last year after it was disclosed that Karatz benefited from favorably dated option awards. He agreed to repay $13 million stemming from incorrect measurement dates for financial reporting of annual option grants between 1998 and 2005. … The company also has said it expects to record additional expenses of no more than $50 million and was investigating whether it needed to restate earnings for prior periods."

The New York Times (2/24, Bajaj) reports, "The inquiry appears to be in the early stages, and it may take months before prosecutors decide what, if any, charges they will bring in the case. … Still, news of interest by federal prosecutors raises the stakes for a man who was once one of the highest-profile and best-paid executives in corporate America, Bruce E. Karatz." The Times adds, "In November, KB's board forced out Mr. Karatz, who was the chairman and chief executive of the company, and Gary A. Ray, the top human resources officer, after an internal investigation concluded that eight stock-option grants since 1998 had been incorrectly dated. … A lawyer representing Mr. Ray, Mark E. Beck, confirmed that he and his client have met with prosecutors but declined to discuss the facts of the case, aside from saying that 'several million documents' would lead officials to 'conclude that he did not engage in any wrongdoing.' … KB Home said in a filing this month that the evidence it had collected suggested that after the company's board approved stock option grants, Mr. Karatz and Mr. Ray used 'hindsight' to pick dates when KB's stock closed at or near a monthly low for seven of the eight grants."

SEC Probing Citigroup Associates Deal. The Financial Times (2/24, Wighton) reports, "Citigroup is under investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission over its accounting for Associates First Capital, the finance business it bought for $31.1bn in 2000." The Times continues, "The chief US regulator is looking into the treatment of tax reserves and releases during the four years to 2004, Citigroup disclosed in a filing on Friday night. … The SEC has subpoenaed witness testimony and accounting and internal controls-related information, the company said. … The SEC is also continuing its long-running probe into Citigroup's treatment of potential Argentina-related losses in the fourth quarter of 2001." The Times adds, "The disclosure of the accouting investigation in Associates underlines the task faced by Chuck Prince, chief executive, in escaping the legacy of Citigroup's acitivities during the bull market. … Mr Prince, who succeeded Sandy Weill as chief executive in October 2003, has spent much of his time dealing with legal and regulatory problems dating back to the late 1990s. … Friday's disclosure comes as Mr Prince's leadership is under renewed fire following his sacking of Todd Thomson as head of Citigroup's wealth managment arm."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Pennsylvania Murder Suspect Seeks To Avoid Death Penalty. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (2/24, Simonich) reports, "Lawyers for murder suspect Donna Moonda today asked a judge to prohibit the federal government from pursuing the death penalty against her." The Post-Gazette continues, "Her attorneys said capital punishment is 'cruel and unusual in all cases' and should not be an option for jurors when Mrs. Moonda goes on trial in June." The Post-Gazette adds, "Today was the deadline for pretrial motions to be filed, and Mrs. Moonda's three court-appointed lawyers peppered U.S. District Judge David Dowd with three separate filings aimed at eliminating the death penalty from the case. … Federal prosecutors have until March 15 to respond. Judge Dowd would then issue his ruling." The Post-Gazette notes, "Prosecutors recommended that Mrs. Moonda, 47, of Mercer County, Pa., stand trial for her life because they say she coldly plotted the murder of her husband, Dr. Gulam Moonda. … U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales made the final decision in authorizing a capital case against Mrs. Moonda. … The U.S. government has not executed a female convict since 1953. State governments, mostly in the South, have executed 11 women since 1984."

DOJ_NMG_0136761

FBI Releases Sketch Of West Virginia Child Rape Suspect. The Wheeling (WV) Post-Intelligencer (2/24, Wells) reported, "A rendering of the man accused in the recent rape and abduction of a city girl has been released as the Federal Bureau of Investigation intensifies its efforts in the case. FBI Supervisory Senior Resident Agent Mark Wheeler on Friday said a command post has been established in the basement of the City-County Building to accommodate the 50 city, county and federal law enforcement officers investigating the Tuesday rape and abduction of a North Wheeling girl. In addition to the release of the suspect's sketch, an updated description of the suspect's vehicle also has been released. Wheeling police Lt. Gary Gaus said a number of registered sex offenders in the area already have been ruled out as suspects, but he would not comment on whether DNA evidence has been collected in the case."

Former Alabama Mayor Sentenced To 10 Years In Prison. The Mobile Press-Register (2/24, Kirby) reported, "Decrying the corrosive effect of public corruption, a federal judge in Mobile on Friday sentenced former Orange Beach Mayor Steve Russo to 10 years in prison for a wide-ranging conspiracy to enrich himself by influencing development projects. U.S. District Judge Kristi DuBose also gave former Orange Beach City Attorney Larry Sutley, 58, two years and three months for his role in the conspiracy but allowed him to remain free while he appeals the case. … 'Public corruption of this type has to be addressed or it would mean the demise of our democracy,' she said." The Press-Register noted that "Russo's 10-year sentence is among the longest in decades for a public corruption case in southern Alabama." The AP (2/24, Mitchell) added, "Russo showed no remorse during the three-hour hearing. 'I can walk out of here knowing I did the very best job for the people of Orange Beach I could do,' he told the judge." Assistant US Attorney Steven Butler said Russo did do some good things while in office. … But he said he also used his 'official power to get rich.'"

Florida Lawyer Convicted Of Obstruction In Keys Bribery Probe. The Miami Herald (2/24, Clark) reported, "James Hendrick, one of the brightest and most influential attorneys in Monroe County, was convicted Friday in federal court of obstructing justice and witness tampering in a wide-ranging, years-long Keys corruption case that might not be over. … His conviction came without the testimony of his one-time friend, former county Mayor Jack London, who died before trial. He had admitted that Hendrick helped steer a bribe to him with the help of lobbyist Randall Hilliard, known as 'the Prince of Darkness.'" The Herald noted, "The case stems from a lengthy FBI investigation that uncovered a $29,000 bribe paid in 1997 to London, Monroe County's mayor at the time. In return for the bribe, London used his influence to win zoning approval for a stalled 79-room hotel project called Hall's Resort. Hendrick received no money in the deal. By the time the FBI had evidence of the bribe, the five-year federal statute of limitations for bribery had expired."

Gunman Who Abducted Florida Boy Still At Large. The New York Times (2/24, Waddell) reports from Parrish, FL, "A 13-year-old boy was abducted at gunpoint at a school bus stop on Friday morning and was found hours later in a wooded area where he had been left bound by his captor." The Times continues, "Sheriff Charles B. Wells of Manatee County said the gunman drove the boy, Clay Moore, to a large cattle ranch about 20 miles away from his neighborhood in the quiet Kingsfield Lakes subdivision on the outskirts of Parrish, near Tampa. His abductor eventually left. About two hours later, Clay, who had been tied up, was able to escape and walk until he came across a farm worker who let him use a cellphone to call his mother. … The gunman, who was driving an old red pickup, remained at large." The Times adds, "Clay was riding a skateboard about 9 a.m. while waiting for his school bus with four other youths when the truck pulled up, and the dark-haired young man driving it ordered him inside, said one of the four, Rabah Jaffal, 14. … Three of the students ran home and called the police, who immediately began a manhunt involving the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the state police and surrounding counties' law enforcement."

Four Florida Cops Caught In FBI Mob Sting. The AP (2/24) reports from Fort Lauderdale, FL, "Four veteran police officers were accused in federal court of taking thousands of dollars to protect what they thought were mob shipments of drugs, stolen art and jewelry." The AP continues, "Three of the officers made initial court appearances Friday and were ordered released on bond. The fourth was in the process of turning himself in and would likely appear next week, federal prosecutors said. … All serve in Hollywood, just south of Fort Lauderdale." The AP adds, 'An FBI affidavit filed in federal court accused the four of taking thousands of dollars to protect a group they thought was a criminal organization based out of New York. The "mobsters" were undercover FBI agents during a two-year corruption sting. … Federal prosecutors said the operations included escorting a load of heroin from Miami Beach, providing security for an illegal poker game aboard a yacht and delivering $1 million worth of supposedly stolen diamonds to New Jersey. … Other deals involved purportedly stolen bearer bonds, watches, paintings and a tractor-trailer load of cigarettes, prosecutors said. … The four officers were charged with conspiracy. They have not entered pleas, and the case will go before a grand jury. All have been placed on leave without pay."

DOJ_NMG_0136762

Florida Police Chief Says More Officers Suspected In FBI Probe. The Miami Herald (2/24, Christensen, Wright) reported, "A two-year federal undercover probe that led to corruption charges against four Hollywood police officers was shut down prematurely after two of those officers learned they were under investigation, according to Hollywood Police Chief James Scarberry. More officers are under suspicion, Scarberry said Friday. The chief said he found out the investigation was blown Thursday -- hours before the FBI swooped in and arrested Officers Kevin Companion, Jeffry Courtney and Stephen Harrison. … 'We called the FBI immediately yesterday after we found out that Companion and Courtney were at the pension office. They both called in sick all week and were putting in their letters of resignation,' Scarberry said." The Herald noted, "During the two-year probe by the U.S. attorney and the FBI -- dubbed 'Tarnished Badge' -- undercover agents convinced the officers that they were members of a New York crime family."

The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (2/24, Haas, Blum) reported, "Federal authorities on Friday released detailed charges against four Hollywood officers in an investigation dubbed 'Operation Tarnished Badge,' accusing the four of protecting and transporting stolen diamonds, artwork, bonds and heroin for undercover FBI agents pretending to be involved in organized crime. … Companion, Courtney and Harrison appeared before U.S. Magistrate Lurana Snow in federal count in Fort Lauderdale on Friday morning. All three looked dejected. … Snow set bond at $350,000 for Companion; $375,000 for Courtney; and $300,000 for Harrison. None of them had posted bail early Friday night, detention officials said. Simcox has not yet been arrested," but the Palm Beach Post (2/24, LaForgia) noted Simcox "is making arrangements to turn himself in to federal authorities next week, his attorney said Friday. 'I believe that he should be surrendering Monday,' said Bruce Udolf, the Fort Lauderdale attorney representing Simcox.

Veteran FBI Analyst Sentenced To Seven Years For Sex With Child. The Fredericksburg Free Lance-Star (2/23, Freehling) reported, "A 17-year veteran of the FBI will serve seven years in prison for having sexual relations with a young girl in Spotsylvania County." On Thursday, former FBI intelligence anayst Anthony John Lesko "entered an Alford plea…to nine counts of felony indecent liberties upon a child. … An Alford plea means Lesko doesn't admit guilt but believes there is enough evidence for a conviction." The Free Lance-Star noted, "Lesko engaged in a sex act with a girl, 9 and 10 at the time, at least nine times in 2003-2004, according to evidence put forth by Spotsylvania Commonwealth's Attorney William Neely." Lesko told a US Navy counselor "that he was the victim of the sexual assault; he said the girl initiated the contact, according to the plea."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Some Christian Groups Critical Of DOJ Religious Freedom Initiative. UPI (2/23) reports, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' Feb. 20 announcement to Southern Baptist Convention leaders about a new Justice Department focus on religious freedom garnered some praise — and significant criticism — from other Christian leaders. Gonzales announced the launch of the department's 'First Freedom Project' in a speech during a regularly scheduled SBC Executive Committee meeting. … 'Religious freedom is a fundamental part of our nation's history and one of its core principles,' Gonzales said. The effort will include educational efforts to inform government officials, employers and everyday Americans about their religious-liberty rights under law, Associated Baptist Press reported Thursday." UPI continues, "The department simultaneously released a 43-page report touting its record, under President Bush, in defending religious freedom. Gonzales and the report implied that the Bush Justice Department's record on prosecuting religious-discrimination cases was significantly stronger than that under former President Bill Clinton. … But several in the religious-liberty community said Bush's record on the issue has been mixed, at best. Brent Walker, executive director of the Washington-based Baptist Joint Committee for Religious Liberty, said he appreciates the administration focusing on the First Amendment — but that the amendment covers two aspects of religious freedom that are inextricably linked to each other. … 'The First Amendment has two protections for religious freedom — prohibition on religious establishments and protection for free exercise of religion,' Walker said in a statement provided to Associated Baptist Press. 'The administration has often ignored the importance of the no-establishment principle by supporting attempts of governments to endorse a religious message, using tax dollars to fund pervasively religious organizations, allowing religious discrimination in hiring for federally funded projects, and going to the Supreme Court to cut back on the rights of citizens to challenge such practices.'" UPI notes, "Walker also noted that Bush's record on free-exercise protections is 'not perfect.' He pointed to a Supreme Court case last year in which the administration attempted to limit a small religious sect's ability to use hallucinogenic tea for sacramental purposes. A unanimous Supreme Court rejected the administration's position. … Americans United for Separation of Church and State went further, releasing a statement Feb. 22 saying Gonzales' announcement 'reeks of hypocrisy.' It called attention to actions detailed in the report that the Justice Department touts as religious-freedom successes — but that are actually quite controversial in the religious-liberty community."

DOJ_NMG_0136763

FBI Could Reopen Dozens Of Civil Rights Cold Cases. The AP (2/24) reports from Jackson, MS, "The FBI is considering reopening dozens of cold cases involving slayings suspected of being racially motivated in the South during the 1950s and '60s. … An announcement could come as early as Tuesday, according to a law enforcement official who spoke with the Associated Press on condition of anonymity because the plans have not yet been finalized." The AP continues, "In addition to the FBI's own investigations, the Southern Poverty Law Center submitted its own list last week of 74 potential unsolved slayings that involved white-on-black violence. … Thirty-two of the deaths happened in Mississippi. The others were in Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Tennessee, Louisiana, North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida, Kentucky and New York." The AP adds, "Mark Potok, director of the Intelligence Project for the Alabama-based Southern Poverty Law Center, said each case was researched in the late 1980s when the group was putting together a civil rights memorial. But it is unclear if each could be considered a civil rights case, he said. … 'The truth is we don't know,' said Potok, whose group investigates hate crimes. 'In each case there was some evidence to suggest that these were racial murders, but it absolutely was not proven. Had we been able to nail them down, their names would've been literally chiseled into the civil rights memorial that sits outside our building here.' … U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton in Jackson reviewed the list of Mississippi killings for the Associated Press on Friday and said based on the limited amount of information available that none would qualify for federal prosecution under civil rights statutes. But he said many could still be prosecuted on a local or state level as murders."

Under the headline "FBI Building Database On Victims Slain Amid Civil Rights-Era Violence," the Jackson Clairon-Ledger (2/24, Mitchell) reported, "The FBI's field offices already have compiled a list of 51 victims," and the Southern Poverty Law Center "has since turned over information on 74 victims to the FBI. … 'We ask that the FBI use its considerable investigatory resources to uncover more information about these cases,' Richard Cohen, president for the center, wrote the Civil Rights Unit of the Criminal Investigative Division of the FBI. "Those responsible for these forgotten deaths - those who may still be alive today, like James Ford Seale, who was recently arrested for the murders of Henry Hezekiah Dee and Charles Eddie Moore - have gone unpunished too long.'" Lampton "said last week: 'As we've shown in the past, we'll investigate any case that comes to light.'"

WGNO-TV New Orleans (2/23, 10:13 p.m. EST) reported on its broadcast that the Southern Poverty Law Center "says evidence in at least 74 unsolved murders suggests they were racial murders. The FBI has been conducting its own investigations, and Director Robert Mueller says he vows 'to pursue justice to the end.'" KHQ-TV Spokane (2/24, 9:03 a.m. EST) reported on its broadcast, "FBI Director Robert Mueller has said the bureau is aggressively seeking to solve cold civil rights cases." Mueller "vowed last month to 'pursue justice to the end.'"

Judge Lifts Federal Supervision Of Little Rock Schools. The New York Times (2/24, Barnes) reports from Little Rock, AR, "The Little Rock School District was released on Friday from federal court supervision of its desegregation efforts, almost 50 years after President Dwight D. Eisenhower dispatched federal troops to enforce an integration order that the Arkansas governor defied." The Times continues, "In a written order, Judge William R. Wilson Jr. of Federal District Court declared the district 'unitary.' That meant it had met its obligations under court-ordered remedies to address lingering questions about its commitment to equal opportunity in education." The Times adds, "Judge Wilson said the school board could 'now operate the district as it sees fit, answerable to no one' save its students, patrons and voters." The Times notes, "In 1957, Gov. Orval E. Faubus, a conservative Democrat, resisted the federal court order to desegregate Central High School by surrounding it with National Guardsmen who blocked the entry of nine black students. Eisenhower responded by federalizing the Guard troops and sending paratroopers from the 101st Airborne Division. … The black pupils were admitted to classes, with the military providing security on campus for the duration of the school year. … The confrontation was a seminal part of the civil rights movement. It was followed by decades of litigation that devoured millions of dollars in legal fees and went through several judges, dozens of school board members and more than one superintendent."

DOJ_NMG_0136764

The AP (2/24, Demillo) reports, "The 1998 desegregation plan was negotiated among the district, federal monitors and a group called the Joshua Intervenors, which represented black students. Judge Wilson noted that another nine years had passed before its conditions were satisfied. … 'LRSD's board can now operate the district as it sees fit; answerable to no one except LRSD's students and patrons and the voters who elected [the board] to office,' he wrote. 'I want to express my heartfelt best wishes as LRSD continues to operate, as our Founders intended, under control of the citizens of the City of Little Rock.' … A final sticking point among the parties had been whether the district adequately assessed black achievement in its academic programs. … Under previous orders from Judge Wilson, the Little Rock district was to evaluate its academic programs annually to determine whether test scores among black students were rising. The judge said yesterday he was now satisfied with the response, which included the board's December resolution that it would continue evaluations even if Judge Wilson released it from monitoring. … The Little Rock district is now 70 percent black; Central High School is 53 percent black."

Rhode Island AG Says Sister's Union Did Not Influence Gay Marriage Ruling. The Washington Times (2/24, Wetzstein, 88K) reports Rhode Island Attorney General Patrick Lynch "says research persuaded him to decide that Rhode Island can recognize same-sex 'marriages' from Massachusetts -- not his sister's recent same-sex union in Massachusetts." The Times notes that on Feb. 15, Lynch "attended the 'marriage' ceremony in Attleboro, Mass., of his older sister. … On Wednesday, Mr. Lynch issued a six-page opinion to the Rhode Island Board of Governors for Higher Education that said their homosexual employees who have 'married' in Massachusetts should be treated as spouses."

NYTimes Applauds New Jersey Court's Decision On Gay Students. The New York Times (2/24, A14, 1.16M) editorializes, "Like all too many school districts, Toms River, N.J., has done a poor job of protecting gay students from bullying. According to the New Jersey Supreme Court, the district punished students for being one minute late for class, but made harassing another child for being gay punishable only after a third offense. In a landmark ruling this week, the court unanimously held that public school districts like Toms River's are liable for damages if they fail to take reasonable steps to stop prolonged anti-gay harassment of a student by another student. … The decision changes the legal landscape in New Jersey, and we hope it will be the start of a new national approach to the problem."

ANTITRUST:

KKR, TPG Close In On Mammoth Deal For Texas Power Company. The Wall Street Journal (2/24, A1, Sender, Berman, Smith) reports, "Private-equity firms Texas Pacific Group and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. were close to a deal Friday night to acquire Texas utilities powerhouse TXU Corp. for about $32 billion, said people familiar with the matter, a massive buyout that would give them control of one of the nation's most successful and controversial power companies." The Journal continues, "One person close to the matter said the firms would pay about $70 a share for the big utility, about $10 a share over Friday's 4 p.m. price of $60.02 on the New York Stock Exchange. The company also had $12.38 billion in debt as of September 30." The Journal adds, "A deal could be finalized over the next few days, this person said, though it was possible it could fall apart at a late moment. … The transaction, first reported by CNBC, would be the latest massive deal engineered by private-equity firms. Enjoying record profits and a flood of cash from investors seeking ever-greater returns, the large investment firms have accounted for the majority of the biggest mergers and acquisitions in the last year. Among recent deals, Blackstone Group paid $23 billion for Equity Office Properties and assumed $16 billion of debt, while Bain Capital, KKR and Merrill Lynch & Co. paid $21 billion and assumed $11.7 billion in debt to acquire hospital operator HCA Inc. in 2006."

DOJ_NMG_0136765

The New York Times (2/24, Sorkin, Krauss) reports, "The amount of private money that is being offered is a huge financial endorsement of the company's energy strategy. TXU has irritated environmental advocates by proposing to build 11 coal-fired power plants in Texas. Despite calls for regulating greenhouse gases, TXU has been the most aggressive in the power industry in pushing coal as the answer to growing electricity demands. Nationwide, power companies are planning to build about 150 coal plants over the next several years." The Times adds, "The deal itself, if approved at a TXU board meeting tomorrow, would be a landmark. It would exceed the Blackstone Group's recent $39 billion acquisition of the office landlord Equity Office Properties, the largest buyout ever. And that would mean that Henry R. Kravis, a co-founder of Kohlberg Kravis Roberts, has managed to upstage, at least for the time being, his longtime rival in deals, Stephen A. Schwarzman, a co-founder of Blackstone. … Energy has been fairly recent territory for private equity. While energy deals accounted for 16 percent of all mergers last year, only 9 percent of those deals involved buyout firms, according to Thomson Financial. The first big foray came last year, when Kinder Morgan, the Texas pipeline giant that was created from some assets of the former Enron, was sold to a group that included Goldman Sachs, the American International Group, the Carlyle Group and Riverstone Holdings for $27.5 billion."

The Financial Times (2/24, Politi, Smith) reports, "A private equity takeover of TXU would extend a flurry of dealmaking by the world's largest buy-out groups, which have emerged as leading forces in high finance and business in recent years as they snapped up some of the biggest companies in a wide range of industries." The Times adds, "Based in Dallas, TXU is the top provider of electricity to the state of Texas, and has recently locked horns with environmentalists over plans to build 11 coal-fired power plants. … In advance of clinching a deal, KKR and TPG gained the backing of several environmental groups by agreeing to scrap plans to construct 8 of the 11 controversial plants. … The private equity buyers also pledged to support a reduction in carbon dioxide emissions to 1990 levels by 2020. … However, a private equity takeover of TXU could still face resistance if it is viewed as jeopardising the reliability of the electricity grid in Texas – or if it results in higher rates for consumer."

The Washington Post (2/24, D1, Cho, Mufson) reports, "TXU has 2.4 million electricity customers in Texas and a network of generating stations, including two nuclear-powered and nine coal-fired plants. Deregulation recently took effect in the state, and the company has divided itself into three parts -- a regulated utility, a power wholesaler and a power generation unit with 18,300 megawatts of capacity. … But the company's claim to fame recently has been a controversy over its plan to build 11 conventional coal plants. That would more than double the company's emissions of carbon dioxide, the most prevalent of greenhouse gases, at a time when Congress is looking at ways to cap greenhouse gas-emissions." The Post notes, "It is not clear how a buyout would affect those plans. Part of the attraction of TXU is its location in a fast-growing state. The new plants could take advantage of its rapidly growing energy demand. But leveraged buyout firms usually trim costs and rarely expand a company's operations. And many executives in the industry have said they never expected the company to build all those plants anyway. … The private-equity firms are expected to propose around $70 per share for TXU and assume about $12 billion of its debt, putting the total value of the transaction at $44 billion to $45 billion. … If a buyout goes through, TXU would become a private company and no longer have to reveal its financial statements publicly or comply with federal regulations such as the Sarbanes-Oxley Act. But it probably would still have to disclose some information to state and federal power regulators." The Post adds, "That change is likely to draw scrutiny from members of Congress, especially those now devising ways to cap and reduce greenhouse gases. Some lawmakers have alleged that TXU might be expanding now so that the new plants would be included in its baseline emission levels. That would be important if Congress adopted a cap-and-trade system similar to Europe's, with allocations distributed to companies based on their past emissions."

DOJ_NMG_0136766

The Los Angeles Times (2/24, Wilson) reports, "Environmental Defense and numerous other environmental groups and civic leaders have sued or otherwise protested the plants, saying they would add 78 million tons of greenhouse gases to the atmosphere annually. Texas already leads the nation in greenhouse gas emissions, widely believed to cause global warming. Smog, mercury emissions and other harmful pollutants also would be emitted. … Many private equity firms are jumping into solar, wind and other 'alternative energy' investments, as dozens of states have adopted 'renewable portfolio standards' requiring diversified energy, including so-called clean sources. Several members of Congress, including Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), have introduced or are preparing legislation that could cap greenhouse gases from coal plants and other electricity providers."

The Dallas Morning News (2/24, Souder, Yung) reports, "As for why TXU would sell, some experts said going private could allow the company to innovate without worrying about putting the share price on a roller coaster and facing the ire of Wall Street. … TXU shares rose 4 percent Friday afternoon, to close at $60.02, after news of the offer began to leak out. In after-hours trading, shares rose as high as $70. … The share price has dropped from all-time highs during the past few months as concern mounts about possible state and federal legislation that could limit the size of the company or the amount of pollution it would be allowed to emit." The News notes, "If approved, the deal would be the largest acquisition ever, reflecting the current buyout binge sweeping the country. The previous record – the $39 billion purchase of Equity Office Properties Trust by the Blackstone Group – closed earlier this month. … The buyers, KKR and Fort Worth-based Texas Pacific, have teamed up before to make millions in the Texas energy sector. They were among a group of buyout firms that earned a more than sixfold return in little more than a year by buying and then quickly selling Texas Genco, a Houston wholesale power generation company, to NRG Energy Inc."

FCC Expected To Hit Univision With Record Fine. The New York Times (2/24, Labaton) reports, "When Univision began broadcasting a show three years ago about the misadventures of 11-year-old identical twin girls who swapped identities after discovering they had been separated at birth, it characterized the episodes as educational programming for children. … That decision is expected to cost Univision, the nation's largest Hispanic network, $24 million in what would be the largest fine the Federal Communications Commission has ever imposed against any company. The penalty is also expected to send a strong signal to broadcasters that they will be expected to meet their required quota of shows that educate and inform children, after years of permissive oversight in this area." The Times continues, "The commission has decided to impose the heavy fine — disclosed by Kevin J. Martin, the chairman of the commission, in an interview — as a tough rebuke to Univision for claiming to meet its obligations to broadcast educational children's programs by showing the Latino soap opera 'Complices al Rescate' ('Friends to the Rescue') and other so-called telenovelas." The Times adds, "The penalty, part of a settlement that will allow the company to proceed with a buyout deal, is nearly three times the previous record fine of $9 million, imposed against Qwest Communications for violating telephone interconnection rules in 2004, and significantly more than the largest indecency penalty, $3.5 million, levied against Viacom that same year for remarks by Howard Stern and other so-called shock jocks on the radio. … It also represents an unusually aggressive enforcement of the 1996 regulations that interpreted the Children's Television Act. Those regulations, adopted after some broadcasters characterized cartoons like 'The Flintstones' and 'The Jetsons' to be educational programs, imposed more substantive requirements on the networks as they comply with the mandate to broadcast at least three hours a week of programs of intellectual value to young people. … Although some television critics say it is common for stations not to comply, only a handful of complaints have been filed. An even smaller number have resulted in modest penalties of several thousand dollars for stations found to have violated the rules."

VMware Goes Up Against Microsoft. The New York Times (2/24, Lohr) reports, "VMware, a young Silicon Valley company, is the early leader in a fast-growing market for what is called virtual-machine software. And that puts it on a collision course with Microsoft, the industry's Goliath. … A virtual machine essentially mimics a computer so that several copies of an operating system — say, Windows or Linux or both — can run on one physical machine. It allows computing chores to be done on fewer computers, using less electricity and taking up less space, promising a way to control costs at corporate data centers straining to keep up with the ever-increasing demands of the Internet age. … It is also a product that occupies strategic ground in computing, as a layer of code that resides between a computer's hardware and the operating system, usurping some tasks, and potentially undermining the importance of the operating system." The Times adds, "In a meeting with corporate customers in New York last month, Steven A. Ballmer, Microsoft's chief executive, said, 'Everybody in the operating system business wants to be the guy on the bottom,' the software that controls the hardware. And he vowed that Microsoft, whose Windows operating systems are the main source of its corporate wealth and market power, would 'compete very aggressively with VMware.' … When quizzed on Microsoft's plans, Mr. Ballmer replied, 'Our view is that virtualization is something that should be built into the operating system.'" The Times notes, "Bundling new technology into Windows has long been the Microsoft game plan. The most storied case came a decade ago when Microsoft overcame the challenge posed by another Silicon Valley highflier, Netscape, offering another crucial layer of software, the Internet browser. Microsoft feared a competitor's Web browser, running on top of the operating system, could reduce the power of Windows. … The tactics Microsoft used in the browser battle, of course, led to a host of antitrust troubles for the big software maker in the United States and Europe. … This time, in the market for virtual-machine software, Microsoft is more restrained. Bowing to customer requests, Microsoft began more than a year ago to change its software licenses so its products could run in virtual machines like VMware offerings. … But in recent months, according to VMware, Microsoft has introduced new restrictions on how Microsoft products can be used in virtual machines in new ways, beyond simply dividing a single physical computer into several virtual ones."

DOJ_NMG_0136767

NYTimes Urges Caution In Review Of Satellite Radio Merger. The New York Times (2/24) editorializes, "Vigorous competition in the private sector has served the United States economy and consumers extremely well, providing a greater array of choices, more innovation and lower prices. The two — and only — satellite radio companies are now eager to merge and are arguing that together, they will prove to be the exception to the rule. … The industry is important and still young. We urge regulators to take a hard look at the companies' proposal before leaving the field in the hands of a single player." The Times adds, "The companies' managers argue that the $13 billion merger could finally make them profitable by letting them cut costs and redundant programs, while giving consumers more programming options for their bucks. As for the fear of creating a monopoly, they argue that competition will still come from terrestrial radio (commonly known as AM and FM), iPods and other next-generation technologies. … It is important to remember that these are not widget makers. Radios carry important discourse and debate — they are vital to the free exchange of ideas protected by the First Amendment. Recent experience shows that media consolidation usually leads to more homogeneous content, politically as well as artistically, and it rarely benefits the consumer or the country. … There is also the question of what precedent would be set if regulators accepted the broadest possible definition of audio competition, and whether that could lead to even more mergers in radio. No less troubling are reports that the companies believe that they have an incentive to merge before the Bush administration and its overly friendly-to-business regulators leave office." The Times concludes, "When XM's and Sirius's licenses were granted, the Federal Communications Commission stipulated that 'one licensee will not be permitted to acquire control of the other.' The chairman of the F.C.C., Kevin Martin, reiterated that point this week but left the door open to a possible merger, saying, 'The companies would need to demonstrate that consumers would clearly be better off with both more choice and affordable prices.' We are skeptical about the chances of that happening."

Experts Say Music Consumers Will Not Be Immediately Affected By MP3 Patent Ruling. The Washington Post (2/24, D1, Sipress, Musgrove) reports, "Don't worry. The authorities aren't coming to confiscate your MP3 player because of a patent infringement ruling this week that involves the technology behind digital music." The Post continues, "The verdict, if upheld, could cost Microsoft $1.52 billion or more in damages. And that could end up costing you, as manufacturers pass on the expense of paying royalties to Alcatel-Lucent, which a federal jury in San Diego found to be the rightful owner of the technology. … But those costs aren't likely to come for some time, if at all, industry analysts and patent lawyers said yesterday." The Post adds, "The technology industry was abuzz over Thursday's unexpected verdict, which included what lawyers said was the largest patent award in history, and its significance for the MP3 format that is at the heart of the booming market for digital music. … Though the verdict could affect hundreds of companies that use the technology in various devices, experts said consumers would not suddenly be unable to obtain or play MP3 files. Even in the long run, there may be no effect on consumers if the verdict is overturned on appeal. Microsoft's lawyers have said they will appeal both the jury's finding that the company infringed on the patents and the amount of its award to Alcatel-Lucent." The Post notes, "The legal dispute turns on two patents for technology developed at Bell Laboratories, which later became part of Lucent Technologies. Alcatel bought Lucent last year and inherited the patents. … Both patents relate to how music is converted into small digital files. One of the patents is for a method of analyzing sound to gauge whether it is more like music or noise, then representing it in digital form based on that determination. The other patent pertains to the process for determining whether the sound is audible to the human ear and then converting only that audible part into digital form. … Hundreds of companies that thought they had properly licensed the MP3 format from Germany's Fraunhofer Institute, which was also involved in developing the MP3 technology, could be financially liable for infringing on Alcatel-Lucent's patents."

DOJ_NMG_0136768

ENVIRONMENT:

Bush Touts Alternative Fuel Vehicles. The New York Times (2/24, A10, Wald, 1.16M) reports that at a White House event President Bush "turned to alternative fuels, and alternative companies, to argue Friday that his goal for reining in gasoline consumption in the coming decade was realistic." Bush "inspected a version of the Toyota Prius, the popular Japanese gas-electric hybrid, that had been rigged with a Canadian-built battery pack to allow it to operate more of each day on electricity, along with a South Korean sport utility truck modified by a small California company to run entirely on batteries. Neither is now a mass-market product, but each, the president said, is evidence that entrepreneurs will rush in to solve the nation's oil addiction. He called on Congress to approve financing that he has requested for research." The Times notes that to "a repeated question as to whether he would consider one of the vehicles for his ranch in Texas, Mr. Bush simply wished the assembled reporters a good weekend and returned to the Oval Office."

However, in its lead story Friday night, ABC World News (2/23, 3:00, Gibson, 8.78M) said, "If you suspected that the mileage stickers on new cars in the showroom were all wrong, you are right. They are about to change. Numbers on new cars will be lower, going down about 10 to 15%. Why? Well, the government's tests have been based on the way we drove almost a quarter century ago, not the way we drive today. Ironically, President Bush had sort of an auto show on the White House lawn today, part of his push to lower gasoline consumption 20%. But the new numbers show we're actually using more gas than we thought." ABC (Reynolds): "The big question is what kind of impact these new numbers will have on the new car market. Gayla Ruffer owns a Toyota Prius hybrid and knows it's not everything it's cranked up to be." Ruffer: "It's not near the mileage that I thought it was gonna get." Reynolds: "Instead of the advertised 50 miles to 60 miles per gallon, her Prius manages less than 35." Ruffer: "I don't know that I could say that I had sticker shock, but more a bit of a taste of reality." Reynolds: "Even Toyota dealers admit the old figures were a stretch."

BP Settles Two Suits Over 2005 Refinery Blast. The New York Times/AP (2/24) reports, "The energy giant BP has settled two more lawsuits stemming from a 2005 explosion at its Texas City oil refinery that killed 15 people and injured more than 170, the company and a lawyer for two injured contract workers said." The AP continues, "Terms of the deal were not released. Jury selection had been set for next week over lawsuits filed by the workers, E. J. Godeaux and Clarence Kinard. Theirs would have been the first cases connected to the blast to go to court." The AP adds, "Mr. Godeaux, 61, a painter and sandblaster from Texas City, had neck and back injuries, and his right eardrum was blown out. Mr. Kinard, 67, a boilermaker from Cleveland, Tex., injured his back and experienced hearing loss."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Location Of Suspected Mexican Drug Kingpin's Arrest At Center Of Legal Dispute. The San Diego Union-Tribune (2/24, Thornton) reports, "The captain of the yacht on which suspected drug kingpin Francisco Javier Arellano Félix was arrested last summer has become the center of a fascinating legal debate with international political implications." The Union-Tribune continues, "Capt. Edgar Omar Osorio took the witness stand yesterday during an unusual pretrial hearing, and questions by Arellano's lawyers seemed to lead in one direction: Did the arrest take place in international waters, as prosecutors maintain, or did U.S. officials apprehend him outside their jurisdiction, in Mexican waters? … Perhaps the more important question is, does it matter where the Aug. 14 arrest occurred?" The Union-Tribune adds, "Prosecutors say the questioning is an irrelevant sideshow with no impact on the facts of the case. But if the incident happened in Mexico, defense attorneys could seek dismissal of the case because Arellano was illegally arrested. Failing that, they could ask that evidence seized on the boat be thrown out because it was the result of an unlawful seizure. … It could also affect the U.S. government's ability to seek the death penalty." The Union-Tribune notes, "Traditionally, Mexico has refused to send anyone to the United States who would face the death penalty, which is barred in Mexico. There could be political ramifications if the U.S. government violated international law and breached the sovereignty of Mexico to apprehend Arellano. … But cooperation on extradition matters between the two countries has improved significantly in recent months. Some legal observers wonder how motivated Mexican officials would be to intervene on behalf of an Arellano, and perhaps disrupt the dismantling of its most feared drug cartel. … Since Mexican President Felipe Calderón was sworn into office in December, he has cleared the way for the extradition of 15 reputed drug lords, including four who were indicted in San Diego years ago. The action was called 'unprecedented in scope and importance' by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. … Even if Arellano was taken in Mexican waters, the U.S. Supreme Court has already ruled in a case with similar allegations that the U.S. government violated Mexico's sovereignty and the extradition treaty between the two nations."

DOJ_NMG_0136769

ATF Says Homemade Pipe Bombs Often Lethal. The El Paso Times (2/24, Fonce-Olivas) reports, "Each of the homemade explosives two Lower Valley men allegedly attempted to sell to undercover federal agents earlier this week had the destructive power to seriously injure or kill a person, a federal official said Friday. … 'It could have caused a lot of damage,' said Tom Crowley, spokesman with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives." The Times continues, "The bombs Alfredo Rubio, 23, of San Elizario, and Juan Ortiz, 22, of Socorro, allegedly tried to sell to an undercover ATF agent on Wednesday were explosive devices, each made of about 12 inches of PVC pipe that contained smokeless powder, steel BBs and a carbon dioxide cartridge. … Crowley said pipe bombs are so dangerous because they contain shrapnel -- usually nails, glass or other dangerous objects -- that become projectiles when the bomb explodes." The Times adds, "The size of the pipe bomb, which can range from 2 inches long to much larger, determines whether the detonation created by the explosive causes serious injury or even death, said El Paso police Sgt. Peter Pacillas, a supervisor on the department's bomb squad. … 'It's an improvised explosive device, so it depends on who's making them and how they're making them,' Pacillas said. 'If they don't kill you, you're going to be seriously maimed.' … The El Paso Police Department, one of several agencies involved in the case, was in charge of transporting and detonating the suspected pipe bombs as the only regional bomb squad in the area."

IMMIGRATION:

Decision To Allow Mexican Trucks On US Roads Meets Opposition. The New York Times/AP (2/24, A13) reports that a Bush administration plan "to allow 100 Mexican trucking companies to haul freight deeper into the United States than previously allowed drew an angry reaction Friday from labor leaders, safety advocates and members of Congress. … opponents said Mexico had substandard trucks and low-paid drivers that would threaten national security, cost thousands of jobs and endanger motorists. James P. Hoffa, president of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, said, 'They are playing a game of Russian roulette on America's highways.'" Sen. Patty Murray, chair of the Appropriations Subcommittee on Transportation, "announced a March 8 hearing to determine whether the plan met safety requirements." The Wall Street Journal (2/24, A3, Matthews, 2.04M) notes that "if the trial succeeds, the U.S. trucking industry could change drastically. Mexican drivers are paid one-third to 40% less than their U.S. counterparts, who make an average of about $40,000 a year. An influx of Mexican truckers would be a boon for U.S. businesses with production lines in Mexico, by decreasing costs and delays from the current need to shift U.S.-bound goods at the border to American trucks from Mexican ones." The Journal adds that "some past opponents of opening up vowed to continue to fight the move."

US Cabinet Secretaries Discuss Border Issues With Canadian, Mexican Counterparts. The New York Times (2/24, A8, Mason, 1.16M) reports that in Ottawa Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez "met their Canadian and Mexican counterparts amid concerns that new United States border restrictions — particularly the requirement of passports, beginning in January 2008, for land and sea crossings — would hamper the $880 billion in annual trade among the countries. No firm agenda emerged for a planned meeting later this year of President Bush, President Felipe Calderón of Mexico and Prime Minister Stephen Harper of Canada. But officials here were optimistic that the countries could continue to increase trade despite concerns by Canada over the passport requirement and by Mexico about United States plans to erect a security wall along their border."

DOJ_NMG_0136770

Border Fence Considered A Potential Environmental Disaster. In an op-ed for the New York Times (2/24, A15, 1.16M) author Ted Kerasote writes, "Authorized by the Secure Fence Act of 2006, this barrier (83 miles of which have already been built) will bisect a border region that has some of the most ecologically diverse landscapes in the hemisphere. … Since the secretary of homeland security will have authority to waive laws that stand in the way of building the fence — like the Endangered Species Act — wildlife and habitats could be destroyed on a scale not seen since the 1960s." Kerasote adds, "many argue that the fence is an issue of national security and the safety of the American people trumps that of American wildlife. But that reasoning is flawed. The economic health of many people is increasingly reliant on the health of their natural surroundings."

TAX:

IRS Urged To Pursue eBay Sellers. The San Francisco Chronicle (2/24, Kopytoff) reports, "When it comes to paying income taxes, eBay's legions of small-time entrepreneurs are on an honor system in which they are supposed to declare their profits to the Internal Revenue Service. Many users, however, ignore the law or are unaware of their obligation." The Chronicle continues, "Now a growing chorus of tax experts is hoping to crack down on the cheating by requiring eBay -- and other online auctions, such as those on Yahoo, Ubid.com and Amazon -- to track users and report their gross sales to the federal government. Armed with such information, the IRS could better seek any taxes owed, potentially reaping millions of dollars in extra revenue for the U.S. Treasury. … But requiring eBay to out its sellers to tax collectors could send a shockwave across its vast online bazaar, where users trade everything from Ferraris to Ugg boots to pepper spray. Paying Uncle Sam could significantly reduce their profits or even make their businesses money-losers." The Chronicle adds, "The latest call for more aggressive tax collection was heard last week at a congressional committee hearing focused on closing the tax gap, the hundreds of billions of dollars in taxes that go unpaid each year. Nina Olson, the national taxpayer advocate for the IRS, spoke of the heavy burden put on the nation by the shortfall and then cited undeclared online sales -- particularly on eBay, given its size -- as part of the problem. … 'The IRS must have the tools needed to address under-reporting of this income,' said Olson, whose job is to voice taxpayer concerns to the federal government. … EBay, based in San Jose, has 97 million U.S. users, who, in 2006 sold $25.2 billion in merchandise, exceeding the gross national product of many countries. More than 720,000 Americans make their primary or secondary income from the Web site, according to a 2005 study. … How many eBay users pay the taxes they owe on their online earnings is unknown. But experts suspect the percentage is low."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Administration's Proposed Medicaid Cuts Draw Governors' Criticism. The Los Angeles Times (2/24, Alonso-Zaldivar, 850K) reports the Bush Administration "is pressing ahead with plans to cut nearly $4 billion in aid for public hospitals and other providers of last resort for the uninsured. The cuts would affect hospital funding provided by Washington as part of Medicaid. … The cuts are prompting sharp protests from governors and dozens of lawmakers, partly because they represent an end run around congressional defenders of the aid program. After failing to get Congress to approve the reductions last year, the administration is now trying to impose them through a regulation that does not require action on Capitol Hill. 'The administration is moving forward with these proposed changes without any input from Congress or governors,' the National Governors Assn. complained Friday in a letter to congressional leaders. In an unusually direct challenge to the administration, the governors asked Congress to pass legislation that would block the rule from going into effect. Separately, some independent experts have questioned whether the administration has the legal authority to make unilateral cuts."

DOJ_NMG_0136771

Cheney Refuses To Retract Criticism Of Pelosi's Stance On Iraq. The Washington Post (2/24, A4, Abramowitz, 690K) reports Vice President Cheney "refused to back down yesterday from his assertion that the Democratic approach to Iraq would 'validate the al-Qaeda strategy,' as he continued a transpacific war of words with House Speaker Nancy Pelosi. … 'She accused me of questioning her patriotism,' Cheney said. 'I didn't question her patriotism. I questioned her judgment. Al-Qaeda functions on the basis that they think they can break our will. That's their fundamental underlying strategy: that if they can kill enough Americans or cause enough havoc, create enough chaos in Iraq, then we'll quit and go home,' Cheney added. 'And my statement was that if we adopt the Pelosi policy, that then we will validate the strategy of al-Qaeda. I said it, and I meant it.'" According to the Post, "The Cheney comments were another example of how the vice president's posture regarding Iraq has been more aggressive than President Bush's in recent weeks."

Committee Chairmen Featured In Democrats' Fundraising Blitz. The Washington Post (2/24, A1, Birnbaum, Solomon, 690K) reports Congressional Democrats "have enlisted their committee chairmen in an early blitz to bring millions of dollars into the party's coffers." Senate Democrats "also plan a fundraising reception during a major gathering of Native Americans in the capital Tuesday evening…including those Jack Abramoff was paid to represent." Financial Services Committee Chairman Barney Frank is quoted as saying, "I'm fundraising to give to others so I can help stay in the majority and do the public policy things I want." The Post adds, "Asked whether banking interests feel obligated to give to Democrats when he asks them for contributions, Frank answered: 'Obligated? No. Incentivized? Yes.' Frank said." The Post goes on to report that Frank has "traveled to Charlotte, home to two of America's largest bank companies, for a similar fundraising breakfast. … The leaders of the two tax-writing committees -- House Ways and Means Chairman Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.) and Senate Finance Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.) -- are planning a rare and expensive joint fundraising reception in New York on March 4. The event…costs between $1,500 and $9,200 a person."

Travelers' Advocates Skeptical Of Proposed Federal "Bill Of Rights" Legislation. The Los Angeles Times (2/24, A1, Zimmerman, 850K) reports, "Recent incidents in which travelers were left stranded for hours on parked airplanes have led to proposals in Congress for time limits on ground delays. But skeptics say the proposals could result in even longer waits and more canceled flights. 'Be careful what you wish for,' said David Stempler, president of the Air Travelers Association, a Washington-area lobbying group. 'After three hours, they'll bring the plane back to the terminal, but then the flight might be canceled and you can't get to your destination.'" Sen. Barbara Boxer "introduced a bill, dubbed the airline passenger bill of rights, that would give passengers the option to return to the airport terminal after three hours." Rep. Mike Thompson "plans to introduce a similar bill next week."

WSJournal Criticizes Proposed Legislation. The Wall Street Journal (2/24, A8, 2.04M), in an editorial, writes, "Right on cue, politicians are making a fuss about a 'passenger bill of rights' and demanding Congressional intervention after last week's JetBlue airline debacle. The irony is that the marketplace is already moving to address the problem, and the government could really help by relaxing some of the rules that incentivize airlines to discomfit passengers in the first place. … In hindsight, it's easy to say JetBlue waited too long, but we wonder how many passengers, offered a choice between the possibility of imminent clearance to take off and the certainty of many more hours in the terminal, would have opted for the departure lounge. A bill of rights mandating deplanings would take these decisions away from those trying, if sometimes futilely, to get their passengers where they're going as quickly as possible."

NYTimes Seconds Justice Kennedy On Higher Judiciary Salaries. The New York Times (2/24, A14, 1.16M), in an editorial, notes that Justice Anthony Kennedy "told the Senate this month that the salaries paid to federal judges are so low that they threaten both the quality and independence of the judiciary. The problem is real, and Congress should quickly pass a bill to fix it."

OTHER NEWS:

Stocks Close Week On "Down Note." NBC Nightly News (2/23, story 5, :20, Williams, 9.87M) reported that

DOJ_NMG_0136772

"stocks finished out the week on a down note. The Dow was off 38 1/2 points. The Nasdaq lost just under 10 points on the day. For the week, a mixed finish: the Dow down 120 points, the Nasdaq up almost 19 points on the week." The Wall Street Journal (2/24, B3, Talley, 2.04M) says the Dow fell "to 12647.48" in its "third straight decline," while the Nasdaq ended the week at 2515.10 and the S&P 500 "lost 5.19, or 0.4%, to 1451.19." The Washington Post/AP (2/24, D4) says it was the "worst week for the Dow Jones industrials since mid-August."

Crude Oil Tops $61; Dollar Declines. The Wall Street Journal (2/24, B4, Sykora, 2.04M) reports crude oil futures "settled at a nine-week high as gasoline futures continued advancing and traders focused on plunging U.S. petroleum-product stockpiles and recent refinery and pipeline glitches around the country. April crude oil on the Nymex gained 19 cents to $61.14 a barrel, its highest close since Dec. 22." Meanwhile, the Wall Street Journal (2/24, B14, Molinski, 2.04M) reports, the dollar "exited lower across the board Friday amid concerns that interest rates will rise in Europe but could remain frozen or even decline in the U.S."

Several Governors Proposing Large Spending Hikes. The Wall Street Journal (2/24, A1, Cooper, 2.04M) reports, "From New York to Montana to California, states are proposing budget increases that outpace inflation and far exceed the 1% rise in domestic outlays -- outside of defense and homeland security -- that President Bush recently proposed in his fiscal 2008 federal budget. In Montana, Gov. Brian Schweitzer is cutting taxes and boosting spending by 26% over two years, including $100 million for new 'meth prisons' that blend incarceration with intensive drug rehab for those convicted of methamphetamine crimes. In Vermont, Gov. Jim Douglas wants to borrow $40 million to create 'the nation's first e-state,' where free wireless broadband is available to all. And in Arizona, the only dispute between a Democratic governor and a Republican legislature over a half-billion-dollar road-repair program is whether to borrow the money or pay cash." The Journal notes, "Last year, the Massachusetts legislature approved a $1.56 billion universal health-care plan under Republican Gov. Mitt Romney, who is now running for president. This year, at least ten states -- most notably Republican Arnold Schwarzenegger's California -- are weighing similar programs."

No Voting Machine Errors Found In FL13 Audit. The Washington Post/AP (2/24, A8) reports, "An audit of touch-screen voting machines at the center of a dispute in a congressional election found no evidence of malfunction, Florida's secretary of state said Friday. The audit was conducted after more than 18,000 ballots were cast in Sarasota County without a selection in the District 13 congressional race in November between Republican Vern Buchanan and Democrat Christine Jennings. Buchanan was the certified winner by 369 votes, but Jennings sued, alleging that the machines malfunctioned." Florida Secretary of State Kurt Browning said he and Gov. Charlie Crist "are committed to ensuring that every Floridian's vote is counted, and I am confident that the race in Sarasota County was fair and accurate." The New York Times (2/24, A9, Drew, 1.16M) reports, "The finding, reached unanimously by a team of computer experts from several universities, could finally settle last fall's closest federal election. … Legal precedents make it difficult to win a lawsuit over ballot design, but a substantial error in the software might have been grounds for a new election."

Citing Money, Vilsack Quits Presidential Race. Former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack ended his bid for the Democratic presidential nomination Friday, frankly stating that his inability to raise enough money to compete was the sole reason for his exit. Vilsack, who declined to comment on any possible vice presidential aspirations, was barely registering in national polls but was in the double digits in his home state, which will lead off the primary voting season. Several reports say Vilsack was the first candidate in, and now the first candidate out, of the field, though of the candidates invited to last week's forum in Nevada, ex-Sen. Mike Gravel was actually the earliest entrant into the race.

ABC World News (2/23, story 6, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) said Vilsack "said he's getting out for one reason: He can't raise money. Candidates are declaring they'll run earlier than ever before and now one drops out." The CBS Evening News (2/23, story 4, :15, Mitchell, 7.66M) said the "first Democrat to declare he was in today said he is out. … The reason, he said, in a word, money -- he doesn't have enough." The Des Moines Register (2/24, 160K) quotes Vilsack saying, "This process has become to a great extent about money, a lot of money. And it is clear to me that we would not be able to continue to raise money in the amounts necessary to sustain, not just a campaign in Iowa and New Hampshire, but a campaign across this country. So it is money and only money that is the reason we are leaving today."

DOJ_NMG_0136773

Under the headline "Vilsack, First Democrat In, Is Quickly Out," the Washington Post (2/24, A2, Balz, 690K) says Vilsack, "who called for a swift end to the Iraq war and proposed an ambitious plan for reducing dependence on foreign oil, was considered a long shot for the nomination, so his early departure does not fundamentally change the shape of the Democratic contest. But it does change the dynamic in Iowa. … Rival campaigns immediately began scrambling for endorsements of Iowa elected officials and prominent party activists and to hire Vilsack staff members."

The New York Times (2/24, A10, Zeleny, 1.16M) says Vilsack "spent the afternoon taking calls from former rivals. They sent their best wishes, even as they began seeking his endorsement in Iowa." And the New Hampshire Union Leader (2/24, DiStaso) reports Stonyfield Farms CEO Gary Hirshberg, "one of only two well-known New Hampshire backers" of Vilsack's campaign, said Sen. Barack Obama "telephoned him asking for support 'literally 120 seconds' after word" of Vilsack's exit became public. The AP (2/23) says Vilsack, "who likely will be considered as a vice presidential nominee, repeatedly declined to endorse another candidate at his news conference."

The Washington Times (2/24, Miller, 88K) reports on its front page that the "first Democrat to officially enter the 2008 presidential race…will be viewed as a casualty of the new campaign world, in which big states such as California, Florida and New Jersey are considering moving up their primaries and in which $100 million is considered the ante." The Los Angeles Times (2/24, Barabak, 850K) seconds this in its lead, saying Vilsack's "abrupt departure from the presidential race Friday underscores the indispensable role of money in the contest, as well as an attention gap between voters and political insiders." On its Web site, The Hill (2/23, Marre) says Vilsack was the victim of "better-known candidates with deeper pockets."

David Yepsen writes on the Des Moines Register (2/23, 160K) Web site, "One immediate effect on the race is to make the Iowa caucuses even more important. With no favorite son candidate in the field, Iowa again becomes a level playing field for the others. As long as Vilsack was in the race, many in the political community thought contests in Nevada and New Hampshire might prove to be fairer tests of strength for the other candidates."

Aide Says Harkin Will Not Retire To Clear Senate Seat For Vilsack. RollCall.com (2/23, Duran) says an aide to Sen. Tom Harkin quickly "shot down speculation that Harkin would not seek re-election and pave the way for Vilsack to run for Senate." Harkin communications director Maureen Knightly said Harkin is "doing everything he can right now to prepare for a run and he's actively raising money."

Vilsack Says "Money Primary Was The One That Mattered." On MSNBC's Hardball (2/23, Matthews), Vilsack said, "I think we were winning the idea primary, but the money primary was the one that mattered. We obviously had a position on the war that I think was the right position. And we had an energy policy I was very proud of. But the reality is, if you don't have the resources, you can't basically push the message, and at the end of the day, that's what it was. … Obviously I understood the rules of the game when I got into this. But clearly, I think there needs to be a debate and conversation in the country about precisely what the rules of the game ought to be in the future. It ought to be about ideas. It ought to be about substance. It ought not to be just about money. Unfortunately, that's the game that's being played today. I understood that. I thought I could compete. Obviously, at the end of the day, I couldn't."

Biden Says Vilsack "Would Have Been A Good President." On CNN's The Situation Room (2/23, Blitzer), Sen. Joseph Biden said of Vilsack, "He would have been a good president. This is a competent guy. This is the guy who turned his state around; this is the guy who made it blue, this is the guy who has absolute capability to do whatever he would be appointed to do or asked to do." On MSNBC's Hardball (2/23, Matthews), Biden said, "Gov. Vilsack is a really capable guy and I don't think you've seen the last of Gov. Vilsack on the national scene." Asked if he thinks Vilsack "just checked in so he can run for vice president," Biden said, "No. I think he checked in because he knew he could be a good president."

Giuliani, McCain Both Lead Clinton In Rasmussen Matchups. A Rasmussen Reports poll of 800 likely voters across the US conducted February 21-22 (+/- 4%) finds that in a general election matchup, Rudy Giuliani leads Sen. Hillary Clinton by nine points, 52%-43%. Giuliani leads John Edwards by two points, 46%-44%. In a head-to-head race between Sen. John McCain and Clinton, McCain leads by five points, 47%-42%.

DOJ_NMG_0136774

With Spat With Clinton Still Fresh, Obama Campaigns In Texas. The CBS Evening News (2/23, story 4, 2:00, Borger, 7.66M) reported Sen. Barack Obama "told a crowd in Texas today that he's the man to change politics." Obama: "I know Washington needs to change, and I think I can be an agent for change in Washington." Borger: "And Hillary Clinton, a veteran of two presidential elections and a nasty battle against her husband's impeachment, today made no bones that she's ready to rumble." Clinton: "Now, as you may have heard, I'm in, and I'm in to win. And I'm in to change our country." Borger: "But with Obama a growing threat to those aspirations, the aggressive Clinton campaign was looking for a chance to take him down a peg." The "spat" over David Geffen's comments this week "is an early look at what we're in for. The Clinton camp has a take-no-prisoners attitude. The Obama campaign is struggling with this: How can you call for an end to partisan bickering knowing you need to hit back if your opponent kicks you around?" The AP (2/23, Johnson) reports Republican Mitt Romney said he "relishes the infighting that has distracted two of his potential Democratic opponents." At a stop in New Hampshire, Romney said, "It's great, isn't it? I love to see it when it happens on the other side.

The Dallas Morning News (2/24, Slater, 500K) says "thousands of people jammed a lakeside venue used for rock concerts" in Austin to hear Obama "promise Friday to 'galvanize a movement for change' in American politics. The crowd -- extraordinarily large for so early in a presidential campaign -- cheered Mr. Obama's call to withdraw U.S. troops from Iraq and his denunciation of the Bush administration." The rally was Obama's "first visit to Texas since formally announcing his candidacy."

Biden Says Democrats Should Refrain From Personal Attacks On One Another. Asked about the Clinton-Obama tiff on MSNBC's Hardball (2/23, Matthews), Sen. Joseph Biden said, "I learned from the outset of my announcing my campaign my lesson not to comment on anybody else's campaign, or on anything that any of the other candidates are doing. So I am going to refrain from commenting. … I am going to abide by Reagan's 11th commandment: never speak ill of another Democrat running. I commit to that. Now there's a difference between speaking ill of them this terms of their character or family and taking sharp disagreement with a policy. We are going to disagree on policy. That's healthy. The Democratic Party needs to hear the debate about which direction each of us want to take the party and take the nation. But I believe we should refrain from either ourselves or through surrogates, if that happens, from going after, attacking the character, the personality, the family of any other candidate."

Indicted Ex-Fundraiser's Wife Sells Land Next To Obama's Home. The Chicago Tribune (2/24, Jackson, Gibson, 617K) reports, "A land sale recorded this month ended the neighborly relationship" between Obama and "indicted political insider Antoin 'Tony' Rezko, Obama's friend and former fundraiser. On Dec. 28, 2006, land records show, Rezko's wife, Rita, sold the garden lot she owned next to Obama's home, transferring it to a company that plans to develop housing there. That sale deed became public this month when it was registered with the Cook County recorder of deeds." In October 2006, Rezko "was indicted in a state government kickback scandal and in an alleged business fraud. He has pleaded not guilty to both indictments. As he campaigns for president, Obama has distanced himself from his longtime friend."

Obama New York City Fundraiser Profiled. Under the headline "In Clinton's Backyard, It's Open Season As An Obama Fund-Raiser Lines Up Donors," the New York Times (2/24, A11, Konigsberg, 1.16M) profiles Jeh Johnson, one of Obama's "leading fund-raisers" in New York City, who is "trying to poach in the heart" of Clinton's "financial territory."

Clinton Says Husband Would Have Diplomatic Role Under Her Administration. The San Francisco Chronicle (2/24, Marinucci, 384K) reports on its front page that Sen. Hillary Clinton – "coming off a week of caustic comments from Hollywood mogul David Geffen and a campaign squabble with rival Sen. Barack Obama -- was exactly where she wanted to be Friday: in front of an adoring crowd in the Democratic stronghold of San Francisco, raising boatloads of campaign cash. And the New York senator used the occasion to defend a man who is potentially a source of controversy: her husband." Responding to an audience member's question, Clinton "called her husband 'the most popular person in the world right now' and said that when she reaches the White House, 'I will continue the tradition of using former presidents' as diplomats around the world." In addition, Clinton "also gave her husband's former vice president -- who still is viewed as a potential rival for the Democratic nomination -- a thumbs-up for his Oscar-nominated film about global warming, 'An Inconvenient Truth.'" Clinton said, "We're all pulling for Al Gore to get that Oscar."

DOJ_NMG_0136775

South Carolina Democratic Official To Run Richardson State Campaign. South Carolina's the State (2/24) reports South Carolina Democratic Party Executive Director Lachlan McIntosh "is leaving the post to run New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson's presidential campaign in South Carolina." McIntosh "said he will start working for Richardson on March 15."

The Wall Street Journal (2/24, A2, Cooper, 2.04M) looks at the lack of governors in the presidential race, with Richardson the only sitting governor in either party's field.

Biden Says Iraq Issue, First Four States Key To His Chances. Sen. Joseph Biden said on MSNBC's Hardball (2/23, Matthews), "If I am able to make my case about how to get us out of Iraq, how I can lead this country -- and everybody knows there will be no margin for error, this next president will have no margin based on what Bush is going to leave him -- then I think I could overcome whatever deficit I might have after the first four primaries. But I do need enough [money] to compete in the first four primaries and caucuses, and I think I can do that."

Gore Oscar Win Could Revive Presidential Campaign Talk. At CNN.com (2/23), analyst William Schneider writes, "We've seen plenty of political moments at the Oscars before. But on Sunday, we could see the most unusual political moment ever" if Al Gore's "An Inconvenient Truth" wins the Best Documentary Feature award. Schneider asks, "Could an Oscar start the momentum for a draft-Gore movement?" Martin Kaplan of the University of Southern California's Norman Lear Center "thinks it could." Kaplan said, "People think that he's paid his dues, he's had more of an impact on issues that people care about than many people who have been in office and there's a feeling that he's finally lost that student council condescension that was fingernails on a blackboard to a lot of supporters." The AP (2/23, Fouhy) says Gore's film is the "odds-on favorite" to win the Oscar.

Carter Says He Would Support Gore For President. ABCNews.com (2/23) reports that in an interview to air on "This Week" on Sunday, ex-President Carter calls Gore his "favorite Democrat" and says, "If Al should decide to run -- which I'm afraid he won't -- I would support Al Gore."

Leading GOP Presidential Contenders Grapple With Abortion Issue. The Politico (2/23, Martin) reports that an "increasingly tense war over abortion has emerged as the early test of conservative bona fides among the leading GOP presidential contenders. To many on the right, the top three candidates are failing it because they're faking it. … Many conservatives consider Arizona Sen. John McCain a less-than-passionate abortion foe, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney a flip-flopper and former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani as downright hostile to the pro-life movement." The "fight to reverse that perception is getting personal. McCain and Romney, through aides and supporters, are hitting each other almost daily over the issue." While McCain has been a "consistent opponent of abortion in his more than two decades in Congress," he is still "viewed with suspicion by many in the anti-abortion community," while Romney "has even more challenges on pro-life issues. He was, in his words, 'effectively pro-choice' until recent years. … Giuliani has smartly avoided the spat. Unlike Romney, he remains pro-choice. But even Giuliani has sought to lessen the gulf between his views and the GOP conservative base on the issue."

In her New York Times (2/24, A15, 1.16M) column, Ann Althouse writes, "We're seeing some awfully complicated positions on abortion from some of the presidential candidates. It's easy to hoot with derision." But "if we listen with a decent sympathy, the things Giuliani and Romney say about abortion make sense. When Romney ran for governor, he made a commitment to Massachusetts voters not to attack the law he knew they supported. That was politically expedient, of course, but it also took an admirably limited view of executive power and acknowledged the independence of the legal system. Similarly, Giuliani respects the distinctive work of judges and the separate role of the state legislatures. … So I'd like to see a little more patience with what Romney and Giuliani are saying. But that doesn't mean we should be naïve. The next president will select real individuals to be judges, and no matter how diligent they are, they will bring something of their humanity to their interpretation of the law, a version of humanity that will express something of the president's cast of mind."

McCain Suggests His Iraq Stance Could End His Political Career. The Seattle Times (2/24, Brunner, 118K) reports Sen. John McCain, in Seattle, said Congress "should give President Bush's planned 'surge' of more U.S. troops in Iraq a chance to work." McCain called the recent nonbinding resolution debate "'a charade' and said if members of Congress oppose the war, they should use their budget authority to cut off funding instead." The AP (2/23, Woodward) says McCain said British Prime Minister Tony Blair "has sacrificed his career to support the Iraq war," and acknowledged he "could face the same fate." McCain said of Blair, "He has literally sacrificed his political career because of Iraq. That is a great testament to his political courage." Asked later "if he was in danger of making the same sacrifice, McCain responded, 'Sure.'"

DOJ_NMG_0136776

Slain Teen's Father Urges McCain To Address Arizona Incident. Newsday (2/24, Massey) reports New York resident Ronald Schiffman, whose "daughter was shot to death in an Arizona parking lot last Sunday," has called on McCain "to speak out against gun violence." Schiffman said, "This is his state. John McCain should make a statement about this incident. He cries, rightly so, about all the boys who die in Iraq. I'd like to see him talk about gun control. It's a topic I think has disappeared because of all the problems the country is facing." Nicole Schiffman, 19, and Carol Kestenbaum, 20, "were shot last Sunday night in Tempe by 22-year-old Joshua Mendel, who had called 911 two weeks earlier asking for help with an alcohol problem."

Dowd Says She Misses Old McCain. In her New York Times (2/24, A15, 1.16M) column, Maureen Dowd writes that McCain "has tried to worm his way into the affections of W. and the religious right," but "there's one huge group that he's not pandering to: Americans. Most Americans are sick and tired of watching things go hideously backward in Iraq and Afghanistan, and want someone to show them the way out. Mr. McCain is stuck on the bridge of a sinking policy with W. and Dick Cheney, who showed again this week that there is no bottom to his lunacy. The senator supported a war that didn't need to be fought and is a cheerleader for a surge that won't work. … Sometimes I miss John McCain, even when I'm with him."

Nevada GOP Decides Against Early Caucus. The New Hampshire Union Leader (2/24, DiStaso) reports Nevada Republicans "have decided not to follow their Democratic counterparts by moving up their Presidential caucus to near the front of the pack of nominating contests. After considering it, the Nevada Republican Party's executive board decided against a calendar move that would have violated a rule of the Republican National Committee, the party's executive director said yesterday."

Napolitano Says Democratic Nominee Will Be Competitive In Arizona. On MSNBC's Hardball (2/23, Matthews), Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano said she thinks "any of the Democrats could run a very strong race" in her state in 2008. If Sen. John McCain is the Republican nominee, "That makes it tougher. … But I still think it would be very competitive."

Candidates Begin "Quadrennial Groveling" To Early State Opinion Leaders. The New York Times (2/24, A11, Leibovich, 1.16M) runs a piece on "the beginning of the quadrennial groveling season. While the presidential campaigns have turned against one another in the news media in recent days, the candidates are making serious nice to would-be supporters." Candidates are seeking out and chatting up anyone who is "a local person-of-influence in a state with early voting," whose possible support offers "a disproportionate say in picking the next president and, more to the point, entitles" them to "disproportionate attention, flattery and testimonials from the procession of Very Ambitious People blowing through town."

Schwarzenegger Will Not Rule Out Senate Run, Will Back GOP Presidential Nominee. In a flattering piece, Roger Simon writes in The Politico (2/23) that if Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger "had been born in Austin instead Austria, he might be president today. But because that office is denied him by the U.S. Constitution, he is concentrating on other things." In a "45-minute interview in his office in the state capitol Thursday," Schwarzenegger said he "will not rule out running for future public office including U.S. senator or mayor of Los Angeles when his term as governor expires," and that he "will not endorse a presidential candidate until after the Republican Convention in September 2008, even though he thinks Rudy Giuliani and John McCain are strong candidates and either could win the California primary." He also said Democrats "should stop criticizing Hillary Clinton for refusing to say she made a mistake by voting for the Iraq war," and that California First Lady Maria Shriver "will 'absolutely not' run for governor of California or any other public office, quashing speculation that a Schwarzenegger dynasty was in the making." Schwarzenegger also said he "would definitely endorse the Republican nominee for president," which means New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg, "a friend and political ally of Schwarzenegger, would not get his endorsement should Bloomberg run for president as an independent."

DOJ_NMG_0136777

Research On Adult Stem Cells Comes Into Question. The Washington Times/AP (2/24) reports, "A scientific panel says a 2002 study that suggested adult stem cells might be as useful as embryonic ones was flawed and its conclusions may be wrong, a finding that raises questions about the promise of a less-controversial source for stem cells. The research by Catherine Verfaillie at the University of Minnesota concluded that adult stem cells taken from the bone marrow of mice could grow into an array of biological tissues, including brain, heart, lung and liver."

In Australia, Cheney Reiterates Stance On China, North Korea, Iran. Major media report Vice President Cheney's comments yesterday and today in Sydney, including a joint press appearance this morning with Prime Minister John Howard. The Financial Times (2/24, Minder, Sevastopulo, Dinmore) says Cheney "on Friday accused China of pursuing military policies that were at odds with its stated ambitions of a 'peaceful rise.'" He "welcomed Beijing's role in securing the six-party agreement with North Korea towards denuclearising the Korean peninsula. But he said China's recent anti-satellite missile test and the rapid expansion in its military budget was sending mixed signals." The Times says the visit "comes at a difficult time for [Howard], who is under pressure to justify his decision to maintain Australia's military involvement in the US-led coalition in Iraq" and has "faced criticism over his inability to speed up legal proceedings against David Hicks, an Australian detained in Guantánamo Bay." Howard "rejected as 'absurd' suggestions the US visit and the strong endorsement received yesterday from Mr Cheney was a political liability in the run-up to federal elections this year."

The AP (2/24, Sullivan) keys on today's joint appearance, reporting Cheney "renewed Washington's criticism of Iran on Saturday, saying 'all options' remained on the table to deal with that country's regime after it ignored a U.N. deadline to halt uranium enrichment and said it would defy foreign pressure." He "said the United States remained 'deeply concerned' about Iran's activities, including the 'aggressive' sponsoring of Hezbollah and inflammatory statements by President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. He said top U.S. officials would meet soon with European allies to decide the next step toward planned tough sanctions against Iran for its pursuit of nuclear weapons." Cheney "also said that Washington was 'comfortable' with Britain's decision to withdraw troops from Iraq and that it was up to Australia to decide if it would do the same."

Cheney Rejects Charge Of "Failed Strategy" In Iraq. Asked during an ABC World News (2/23, story 2, 4:15, Karl, 8.78M) interview if "our strategy been failing" in Iraq, "isn't that why the President has to come out with a new strategy," Cheney said, "A failed strategy, let's see, we didn't fail when we got rid of Saddam. We didn't fail when we held elections, we didn't fail when we got a constitution written, those are success stories." Karl: "Didn't we fail when 3,000 American soldiers killed? Cheney: "You wish there was never a casualty, Jonathan. You wish there as never a casualty, always regret casualties but we're at war. And we have to succeed where we begun this venture."

US, Allies To Push For New UN Sanctions Against Iran. The Financial Times (2/24, Dombey, Turner) notes, "Western countries said on Friday they would seek to agree new sanctions against Iran involving a travel ban, possibly an arms embargo, and a crackdown on export credits because of Tehran's failure this week to meet a United Nations deadline to curb its nuclear programme. But they acknowledged some measures, such as the export credits, could be difficult to agree among the [UNSC's] five permanent members, which meet on Monday with Germany to discuss next steps." Washington and Brussels "hope that by setting more modest goals, they will avoid the four-month long wrangle at the Security Council that preceded the imposition of previous sanctions against Iran last December."

An analysis piece in today's New York Times (2/24, Sanger, 1.16M) is entitled, "Leaving The Options Open With Iran." While "the Bush administration tries to rally allies to tighten sanctions on Iran yet again, it is sending mixed messages to Tehran about its commitment to a diplomatic solution, trying to create new openings for negotiations even while holding open, ever so vaguely, the possibility that the United States might some day resort to force." Citing statements yesterday by Cheney and Rice, the Times says "White House officials insist that there is no contradiction." The White House has declined to say at what point the Iranians will have pushed the United States too far," and sources says President Bush "is happy to leave the Iranians guessing." Anonymous Administration officials "said the carrier movements, the accusations about weapons in Iraq and the use of sanctions against the government were all intended to provide Mr. Bush with some leverage in dealing with Iran." Cheney "appears increasingly isolated now that many of his protégés have departed the Defense Department, the State Department and other corners of the administration."

DOJ_NMG_0136778

Rafsanjani Backtracks From "Conciliatory Stance." The Washington Times/AP (2/24, Karimi) carries comments by Ahmadinejad and "influential" former President Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani that international "critics of its nuclear program are 'bullying' Iran." Those remarks "appeared to show that the Iranian ruling establishment is closing ranks ahead of the possible new measures." While Rafsanjani "in recent weeks has emerged as a high-level advocate of a more conciliatory stance toward the West in the nuclear dispute," the AP says he "told worshippers gathered for Friday prayers in Tehran that Western countries would fail to achieve anything by pressuring Iran about its nuclear activities."

Richardson Says Only Diplomacy Can Achieve Success With Iran. In an op-ed in today's Washington Post (2/24, A19, 690K), New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson says, "The recent tentative agreement with North Korea over its nuclear program illustrates how diplomacy can work even with the most unsavory of regimes. Unfortunately, it took the Bush administration more than six years to commit to diplomacy." With regard to Iran, "President Bush refuses to talk, except to make threats. … This is not a strategy for peace. It is a strategy for war," and "saber-rattling is not a good way to get the Iranians to cooperate." Richardson asks the Administration "to engage directly with the Iranians and to lead a global diplomatic offensive to prevent them from building nuclear weapons. We need tough, direct negotiations, not just with Iran but also with our allies, especially Russia, to get them to support us in presenting Iran with credible carrots and sticks. … It is time for alliance-building, direct engagement and tough face-to-face negotiations. For the United States to attack Iran without exhausting all diplomatic options would be a terrible mistake."

El-Baradei Says North Korea Wants Renewed Nuclear Inspections. On its front page, the Washington Times/AP (2/24, Jahn) carries comments by IAEA head Mohamed El-Baradei that "North Korea on Friday asked [him] to visit four years after expelling his experts and dropping out of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty — an encouraging sign the reclusive regime is serious about dismantling its weapons program." El-Baradei "offered few details about his upcoming trip, which other agency officials said would likely occur in the second week of March. Still, his announcement was significant because it signaled the North's willingness to subject its nuclear program to outside scrutiny for the first time since" 2003. White House spokesman Tony Fratto "said the invitation shows North Korea is willing to begin executing the terms of the six-nation deal reached Feb. 13." AFP (2/24) titles its coverage, "US 'Very Pleased' About North Korean Invitation To UN Watchdog: Rice."

The Los Angeles Times (2/24, Drogin, 850K) calls the announcement a "breakthrough," and reports, "In a fresh sign of easing tensions, North Korean officials on Friday invited the chief of the United Nations' nuclear watchdog agency to come to [Pyongyang] next month to develop plans aimed at dismantling the nation's nuclear weapons program." El-Baradei "said that he hopes to discuss the 'shut-down and eventual abandonment' of the plutonium-producing reactor facility at Yongbyon, ending its ability to produce fuel for additional nuclear weapons."

An AP (2/23) story notes Kim Kye-Gwan, "North Korea's chief nuclear negotiator, plans to visit the United States within days for follow-up talks on a recent disarmament deal, a South Korean news report said Saturday." Kim plans to meet Assistant Secretary of State Chris Hill in New York late next week. "If Kim's trip takes place, it would be the first U.S. visit by North Korea's main nuclear envoy since the international standoff over the North's nuclear ambitions flared in late 2002."

Pakistan Says Waziristan Al Qaeda Team Killed US Diplomat. The New York Times (2/24, Gall, 1.16M) reports claims by Pakistani prosecutors that "the suicide bombing that killed" US diplomat David Foy in Karachi "last March, just before a visit by President Bush, was organized by a small cell of Pakistani militants and masterminded by an operative of Al Qaeda based in the Pakistan's tribal areas." Those charges were presented as "evidence — the result of months of investigations by the police, assisted by F.B.I. investigators — at the trial of two men accused in the plot," Anwar ul-Haq and Usman Ghani. "The case is one of the first in Pakistan to underline in court the links between splinter cells of Pakistani jihad groups and Qaeda operatives in Waziristan."

DOJ_NMG_0136779

Pakistan Tests Nuclear-Capable Missile. AFP (2/23) notes Pakistani military leaders' claims that they "test-fired [their] longest range nuclear-capable ballistic missile, two days after signing a deal with rival India to cut the risk of atomic weapons accidents." The Shaheen II, or Hatf VI, "missile with a range of 2,000 kilometres (1,240 miles) was launched from an undisclosed location" following notifications to "'neighboring countries.'" AFP says the "test comes at a key time in relations between New Delhi and Islamabad following the firebombing of a cross-border train at midnight Sunday, which killed 68 Pakistanis and Indians."

Turkey Charges Kurdish Politician With "Inciting Hatred." The Washington Post/AP (2/24, A12) reports, "A politician was charged Friday with inciting hatred and threatening public safety after suggesting that fellow Kurds would rise against the state and fight if Turkey ever attacked their Kurdish brethren in neighboring Iraq. Police detained Hilmi Aydogdu, leader of the Democratic Society Party's branch in the mainly Kurdish city of Diyarbakir, as he left a conference and questioned him over the remarks, said Nazmi Gur, a party spokesman. ... Turkish leaders are concerned that Iraq's Kurds want Kirkuk's oil revenue to fund a bid for independence that could encourage separatist Kurdish guerrillas in Turkey who have been fighting for autonomy since 1984."

US, Russia Not Among Cluster Bomb Ban Signatories. The Washington Times/AP (2/24, Mellgren) reports, "Forty-six nations adopted a declaration yesterday calling for a 2008 treaty banning cluster bombs, saying the weapons kill and maim long after conflicts end and inflict 'unacceptable harm' on civilians, particularly children." The AP notes that "some key arms makers -- including the United States, Russia, Israel and China -- snubbed the conference," while Poland, Romania and Japan "did not approve the final text."

UK Interested In Hosting US Missile Defense System. The New York Times (2/24, A4, Cowell, 1.16M) reports London and Washington "said Friday that they were discussing the stationing of an American antiballistic missile defense system on British soil." Prime Minister Tony Blair's "spokeswoman said Friday that Britain had been secretly lobbying for inclusion in the system for some time." The Times says the move "seems sure to prove contentious in Britain, and to cloud Mr. Blair's final months in office." The "negotiations are most likely to raise political hackles at a time when many in Mr. Blair's Labor Party and in the opposition Conservatives are pressing for Britain to distance itself from the United States after their close and sometimes unpopular alliance in Iraq." The Financial Times (2/24, Fidler, Adams, Dombey) cites British government sources claiming London "has pressed Washington to site important elements of the US missile defence system in the UK."

Russia Angered By US Radar, Missile Plans. The CBS Evening News (2/23, story 5, 2:20, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Russia today praised its armed forces as its relations with the U.S. seem to be sliding back to the Cold War era." CBS (Palmer): "The rhetoric coming out of Russia these days is real and aggressive. ... Russia's generals were furious with U.S. plans to put radar bases into the Czech Republic and a new missile defense system into Poland."

NYTimes Assails Bush Plan For Eastern Europe Sites. In an editorial entitled, "Misguided Missiles," the New York Times (2/24, A14, 1.16M) says "it would seem that everyone involved should know better. But the Bush administration's tone-deaf plan to station parts of a missile defense system in Eastern Europe and Moscow's snarling response show that all sides could use a refresher course in diplomatic sense and civility." The "mixture of crocodile tears and threats from Russian officials seems overly dramatic — and very much in character for President Vladimir Putin." Secretary Rice "should have expected Moscow's reaction," and she "should have known that provoking Moscow this way could be especially counterproductive." The Times concludes, "A few interceptors in Europe may or may not work against 'rogue states,' but they are counterproductive if all they do is to provoke Russia and irk NATO allies."

Prodi Lines Up Support Ahead Of Likely Return To Premiership. The New York Times (2/24, A8, Fisher, 1.16M) reports, "It wasn't love or even any real faith that they could stick together long. Rather, it seems, a singular frightening thought pushed nine bickering parties to agree late on Thursday to come together again: that Silvio Berlusconi might soon lead Italy again." Because recent polling "showed that Mr. Berlusconi's center-right coalition would probably win if elections were called now," the Times says "new elections seem unlikely at the moment." The "real worry that the center-left could again lose power, only nine months after wresting it from Mr. Berlusconi, seemed to concentrate minds overnight Thursday as the fractured parties in Mr. Prodi's coalition came together behind his demands."

DOJ_NMG_0136780

Under the headline, "Prodi aims to secure centre-left vote," the Financial Times (2/24, Barber) says "Italian political leaders continued their search for a new government on Friday as" Prodi "tried to strengthen his centre-left coalition and secure it a second term of office." His "aim is to ensure that if [Napolitano] asks him to form a new government, he will be able to count on the support of every single centre-left legislator in a subsequent vote of confidence." The AP (2/24, Rizzo) adds, "Center-left leaders rallied behind [Prodi] on Friday, boosting his chances of returning to office."

Chavez Conducts "Frenetic" Regional Diplomacy To Buttress Standing. The New York Times (2/24, A4, Romero, 1.16M) summarizes the "busy week" of diplomacy by Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez. He met in Caracas on Friday "with President Daniel Ortega of Nicaragua to discuss an array of Venezuelan assistance programs, capping an unusually frenetic week for this country's efforts to enhance its political and economic influence in parts of Latin America." The deals with Nicaragua, Ecuador and Argentina stem are part of "Venezuela's use of its windfall from historically high oil prices, and sometimes its own reserves and exports of oil, to lift its regional profile." Chavez "is using Venezuela's oil revenues, valued at more than $50 billion a year, to counter the influence of the United States and multilateral lending organizations like the International Monetary Fund."

Motives Behind Citgo Campaign Questioned. Under the headline, "Is Citgo Program For Poor, Or For Chávez?" the Washington Post (2/24, D1, Birnbaum, Mufson, 690K) notes, "Citgo, the Venezuela-owned oil company, is running television commercials across the United States promoting the discounted heating oil it provides to low-income people -- but some are wondering whether the ads are really promoting the South American country's leader." Citgo "said the ads … are designed to persuade families to sign up for the charitable program. Critics of Venezuela, however, see both political and economic motives -- primarily to enhance the image of the country's leftist leader, Hugo Chávez, and thereby improve the company's standing with U.S. consumers." The Post adds, "Some observers, while praising the program's generosity, believe that more is involved than good deeds."

Hong Kong's Tsang Said To "Juggle" Roles. The Wall Street Journal (2/24, A9, Kissel, 2.04M) conducts an extensive interview of Hong Kong chief executive Donald Tsang entitled, "Tsangfroid." He is "part of a grand juggling act, protecting Hong Kong's cherished freedoms while integrating the place – carefully, it's hard work, doing the best that we can, he'll tell you -- into the mainland's booming economy." The Journal says he "is 'running' for 're-election' in a rigged campaign where Beijing still picks the winner." For his part, Tsang "has focused his energies on the economy," and he has "a vision for Hong Kong as a nexus for capital not unlike that of London for Europe, or New York for the Americas." His "eagerness to bet Hong Kong's future on the mainland is genuine: He is undoubtedly a Chinese patriot. But why should this capitalist city scramble to join the Communist Party's five-year industrial plan? Other actions, too, hint that the Hong Kong government is starting to stray from the free-market policies that made it so rich."

THE BIG PICTURE

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"Iraq Allies, Washington Clash Over Key Policy."
"Drug Cartel's Betrayer Tells His Story."
"Passenger Bill Of Rights' Shaky Start."

New York Times:

"Canadian Court Limits Detention In Terror Cases."
"U.S. Seizes Son Of A Top Shiite, Stirring Uproar."
"At $45 Billion, New Contender For Top Buyout."
"Record Fine Expected For Univision."
"Retired Politicians Spend Unused Campaign Funds."
"New Airport X-Rays Scan Bodies, Not Just Bags."
"Family Hands Off Its Business, And Its Philosophy."

Washington Post:

"Colleges Go Online To Calm The Admissions Jitters."
"Democrats Offer Up Chairmen For Donors."
"Review Of Walter Reed Is Ordered."
"Iraq Rebuilding Short On Qualified Civilians."
"Abuse Victims Demand More From Church."
"Fannie Mae Shuts Down Foundation."

DOJ_NMG_0136781

Washington Times:
"N. Korea Invites U.N. Inspector."
"GOP Rejects Iraq Measure."
"Arkansas' Historic School Case Ends."
"And The Nominees Are... From All Over."
"American Hot Wax Is Still Cool."
"Cameras Nab Cops Going To Emergencies."
"Vilsack Calls It Quits For '08."

Detroit Free Press:
"Investors Circle Chrysler."
"Who Is Tara Grant?"
"Woman: Cops Lost My $56k Diamond."
"Home Magic Disappears."
"Chrysler Eyes Site In Van Buren."
"DPS Investigates $1m Art Purchase."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"On A Mission For Vietnam POWs."
"Judge Wants Jail Reports Audited."
"The Fight For Kids' Health Care."
"Watch Out For Some Gridlock."
"Morris Brown Marks 126 Years."
"Ex-Inmate Wins Round Vs. Fulton."
"Hospital Law Catches Feds' Eye."
"Marta Rail In Alpharetta?"

Dallas Morning News:
"Animal House Gets Raided."
"TXU May Get Record Buyout."
"Teammates Of Grapevine Player Wait And Pray."
"Drug Dogs To Be Used To Fight 'Cheese.'"
"Director Of Juvenile Justice Agency Stepping Down."
"Obama Reels In Austin Crowd."
"Moroney Remembered For Service To Parish, Family, Belo."

Houston Chronicle:
"Some Lottery Games Offer No Chance."
"Privacy Fears Greet Body Scanner's Airport Debut."
"Your Fashionable Faux Fur Could Be Lassie's Coat."
"Fort Bend Toxic Suicide Bid May Lead To Charges."
"Latin Filmmakers Make Strong Oscar Showing."
"T-Mac Gets 37, But Rockets Fall To Hawks."
"Chevron Bets On Galveston Biodiesel Plant."
"NASA Lacked Plan For Earthly Astronaut Breakdown."
"Death Row Appeal: Two Couldn't Fire Same Bullet."
"Ebony Opera Guild Offers Spirituals."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Hybrid Car Mileage; Cheney-Iraq; Carter-Iraq; Iraq Incident; Gates-Walter Reed; Vilsack Quits Presidential Race; TSA Screening; Dr. Pepper Guerilla Marketing; Sexualized Media Images; Cervical Cancer Vaccine.
CBS: Congress-Iraq; Military Opposition To War; Gates-Walter Reed; Vilsack Quits Presidential Race; Clinton/Obama; Gates-Russia; Airline Industry; Hybrid Car Mileage; Gym Teacher-Unicycling.
NBC: Gates-Walter Reed; Congress-Iraq; Congress-Iraq Analysis; Gulf Coast Company-Katrina; Economic Report; Elder Care-VA Benefits; Little Rock Schools; Oscar Nominees; Taco Bell Rodents; Juvenile Cardiac Arrest.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — No public schedule.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: Not in session

US House: Not in session.

Other: GOVERNORS _ The National Governors Association holds its Winter Meeting. Highlights: 10 a.m. News conference with Chair Gov. Janet Napolitano of Arizona, others. 1 p.m. Session on "Innovation America," with Cisco Systems CEO John Chambers and Robert Rubin of Citigroup. 6:30 p.m. Reception honoring the governors. Italian Embassy, 3000 Whitehaven St. NW. Note: receiving line photo op at 6:30 p.m. Remarks at 7 p.m. Location: JW Marriott, 1331 Pennsylvania Ave, NW, unless otherwise noted. Contacts: Jodi Omear, 202-624-5346

BREAST CANCER SURVIVORS _ More than 800 young breast cancer survivors, their caregivers and medical professionals gather for the 7th Annual Conference for Young Women Affected by Breast Cancer, the only international meeting dedicated to the unique needs of young breast cancer survivors. Location: Hyatt Regency-Crystal City, 2799 Jefferson Davis Hwy., Arlington, Va. Contacts: Karen Borack, 212-242-4629

JEWISH COMMUNITY POLICY _ Jewish leaders from the United States and Canada meet to debate, analyze and vote the Jewish community's domestic and international policy at the 2007 Jewish Council for Public Affairs plenum.

DOJ_NMG_0136782

Location: Omni Shoreham Hotel, 2500 Calvert St. NW Contacts: 202-265-3000

RELIGIOUS LEADERS-IRAN _ 9 a.m. A delegation of U.S. religious leaders returning from a week-long trip to Iran will hold a press conference to brief reporters on their meetings with the Iranian president and Iranian religious leaders. This is the first religious delegation to meet with an Iranian president in Iran since the revolution in 1979. Location: National Press Club, Zenger Room. Contacts: Jack Pannell, 202-745-4614

ARCHIVES DECLASSIFICATION _ 9 a.m. - 12 p.m. The National Archives hosts the 11th meeting of the Public Intertest Declassification Board. Location: Room 700, National Archives and Records Administration. Contacts: Lee Morrison, 202-357-5039

DEAN _ 9:30 a.m. DNC Chairman Howard Dean participates in the National Black Leadership Roundtable Summit. Location: Howard University law school, 2900 Van Ness St. NW. Contacts: Stacie Paxton, 202-863-8148

Copyright 2007 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
Canadian Court Rules Against Indefinite Detention Of Terrorism Suspects ... 2
Schoomaker Plays Down Value Of Catching Bin Laden ... 2
Padilla Co-Defendants Seek Separate Trial ... 2
Judge Orders Psychological Evaluation Of Illinois Terror Suspect ... 3

Homeland Response:
Minnesota Man Sentenced To 10 Years For Courthouse Bomb Plot ... 3
FBI Investigating Mayo Clinic Scientist Over Potassium Cyanide Purchase ... 3
TSA Unveils New Body Scanning Machine ... 3

War News:
Democratic Efforts To Rewrite War Authorization Cast As Certain To Fail ... 3
Gates Calls Walter Reed Conditions "Unacceptable." ... 4
Arrest Of Shiite Politician's Son By US Troops Stirs Uproar ... 5
US Disappointed In Lack Of Iraqi Progress In Integrating Baathists ... 6
Bachmann Backs Down From Comments About Iranian Partition Plan For Iraq ... 6
Americans Underestimate Iraqi Death Toll ... 6
Civilian Staffing Shortages Said To Hinder Iraqi Reconstruction ... 6
Active Troops Who Oppose War Profiled ... 6
Watada Is Charged Again ... 7
WSJournal Lauds Prince Harry's Deployment ... 7
More UK Troops Headed To Afghanistan ... 7

DOJ:
Eighth US Attorney Announces Resignation ... 7

Corporate Scandals:
DOJ Launches Probe Of KB Homes Stock Option Grants ... 7
SEC Probing Citigroup Associates Deal ... 8

Criminal Law:
Pennsylvania Murder Suspect Seeks To Avoid Death Penalty ... 8
FBI Releases Sketch Of West Virginia Child Rape Suspect ... 8
Former Alabama Mayor Sentenced To 10 Years In Prison ... 9
Florida Lawyer Convicted Of Obstruction In Keys Bribery Probe ... 9
Gunman Who Abducted Florida Boy Still At Large ... 9
Four Florida Cops Caught In FBI Mob Sting ... 9
Veteran FBI Analyst Sentenced To Seven Years For Sex With Child ... 10

Civil Rights:
Some Christian Groups Critical Of DOJ Religious Freedom Initiative ... 10
FBI Could Reopen Dozens Of Civil Rights Cold Cases ... 10
Judge Lifts Federal Supervision Of Little Rock Schools ... 11
Rhode Island AG Says Sister's Union Did Not Influence Gay Marriage Ruling ... 11
NYTimes Applauds New Jersey Court's Decision On Gay Students ... 12

Antitrust:
KKR, TPG Close In On Mammoth Deal For Texas Power Company ... 12
FCC Expected To Hit Univision With Record Fine ... 13
VMware Goes Up Against Microsoft ... 14
NYTimes Urges Caution In Review Of Satellite Radio Merger ... 14
Experts Say Music Consumers Will Not Be Immediately Affected By MP3 Patent Ruling ... 14

Environment:
Bush Touts Alternative Fuel Vehicles ... 15
BP Settles Two Suits Over 2005 Refinery Blast ... 15

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
Location Of Suspected Mexican Drug Kingpin's Arrest At Center Of Legal Dispute ... 15
ATF Says Homemade Pipe Bombs Often Lethal ... 16

Immigration:
Decision To Allow Mexican Trucks On US Roads Meets Opposition ... 16

Tax:
IRS Urged To Pursue eBay Sellers ... 17

Congress-Administration:
Administration's Proposed Medicaid Cuts Draw Governors' Criticism ... 17
Cheney Refuses To Retract Criticism Of Pelosi's Stance On Iraq 17
Committee Chairmen Featured In Democrats' Fundraising Blitz 17

Travelers' Advocates Skeptical Of Proposed Federal "Bill Of Rights" Legislation 18
NYTimes Seconds Justice Kennedy On Higher Judiciary Salaries 18

Other News:

Stocks Close Week On "Down Note." 18
Several Governors Proposing Large Spending Hikes 18
No Voting Machine Errors Found In FL13 Audit 19
Citing Money, Vilsack Quits Presidential Race 19
Giuliani, McCain Both Lead Clinton In Rasmussen Matchups 20
With Spat With Clinton Still Fresh, Obama Campaigns In Texas 20
Clinton Says Husband Would Have Diplomatic Role Under Her Administration 21
South Carolina Democratic Official To Run Richardson State Campaign 21
Biden Says Iraq Issue, First Four States Key To His Chances ... 21
Gore Oscar Win Could Revive Presidential Campaign Talk 21
Leading GOP Presidential Contenders Grapple With Abortion Issue 21
McCain Suggests His Iraq Stance Could End His Political Career 22
Nevada GOP Decides Against Early Caucus 22
Napolitano Says Democratic Nominee Will Be Competitive In Arizona 22
Candidates Begin "Quadrennial Groveling" To Early State Opinion Leaders 22
Schwarzenegger Will Not Rule Out Senate Run, Will Back GOP Presidential Nominee 22
Research On Adult Stem Cells Comes Into Question 23
In Australia, Cheney Reiterates Stance On China, North Korea, Iran 23
US, Allies To Push For New UN Sanctions Against Iran 23
El-Baradei Says North Korea Wants Renewed Nuclear Inspections 24
Pakistan Says Waziristan Al Qaeda Team Killed US Diplomat... 24
Pakistan Tests Nuclear-Capable Missile 24
Turkey Charges Kurdish Politician With "Inciting Hatred." 24
US, Russia Not Among Cluster Bomb Ban Signatories 25
UK Interested In Hosting US Missile Defense System 25
Prodi Lines Up Support Ahead Of Likely Return To Premiership 25
Chavez Conducts "Frenetic" Regional Diplomacy To Buttress Standing 25
Hong Kong's Tsang Said To "Juggle" Roles 26

The Big Picture

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 26

Washington's Schedule

Today's Events In Washington 27

TERRORISM NEWS:

Canadian Court Rules Against Indefinite Detention Of Terrorism Suspects. The New York Times (2/24, A1, Austen, 1.16M) reports, "Canada's highest court on Friday unanimously struck down a law that allows the Canadian government to detain foreign-born terrorism suspects indefinitely using secret evidence and without charges while their deportations are being reviewed. … The three men who brought the case are likely to remain jailed or under strict parole because the court suspended its decision for a year to allow Parliament to introduce a law consistent with the ruling. The AP (2/23, Duff-Brown) reports, "The court said the men and their lawyers should have a right to respond to the evidence used against them by intelligence agents and noted that a law in Britain allows special advocates to review sensitive intelligence material."

The Washington Post (2/24, A10, Struck, 690K) reports, "Supporters of the men hailed the ruling as a victory for civil rights but acknowledged that it did not entirely sweep away the procedures for holding suspects without trial that critics here have called 'Canada's Guantanamo North.' … Stockwell Day, the government's minister of public safety, said in Ottawa that 'in general, the Supreme Court upheld the security certificates. We will look at the changes the court said are necessary.'"

Schoomaker Plays Down Value Of Catching Bin Laden. The Washington Post (2/24, A8, 690K) reports, "The Army's highest-ranking officer said Friday that he was unsure whether the U.S. military would capture or kill Osama bin Laden, adding, 'I don't know that it's all that important, frankly.'" Outgoing Army Chief of Staff Peter Schoomaker "pointed to the capture of Saddam Hussein, the killings of his sons, Uday and Qusay, and the killing of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi as evidence that the capture or death of al-Qaeda's leader would have little effect on threats to the United States." While President Bush had "reaffirmed the goal [of catching bin Laden] last September in a prime-time speech ... Schoomaker's remarks echoed comments last year by Vice President Cheney, who seemed to play down the value of capturing or killing bin Laden."

Padilla Co-Defendants Seek Separate Trial. The New York Times (2/24, A13, Sontag, 1.16M) reports, "As a competency hearing for Jose Padilla gets under way in federal court…his co-defendants in a terrorism conspiracy case are seeking separate trials because of what they fear is the taint of his notoriety as the accused 'dirty bomber.'" Padilla "was never charged with the plot to use a radiological dirty bomb that senior administration officials initially accused him of hatching. But Adham Amin Hassoun and Kifah Wael Jayyousi, Mr. Padilla's co-defendants, say 'spill-over prejudice' would be inevitable. They have filed separate motions to sever their cases from Mr. Padilla's, the latest in a series of challenges that are complicating the government's efforts to prosecute the case."

DOJ_NMG_0136785

Judge Orders Psychological Evaluation Of Illinois Terror Suspect. The Rockford Register Star (2/24, Wiser) reported, "A 22-year-old Genoa man whom authorities accuse of plotting to kill holiday shoppers with hand grenades will have to undergo psychological evaluation before the case against him proceeds. U.S. District Judge David H. Coar ordered the evaluation of Derrick Shareef during a court hearing Friday in the Dirksen federal courthouse. Shareef's attorney, Michael Mann of Maywood, requested the evaluation." The Register Star noted, "Authorities said Shareef revealed his plans to an informant who was working with the Federal Bureau of Investigation's Joint-Terrorism Task Force." The AP (2/24, Robinson) added, "Assistant U.S. Attorney Jake Ryan did not object to the examination. Coar said the competency examination should be performed within 30 days and set April 6 for a hearing on the results."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Minnesota Man Sentenced To 10 Years For Courthouse Bomb Plot. The St. Paul Pioneer Press (2/24, Gurnon) reported, "A Kenyon, Minn., man who threatened to blow up the Rice County Courthouse was sentenced in federal court in Minneapolis on Thursday to 10 years in prison." Allan Talmage Weatherford "pleaded guilty in September to possession of a destructive device. When officials searched Weatherford's 160-acre farm in 2005 and 2006, they found nearly 50 firearms, including a .50-caliber military sniping rifle, as well as an explosive device and two propane tanks filled with a mixture of fertilizer and petroleum — the same combination used in the Oklahoma City bombing." The Pioneer Press added, "He planned to target the courthouse and the county law enforcement center, officials said."

FBI Investigating Mayo Clinic Scientist Over Potassium Cyanide Purchase. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (2/24, Browning) reported, "A research scientist and associate professor of medicine at the Mayo Clinic in Rochester is under investigation by the FBI for purchasing potassium cyanide for use as 'a chemical weapon' in connection with a domestic dispute, according to a federal search warrant unsealed this week in St. Paul." Sreekumar Raghavakaimal is charged "with felony terroristic threats, felony false imprisonment, gross misdemeanor interference with a 911 emergency call, and misdemeanor domestic assault, according to Julie Germann, the prosecutor in the case." The Star Tribune notes that "Raghavakaimal's estranged wife said they had argued over a ring he wanted returned."

TSA Unveils New Body Scanning Machine. The New York Times (2/24, A1, Giblin, Lipton, 1.16M) reports, "X-ray vision has come to the airport checkpoint" in Phoenix "courtesy of federal aviation security officials who have installed a new device that peeks underneath passengers' clothing to search for guns, bombs or liquid explosives. The new body scanning machine…will screen only volunteers, at least initially. Transportation Security Administration officials want to make sure the machine is reliable and fast enough to replace the traditional pat-down — and that it does not provoke too many protests. Security officials examining the head-to-toe images work in a closed booth, hidden from public view, agency officials said. Special 'privacy' software intentionally blurs the image, creating an outline of a body that is clear enough to see a collarbone, bellybutton or weapon, but flattens details of revealing contours."

ABC World News (2/23, story 7, 2:00, Nauert, 8.78M) ran a report on the "controversial x-ray scanner that peers right through a person's clothing," demonstrating its use and the images produced. Nauert said TSA "plans to roll out the new x-ray at Los Angeles and New York's JFK airports. It that goes well, the Backscatter may be headed to airports across America."

WAR NEWS:

Democratic Efforts To Rewrite War Authorization Cast As Certain To Fail. As Senate Democrats led by Sen. Joseph Biden push a plan to rewrite the 2002 congressional authorization for the use of force in Iraq, Republicans warn that the proposed changes would put heavy demands on US forces in the field. Reports cast the measure as dead on arrival, unlikely to get the 60 votes needed to break a certain filibuster, and sure to be vetoed by President Bush even if it could. While CBS led with the story and ABC and NBC also ran reports near the top of their newscasts, only the Washington Times among major newspapers puts it on the front page.

The CBS Evening News (2/23, lead story, 2:15, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported Democrats "are trying a new strategy in their battle with President Bush over the war in Iraq. After failing to push through a non-binding resolution opposing the war, Senate Democrats are now out to force the President to change the way the war is being fought." CBS (Axelrod): "Democrats looking for a politically effective way to oppose the war think they've found a winner: rewriting the four-year-old resolution that gave President Bush the power to put troops in Iraq in the first place. The idea started with Sen. Joe Biden." Biden: "That mission is finished, done. There were no weapons, Saddam's gone, they are in compliance." Axelrod: "Democrats want a narrower mission: denying terrorists a safe haven in Iraq, and training Iraqi troops to secure their own country. Fewer U.S. troops would be needed, and the drawdown could start early next year. Lee Hamilton, who co-chaired the Iraq Study Group, says this is the Democrats' best chance to oppose the war but avoid divisive arguments on supporting the troops."

DOJ_NMG_0136786

NBC Nightly News (2/23, story 2, 1:30, Gregory, 9.87M) called it "kind of do-over, a rewrite of the resolution they approved in 2002." But most Democrats "appear unwilling to cut off war funding as the President requests another $100 billion for Iraq and Afghanistan." Today the White House asserted that though the war has changed, the President has the sole authority to set the strategy." NBC's Tim Russert said, "The Democratic base is strongly against this war. They want something other than a non-binding resolution. They want action. ... The problem: Republicans will filibuster and the Democrats do not have the 60 votes to break that filibuster." And on ABC World News (2/23, story 3, Gibson, 8.78M), George Stephanopoulos said, "Even if they had the votes for this, there is no wait the President would sign it."

The AP (2/23, Loven) reports Senate Democrats said their "next challenge to President Bush's Iraq war policy would require the gradual withdrawal of U.S. combat troops beginning within 120 days. The draft legislation also declares the war 'requires principally a political solution' rather than a military one." But the "odds against it ever becoming law are high, and the White House and Senate Republicans were quick to denounce it."

The New York Times (2/24, A6, Stolberg, Broder, 1.16M) reports, "Some Democrats acknowledge that they are in a sticky situation as they try to map out a strategy that will appease the antiwar left, which is pushing for conditions on war financing, without alienating moderate Democrats and Republicans who fear being painted as unsupportive of the troops. ... As they search for consensus, Democrats must also worry about a wild card in the debate" in the form of Independent Democrat Joseph Lieberman, "a strong supporter of the war who has hinted that he might become a Republican if Democrats go too far in trying to rein in Mr. Bush."

The Washington Times (2/24, Ward, Dinan, 88K) says on its front page that Republicans "rejected the Democrats' plan to withdraw Congress' 2002 vote to invade Iraq." The Washington Post (2/24, A4, Murray, 690K) reports Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell "warned yesterday that a new Democratic effort to repeal the 2002 Iraq war resolution would meet the same fate as two previous efforts to limit President Bush's authority: blocked by procedural obstacles, unless Democrats relent to GOP terms. ... He warned that Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, the U.S. military commander in Iraq, would 'have to surround himself with lawyers' to comply with the new resolution that senior Democrats are drafting."

Biden Says Bush "Misusing" Authority Under 2002 Authorization. Biden said on CNN's The Situation Room (2/23, Blitzer), "The President's authority, the way he is using it, he's misusing it. The rationale for him being in Iraq no longer exists. We went there, gave him authority to take out weapons of mass destruction, which never existed; take down Saddam, who is dead' and force compliance with the UN resolutions that are already enforced. … We've got to redefine the mission. It's a process. We got to bang it away. Carl Levin and I are working hard with our leadership to try to make this case. We may not get it initially, but we will eventually." Blitzer: "Have you done any check to see if there is an historic precedent whereby the Congress has authorized the president to use force in one specific engagement and then withdrawn that authorization?" Biden: "To the best of my knowledge, there hasn't been one, but there has never been a president as irresponsible in the use of that force as this president has been. So this is a new precedent."

On MSNBC's Hardball (2/23, Matthews), Biden said, "What I propose and Carl Levin is joining me, or I am joining him, is a resolution that repeals the authority he was given, what authority he was he given to deal with weapons of mass destruction, take down Saddam Hussein if need be, and force compliance with UN resolutions that Saddam Hussein was violating. All three of those goals are met and now the President is plunging us further into a civil war where there is self-sustaining sectarian violence. And he is taking us down a very, very dangerous path."

Gates Calls Walter Reed Conditions "Unacceptable." NBC Nightly News (2/23, lead story, 3:00, Yang, 9.87M) reported, "Today the very top of the military's chain of command got involved in dealing with the disturbing treatment of outpatients here at Walter Reed Army Medical Center." Defense Secretary Robert Gates "called it unacceptable treatment for those who've given so much for their country." Gates: "They should not have to recuperate in substandard housing, nor should they be expected to tackle mountains of paperwork." Yang: "At Walter Reed, it's been…a frantic mission of damage control. … But not everyone's on the same page. Yesterday, the Army's surgeon general, a former Walter Reed commander, said the news coverage has been unfair." The New York Times (2/24, A10, Cloud, 1.16M) says "the Post reports prompted several days of damage control by Army and Pentagon officials that have veered between acknowledging the situation and playing it down."

DOJ_NMG_0136787

ABC World News (2/23, story 5, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported Gates "visited Walter Reed Medical center to see for himself the conditions there. He announced the formation of a review board that would report back in 45 days. ... He called the situation unacceptable." The CBS Evening News (2/23, story 3, :20, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported Gates "went there today following reports of substandard living conditions, including mold and roaches. Gates said hospital officials will be held accountable for the, quote, unacceptable conditions."

On its front page, the Washington Post (2/24, A1, Vogel, 690K) reports Gates "also warned that senior military leaders could be disciplined based on the findings of the review group. ... The Senate Armed Services Committee has tentatively scheduled hearings on the facility for March 6." The Los Angeles Times (2/24, Barnes, 850K) reports, "The review ordered by Gates will focus on rehabilitative care and administrative procedures at Walter Reed and the National Naval Medical Center." Defense officials "have said that there are no allegations of systemic problems at Bethesda or other military hospitals, but Gates said the commission would be able to examine all military hospitals." The AP (2/23) reports that despite Gates's promise to hold officials "accountable," "no one in the Army chain of command has so far offered to resign."

Army Attempted "Preemptive" Briefing Before WPost Expose. In a critical piece, Washington Post (2/24, 690K) columnist Howard Kurtz reports differences of opinion between the Army and the press: "The Post last week gave the Army six days to respond to the paper's investigation ... The Army's public affairs office used the time to summon journalists from other news organizations to a briefing at which Walter Reed's commander responded to the findings -- in an article that had not yet been published." Los Angeles Times reporter Peter Spiegel said, "It made us feel very uncomfortable that we were being set up to be the Army's public affairs arm." Post reporter Dana Priest complained about the Army's behavior, "Do you think I'm going to be willing next time to give you that much time to respond, if you're going to turn around and tell my competitors?"

WPost Says DOD "Responding Quickly" To Many Problems. The Washington Post (2/24, 690K) editorializes, "After a week of terrible publicity, the Defense Department seems to be responding quickly to many of the problems The Post found in a four-month investigation at Walter Reed Army Medical Center. But so far, the most disturbing problem uncovered in The Post's series is getting the least public acknowledgment from generals and journalists alike. ... Post reporters found that the stresses on outpatients at Walter Reed included not only their physical recovery, dank rooms or long waits but also the difficulty they have in getting fair disability compensation. … Veterans too seriously wounded to return to active duty should get the benefits they deserve without having to beg for them."

Arrest Of Shiite Politician's Son By US Troops Stirs Uproar. ABC World News (2/23, story 4, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "An incident in Iraq is threatening to complicate U.S./-Iraqi relations. The Bush Administration has gone to great lengths courting one of Iraq's most powerful Shiite leaders, but today US troops arrested his son and held him for 11 hours after he entered Iraq from Iran. The US ambassador was very apologetic."

The New York Times (2/24, A1, Oppel, 1.16M) reports, "American troops seized and then released the eldest son of Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, perhaps the most powerful Shiite political leader in Iraq, after he crossed the border from Iran into Iraq on Friday morning. ... Allies of the Hakim family denounced the detention as a serious insult, and a senior adviser to the family asserted that American forces also had assaulted several guards. The Hakims control the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, the backbone of the Shiite political alliance that has dominated politics during the occupation."

The Los Angeles Times (2/24, Berthelsen, 850K) reports Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad "quickly apologized for the incident." Hakim "complained of being treated roughly at the hands of the soldiers, including being blindfolded as he was transported to a military base and having his underwear searched once he arrived there." The Times adds, "News of Hakim's arrest drew widespread attention Friday, a day of relative calm in Iraq. Police patrols discovered the bodies of five men shot to death around the capital, a daily toll far lower than usual."

The Washington Post (2/24, A12, Londono, 690K) reports the senior Hakim, "who met with President Bush during a visit to Washington in December, spent many years in exile in Iran and has close ties to that country." The Washington Times/AP (2/24, Murphy) reports, "Even though the U.S. ambassador issued a rapid apology, the decision to hold Amar al-Hakim risks touching off a backlash from Shi'ite leaders at a time when their cooperation is needed most."

Crackdown Said To Be "Curbing Violence." The Financial Times (2/24, Negus) reports, "US officials claim their forces are slowly expanding their presence in the capital and curbing the sectarian violence that left tens of thousands dead last year. Many Iraqis, however, say that fighting has continued unabated, while a high-profile rape case linked to the crackdown has heightened tensions between the Sunni and Shia communities. ... Iraqi officials claim the sectarian death toll has already fallen as a result of the increased troop presence ... Maj Gen Caldwell and other commanders, however, have cautioned that it is too early to call the operation a success, and that the true impact will not be seen for months."

DOJ_NMG_0136788

Car Bombing Kills Four In Baghdad. The AP (2/24) reports, "Car bomb blasts hit parts of Baghdad on Saturday in attacks apparently targeting security forces involved in an ongoing campaign to restore order in the capital. At least four civilians were killed and nearly 10 injured, police said."

Stryker Team Called Crucial To Security Plan. The Los Angeles Times (2/24, Susman, 850K) reports about Army Spc. Aurelio Cazares and his Stryker unit, "There aren't many things that worry him as he steers the 22-ton troop carrier ... through Baghdad's streets. ... Nothing, though, can guarantee protection from some of the armor-piercing explosives plaguing U.S. forces in Iraq. Since August, three men from Cazares' 3rd Stryker Brigade Combat Team, from the Army's 2nd Infantry Division, have died in such attacks. ... Since U.S. and Iraqi forces put a new Baghdad security plan into high gear last week, the Stryker team has been at the forefront of sweeps and patrols, some lasting 20 hours at a stretch. For the soldiers of the brigade, it has meant little sleep and the majority of their waking hours inside the dark, cramped interiors of the Strykers, whose bulk, speed and armor have made them the vehicle of choice in Baghdad's riskiest operations." The Times admiringly describes the vehicle's assets: "The Strykers reach a speed of 65 mph and are relatively quiet as they trundle through the streets, giving them a stealth quality other troop carriers lack. In addition to their armor, they are surrounded by a cage-like shield designed to repel rocket-propelled grenades."

US Disappointed In Lack Of Iraqi Progress In Integrating Baathists. The Los Angeles Times (2/24, Richter, 850K) reports on its front page, "Serious new divisions have emerged between the Bush administration and its Iraqi allies over the Baghdad government's refusal to enact a reform that the White House considers crucial to its new strategy for bringing the country's violence under control. ... legislation that would ease rules barring former members of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party from government service has been blocked by the country's Shiite-dominated parliament." US officials had "repeatedly expressed confidence that Nouri al-Maliki, the prime minister, would work for passage of 'de-Baathification' reform. However, they now have begun to express disappointment at the Iraqi stalemate. ... The dimming prospects for reform hold troubling implications for the administration's new strategy on Iraq, which relies heavily on political reconciliation between Sunnis Arabs and Shiites as a way to stem the sectarian violence."

Bachmann Backs Down From Comments About Iranian Partition Plan For Iraq. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (2/24, Black, 395K) reports Rep. Michele Bachmann "claimed two weeks ago to know of an Iranian plan for the partition of Iraq in which Iran would control half the country and set it up as 'a terrorist safe haven zone' and a staging area for attacks around the Middle East and on the United States. The existence of such a plan has not been suggested publicly by the Bush administration or other officials." Bachmann "retracted the first [statement by her] in several important respects."

Americans Underestimate Iraqi Death Toll. The AP (2/23, Benac) reports that polled Americans "woefully underestimate the number of Iraqi civilians who have been killed." While "Seventeen percent in the poll know someone [from the US] who has been killed or wounded in Iraq," "The number of Iraqis killed, however, is much harder to pin down, and that uncertainty is perhaps reflected in Americans' tendency to lowball the Iraqi death toll by tens of thousands. ... The U.N. Assistance Mission for Iraq reports more than 34,000 deaths in 2006 alone. Among those polled for the AP survey, however, the median estimate of Iraqi deaths was 9,890."

Civilian Staffing Shortages Said To Hinder Iraqi Reconstruction. In a story on its front page today, the Washington Post (2/24, Chandrasekaran, 690K) details efforts to fully staff Provincial Reconstruction Teams (PRTs) and other civilian slots in Iraq. "Almost four years after the United States set about trying to rebuild Iraq, the job remains overwhelmingly unfinished." PRTs like those in Diyala "are often understaffed and underqualified -- and almost unable to work outside the military outposts where they are hunkered down for security reasons. Today, there are just 10 of the 30-person teams operating in all of Iraq." President Bush's "new plan" to double the number of PRTs "is running into what [some] officials familiar with their work described as the problems that have plagued the U.S. government effort from the start: Turf wars between federal agencies. Outright refusal to fill certain vital posts by some departments. A State Department in charge of the teams that just doesn't have any agronomists, engineers, police officers or technicians of its own to send to Iraq."

Active Troops Who Oppose War Profiled. The CBS Evening News (2/23, story 2, 2:20, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "There is new opposition to the war tonight, and it comes from the very Americans fighting it, men and women in uniform. Hundreds of them are very publicly asking Congress to stop it." CBS (Logan): "The fight in hostile Anbar province has been more deadly for U.S. forces than anywhere else in Iraq. ... That's part of the reason over 1,000 servicemen and women have done something normally unthinkable for the military -- protest a war they're in the middle of fighting. Their interviews will be on '60 Minutes' this Sunday. ... They've all sent a petition called Appeal for Redress to their individual members of Congress, letting them know that staying in Iraq will not work, and it's time for U.S. troops to come home."

DOJ_NMG_0136789

Watada Is Charged Again. The AP (2/24, Johnson) reports the Army refiled charges Friday against First Lt. Ehren Watada, "who refused to serve in Iraq, about two weeks after his first court-martial was declared a mistrial." Watada's attorney "said he would seek to have the charges dismissed as a violation of the Constitution's protection against double jeopardy." The Los Angeles Times (2/24, 850K) carries an abbreviated version of this article.

WSJournal Lauds Prince Harry's Deployment. The Wall Street Journal (2/24, 2.04M) editorializes that while "Cornet Harry Wales is probably not a latter-day King Henry V," it is "hard not to be struck by the sight of a European royal who wants something more from life than to appear regularly in the pages of Hello! ... The Prince's decision is all the more courageous given that he will surely become a prime target for jihadists seeking a trophy kill. No less admirable is the Prince bucking the antiwar tide of British public opinion."

More UK Troops Headed To Afghanistan. The Washington Times/AP (2/24, French) reports, "Britain said yesterday it would send additional troops to southern Afghanistan in response to NATO's call to bolster forces in the region, days after the country said it plans to withdraw 1,600 troops from Iraq in coming months. ... The Defense Ministry refused to confirm reports in the British press that an additional 1,000 troops were to be sent. ... In particular, the reluctance of France, Spain, Italy, Germany and Turkey to provide more combat troops has caused frustration among nations on the front lines." Meanwhile, Taliban commander "Mullah Dadullah said the extra weapons the Taliban were being supplied -- he did not say from where -- included the ability to bring down the NATO and U.S. helicopters crucial to their operations in this rugged, mountainous country."

New Al Qaeda Video Purports To Show Attack. The AP (2/23) reports, "Al Qaeda posted a 56-second video Friday of rockets being fired at what it claimed was a U.S. military base in Afghanistan. The tape appeared to be the latest in a series of videos that the terror network has released to convey that its insurgents are faring well in the Afghan war. ... Its authenticity could not be independently confirmed."

Afghans Perceive Decline Since 2005. The Washington Post (2/24, A11, Witte, 690K) reports in a pessimistic article, "Conditions in Afghanistan have deteriorated markedly since 2005, with rising violence, government corruption and misguided U.S. efforts contributing to growing unease among the population, according to a report released yesterday based in part on 1,000 interviews with ordinary Afghans. Although there were bright spots -- a better overall economy and more rights for women -- the report's authors found diminishing security as the Taliban steps up its attacks, a discredited justice system and a severe lack of basic services such as electricity." The report by CSIS and USAID "found that Afghans tend to be more negative in their outlook than official statistics or media accounts would suggest."

DOJ:

Eighth US Attorney Announces Resignation. The Washington Post (2/24, A2, Eggen, 690K) reports Margaret Chiara, the U.S. attorney in Grand Rapids, Michigan, "announced her resignation yesterday, the latest in a wave of forced departures of federal prosecutors who have clashed with the Justice Department over the death penalty and other issues. … Sources familiar with the case confirmed that she was among a larger group of prosecutors who were first asked to resign Dec. 7." The Post notes that the "firings" have been "criticized by lawmakers in both parties and have prompted proposals in Congress to restrict the ability of Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to appoint interim prosecutors indefinitely. The New York Times (2/24, A10, Johnston, 1.16M) reports Chiara is a Republican who "took office in 2001 after twice being elected a county prosecutor. She had also served as policy director of the Michigan Supreme Court."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

DOJ Launches Probe Of KB Homes Stock Option Grants. The Wall Street Journal (2/24, A3, Forelle, Corkery) reports, "Federal prosecutors in Los Angeles are scrutinizing stock-options backdating at home builder KB Home, according to people familiar with the matter. These people say prosecutors appear interested in the conduct of former Chief Executive Officer Bruce Karatz and former human-resources chief Gary Ray." The Journal continues, "A lawyer for Mr. Ray, Mark Beck, says he is 'attempting to persuade [the prosecutor] that Gary Ray did not engage in any wrongdoing and certainly no conscious wrongdoing.'" The Journal adds, "It isn't clear precisely what the prosecutors are examining. Last year the Los Angeles-based company said an internal investigation found that Mr. Karatz had backdated his own option grants to increase his pay. He agreed to leave the company and forfeit about $13 million in gains from the backdating, becoming one of the highest-profile and best-paid CEOs to be forced out in the options scandal. Mr. Ray, whom KB Home has said participated in the backdating with Mr. Karatz, also left. … Company spokeswoman Caroline Shaw said the Department of Justice is looking into past stock-option grant practices at KB Home, but has told the company itself that it is 'not a target of this investigation.' She added, 'KB Home has and intends to fully cooperate with any government agency looking into this matter.'"

DOJ_NMG_0136790

The AP (2/24) reports, "The company last month acknowledged that the Securities and Exchange Commission had launched a formal investigation into its options practices." The AP adds, "KB Home is one of at least 200 companies to disclose SEC, DOJ or internal investigations, according to an Associated Press review. … KB Home's former chief executive Bruce Karatz, along with its executive vice president and chief legal officer, were forced to step down late last year after it was disclosed that Karatz benefited from favorably dated option awards. He agreed to repay $13 million stemming from incorrect measurement dates for financial reporting of annual option grants between 1998 and 2005. … The company also has said it expects to record additional expenses of no more than $50 million and was investigating whether it needed to restate earnings for prior periods."

The New York Times (2/24, Bajaj) reports, "The inquiry appears to be in the early stages, and it may take months before prosecutors decide what, if any, charges they will bring in the case. … Still, news of interest by federal prosecutors raises the stakes for a man who was once one of the highest-profile and best-paid executives in corporate America, Bruce E. Karatz." The Times adds, "In November, KB's board forced out Mr. Karatz, who was the chairman and chief executive of the company, and Gary A. Ray, the top human resources officer, after an internal investigation concluded that eight stock-option grants since 1998 had been incorrectly dated. … A lawyer representing Mr. Ray, Mark E. Beck, confirmed that he and his client have met with prosecutors but declined to discuss the facts of the case, aside from saying that 'several million documents' would lead officials to 'conclude that he did not engage in any wrongdoing.' … KB Home said in a filing this month that the evidence it had collected suggested that after the company's board approved stock option grants, Mr. Karatz and Mr. Ray used 'hindsight' to pick dates when KB's stock closed at or near a monthly low for seven of the eight grants."

SEC Probing Citigroup Associates Deal. The Financial Times (2/24, Wighton) reports, "Citigroup is under investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission over its accounting for Associates First Capital, the finance business it bought for $31.1bn in 2000." The Times continues, "The chief US regulator is looking into the treatment of tax reserves and releases during the four years to 2004, Citigroup disclosed in a filing on Friday night. … The SEC has subpoenaed witness testimony and accounting and internal controls-related information, the company said. … The SEC is also continuing its long-running probe into Citigroup's treatment of potential Argentina-related losses in the fourth quarter of 2001." The Times adds, "The disclosure of the accouting investigation in Associates underlines the task faced by Chuck Prince, chief executive, in escaping the legacy of Citigroup's acitivities during the bull market. … Mr Prince, who succeeded Sandy Weill as chief executive in October 2003, has spent much of his time dealing with legal and regulatory problems dating back to the late 1990s. … Friday's disclosure comes as Mr Prince's leadership is under renewed fire following his sacking of Todd Thomson as head of Citigroup's wealth managment arm."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Pennsylvania Murder Suspect Seeks To Avoid Death Penalty. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (2/24, Simonich) reports, "Lawyers for murder suspect Donna Moonda today asked a judge to prohibit the federal government from pursuing the death penalty against her." The Post-Gazette continues, "Her attorneys said capital punishment is 'cruel and unusual in all cases' and should not be an option for jurors when Mrs. Moonda goes on trial in June." The Post-Gazette adds, "Today was the deadline for pretrial motions to be filed, and Mrs. Moonda's three court-appointed lawyers peppered U.S. District Judge David Dowd with three separate filings aimed at eliminating the death penalty from the case. … Federal prosecutors have until March 15 to respond. Judge Dowd would then issue his ruling." The Post-Gazette notes, "Prosecutors recommended that Mrs. Moonda, 47, of Mercer County, Pa., stand trial for her life because they say she coldly plotted the murder of her husband, Dr. Gulam Moonda. … U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales made the final decision in authorizing a capital case against Mrs. Moonda. … The U.S. government has not executed a female convict since 1953. State governments, mostly in the South, have executed 11 women since 1984."

FBI Releases Sketch Of West Virginia Child Rape Suspect. The Wheeling (WV) Post-Intelligencer (2/24, Wells) reported, "A rendering of the man accused in the recent rape and abduction of a city girl has been released as the Federal Bureau of Investigation intensifies its efforts in the case. FBI Supervisory Senior Resident Agent Mark Wheeler on Friday said a command post has been established in the basement of the City-County Building to accommodate the 50 city, county and federal law enforcement officers investigating the Tuesday rape and abduction of a North Wheeling girl. In addition to the release of the suspect's sketch, an updated description of the suspect's vehicle also has been released. Wheeling police Lt. Gary Gaus said a number of registered sex offenders in the area already have been ruled out as suspects, but he would not comment on whether DNA evidence has been collected in the case."

DOJ_NMG_0136791

Former Alabama Mayor Sentenced To 10 Years In Prison. The Mobile Press-Register (2/24, Kirby) reported, "Decrying the corrosive effect of public corruption, a federal judge in Mobile on Friday sentenced former Orange Beach Mayor Steve Russo to 10 years in prison for a wide-ranging conspiracy to enrich himself by influencing development projects. U.S. District Judge Kristi DuBose also gave former Orange Beach City Attorney Larry Sutley, 58, two years and three months for his role in the conspiracy but allowed him to remain free while he appeals the case. … 'Public corruption of this type has to be addressed or it would mean the demise of our democracy,' she said." The Press-Register noted that "Russo's 10-year sentence is among the longest in decades for a public corruption case in southern Alabama." The AP (2/24, Mitchell) added, "Russo showed no remorse during the three-hour hearing. 'I can walk out of here knowing I did the very best job for the people of Orange Beach I could do,' he told the judge." Assistant US Attorney Steven Butler said Russo did do some good things while in office. … But he said he also used his 'official power to get rich.'"

Florida Lawyer Convicted Of Obstruction In Keys Bribery Probe. The Miami Herald (2/24, Clark) reported, "James Hendrick, one of the brightest and most influential attorneys in Monroe County, was convicted Friday in federal court of obstructing justice and witness tampering in a wide-ranging, years-long Keys corruption case that might not be over. … His conviction came without the testimony of his one-time friend, former county Mayor Jack London, who died before trial. He had admitted that Hendrick helped steer a bribe to him with the help of lobbyist Randall Hilliard, known as 'the Prince of Darkness.'" The Herald noted, "The case stems from a lengthy FBI investigation that uncovered a $29,000 bribe paid in 1997 to London, Monroe County's mayor at the time. In return for the bribe, London used his influence to win zoning approval for a stalled 79-room hotel project called Hall's Resort. Hendrick received no money in the deal. By the time the FBI had evidence of the bribe, the five-year federal statute of limitations for bribery had expired."

Gunman Who Abducted Florida Boy Still At Large. The New York Times (2/24, Waddell) reports from Parrish, FL, "A 13-year-old boy was abducted at gunpoint at a school bus stop on Friday morning and was found hours later in a wooded area where he had been left bound by his captor." The Times continues, "Sheriff Charles B. Wells of Manatee County said the gunman drove the boy, Clay Moore, to a large cattle ranch about 20 miles away from his neighborhood in the quiet Kingsfield Lakes subdivision on the outskirts of Parrish, near Tampa. His abductor eventually left. About two hours later, Clay, who had been tied up, was able to escape and walk until he came across a farm worker who let him use a cellphone to call his mother. … The gunman, who was driving an old red pickup, remained at large." The Times adds, "Clay was riding a skateboard about 9 a.m. while waiting for his school bus with four other youths when the truck pulled up, and the dark-haired young man driving it ordered him inside, said one of the four, Rabah Jaffal, 14. … Three of the students ran home and called the police, who immediately began a manhunt involving the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the state police and surrounding counties' law enforcement."

Four Florida Cops Caught In FBI Mob Sting. The AP (2/24) reports from Fort Lauderdale, FL, "Four veteran police officers were accused in federal court of taking thousands of dollars to protect what they thought were mob shipments of drugs, stolen art and jewelry." The AP continues, "Three of the officers made initial court appearances Friday and were ordered released on bond. The fourth was in the process of turning himself in and would likely appear next week, federal prosecutors said. … All serve in Hollywood, just south of Fort Lauderdale." The AP adds, 'An FBI affidavit filed in federal court accused the four of taking thousands of dollars to protect a group they thought was a criminal organization based out of New York. The "mobsters" were undercover FBI agents during a two-year corruption sting. … Federal prosecutors said the operations included escorting a load of heroin from Miami Beach, providing security for an illegal poker game aboard a yacht and delivering $1 million worth of supposedly stolen diamonds to New Jersey. … Other deals involved purportedly stolen bearer bonds, watches, paintings and a tractor-trailer load of cigarettes, prosecutors said. … The four officers were charged with conspiracy. They have not entered pleas, and the case will go before a grand jury. All have been placed on leave without pay."

Florida Police Chief Says More Officers Suspected In FBI Probe. The Miami Herald (2/24, Christensen, Wright) reported, "A two-year federal undercover probe that led to corruption charges against four Hollywood police officers was shut down prematurely after two of those officers learned they were under investigation, according to Hollywood Police Chief James Scarberry. More officers are under suspicion, Scarberry said Friday. The chief said he found out the investigation was blown Thursday -- hours before the FBI swooped in and arrested Officers Kevin Companion, Jeffry Courtney and Stephen Harrison. … 'We called the FBI immediately yesterday after we found out that Companion and Courtney were at the pension office. They both called in sick all week and were putting in their letters of resignation,' Scarberry said." The Herald noted, "During the two-year probe by the U.S. attorney and the FBI -- dubbed 'Tarnished Badge' -- undercover agents convinced the officers that they were members of a New York crime family."

DOJ_NMG_0136792

The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (2/24, Haas, Blum) reported, "Federal authorities on Friday released detailed charges against four Hollywood officers in an investigation dubbed 'Operation Tarnished Badge,' accusing the four of protecting and transporting stolen diamonds, artwork, bonds and heroin for undercover FBI agents pretending to be involved in organized crime. … Companion, Courtney and Harrison appeared before U.S. Magistrate Lurana Snow in federal count in Fort Lauderdale on Friday morning. All three looked dejected. … Snow set bond at $350,000 for Companion; $375,000 for Courtney; and $300,000 for Harrison. None of them had posted bail early Friday night, detention officials said. Simcox has not yet been arrested," but the Palm Beach Post (2/24, LaForgia) noted Simcox "is making arrangements to turn himself in to federal authorities next week, his attorney said Friday. 'I believe that he should be surrendering Monday,' said Bruce Udolf, the Fort Lauderdale attorney representing Simcox.

Veteran FBI Analyst Sentenced To Seven Years For Sex With Child. The Fredericksburg Free Lance-Star (2/23, Freehling) reported, "A 17-year veteran of the FBI will serve seven years in prison for having sexual relations with a young girl in Spotsylvania County." On Thursday, former FBI intelligence anayst Anthony John Lesko "entered an Alford plea…to nine counts of felony indecent liberties upon a child. … An Alford plea means Lesko doesn't admit guilt but believes there is enough evidence for a conviction." The Free Lance-Star noted, "Lesko engaged in a sex act with a girl, 9 and 10 at the time, at least nine times in 2003-2004, according to evidence put forth by Spotsylvania Commonwealth's Attorney William Neely." Lesko told a US Navy counselor "that he was the victim of the sexual assault; he said the girl initiated the contact, according to the plea."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Some Christian Groups Critical Of DOJ Religious Freedom Initiative. UPI (2/23) reports, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' Feb. 20 announcement to Southern Baptist Convention leaders about a new Justice Department focus on religious freedom garnered some praise — and significant criticism — from other Christian leaders. Gonzales announced the launch of the department's 'First Freedom Project' in a speech during a regularly scheduled SBC Executive Committee meeting. … 'Religious freedom is a fundamental part of our nation's history and one of its core principles,' Gonzales said. The effort will include educational efforts to inform government officials, employers and everyday Americans about their religious-liberty rights under law, Associated Baptist Press reported Thursday." UPI continues, "The department simultaneously released a 43-page report touting its record, under President Bush, in defending religious freedom. Gonzales and the report implied that the Bush Justice Department's record on prosecuting religious-discrimination cases was significantly stronger than that under former President Bill Clinton. … But several in the religious-liberty community said Bush's record on the issue has been mixed, at best. Brent Walker, executive director of the Washington-based Baptist Joint Committee for Religious Liberty, said he appreciates the administration focusing on the First Amendment — but that the amendment covers two aspects of religious freedom that are inextricably linked to each other. … 'The First Amendment has two protections for religious freedom — prohibition on religious establishments and protection for free exercise of religion,' Walker said in a statement provided to Associated Baptist Press. 'The administration has often ignored the importance of the no-establishment principle by supporting attempts of governments to endorse a religious message, using tax dollars to fund pervasively religious organizations, allowing religious discrimination in hiring for federally funded projects, and going to the Supreme Court to cut back on the rights of citizens to challenge such practices.'" UPI notes, "Walker also noted that Bush's record on free-exercise protections is 'not perfect.' He pointed to a Supreme Court case last year in which the administration attempted to limit a small religious sect's ability to use hallucinogenic tea for sacramental purposes. A unanimous Supreme Court rejected the administration's position. … Americans United for Separation of Church and State went further, releasing a statement Feb. 22 saying Gonzales' announcement 'reeks of hypocrisy.' It called attention to actions detailed in the report that the Justice Department touts as religious-freedom successes — but that are actually quite controversial in the religious-liberty community."

FBI Could Reopen Dozens Of Civil Rights Cold Cases. The AP (2/24) reports from Jackson, MS, "The FBI is considering reopening dozens of cold cases involving slayings suspected of being racially motivated in the South during the 1950s and '60s. … An announcement could come as early as Tuesday, according to a law enforcement official who spoke with the Associated Press on condition of anonymity because the plans have not yet been finalized." The AP continues, "In addition to the FBI's own investigations, the Southern Poverty Law Center submitted its own list last week of 74 potential unsolved slayings that involved white-on-black violence. … Thirty-two of the deaths happened in Mississippi. The others were in Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Tennessee, Louisiana, North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida, Kentucky and New York." The AP adds, "Mark Potok, director of the Intelligence Project for the Alabama-based Southern Poverty Law Center, said each case was researched in the late 1980s when the group was putting together a civil rights memorial. But it is unclear if each could be considered a civil rights case, he said. … 'The truth is we don't know,' said Potok, whose group investigates hate crimes. 'In each case there was some evidence to suggest that these were racial murders, but it absolutely was not proven. Had we been able to nail them down, their names would've been literally chiseled into the civil rights memorial that sits outside our building here.' … U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton in Jackson reviewed the list of Mississippi killings for the Associated Press on Friday and said based on the limited amount of information available that none would qualify for federal prosecution under civil rights statutes. But he said many could still be prosecuted on a local or state level as murders."

DOJ_NMG_0136793

Under the headline "FBI Building Database On Victims Slain Amid Civil Rights-Era Violence," the Jackson Clairon-Ledger (2/24, Mitchell) reported, "The FBI's field offices already have compiled a list of 51 victims," and the Southern Poverty Law Center "has since turned over information on 74 victims to the FBI. … 'We ask that the FBI use its considerable investigatory resources to uncover more information about these cases,' Richard Cohen, president for the center, wrote the Civil Rights Unit of the Criminal Investigative Division of the FBI. "Those responsible for these forgotten deaths - those who may still be alive today, like James Ford Seale, who was recently arrested for the murders of Henry Hezekiah Dee and Charles Eddie Moore - have gone unpunished too long.'" Lampton "said last week: 'As we've shown in the past, we'll investigate any case that comes to light.'"

WGNO-TV New Orleans (2/23, 10:13 p.m. EST) reported on its broadcast that the Southern Poverty Law Center "says evidence in at least 74 unsolved murders suggests they were racial murders. The FBI has been conducting its own investigations, and Director Robert Mueller says he vows 'to pursue justice to the end.'" KHQ-TV Spokane (2/24, 9:03 a.m. EST) reported on its broadcast, "FBI Director Robert Mueller has said the bureau is aggressively seeking to solve cold civil rights cases." Mueller "vowed last month to 'pursue justice to the end.'"

Judge Lifts Federal Supervision Of Little Rock Schools. The New York Times (2/24, Barnes) reports from Little Rock, AR, "The Little Rock School District was released on Friday from federal court supervision of its desegregation efforts, almost 50 years after President Dwight D. Eisenhower dispatched federal troops to enforce an integration order that the Arkansas governor defied." The Times continues, "In a written order, Judge William R. Wilson Jr. of Federal District Court declared the district 'unitary.' That meant it had met its obligations under court-ordered remedies to address lingering questions about its commitment to equal opportunity in education." The Times adds, "Judge Wilson said the school board could 'now operate the district as it sees fit, answerable to no one' save its students, patrons and voters." The Times notes, "In 1957, Gov. Orval E. Faubus, a conservative Democrat, resisted the federal court order to desegregate Central High School by surrounding it with National Guardsmen who blocked the entry of nine black students. Eisenhower responded by federalizing the Guard troops and sending paratroopers from the 101st Airborne Division. … The black pupils were admitted to classes, with the military providing security on campus for the duration of the school year. … The confrontation was a seminal part of the civil rights movement. It was followed by decades of litigation that devoured millions of dollars in legal fees and went through several judges, dozens of school board members and more than one superintendent."

The AP (2/24, Demillo) reports, "The 1998 desegregation plan was negotiated among the district, federal monitors and a group called the Joshua Intervenors, which represented black students. Judge Wilson noted that another nine years had passed before its conditions were satisfied. … 'LRSD's board can now operate the district as it sees fit; answerable to no one except LRSD's students and patrons and the voters who elected [the board] to office,' he wrote. 'I want to express my heartfelt best wishes as LRSD continues to operate, as our Founders intended, under control of the citizens of the City of Little Rock.' … A final sticking point among the parties had been whether the district adequately assessed black achievement in its academic programs. … Under previous orders from Judge Wilson, the Little Rock district was to evaluate its academic programs annually to determine whether test scores among black students were rising. The judge said yesterday he was now satisfied with the response, which included the board's December resolution that it would continue evaluations even if Judge Wilson released it from monitoring. … The Little Rock district is now 70 percent black; Central High School is 53 percent black."

Rhode Island AG Says Sister's Union Did Not Influence Gay Marriage Ruling. The Washington Times (2/24, Wetzstein, 88K) reports Rhode Island Attorney General Patrick Lynch "says research persuaded him to decide that Rhode Island can recognize same-sex

DOJ_NMG_0136794

'marriages' from Massachusetts -- not his sister's recent same-sex union in Massachusetts." The Times notes that on Feb. 15, Lynch "attended the 'marriage' ceremony in Attleboro, Mass., of his older sister. … On Wednesday, Mr. Lynch issued a six-page opinion to the Rhode Island Board of Governors for Higher Education that said their homosexual employees who have 'married' in Massachusetts should be treated as spouses."

NYTimes Applauds New Jersey Court's Decision On Gay Students. The New York Times (2/24, A14, 1.16M) editorializes, "Like all too many school districts, Toms River, N.J., has done a poor job of protecting gay students from bullying. According to the New Jersey Supreme Court, the district punished students for being one minute late for class, but made harassing another child for being gay punishable only after a third offense. In a landmark ruling this week, the court unanimously held that public school districts like Toms River's are liable for damages if they fail to take reasonable steps to stop prolonged anti-gay harassment of a student by another student. … The decision changes the legal landscape in New Jersey, and we hope it will be the start of a new national approach to the problem."

ANTITRUST:

KKR, TPG Close In On Mammoth Deal For Texas Power Company. The Wall Street Journal (2/24, A1, Sender, Berman, Smith) reports, "Private-equity firms Texas Pacific Group and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. were close to a deal Friday night to acquire Texas utilities powerhouse TXU Corp. for about $32 billion, said people familiar with the matter, a massive buyout that would give them control of one of the nation's most successful and controversial power companies." The Journal continues, "One person close to the matter said the firms would pay about $70 a share for the big utility, about $10 a share over Friday's 4 p.m. price of $60.02 on the New York Stock Exchange. The company also had $12.38 billion in debt as of September 30." The Journal adds, "A deal could be finalized over the next few days, this person said, though it was possible it could fall apart at a late moment. … The transaction, first reported by CNBC, would be the latest massive deal engineered by private-equity firms. Enjoying record profits and a flood of cash from investors seeking ever-greater returns, the large investment firms have accounted for the majority of the biggest mergers and acquisitions in the last year. Among recent deals, Blackstone Group paid $23 billion for Equity Office Properties and assumed $16 billion of debt, while Bain Capital, KKR and Merrill Lynch & Co. paid $21 billion and assumed $11.7 billion in debt to acquire hospital operator HCA Inc. in 2006."

The New York Times (2/24, Sorkin, Krauss) reports, "The amount of private money that is being offered is a huge financial endorsement of the company's energy strategy. TXU has irritated environmental advocates by proposing to build 11 coal-fired power plants in Texas. Despite calls for regulating greenhouse gases, TXU has been the most aggressive in the power industry in pushing coal as the answer to growing electricity demands. Nationwide, power companies are planning to build about 150 coal plants over the next several years." The Times adds, "The deal itself, if approved at a TXU board meeting tomorrow, would be a landmark. It would exceed the Blackstone Group's recent $39 billion acquisition of the office landlord Equity Office Properties, the largest buyout ever. And that would mean that Henry R. Kravis, a co-founder of Kohlberg Kravis Roberts, has managed to upstage, at least for the time being, his longtime rival in deals, Stephen A. Schwarzman, a co-founder of Blackstone. … Energy has been fairly recent territory for private equity. While energy deals accounted for 16 percent of all mergers last year, only 9 percent of those deals involved buyout firms, according to Thomson Financial. The first big foray came last year, when Kinder Morgan, the Texas pipeline giant that was created from some assets of the former Enron, was sold to a group that included Goldman Sachs, the American International Group, the Carlyle Group and Riverstone Holdings for $27.5 billion."

The Financial Times (2/24, Politi, Smith) reports, "A private equity takeover of TXU would extend a flurry of dealmaking by the world's largest buy-out groups, which have emerged as leading forces in high finance and business in recent years as they snapped up some of the biggest companies in a wide range of industries." The Times adds, "Based in Dallas, TXU is the top provider of electricity to the state of Texas, and has recently locked horns with environmentalists over plans to build 11 coal-fired power plants. … In advance of clinching a deal, KKR and TPG gained the backing of several environmental groups by agreeing to scrap plans to construct 8 of the 11 controversial plants. … The private equity buyers also pledged to support a reduction in carbon dioxide emissions to 1990 levels by 2020. … However, a private equity takeover of TXU could still face resistance if it is viewed as jeopardising the reliability of the electricity grid in Texas – or if it results in higher rates for consumer."

The Washington Post (2/24, D1, Cho, Mufson) reports, "TXU has 2.4 million electricity customers in Texas and a network of generating stations, including two nuclear-powered and nine coal-fired plants. Deregulation recently took effect in the state, and the company has divided itself into three parts -- a regulated utility, a power wholesaler and a power generation unit with 18,300 megawatts of capacity. … But the company's claim to fame recently has been a controversy over its plan to build 11 conventional coal plants.

DOJ_NMG_0136795

That would more than double the company's emissions of carbon dioxide, the most prevalent of greenhouse gases, at a time when Congress is looking at ways to cap greenhouse gas-emissions." The Post notes, "It is not clear how a buyout would affect those plans. Part of the attraction of TXU is its location in a fast-growing state. The new plants could take advantage of its rapidly growing energy demand. But leveraged buyout firms usually trim costs and rarely expand a company's operations. And many executives in the industry have said they never expected the company to build all those plants anyway. … The private-equity firms are expected to propose around $70 per share for TXU and assume about $12 billion of its debt, putting the total value of the transaction at $44 billion to $45 billion. … If a buyout goes through, TXU would become a private company and no longer have to reveal its financial statements publicly or comply with federal regulations such as the Sarbanes-Oxley Act. But it probably would still have to disclose some information to state and federal power regulators." The Post adds, "That change is likely to draw scrutiny from members of Congress, especially those now devising ways to cap and reduce greenhouse gases. Some lawmakers have alleged that TXU might be expanding now so that the new plants would be included in its baseline emission levels. That would be important if Congress adopted a cap-and-trade system similar to Europe's, with allocations distributed to companies based on their past emissions."

The Los Angeles Times (2/24, Wilson) reports, "Environmental Defense and numerous other environmental groups and civic leaders have sued or otherwise protested the plants, saying they would add 78 million tons of greenhouse gases to the atmosphere annually. Texas already leads the nation in greenhouse gas emissions, widely believed to cause global warming. Smog, mercury emissions and other harmful pollutants also would be emitted. … Many private equity firms are jumping into solar, wind and other 'alternative energy' investments, as dozens of states have adopted 'renewable portfolio standards' requiring diversified energy, including so-called clean sources. Several members of Congress, including Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), have introduced or are preparing legislation that could cap greenhouse gases from coal plants and other electricity providers."

The Dallas Morning News (2/24, Souder, Yung) reports, "As for why TXU would sell, some experts said going private could allow the company to innovate without worrying about putting the share price on a roller coaster and facing the ire of Wall Street. … TXU shares rose 4 percent Friday afternoon, to close at $60.02, after news of the offer began to leak out. In after-hours trading, shares rose as high as $70. … The share price has dropped from all-time highs during the past few months as concern mounts about possible state and federal legislation that could limit the size of the company or the amount of pollution it would be allowed to emit." The News notes, "If approved, the deal would be the largest acquisition ever, reflecting the current buyout binge sweeping the country. The previous record – the $39 billion purchase of Equity Office Properties Trust by the Blackstone Group – closed earlier this month. … The buyers, KKR and Fort Worth-based Texas Pacific, have teamed up before to make millions in the Texas energy sector. They were among a group of buyout firms that earned a more than sixfold return in little more than a year by buying and then quickly selling Texas Genco, a Houston wholesale power generation company, to NRG Energy Inc."

FCC Expected To Hit Univision With Record Fine. The New York Times (2/24, Labaton) reports, "When Univision began broadcasting a show three years ago about the misadventures of 11-year-old identical twin girls who swapped identities after discovering they had been separated at birth, it characterized the episodes as educational programming for children. … That decision is expected to cost Univision, the nation's largest Hispanic network, $24 million in what would be the largest fine the Federal Communications Commission has ever imposed against any company. The penalty is also expected to send a strong signal to broadcasters that they will be expected to meet their required quota of shows that educate and inform children, after years of permissive oversight in this area." The Times continues, "The commission has decided to impose the heavy fine — disclosed by Kevin J. Martin, the chairman of the commission, in an interview — as a tough rebuke to Univision for claiming to meet its obligations to broadcast educational children's programs by showing the Latino soap opera 'Complices al Rescate' ('Friends to the Rescue') and other so-called telenovelas." The Times adds, "The penalty, part of a settlement that will allow the company to proceed with a buyout deal, is nearly three times the previous record fine of $9 million, imposed against Qwest Communications for violating telephone interconnection rules in 2004, and significantly more than the largest indecency penalty, $3.5 million, levied against Viacom that same year for remarks by Howard Stern and other so-called shock jocks on the radio. … It also represents an unusually aggressive enforcement of the 1996 regulations that interpreted the Children's Television Act. Those regulations, adopted after some broadcasters characterized cartoons like 'The Flintstones' and 'The Jetsons' to be educational programs, imposed more substantive requirements on the networks as they comply with the mandate to broadcast at least three hours a week of programs of intellectual value to young people. … Although some television critics say it is common for stations not to comply, only a handful of complaints have been filed. An even smaller number have resulted in modest penalties of several thousand dollars for stations found to have violated the rules."

DOJ_NMG_0136796

VMware Goes Up Against Microsoft. The New York Times (2/24, Lohr) reports, "VMware, a young Silicon Valley company, is the early leader in a fast-growing market for what is called virtual-machine software. And that puts it on a collision course with Microsoft, the industry's Goliath. … A virtual machine essentially mimics a computer so that several copies of an operating system — say, Windows or Linux or both — can run on one physical machine. It allows computing chores to be done on fewer computers, using less electricity and taking up less space, promising a way to control costs at corporate data centers straining to keep up with the ever-increasing demands of the Internet age. … It is also a product that occupies strategic ground in computing, as a layer of code that resides between a computer's hardware and the operating system, usurping some tasks, and potentially undermining the importance of the operating system." The Times adds, "In a meeting with corporate customers in New York last month, Steven A. Ballmer, Microsoft's chief executive, said, 'Everybody in the operating system business wants to be the guy on the bottom,' the software that controls the hardware. And he vowed that Microsoft, whose Windows operating systems are the main source of its corporate wealth and market power, would 'compete very aggressively with VMware.' … When quizzed on Microsoft's plans, Mr. Ballmer replied, 'Our view is that virtualization is something that should be built into the operating system.'" The Times notes, "Bundling new technology into Windows has long been the Microsoft game plan. The most storied case came a decade ago when Microsoft overcame the challenge posed by another Silicon Valley highflier, Netscape, offering another crucial layer of software, the Internet browser. Microsoft feared a competitor's Web browser, running on top of the operating system, could reduce the power of Windows. … The tactics Microsoft used in the browser battle, of course, led to a host of antitrust troubles for the big software maker in the United States and Europe. … This time, in the market for virtual-machine software, Microsoft is more restrained. Bowing to customer requests, Microsoft began more than a year ago to change its software licenses so its products could run in virtual machines like VMware offerings. … But in recent months, according to VMware, Microsoft has introduced new restrictions on how Microsoft products can be used in virtual machines in new ways, beyond simply dividing a single physical computer into several virtual ones."

NYTimes Urges Caution In Review Of Satellite Radio Merger. The New York Times (2/24) editorializes, "Vigorous competition in the private sector has served the United States economy and consumers extremely well, providing a greater array of choices, more innovation and lower prices. The two — and only — satellite radio companies are now eager to merge and are arguing that together, they will prove to be the exception to the rule. … The industry is important and still young. We urge regulators to take a hard look at the companies' proposal before leaving the field in the hands of a single player." The Times adds, "The companies' managers argue that the $13 billion merger could finally make them profitable by letting them cut costs and redundant programs, while giving consumers more programming options for their bucks. As for the fear of creating a monopoly, they argue that competition will still come from terrestrial radio (commonly known as AM and FM), iPods and other next-generation technologies. … It is important to remember that these are not widget makers. Radios carry important discourse and debate — they are vital to the free exchange of ideas protected by the First Amendment. Recent experience shows that media consolidation usually leads to more homogeneous content, politically as well as artistically, and it rarely benefits the consumer or the country. … There is also the question of what precedent would be set if regulators accepted the broadest possible definition of audio competition, and whether that could lead to even more mergers in radio. No less troubling are reports that the companies believe that they have an incentive to merge before the Bush administration and its overly friendly-to-business regulators leave office." The Times concludes, "When XM's and Sirius's licenses were granted, the Federal Communications Commission stipulated that 'one licensee will not be permitted to acquire control of the other.' The chairman of the F.C.C., Kevin Martin, reiterated that point this week but left the door open to a possible merger, saying, 'The companies would need to demonstrate that consumers would clearly be better off with both more choice and affordable prices.' We are skeptical about the chances of that happening."

Experts Say Music Consumers Will Not Be Immediately Affected By MP3 Patent Ruling. The Washington Post (2/24, D1, Sipress, Musgrove) reports, "Don't worry. The authorities aren't coming to confiscate your MP3 player because of a patent infringement ruling this week that involves the technology behind digital music." The Post continues, "The verdict, if upheld, could cost Microsoft $1.52 billion or more in damages. And that could end up costing you, as manufacturers pass on the expense of paying royalties to Alcatel-Lucent, which a federal jury in San Diego found to be the rightful owner of the technology. … But those costs aren't likely to come for some time, if at all, industry analysts and patent lawyers said yesterday." The Post adds, "The technology industry was abuzz over Thursday's unexpected verdict, which included what lawyers said was the largest patent award in history, and its significance for the MP3 format that is at the heart of the booming market for digital music. … Though the verdict could affect hundreds of companies that use the technology in various devices, experts said consumers would not suddenly be unable to obtain or play MP3 files. Even in the long run, there may be no effect on consumers if the verdict is overturned on appeal. Microsoft's lawyers have said they will appeal both the jury's finding that the company infringed on the patents and the amount of its award to Alcatel-Lucent." The Post notes, "The legal dispute turns on two patents for technology developed at Bell Laboratories, which later became part of Lucent Technologies. Alcatel bought Lucent last year and inherited the patents. … Both patents relate to how music is converted into small digital files. One of the patents is for a method of analyzing sound to gauge whether it is more like music or noise, then representing it in digital form based on that determination. The other patent pertains to the process for determining whether the sound is audible to the human ear and then converting only that audible part into digital form. … Hundreds of companies that thought they had properly licensed the MP3 format from Germany's Fraunhofer Institute, which was also involved in developing the MP3 technology, could be financially liable for infringing on Alcatel-Lucent's patents."

DOJ_NMG_0136797

ENVIRONMENT:

Bush Touts Alternative Fuel Vehicles. The New York Times (2/24, A10, Wald, 1.16M) reports that at a White House event President Bush "turned to alternative fuels, and alternative companies, to argue Friday that his goal for reining in gasoline consumption in the coming decade was realistic." Bush "inspected a version of the Toyota Prius, the popular Japanese gas-electric hybrid, that had been rigged with a Canadian-built battery pack to allow it to operate more of each day on electricity, along with a South Korean sport utility truck modified by a small California company to run entirely on batteries. Neither is now a mass-market product, but each, the president said, is evidence that entrepreneurs will rush in to solve the nation's oil addiction. He called on Congress to approve financing that he has requested for research." The Times notes that to "a repeated question as to whether he would consider one of the vehicles for his ranch in Texas, Mr. Bush simply wished the assembled reporters a good weekend and returned to the Oval Office."

However, in its lead story Friday night, ABC World News (2/23, 3:00, Gibson, 8.78M) said, "If you suspected that the mileage stickers on new cars in the showroom were all wrong, you are right. They are about to change. Numbers on new cars will be lower, going down about 10 to 15%. Why? Well, the government's tests have been based on the way we drove almost a quarter century ago, not the way we drive today. Ironically, President Bush had sort of an auto show on the White House lawn today, part of his push to lower gasoline consumption 20%. But the new numbers show we're actually using more gas than we thought." ABC (Reynolds): "The big question is what kind of impact these new numbers will have on the new car market. Gayla Ruffer owns a Toyota Prius hybrid and knows it's not everything it's cranked up to be." Ruffer: "It's not near the mileage that I thought it was gonna get." Reynolds: "Instead of the advertised 50 miles to 60 miles per gallon, her Prius manages less than 35." Ruffer: "I don't know that I could say that I had sticker shock, but more a bit of a taste of reality." Reynolds: "Even Toyota dealers admit the old figures were a stretch."

BP Settles Two Suits Over 2005 Refinery Blast. The New York Times/AP (2/24) reports, "The energy giant BP has settled two more lawsuits stemming from a 2005 explosion at its Texas City oil refinery that killed 15 people and injured more than 170, the company and a lawyer for two injured contract workers said." The AP continues, "Terms of the deal were not released. Jury selection had been set for next week over lawsuits filed by the workers, E. J. Godeaux and Clarence Kinard. Theirs would have been the first cases connected to the blast to go to court." The AP adds, "Mr. Godeaux, 61, a painter and sandblaster from Texas City, had neck and back injuries, and his right eardrum was blown out. Mr. Kinard, 67, a boilermaker from Cleveland, Tex., injured his back and experienced hearing loss."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Location Of Suspected Mexican Drug Kingpin's Arrest At Center Of Legal Dispute. The San Diego Union-Tribune (2/24, Thornton) reports, "The captain of the yacht on which suspected drug kingpin Francisco Javier Arellano Félix was arrested last summer has become the center of a fascinating legal debate with international political implications." The Union-Tribune continues, "Capt. Edgar Omar Osorio took the witness stand yesterday during an unusual pretrial hearing, and questions by Arellano's lawyers seemed to lead in one direction: Did the arrest take place in international waters, as prosecutors maintain, or did U.S. officials apprehend him outside their jurisdiction, in Mexican waters? … Perhaps the more important question is, does it matter where the Aug. 14 arrest occurred?" The Union-Tribune adds, "Prosecutors say the questioning is an irrelevant sideshow with no impact on the facts of the case. But if the incident happened in Mexico, defense attorneys could seek dismissal of the case because Arellano was illegally arrested. Failing that, they could ask that evidence seized on the boat be thrown out because it was the result of an unlawful seizure. … It could also affect the U.S. government's ability to seek the death penalty." The Union-Tribune notes, "Traditionally, Mexico has refused to send anyone to the United States who would face the death penalty, which is barred in Mexico. There could be political ramifications if the U.S. government violated international law and breached the sovereignty of Mexico to apprehend Arellano. … But cooperation on extradition matters between the two countries has improved significantly in recent months. Some legal observers wonder how motivated Mexican officials would be to intervene on behalf of an Arellano, and perhaps disrupt the dismantling of its most feared drug cartel. … Since Mexican President Felipe Calderón was sworn into office in December, he has cleared the way for the extradition of 15 reputed drug lords, including four who were indicted in San Diego years ago. The action was called 'unprecedented in scope and importance' by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. … Even if Arellano was taken in Mexican waters, the U.S. Supreme Court has already ruled in a case with similar allegations that the U.S. government violated Mexico's sovereignty and the extradition treaty between the two nations."

DOJ_NMG_0136798

ATF Says Homemade Pipe Bombs Often Lethal. The El Paso Times (2/24, Fonce-Olivas) reports, "Each of the homemade explosives two Lower Valley men allegedly attempted to sell to undercover federal agents earlier this week had the destructive power to seriously injure or kill a person, a federal official said Friday. … 'It could have caused a lot of damage,' said Tom Crowley, spokesman with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives." The Times continues, "The bombs Alfredo Rubio, 23, of San Elizario, and Juan Ortiz, 22, of Socorro, allegedly tried to sell to an undercover ATF agent on Wednesday were explosive devices, each made of about 12 inches of PVC pipe that contained smokeless powder, steel BBs and a carbon dioxide cartridge. … Crowley said pipe bombs are so dangerous because they contain shrapnel -- usually nails, glass or other dangerous objects -- that become projectiles when the bomb explodes." The Times adds, "The size of the pipe bomb, which can range from 2 inches long to much larger, determines whether the detonation created by the explosive causes serious injury or even death, said El Paso police Sgt. Peter Pacillas, a supervisor on the department's bomb squad. … 'It's an improvised explosive device, so it depends on who's making them and how they're making them,' Pacillas said. 'If they don't kill you, you're going to be seriously maimed.' … The El Paso Police Department, one of several agencies involved in the case, was in charge of transporting and detonating the suspected pipe bombs as the only regional bomb squad in the area."

IMMIGRATION:

Decision To Allow Mexican Trucks On US Roads Meets Opposition. The New York Times/AP (2/24, A13) reports that a Bush administration plan "to allow 100 Mexican trucking companies to haul freight deeper into the United States than previously allowed drew an angry reaction Friday from labor leaders, safety advocates and members of Congress. … opponents said Mexico had substandard trucks and low-paid drivers that would threaten national security, cost thousands of jobs and endanger motorists. James P. Hoffa, president of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, said, 'They are playing a game of Russian roulette on America's highways.'" Sen. Patty Murray, chair of the Appropriations Subcommittee on Transportation, "announced a March 8 hearing to determine whether the plan met safety requirements." The Wall Street Journal (2/24, A3, Matthews, 2.04M) notes that "if the trial succeeds, the U.S. trucking industry could change drastically. Mexican drivers are paid one-third to 40% less than their U.S. counterparts, who make an average of about $40,000 a year. An influx of Mexican truckers would be a boon for U.S. businesses with production lines in Mexico, by decreasing costs and delays from the current need to shift U.S.-bound goods at the border to American trucks from Mexican ones." The Journal adds that "some past opponents of opening up vowed to continue to fight the move."

US Cabinet Secretaries Discuss Border Issues With Canadian, Mexican Counterparts. The New York Times (2/24, A8, Mason, 1.16M) reports that in Ottawa Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez "met their Canadian and Mexican counterparts amid concerns that new United States border restrictions — particularly the requirement of passports, beginning in January 2008, for land and sea crossings — would hamper the $880 billion in annual trade among the countries. No firm agenda emerged for a planned meeting later this year of President Bush, President Felipe Calderón of Mexico and Prime Minister Stephen Harper of Canada. But officials here were optimistic that the countries could continue to increase trade despite concerns by Canada over the passport requirement and by Mexico about United States plans to erect a security wall along their border."

Border Fence Considered A Potential Environmental Disaster. In an op-ed for the New York Times (2/24, A15, 1.16M) author Ted Kerasote writes, "Authorized by the Secure Fence Act of 2006, this barrier (83 miles of which have already been built) will bisect a border region that has some of the most ecologically diverse landscapes in the hemisphere. … Since the secretary of homeland security will have authority to waive laws that stand in the way of building the fence — like the Endangered Species Act — wildlife and habitats could be destroyed on a scale not seen since the 1960s." Kerasote adds, "many argue that the fence is an issue of national security and the safety of the American people trumps that of American wildlife. But that reasoning is flawed. The economic health of many people is increasingly reliant on the health of their natural surroundings."

DOJ_NMG_0136799

TAX:

IRS Urged To Pursue eBay Sellers. The San Francisco Chronicle (2/24, Kopytoff) reports, "When it comes to paying income taxes, eBay's legions of small-time entrepreneurs are on an honor system in which they are supposed to declare their profits to the Internal Revenue Service. Many users, however, ignore the law or are unaware of their obligation." The Chronicle continues, "Now a growing chorus of tax experts is hoping to crack down on the cheating by requiring eBay -- and other online auctions, such as those on Yahoo, Ubid.com and Amazon -- to track users and report their gross sales to the federal government. Armed with such information, the IRS could better seek any taxes owed, potentially reaping millions of dollars in extra revenue for the U.S. Treasury. … But requiring eBay to out its sellers to tax collectors could send a shockwave across its vast online bazaar, where users trade everything from Ferraris to Ugg boots to pepper spray. Paying Uncle Sam could significantly reduce their profits or even make their businesses money-losers." The Chronicle adds, "The latest call for more aggressive tax collection was heard last week at a congressional committee hearing focused on closing the tax gap, the hundreds of billions of dollars in taxes that go unpaid each year. Nina Olson, the national taxpayer advocate for the IRS, spoke of the heavy burden put on the nation by the shortfall and then cited undeclared online sales -- particularly on eBay, given its size -- as part of the problem. … 'The IRS must have the tools needed to address under-reporting of this income,' said Olson, whose job is to voice taxpayer concerns to the federal government. … EBay, based in San Jose, has 97 million U.S. users, who, in 2006 sold $25.2 billion in merchandise, exceeding the gross national product of many countries. More than 720,000 Americans make their primary or secondary income from the Web site, according to a 2005 study. … How many eBay users pay the taxes they owe on their online earnings is unknown. But experts suspect the percentage is low."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Administration's Proposed Medicaid Cuts Draw Governors' Criticism. The Los Angeles Times (2/24, Alonso-Zaldivar, 850K) reports the Bush Administration "is pressing ahead with plans to cut nearly $4 billion in aid for public hospitals and other providers of last resort for the uninsured. The cuts would affect hospital funding provided by Washington as part of Medicaid. … The cuts are prompting sharp protests from governors and dozens of lawmakers, partly because they represent an end run around congressional defenders of the aid program. After failing to get Congress to approve the reductions last year, the administration is now trying to impose them through a regulation that does not require action on Capitol Hill. 'The administration is moving forward with these proposed changes without any input from Congress or governors,' the National Governors Assn. complained Friday in a letter to congressional leaders. In an unusually direct challenge to the administration, the governors asked Congress to pass legislation that would block the rule from going into effect. Separately, some independent experts have questioned whether the administration has the legal authority to make unilateral cuts."

Cheney Refuses To Retract Criticism Of Pelosi's Stance On Iraq. The Washington Post (2/24, A4, Abramowitz, 690K) reports Vice President Cheney "refused to back down yesterday from his assertion that the Democratic approach to Iraq would 'validate the al-Qaeda strategy,' as he continued a transpacific war of words with House Speaker Nancy Pelosi. … 'She accused me of questioning her patriotism,' Cheney said. 'I didn't question her patriotism. I questioned her judgment. Al-Qaeda functions on the basis that they think they can break our will. That's their fundamental underlying strategy: that if they can kill enough Americans or cause enough havoc, create enough chaos in Iraq, then we'll quit and go home,' Cheney added. 'And my statement was that if we adopt the Pelosi policy, that then we will validate the strategy of al-Qaeda. I said it, and I meant it.'" According to the Post, "The Cheney comments were another example of how the vice president's posture regarding Iraq has been more aggressive than President Bush's in recent weeks."

Committee Chairmen Featured In Democrats' Fundraising Blitz. The Washington Post (2/24, A1, Birnbaum, Solomon, 690K) reports Congressional Democrats "have enlisted their committee chairmen in an early blitz to bring millions of dollars into the party's coffers." Senate Democrats "also plan a fundraising reception during a major gathering of Native Americans in the capital Tuesday evening…including those Jack Abramoff was paid to represent." Financial Services Committee Chairman Barney Frank is quoted as saying, "I'm fundraising to give to others so I can help stay in the majority and do the public policy things I want." The Post adds, "Asked whether banking interests feel obligated to give to Democrats when he asks them for contributions, Frank answered: 'Obligated? No. Incentivized? Yes.' Frank said." The Post goes on to report that Frank has "traveled to Charlotte, home to two of America's largest bank companies, for a similar fundraising breakfast. … The leaders of the two tax-writing committees -- House Ways and Means Chairman Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.) and Senate Finance Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.) -- are planning a rare and expensive joint fundraising reception in New York on March 4. The event…costs between $1,500 and $9,200 a person."

DOJ_NMG_0136800

Travelers' Advocates Skeptical Of Proposed Federal "Bill Of Rights" Legislation. The Los Angeles Times (2/24, A1, Zimmerman, 850K) reports, "Recent incidents in which travelers were left stranded for hours on parked airplanes have led to proposals in Congress for time limits on ground delays. But skeptics say the proposals could result in even longer waits and more canceled flights. 'Be careful what you wish for,' said David Stempler, president of the Air Travelers Association, a Washington-area lobbying group. 'After three hours, they'll bring the plane back to the terminal, but then the flight might be canceled and you can't get to your destination.'" Sen. Barbara Boxer "introduced a bill, dubbed the airline passenger bill of rights, that would give passengers the option to return to the airport terminal after three hours." Rep. Mike Thompson "plans to introduce a similar bill next week."

WSJournal Criticizes Proposed Legislation. The Wall Street Journal (2/24, A8, 2.04M), in an editorial, writes, "Right on cue, politicians are making a fuss about a 'passenger bill of rights' and demanding Congressional intervention after last week's JetBlue airline debacle. The irony is that the marketplace is already moving to address the problem, and the government could really help by relaxing some of the rules that incentivize airlines to discomfit passengers in the first place. … In hindsight, it's easy to say JetBlue waited too long, but we wonder how many passengers, offered a choice between the possibility of imminent clearance to take off and the certainty of many more hours in the terminal, would have opted for the departure lounge. A bill of rights mandating deplanings would take these decisions away from those trying, if sometimes futilely, to get their passengers where they're going as quickly as possible."

NYTimes Seconds Justice Kennedy On Higher Judiciary Salaries. The New York Times (2/24, A14, 1.16M), in an editorial, notes that Justice Anthony Kennedy "told the Senate this month that the salaries paid to federal judges are so low that they threaten both the quality and independence of the judiciary. The problem is real, and Congress should quickly pass a bill to fix it."

OTHER NEWS:

Stocks Close Week On "Down Note." NBC Nightly News (2/23, story 5, :20, Williams, 9.87M) reported that "stocks finished out the week on a down note. The Dow was off 38 1/2 points. The Nasdaq lost just under 10 points on the day. For the week, a mixed finish: the Dow down 120 points, the Nasdaq up almost 19 points on the week." The Wall Street Journal (2/24, B3, Talley, 2.04M) says the Dow fell "to 12647.48" in its "third straight decline," while the Nasdaq ended the week at 2515.10 and the S&P 500 "lost 5.19, or 0.4%, to 1451.19." The Washington Post/AP (2/24, D4) says it was the "worst week for the Dow Jones industrials since mid-August."

Crude Oil Tops $61; Dollar Declines. The Wall Street Journal (2/24, B4, Sykora, 2.04M) reports crude oil futures "settled at a nine-week high as gasoline futures continued advancing and traders focused on plunging U.S. petroleum-product stockpiles and recent refinery and pipeline glitches around the country. April crude oil on the Nymex gained 19 cents to $61.14 a barrel, its highest close since Dec. 22." Meanwhile, the Wall Street Journal (2/24, B14, Molinski, 2.04M) reports, the dollar "exited lower across the board Friday amid concerns that interest rates will rise in Europe but could remain frozen or even decline in the U.S."

Several Governors Proposing Large Spending Hikes. The Wall Street Journal (2/24, A1, Cooper, 2.04M) reports, "From New York to Montana to California, states are proposing budget increases that outpace inflation and far exceed the 1% rise in domestic outlays -- outside of defense and homeland security -- that President Bush recently proposed in his fiscal 2008 federal budget. In Montana, Gov. Brian Schweitzer is cutting taxes and boosting spending by 26% over two years, including $100 million for new 'meth prisons' that blend incarceration with intensive drug rehab for those convicted of methamphetamine crimes. In Vermont, Gov. Jim Douglas wants to borrow $40 million to create 'the nation's first e-state,' where free wireless broadband is available to all. And in Arizona, the only dispute between a Democratic governor and a Republican legislature over a half-billion-dollar road-repair program is whether to borrow the money or pay cash." The Journal notes, "Last year, the Massachusetts legislature approved a $1.56 billion universal health-care plan under Republican Gov. Mitt Romney, who is now running for president. This year, at least ten states -- most notably Republican Arnold Schwarzenegger's California -- are weighing similar programs."

DOJ_NMG_0136801

No Voting Machine Errors Found In FL13 Audit.

The Washington Post/AP (2/24, A8) reports, "An audit of touch-screen voting machines at the center of a dispute in a congressional election found no evidence of malfunction, Florida's secretary of state said Friday. The audit was conducted after more than 18,000 ballots were cast in Sarasota County without a selection in the District 13 congressional race in November between Republican Vern Buchanan and Democrat Christine Jennings. Buchanan was the certified winner by 369 votes, but Jennings sued, alleging that the machines malfunctioned." Florida Secretary of State Kurt Browning said he and Gov. Charlie Crist "are committed to ensuring that every Floridian's vote is counted, and I am confident that the race in Sarasota County was fair and accurate." The New York Times (2/24, A9, Drew, 1.16M) reports, "The finding, reached unanimously by a team of computer experts from several universities, could finally settle last fall's closest federal election. … Legal precedents make it difficult to win a lawsuit over ballot design, but a substantial error in the software might have been grounds for a new election."

Citing Money, Vilsack Quits Presidential Race.

Former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack ended his bid for the Democratic presidential nomination Friday, frankly stating that his inability to raise enough money to compete was the sole reason for his exit. Vilsack, who declined to comment on any possible vice presidential aspirations, was barely registering in national polls but was in the double digits in his home state, which will lead off the primary voting season. Several reports say Vilsack was the first candidate in, and now the first candidate out, of the field, though of the candidates invited to last week's forum in Nevada, ex-Sen. Mike Gravel was actually the earliest entrant into the race.

ABC World News (2/23, story 6, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) said Vilsack "said he's getting out for one reason: He can't raise money. Candidates are declaring they'll run earlier than ever before and now one drops out." The CBS Evening News (2/23, story 4, :15, Mitchell, 7.66M) said the "first Democrat to declare he was in today said he is out. … The reason, he said, in a word, money -- he doesn't have enough." The Des Moines Register (2/24, 160K) quotes Vilsack saying, "This process has become to a great extent about money, a lot of money. And it is clear to me that we would not be able to continue to raise money in the amounts necessary to sustain, not just a campaign in Iowa and New Hampshire, but a campaign across this country. So it is money and only money that is the reason we are leaving today."

Under the headline "Vilsack, First Democrat In, Is Quickly Out," the Washington Post (2/24, A2, Balz, 690K) says Vilsack, "who called for a swift end to the Iraq war and proposed an ambitious plan for reducing dependence on foreign oil, was considered a long shot for the nomination, so his early departure does not fundamentally change the shape of the Democratic contest. But it does change the dynamic in Iowa. … Rival campaigns immediately began scrambling for endorsements of Iowa elected officials and prominent party activists and to hire Vilsack staff members."

The New York Times (2/24, A10, Zeleny, 1.16M) says Vilsack "spent the afternoon taking calls from former rivals. They sent their best wishes, even as they began seeking his endorsement in Iowa." And the New Hampshire Union Leader (2/24, DiStaso) reports Stonyfield Farms CEO Gary Hirshberg, "one of only two well-known New Hampshire backers" of Vilsack's campaign, said Sen. Barack Obama "telephoned him asking for support 'literally 120 seconds' after word" of Vilsack's exit became public. The AP (2/23) says Vilsack, "who likely will be considered as a vice presidential nominee, repeatedly declined to endorse another candidate at his news conference."

The Washington Times (2/24, Miller, 88K) reports on its front page that the "first Democrat to officially enter the 2008 presidential race…will be viewed as a casualty of the new campaign world, in which big states such as California, Florida and New Jersey are considering moving up their primaries and in which $100 million is considered the ante." The Los Angeles Times (2/24, Barabak, 850K) seconds this in its lead, saying Vilsack's "abrupt departure from the presidential race Friday underscores the indispensable role of money in the contest, as well as an attention gap between voters and political insiders." On its Web site, The Hill (2/23, Marre) says Vilsack was the victim of "better-known candidates with deeper pockets."

David Yepsen writes on the Des Moines Register (2/23, 160K) Web site, "One immediate effect on the race is to make the Iowa caucuses even more important. With no favorite son candidate in the field, Iowa again becomes a level playing field for the others. As long as Vilsack was in the race, many in the political community thought contests in Nevada and New Hampshire might prove to be fairer tests of strength for the other candidates."

Aide Says Harkin Will Not Retire To Clear Senate Seat For Vilsack. RollCall.com (2/23, Duran) says an aide to Sen. Tom Harkin quickly "shot down speculation that Harkin would not seek re-election and pave the way for Vilsack to run for Senate." Harkin communications director Maureen Knightly said Harkin is "doing everything he can right now to prepare for a run and he's actively raising money."

DOJ_NMG_0136802

Vilsack Says "Money Primary Was The One That Mattered." On MSNBC's Hardball (2/23, Matthews), Vilsack said, "I think we were winning the idea primary, but the money primary was the one that mattered. We obviously had a position on the war that I think was the right position. And we had an energy policy I was very proud of. But the reality is, if you don't have the resources, you can't basically push the message, and at the end of the day, that's what it was. … Obviously I understood the rules of the game when I got into this. But clearly, I think there needs to be a debate and conversation in the country about precisely what the rules of the game ought to be in the future. It ought to be about ideas. It ought to be about substance. It ought not to be just about money. Unfortunately, that's the game that's being played today. I understood that. I thought I could compete. Obviously, at the end of the day, I couldn't."

Biden Says Vilsack "Would Have Been A Good President." On CNN's The Situation Room (2/23, Blitzer), Sen. Joseph Biden said of Vilsack, "He would have been a good president. This is a competent guy. This is the guy who turned his state around; this is the guy who made it blue, this is the guy who has absolute capability to do whatever he would be appointed to do or asked to do." On MSNBC's Hardball (2/23, Matthews), Biden said, "Gov. Vilsack is a really capable guy and I don't think you've seen the last of Gov. Vilsack on the national scene." Asked if he thinks Vilsack "just checked in so he can run for vice president," Biden said, "No. I think he checked in because he knew he could be a good president."

Giuliani, McCain Both Lead Clinton In Rasmussen Matchups. A Rasmussen Reports poll of 800 likely voters across the US conducted February 21-22 (+/- 4%) finds that in a general election matchup, Rudy Giuliani leads Sen. Hillary Clinton by nine points, 52%-43%. Giuliani leads John Edwards by two points, 46%-44%. In a head-to-head race between Sen. John McCain and Clinton, McCain leads by five points, 47%-42%.

With Spat With Clinton Still Fresh, Obama Campaigns In Texas. The CBS Evening News (2/23, story 4, 2:00, Borger, 7.66M) reported Sen. Barack Obama "told a crowd in Texas today that he's the man to change politics." Obama: "I know Washington needs to change, and I think I can be an agent for change in Washington." Borger: "And Hillary Clinton, a veteran of two presidential elections and a nasty battle against her husband's impeachment, today made no bones that she's ready to rumble." Clinton: "Now, as you may have heard, I'm in, and I'm in to win. And I'm in to change our country." Borger: "But with Obama a growing threat to those aspirations, the aggressive Clinton campaign was looking for a chance to take him down a peg." The "spat" over David Geffen's comments this week "is an early look at what we're in for. The Clinton camp has a take-no-prisoners attitude. The Obama campaign is struggling with this: How can you call for an end to partisan bickering knowing you need to hit back if your opponent kicks you around?" The AP (2/23, Johnson) reports Republican Mitt Romney said he "relishes the infighting that has distracted two of his potential Democratic opponents." At a stop in New Hampshire, Romney said, "It's great, isn't it? I love to see it when it happens on the other side.

The Dallas Morning News (2/24, Slater, 500K) says "thousands of people jammed a lakeside venue used for rock concerts" in Austin to hear Obama "promise Friday to 'galvanize a movement for change' in American politics. The crowd -- extraordinarily large for so early in a presidential campaign -- cheered Mr. Obama's call to withdraw U.S. troops from Iraq and his denunciation of the Bush administration." The rally was Obama's "first visit to Texas since formally announcing his candidacy."

Biden Says Democrats Should Refrain From Personal Attacks On One Another. Asked about the Clinton-Obama tiff on MSNBC's Hardball (2/23, Matthews), Sen. Joseph Biden said, "I learned from the outset of my announcing my campaign my lesson not to comment on anybody else's campaign, or on anything that any of the other candidates are doing. So I am going to refrain from commenting. … I am going to abide by Reagan's 11th commandment: never speak ill of another Democrat running. I commit to that. Now there's a difference between speaking ill of them this terms of their character or family and taking sharp disagreement with a policy. We are going to disagree on policy. That's healthy. The Democratic Party needs to hear the debate about which direction each of us want to take the party and take the nation. But I believe we should refrain from either ourselves or through surrogates, if that happens, from going after, attacking the character, the personality, the family of any other candidate."

Indicted Ex-Fundraiser's Wife Sells Land Next To Obama's Home. The Chicago Tribune (2/24, Jackson, Gibson, 617K) reports, "A land sale recorded this month ended the neighborly relationship" between Obama and "indicted political insider Antoin 'Tony' Rezko, Obama's friend and former fundraiser. On Dec. 28, 2006, land records show, Rezko's wife, Rita, sold the garden lot she owned next to Obama's home, transferring it to a company that plans to develop housing there. That sale deed became public this month when it was registered with the Cook County recorder of deeds." In October 2006, Rezko "was indicted in a state government kickback scandal and in an alleged business fraud. He has pleaded not guilty to both indictments. As he campaigns for president, Obama has distanced himself from his longtime friend."

DOJ_NMG_0136803

Obama New York City Fundraiser Profiled. Under the headline "In Clinton's Backyard, It's Open Season As An Obama Fund-Raiser Lines Up Donors," the New York Times (2/24, A11, Konigsberg, 1.16M) profiles Jeh Johnson, one of Obama's "leading fund-raisers" in New York City, who is "trying to poach in the heart" of Clinton's "financial territory."

Clinton Says Husband Would Have Diplomatic Role Under Her Administration. The San Francisco Chronicle (2/24, Marinucci, 384K) reports on its front page that Sen. Hillary Clinton – "coming off a week of caustic comments from Hollywood mogul David Geffen and a campaign squabble with rival Sen. Barack Obama -- was exactly where she wanted to be Friday: in front of an adoring crowd in the Democratic stronghold of San Francisco, raising boatloads of campaign cash. And the New York senator used the occasion to defend a man who is potentially a source of controversy: her husband." Responding to an audience member's question, Clinton "called her husband 'the most popular person in the world right now' and said that when she reaches the White House, 'I will continue the tradition of using former presidents' as diplomats around the world." In addition, Clinton "also gave her husband's former vice president -- who still is viewed as a potential rival for the Democratic nomination -- a thumbs-up for his Oscar-nominated film about global warming, 'An Inconvenient Truth.'" Clinton said, "We're all pulling for Al Gore to get that Oscar."

South Carolina Democratic Official To Run Richardson State Campaign. South Carolina's the State (2/24) reports South Carolina Democratic Party Executive Director Lachlan McIntosh "is leaving the post to run New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson's presidential campaign in South Carolina." McIntosh "said he will start working for Richardson on March 15."

The Wall Street Journal (2/24, A2, Cooper, 2.04M) looks at the lack of governors in the presidential race, with Richardson the only sitting governor in either party's field.

Biden Says Iraq Issue, First Four States Key To His Chances. Sen. Joseph Biden said on MSNBC's Hardball (2/23, Matthews), "If I am able to make my case about how to get us out of Iraq, how I can lead this country -- and everybody knows there will be no margin for error, this next president will have no margin based on what Bush is going to leave him -- then I think I could overcome whatever deficit I might have after the first four primaries. But I do need enough [money] to compete in the first four primaries and caucuses, and I think I can do that."

Gore Oscar Win Could Revive Presidential Campaign Talk. At CNN.com (2/23), analyst William Schneider writes, "We've seen plenty of political moments at the Oscars before. But on Sunday, we could see the most unusual political moment ever" if Al Gore's "An Inconvenient Truth" wins the Best Documentary Feature award. Schneider asks, "Could an Oscar start the momentum for a draft-Gore movement?" Martin Kaplan of the University of Southern California's Norman Lear Center "thinks it could." Kaplan said, "People think that he's paid his dues, he's had more of an impact on issues that people care about than many people who have been in office and there's a feeling that he's finally lost that student council condescension that was fingernails on a blackboard to a lot of supporters." The AP (2/23, Fouhy) says Gore's film is the "odds-on favorite" to win the Oscar.

Carter Says He Would Support Gore For President. ABCNews.com (2/23) reports that in an interview to air on "This Week" on Sunday, ex-President Carter calls Gore his "favorite Democrat" and says, "If Al should decide to run -- which I'm afraid he won't -- I would support Al Gore."

Leading GOP Presidential Contenders Grapple With Abortion Issue. The Politico (2/23, Martin) reports that an "increasingly tense war over abortion has emerged as the early test of conservative bona fides among the leading GOP presidential contenders. To many on the right, the top three candidates are failing it because they're faking it. … Many conservatives consider Arizona Sen. John McCain a less-than-passionate abortion foe, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney a flip-flopper and former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani as downright hostile to the pro-life movement." The "fight to reverse that perception is getting personal. McCain and Romney, through aides and supporters, are hitting each other almost daily over the issue." While McCain has been a "consistent opponent of abortion in his more than two decades in Congress," he is still "viewed with suspicion by many in the anti-abortion community," while Romney "has even more challenges on pro-life issues. He was, in his words, 'effectively pro-choice' until recent years. … Giuliani has smartly avoided the spat. Unlike Romney, he remains pro-choice. But even Giuliani has sought to lessen the gulf between his views and the GOP conservative base on the issue."

In her New York Times (2/24, A15, 1.16M) column, Ann Althouse writes, "We're seeing some awfully complicated positions on abortion from some of the presidential candidates. It's easy to hoot with derision." But "if we listen with a decent sympathy, the things Giuliani and Romney say about abortion make sense. When Romney ran for governor, he made a commitment to Massachusetts voters not to attack the law he knew they supported. That was politically expedient, of course, but it also took an admirably limited view of executive power and acknowledged the independence of the legal system. Similarly, Giuliani respects the distinctive work of judges and the separate role of the state legislatures. … So I'd like to see a little more patience with what Romney and Giuliani are saying. But that doesn't mean we should be naïve. The next president will select real individuals to be judges, and no matter how diligent they are, they will bring something of their humanity to their interpretation of the law, a version of humanity that will express something of the president's cast of mind."

DOJ_NMG_0136804

McCain Suggests His Iraq Stance Could End His Political Career. The Seattle Times (2/24, Brunner, 118K) reports Sen. John McCain, in Seattle, said Congress "should give President Bush's planned 'surge' of more U.S. troops in Iraq a chance to work." McCain called the recent nonbinding resolution debate "'a charade' and said if members of Congress oppose the war, they should use their budget authority to cut off funding instead." The AP (2/23, Woodward) says McCain said British Prime Minister Tony Blair "has sacrificed his career to support the Iraq war," and acknowledged he "could face the same fate." McCain said of Blair, "He has literally sacrificed his political career because of Iraq. That is a great testament to his political courage." Asked later "if he was in danger of making the same sacrifice, McCain responded, 'Sure.'"

Slain Teen's Father Urges McCain To Address Arizona Incident. Newsday (2/24, Massey) reports New York resident Ronald Schiffman, whose "daughter was shot to death in an Arizona parking lot last Sunday," has called on McCain "to speak out against gun violence." Schiffman said, "This is his state. John McCain should make a statement about this incident. He cries, rightly so, about all the boys who die in Iraq. I'd like to see him talk about gun control. It's a topic I think has disappeared because of all the problems the country is facing." Nicole Schiffman, 19, and Carol Kestenbaum, 20, "were shot last Sunday night in Tempe by 22-year-old Joshua Mendel, who had called 911 two weeks earlier asking for help with an alcohol problem."

Dowd Says She Misses Old McCain. In her New York Times (2/24, A15, 1.16M) column, Maureen Dowd writes that McCain "has tried to worm his way into the affections of W. and the religious right," but "there's one huge group that he's not pandering to: Americans. Most Americans are sick and tired of watching things go hideously backward in Iraq and Afghanistan, and want someone to show them the way out. Mr. McCain is stuck on the bridge of a sinking policy with W. and Dick Cheney, who showed again this week that there is no bottom to his lunacy. The senator supported a war that didn't need to be fought and is a cheerleader for a surge that won't work. … Sometimes I miss John McCain, even when I'm with him."

Nevada GOP Decides Against Early Caucus. The New Hampshire Union Leader (2/24, DiStaso) reports Nevada Republicans "have decided not to follow their Democratic counterparts by moving up their Presidential caucus to near the front of the pack of nominating contests. After considering it, the Nevada Republican Party's executive board decided against a calendar move that would have violated a rule of the Republican National Committee, the party's executive director said yesterday."

Napolitano Says Democratic Nominee Will Be Competitive In Arizona. On MSNBC's Hardball (2/23, Matthews), Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano said she thinks "any of the Democrats could run a very strong race" in her state in 2008. If Sen. John McCain is the Republican nominee, "That makes it tougher. … But I still think it would be very competitive."

Candidates Begin "Quadrennial Groveling" To Early State Opinion Leaders. The New York Times (2/24, A11, Leibovich, 1.16M) runs a piece on "the beginning of the quadrennial groveling season. While the presidential campaigns have turned against one another in the news media in recent days, the candidates are making serious nice to would-be supporters." Candidates are seeking out and chatting up anyone who is "a local person-of-influence in a state with early voting," whose possible support offers "a disproportionate say in picking the next president and, more to the point, entitles" them to "disproportionate attention, flattery and testimonials from the procession of Very Ambitious People blowing through town."

Schwarzenegger Will Not Rule Out Senate Run, Will Back GOP Presidential Nominee. In a flattering piece, Roger Simon writes in The Politico (2/23) that if Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger "had been born in Austin instead Austria, he might be president today. But because that office is denied him by the U.S. Constitution, he is concentrating on other things." In a "45-minute interview in his office in the state capitol Thursday," Schwarzenegger said he "will not rule out running for future public office including U.S. senator or mayor of Los Angeles when his term as governor expires," and that he "will not endorse a presidential candidate until after the Republican Convention in September 2008, even though he thinks Rudy Giuliani and John McCain are strong candidates and either could win the California primary." He also said Democrats "should stop criticizing Hillary Clinton for refusing to say she made a mistake by voting for the Iraq war," and that California First Lady Maria Shriver "will 'absolutely not' run for governor of California or any other public office, quashing speculation that a Schwarzenegger dynasty was in the making."

DOJ_NMG_0136805

Schwarzenegger also said he "would definitely endorse the Republican nominee for president," which means New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg, "a friend and political ally of Schwarzenegger, would not get his endorsement should Bloomberg run for president as an independent."

Research On Adult Stem Cells Comes Into Question. The Washington Times/AP (2/24) reports, "A scientific panel says a 2002 study that suggested adult stem cells might be as useful as embryonic ones was flawed and its conclusions may be wrong, a finding that raises questions about the promise of a less-controversial source for stem cells. The research by Catherine Verfaillie at the University of Minnesota concluded that adult stem cells taken from the bone marrow of mice could grow into an array of biological tissues, including brain, heart, lung and liver."

In Australia, Cheney Reiterates Stance On China, North Korea, Iran. Major media report Vice President Cheney's comments yesterday and today in Sydney, including a joint press appearance this morning with Prime Minister John Howard. The Financial Times (2/24, Minder, Sevastopulo, Dinmore) says Cheney "on Friday accused China of pursuing military policies that were at odds with its stated ambitions of a 'peaceful rise.'" He "welcomed Beijing's role in securing the six-party agreement with North Korea towards denuclearising the Korean peninsula. But he said China's recent anti-satellite missile test and the rapid expansion in its military budget was sending mixed signals." The Times says the visit "comes at a difficult time for [Howard], who is under pressure to justify his decision to maintain Australia's military involvement in the US-led coalition in Iraq" and has "faced criticism over his inability to speed up legal proceedings against David Hicks, an Australian detained in Guantánamo Bay." Howard "rejected as 'absurd' suggestions the US visit and the strong endorsement received yesterday from Mr Cheney was a political liability in the run-up to federal elections this year."

The AP (2/24, Sullivan) keys on today's joint appearance, reporting Cheney "renewed Washington's criticism of Iran on Saturday, saying 'all options' remained on the table to deal with that country's regime after it ignored a U.N. deadline to halt uranium enrichment and said it would defy foreign pressure." He "said the United States remained 'deeply concerned' about Iran's activities, including the 'aggressive' sponsoring of Hezbollah and inflammatory statements by President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. He said top U.S. officials would meet soon with European allies to decide the next step toward planned tough sanctions against Iran for its pursuit of nuclear weapons." Cheney "also said that Washington was 'comfortable' with Britain's decision to withdraw troops from Iraq and that it was up to Australia to decide if it would do the same."

Cheney Rejects Charge Of "Failed Strategy" In Iraq. Asked during an ABC World News (2/23, story 2, 4:15, Karl, 8.78M) interview if "our strategy been failing" in Iraq, "isn't that why the President has to come out with a new strategy," Cheney said, "A failed strategy, let's see, we didn't fail when we got rid of Saddam. We didn't fail when we held elections, we didn't fail when we got a constitution written, those are success stories." Karl: "Didn't we fail when 3,000 American soldiers killed? Cheney: "You wish there was never a casualty, Jonathan. You wish there as never a casualty, always regret casualties but we're at war. And we have to succeed where we begun this venture."

US, Allies To Push For New UN Sanctions Against Iran. The Financial Times (2/24, Dombey, Turner) notes, "Western countries said on Friday they would seek to agree new sanctions against Iran involving a travel ban, possibly an arms embargo, and a crackdown on export credits because of Tehran's failure this week to meet a United Nations deadline to curb its nuclear programme. But they acknowledged some measures, such as the export credits, could be difficult to agree among the [UNSC's] five permanent members, which meet on Monday with Germany to discuss next steps." Washington and Brussels "hope that by setting more modest goals, they will avoid the four-month long wrangle at the Security Council that preceded the imposition of previous sanctions against Iran last December."

An analysis piece in today's New York Times (2/24, Sanger, 1.16M) is entitled, "Leaving The Options Open With Iran." While "the Bush administration tries to rally allies to tighten sanctions on Iran yet again, it is sending mixed messages to Tehran about its commitment to a diplomatic solution, trying to create new openings for negotiations even while holding open, ever so vaguely, the possibility that the United States might some day resort to force." Citing statements yesterday by Cheney and Rice, the Times says "White House officials insist that there is no contradiction." The White House has declined to say at what point the Iranians will have pushed the United States too far," and sources says President Bush "is happy to leave the Iranians guessing." Anonymous Administration officials "said the carrier movements, the accusations about weapons in Iraq and the use of sanctions against the government were all intended to provide Mr. Bush with some leverage in dealing with Iran." Cheney "appears increasingly isolated now that many of his protégés have departed the Defense Department, the State Department and other corners of the administration."

Rafsanjani Backtracks From "Conciliatory Stance." The Washington Times/AP (2/24, Karimi) carries comments by Ahmadinejad and "influential" former President Akbar

DOJ_NMG_0136806

Hashemi Rafsanjani that international "critics of its nuclear program are 'bullying' Iran." Those remarks "appeared to show that the Iranian ruling establishment is closing ranks ahead of the possible new measures." While Rafsanjani "in recent weeks has emerged as a high-level advocate of a more conciliatory stance toward the West in the nuclear dispute," the AP says he "told worshippers gathered for Friday prayers in Tehran that Western countries would fail to achieve anything by pressuring Iran about its nuclear activities."

Richardson Says Only Diplomacy Can Achieve Success With Iran. In an op-ed in today's Washington Post (2/24, A19, 690K), New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson says, "The recent tentative agreement with North Korea over its nuclear program illustrates how diplomacy can work even with the most unsavory of regimes. Unfortunately, it took the Bush administration more than six years to commit to diplomacy." With regard to Iran, "President Bush refuses to talk, except to make threats. … This is not a strategy for peace. It is a strategy for war," and "saber-rattling is not a good way to get the Iranians to cooperate." Richardson asks the Administration "to engage directly with the Iranians and to lead a global diplomatic offensive to prevent them from building nuclear weapons. We need tough, direct negotiations, not just with Iran but also with our allies, especially Russia, to get them to support us in presenting Iran with credible carrots and sticks. … It is time for alliance-building, direct engagement and tough face-to-face negotiations. For the United States to attack Iran without exhausting all diplomatic options would be a terrible mistake."

El-Baradei Says North Korea Wants Renewed Nuclear Inspections. On its front page, the Washington Times/AP (2/24, Jahn) carries comments by IAEA head Mohamed El-Baradei that "North Korea on Friday asked [him] to visit four years after expelling his experts and dropping out of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty — an encouraging sign the reclusive regime is serious about dismantling its weapons program." El-Baradei "offered few details about his upcoming trip, which other agency officials said would likely occur in the second week of March. Still, his announcement was significant because it signaled the North's willingness to subject its nuclear program to outside scrutiny for the first time since" 2003. White House spokesman Tony Fratto "said the invitation shows North Korea is willing to begin executing the terms of the six-nation deal reached Feb. 13." AFP (2/24) titles its coverage, "US 'Very Pleased' About North Korean Invitation To UN Watchdog: Rice."

The Los Angeles Times (2/24, Drogin, 850K) calls the announcement a "breakthrough," and reports, "In a fresh sign of easing tensions, North Korean officials on Friday invited the chief of the United Nations' nuclear watchdog agency to come to [Pyongyang] next month to develop plans aimed at dismantling the nation's nuclear weapons program." El-Baradei "said that he hopes to discuss the 'shut-down and eventual abandonment' of the plutonium-producing reactor facility at Yongbyon, ending its ability to produce fuel for additional nuclear weapons."

An AP (2/23) story notes Kim Kye-Gwan, "North Korea's chief nuclear negotiator, plans to visit the United States within days for follow-up talks on a recent disarmament deal, a South Korean news report said Saturday." Kim plans to meet Assistant Secretary of State Chris Hill in New York late next week. "If Kim's trip takes place, it would be the first U.S. visit by North Korea's main nuclear envoy since the international standoff over the North's nuclear ambitions flared in late 2002."

Pakistan Says Waziristan Al Qaeda Team Killed US Diplomat. The New York Times (2/24, Gall, 1.16M) reports claims by Pakistani prosecutors that "the suicide bombing that killed" US diplomat David Foy in Karachi "last March, just before a visit by President Bush, was organized by a small cell of Pakistani militants and masterminded by an operative of Al Qaeda based in the Pakistan's tribal areas." Those charges were presented as "evidence — the result of months of investigations by the police, assisted by F.B.I. investigators — at the trial of two men accused in the plot," Anwar ul-Haq and Usman Ghani. "The case is one of the first in Pakistan to underline in court the links between splinter cells of Pakistani jihad groups and Qaeda operatives in Waziristan."

Pakistan Tests Nuclear-Capable Missile. AFP (2/23) notes Pakistani military leaders' claims that they "test-fired [their] longest range nuclear-capable ballistic missile, two days after signing a deal with rival India to cut the risk of atomic weapons accidents." The Shaheen II, or Hatf VI, "missile with a range of 2,000 kilometres (1,240 miles) was launched from an undisclosed location" following notifications to "'neighboring countries.'" AFP says the "test comes at a key time in relations between New Delhi and Islamabad following the firebombing of a cross-border train at midnight Sunday, which killed 68 Pakistanis and Indians."

Turkey Charges Kurdish Politician With "Inciting Hatred." The Washington Post/AP (2/24, A12) reports, "A politician was charged Friday with inciting hatred and threatening public safety after suggesting that fellow Kurds would rise against the state and fight if Turkey ever attacked their Kurdish brethren in neighboring Iraq. Police detained Hilmi Aydogdu, leader of the Democratic Society Party's branch in the mainly Kurdish city of Diyarbakir, as he left a conference and questioned him over the remarks, said Nazmi Gur, a party spokesman. ... Turkish leaders are concerned that Iraq's Kurds want Kirkuk's oil revenue to fund a bid for independence that could encourage separatist Kurdish guerrillas in Turkey who have been fighting for autonomy since 1984."

DOJ_NMG_0136807

US, Russia Not Among Cluster Bomb Ban Signatories. The Washington Times/AP (2/24, Mellgren) reports, "Forty-six nations adopted a declaration yesterday calling for a 2008 treaty banning cluster bombs, saying the weapons kill and maim long after conflicts end and inflict 'unacceptable harm' on civilians, particularly children." The AP notes that "some key arms makers -- including the United States, Russia, Israel and China -- snubbed the conference," while Poland, Romania and Japan "did not approve the final text."

UK Interested In Hosting US Missile Defense System. The New York Times (2/24, A4, Cowell, 1.16M) reports London and Washington "said Friday that they were discussing the stationing of an American antiballistic missile defense system on British soil." Prime Minister Tony Blair's "spokeswoman said Friday that Britain had been secretly lobbying for inclusion in the system for some time." The Times says the move "seems sure to prove contentious in Britain, and to cloud Mr. Blair's final months in office." The "negotiations are most likely to raise political hackles at a time when many in Mr. Blair's Labor Party and in the opposition Conservatives are pressing for Britain to distance itself from the United States after their close and sometimes unpopular alliance in Iraq." The Financial Times (2/24, Fidler, Adams, Dombey) cites British government sources claiming London "has pressed Washington to site important elements of the US missile defence system in the UK."

Russia Angered By US Radar, Missile Plans. The CBS Evening News (2/23, story 5, 2:20, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Russia today praised its armed forces as its relations with the U.S. seem to be sliding back to the Cold War era." CBS (Palmer): "The rhetoric coming out of Russia these days is real and aggressive. ... Russia's generals were furious with U.S. plans to put radar bases into the Czech Republic and a new missile defense system into Poland."

NYTimes Assails Bush Plan For Eastern Europe Sites. In an editorial entitled, "Misguided Missiles," the New York Times (2/24, A14, 1.16M) says "it would seem that everyone involved should know better. But the Bush administration's tone-deaf plan to station parts of a missile defense system in Eastern Europe and Moscow's snarling response show that all sides could use a refresher course in diplomatic sense and civility." The "mixture of crocodile tears and threats from Russian officials seems overly dramatic — and very much in character for President Vladimir Putin." Secretary Rice "should have expected Moscow's reaction," and she "should have known that provoking Moscow this way could be especially counterproductive." The Times concludes, "A few interceptors in Europe may or may not work against 'rogue states,' but they are counterproductive if all they do is to provoke Russia and irk NATO allies."

Prodi Lines Up Support Ahead Of Likely Return To Premiership. The New York Times (2/24, A8, Fisher, 1.16M) reports, "It wasn't love or even any real faith that they could stick together long. Rather, it seems, a singular frightening thought pushed nine bickering parties to agree late on Thursday to come together again: that Silvio Berlusconi might soon lead Italy again." Because recent polling "showed that Mr. Berlusconi's center-right coalition would probably win if elections were called now," the Times says "new elections seem unlikely at the moment." The "real worry that the center-left could again lose power, only nine months after wresting it from Mr. Berlusconi, seemed to concentrate minds overnight Thursday as the fractured parties in Mr. Prodi's coalition came together behind his demands."

Under the headline, "Prodi aims to secure centre-left vote," the Financial Times (2/24, Barber) says "Italian political leaders continued their search for a new government on Friday as" Prodi "tried to strengthen his centre-left coalition and secure it a second term of office." His "aim is to ensure that if [Napolitano] asks him to form a new government, he will be able to count on the support of every single centre-left legislator in a subsequent vote of confidence." The AP (2/24, Rizzo) adds, "Center-left leaders rallied behind [Prodi] on Friday, boosting his chances of returning to office."

Chavez Conducts "Frenetic" Regional Diplomacy To Buttress Standing. The New York Times (2/24, A4, Romero, 1.16M) summarizes the "busy week" of diplomacy by Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez. He met in Caracas on Friday "with President Daniel Ortega of Nicaragua to discuss an array of Venezuelan assistance programs, capping an unusually frenetic week for this country's efforts to enhance its political and economic influence in parts of Latin America." The deals with Nicaragua, Ecuador and Argentina stem are part of "Venezuela's use of its windfall from historically high oil prices, and sometimes its own reserves and exports of oil, to lift its regional profile." Chavez "is using Venezuela's oil revenues, valued at more than $50 billion a year, to counter the influence of the United States and multilateral lending organizations like the International Monetary Fund."

Motives Behind Citgo Campaign Questioned. Under the headline, "Is Citgo Program For Poor, Or For Chávez?" the Washington Post (2/24, D1, Birnbaum, Mufson, 690K) notes, "Citgo, the Venezuela-owned oil company, is running

DOJ_NMG_0136808

television commercials across the United States promoting the discounted heating oil it provides to low-income people -- but some are wondering whether the ads are really promoting the South American country's leader." Citgo "said the ads … are designed to persuade families to sign up for the charitable program. Critics of Venezuela, however, see both political and economic motives -- primarily to enhance the image of the country's leftist leader, Hugo Chávez, and thereby improve the company's standing with U.S. consumers." The Post adds, "Some observers, while praising the program's generosity, believe that more is involved than good deeds."

Hong Kong's Tsang Said To "Juggle" Roles.

The Wall Street Journal (2/24, A9, Kissel, 2.04M) conducts an extensive interview of Hong Kong chief executive Donald Tsang entitled, "Tsangfroid." He is "part of a grand juggling act, protecting Hong Kong's cherished freedoms while integrating the place – carefully, it's hard work, doing the best that we can, he'll tell you -- into the mainland's booming economy." The Journal says he "is 'running' for 're-election' in a rigged campaign where Beijing still picks the winner." For his part, Tsang "has focused his energies on the economy," and he has "a vision for Hong Kong as a nexus for capital not unlike that of London for Europe, or New York for the Americas." His "eagerness to bet Hong Kong's future on the mainland is genuine: He is undoubtedly a Chinese patriot. But why should this capitalist city scramble to join the Communist Party's five-year industrial plan? Other actions, too, hint that the Hong Kong government is starting to stray from the free-market policies that made it so rich."

THE BIG PICTURE

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Iraq Allies, Washington Clash Over Key Policy."
"Drug Cartel's Betrayer Tells His Story."
"Passenger Bill Of Rights' Shaky Start."

New York Times:
"Canadian Court Limits Detention In Terror Cases."
"U.S. Seizes Son Of A Top Shiite, Stirring Uproar."
"At $45 Billion, New Contender For Top Buyout."
"Record Fine Expected For Univision."
"Retired Politicians Spend Unused Campaign Funds."
"New Airport X-Rays Scan Bodies, Not Just Bags."
"Family Hands Off Its Business, And Its Philosophy."

Washington Post:
"Colleges Go Online To Calm The Admissions Jitters."
"Democrats Offer Up Chairmen For Donors."
"Review Of Walter Reed Is Ordered."
"Iraq Rebuilding Short On Qualified Civilians."
"Abuse Victims Demand More From Church."
"Fannie Mae Shuts Down Foundation."

Washington Times:
"N. Korea Invites U.N. Inspector."
"GOP Rejects Iraq Measure."
"Arkansas' Historic School Case Ends."
"And The Nominees Are... From All Over."
"American Hot Wax Is Still Cool."
"Cameras Nab Cops Going To Emergencies."
"Vilsack Calls It Quits For '08."

Detroit Free Press:
"Investors Circle Chrysler."
"Who Is Tara Grant?"
"Woman: Cops Lost My $56k Diamond."
"Home Magic Disappears."
"Chrysler Eyes Site In Van Buren."
"DPS Investigates $1m Art Purchase."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"On A Mission For Vietnam POWs."
"Judge Wants Jail Reports Audited."
"The Fight For Kids' Health Care."
"Watch Out For Some Gridlock."
"Morris Brown Marks 126 Years."
"Ex-Inmate Wins Round Vs. Fulton."
"Hospital Law Catches Feds' Eye."
"Marta Rail In Alpharetta?"

Dallas Morning News:
"Animal House Gets Raided."
"TXU May Get Record Buyout."
"Teammates Of Grapevine Player Wait And Pray."
"Drug Dogs To Be Used To Fight 'Cheese.'"
"Director Of Juvenile Justice Agency Stepping Down."
"Obama Reels In Austin Crowd."
"Moroney Remembered For Service To Parish, Family, Belo."

Houston Chronicle:
"Some Lottery Games Offer No Chance."
"Privacy Fears Greet Body Scanner's Airport Debut."
"Your Fashionable Faux Fur Could Be Lassie's Coat."
"Fort Bend Toxic Suicide Bid May Lead To Charges."
"Latin Filmmakers Make Strong Oscar Showing."
"T-Mac Gets 37, But Rockets Fall To Hawks."
"Chevron Bets On Galveston Biodiesel Plant."
"NASA Lacked Plan For Earthly Astronaut Breakdown."
"Death Row Appeal: Two Couldn't Fire Same Bullet."
"Ebony Opera Guild Offers Spirituals."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Hybrid Car Mileage; Cheney-Iraq; Carter-Iraq; Iraq Incident; Gates-Walter Reed; Vilsack Quits Presidential Race; TSA Screening; Dr. Pepper Guerilla Marketing; Sexualized Media Images; Cervical Cancer Vaccine.

DOJ_NMG_0136809

CBS: Congress-Iraq; Military Opposition To War; Gates-Walter Reed; Vilsack Quits Presidential Race; Clinton/Obama; Gates-Russia; Airline Industry; Hybrid Car Mileage; Gym Teacher-Unicycling.

NBC: Gates-Walter Reed; Congress-Iraq; Congress-Iraq Analysis; Gulf Coast Company-Katrina; Economic Report; Elder Care-VA Benefits; Little Rock Schools; Oscar Nominees; Taco Bell Rodents; Juvenile Cardiac Arrest.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — No public schedule.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: Not in session

US House: Not in session.

Other: GOVERNORS _ The National Governors Association holds its Winter Meeting. Highlights: 10 a.m. News conference with Chair Gov. Janet Napolitano of Arizona, others. 1 p.m. Session on "Innovation America," with Cisco Systems CEO John Chambers and Robert Rubin of Citigroup. 6:30 p.m. Reception honoring the governors. Italian Embassy, 3000 Whitehaven St. NW. Note: receiving line photo op at 6:30 p.m. Remarks at 7 p.m. Location: JW Marriott, 1331 Pennsylvania Ave, NW, unless otherwise noted. Contacts: Jodi Omear, 202-624-5346

BREAST CANCER SURVIVORS _ More than 800 young breast cancer survivors, their caregivers and medical professionals gather for the 7th Annual Conference for Young Women Affected by Breast Cancer, the only international meeting dedicated to the unique needs of young breast cancer survivors. Location: Hyatt Regency-Crystal City, 2799 Jefferson Davis Hwy., Arlington, Va. Contacts: Karen Borack, 212-242-4629

JEWISH COMMUNITY POLICY _ Jewish leaders from the United States and Canada meet to debate, analyze and vote the Jewish community's domestic and international policy at the 2007 Jewish Council for Public Affairs plenum. Location: Omni Shoreham Hotel, 2500 Calvert St. NW Contacts: 202-265-3000

RELIGIOUS LEADERS-IRAN _ 9 a.m. A delegation of U.S. religious leaders returning from a week-long trip to Iran will hold a press conference to brief reporters on their meetings with the Iranian president and Iranian religious leaders. This is the first religious delegation to meet with an Iranian president in Iran since the revolution in 1979. Location: National Press Club, Zenger Room. Contacts: Jack Pannell, 202-745-4614

ARCHIVES DECLASSIFICATION _ 9 a.m. - 12 p.m. The National Archives hosts the 11th meeting of the Public Intertest Declassification Board. Location: Room 700, National Archives and Records Administration. Contacts: Lee Morrison, 202-357-5039

DEAN _ 9:30 a.m. DNC Chairman Howard Dean participates in the National Black Leadership Roundtable Summit. Location: Howard University law school, 2900 Van Ness St. NW. Contacts: Stacie Paxton, 202-863-8148

Copyright 2007 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0136810

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, February 26, 2007 7:59 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Saturday, February 24, 2007
Attachments:	dojclips070224.pdf; dojclips070224.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Canadian Court Limits Detention In Terror Cases (NYT) 3
Canada Rules Indefinite Detention Wrong (AP) 5
Jailing Without Trial Rejected In Canada (WP) 6
General Plays Down Value Of Capturing Bin Laden (WP) 7
Co-Defendants Of Padilla Are Seeking To Split Cases (NYT) .. 7
Judge OKs Lawyer's Request For Evaluation In Terror-plot Case (ROCKRS) 9
Mental Exam Ordered For Alleged Would-be Rockford Mall Bomber (AP) 9

Homeland Response:

Minneapolis / Man Gets 10 Years For Plan To Bomb Court (STPPP) 10
Mayo Researcher Under Investigation By FBI (MINNST) 10
New Airport X-Rays Scan Bodies, Not Just Bags (NYT) 11

War News:

White House Warns Against Iraq Pullout (AP) 12
Congressional Democrats Wrestle Over How To Force Bush To Alter Iraq Policy (NYT) 13
GOP Rejects Iraq Measure (WT) 15
McConnell Threatens To Block Bid To Repeal War Resolution (WP) 16
Defense Secretary Vows Action On Medical Center Conditions (NYT) 17
Review At Walter Reed Is Ordered (WP) 18
Gates Orders Review Of Walter Reed Hospital (LAT) 19
Gates Vows Action On Walter Reed Worries (AP) 20
The Army's Preemptive News Briefing (WP) 20
Benefits Of The Doubt (WP) 21
U.S. Seizes Son Of A Top Shiite, Stirring Uproar (NYT) 22
Iraqi's Arrest Brings Apology From U.S. (LAT) 24
U.S. Detains Shiite Leader's Son (WP) 24
U.S. Detains Top Shi'ite Leader's Son (WT/AP) 25
Baghdad Crackdown 'curbing Violence' (FT) 26
Car Bombings Kill 4 Civilians In Baghdad (AP) 27
Stryker Team Key To Iraq Security Plan (LAT) 27
U.S. Disappointed In Iraq's Progress With Baathists (LAT) 28
Bachmann Backs Down From Iraq Comments (MINNST) 30
Americans Underestimate Iraqi Death Toll (AP) 31
Iraq Rebuilding Short On Qualified Civilians (WP) 32
Army's Iraq War Objector Charged Again (AP) 35
Iraq Objector Faces Another Court-martial (LAT) 36
'Cry God For Harry!' (WSJ) 36
More Troops Headed To Afghanistan (WT/AP) 36
New Al Qaeda Video Claims Attack In Afghanistan (AP) 37
Afghans See Decline Since '05 (WP) 38

DOJ:

Justice Department Fires 8th U.S. Attorney (WP) 38
Eighth U.S. Attorney Dismissed From Post (NYT) 39

Corporate Scandals:

Former KB Officials Face U.S. Backdating Probe (WSJ) 40
DOJ Launches KB Home Stock Options Probe (AP) 40
New Inquiry On Options At KB Home (NYT) 41
SEC Probe Into Citigroup Associates Deal (FT) 41

Criminal Law:

Mrs. Moonda Asks To Remove Death Penalty From Case (PPG) 42
Suspect Sketch Issued (WHEELPI) 43
Russo, Former OB Mayor, Gets 10 Years (MR) 43
Former Orange Beach Mayor Gets 10-year Sentence (BSH) 45
Ex-official Convicted In Bribery Case (MH) 46
Authorities Search For Gunman Who Abducted A Florida Boy (NYT) 47
FBI Agents Pose As Mobsters, Sting Florida Cops (AP) 48
Chief: Probe Of Hollywood Cops Halted Early (MH) 48
Officers Face Life In Prison For Running Diamonds, Drugs For Fake Mafia (FLSUNSEN) 50
Area Man Faces Charges In FBI Sting (PALMBEACHP) 51

Ex-FBI Man Gets 7 Years For Child Sex (FREDFLS) 52

Civil Rights:

Gonzales' Spiel Riles Some Christians (UPI) 52
FBI May Reopen Cold Cases On 1950s And '60s Slayings In The South (AP) 54
FBI Building Database On Victims Slain Amid Civil Rights-era Violence (JCL) 55
Federal Supervision Of Race In Little Rock Schools Ends (NYT) 56
Arkansas' Historic School Case Ends (AP) 57
Rhode Island Official OKs Gay 'Marriage' (WT) 58
Protecting All Students (NYT) 58

Antitrust:

Buyout Firms Seek Utility TXU For $32 Billion (WSJ) 59
At $45 Billion, New Contender For Top Buyout (NYT) 60
TXU Set To Approve Record Private Equity Deal (FT) 62
$45 Billion Deal Near For Texas Power Firm (WP) 63
TXU Sale Could Cost $32 Billion (LAT) 64
TXU May Cut Rates In Buyout Bid (DMN) 64
Record Fine Expected For Univision (NYT) 66
A Software Maker Goes Up Against Microsoft (NYT) 68
Tuning In To One Company (NYT) 70
MP3 Patent Verdict Harmless To Music Fans -- For Now (WP) 71

Environment:

President Promotes Alternative Energy With A Car Show Of Sorts (NYT) 72
Texas: B.P. Settles 2 Lawsuits (NYT/AP) 73

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Arellano's Arrest Location Challenged (SDUT) 73
Homemade Pipe Bombs Often Lethal, Expert Says (EPT) 74

Immigration:

Bush Plan To Allow Mexican Truckers Throughout U.S. Draws Criticism (NYT/AP) 75
U.S. To Allow Mexican Trucks (WSJ) 75
U.S., Mexico And Canada Discuss Border Issues (NYT) 77
Borders Without Fences (NYT) 77

Tax:

IRS Urged To Go After EBay Sellers (SFC) 78

Congress-Administration:

Medicaid Cuts Would Cost Public Hospitals, Other Facilities (LAT) 79
Cheney Remark Rankles Pelosi (WP) 81
Democrats Offer Up Chairmen For Donors (WP) 82
Passenger Bill Of Rights May Cause Some Turbulence (LAT) 84
The Politics Of JetBlue (WSJ) 85
Better Pay For Judges (NYT) 86

Other News:

H&R Block, Roper Industries Rise (WSJ) 87
Rising Oil Prices, Lenders' Woes Give Dow Worst Week Since Mid-Aug. (WP) 87
Gold Nears The $700 Level, Helped By Crude-Oil Gains (WSJ) 88
Dollar Declines On Rate Worries (WSJ) 88
States Set Big Spending Plans As Washington Preaches Austerity (WSJ) 89
Voting Machines Found Not At Fault In Fla. Election (WP/AP) 92
Panel Cites Voter Error, Not Software, In Loss Of Votes (NYT) 92
Vilsack Drops Out Of Prez Race (DMR) 93
Vilsack, First Democrat In, Is Quickly Out (WP) 94
Vilsack Ends Bid For Presidency (NYT) 95
Hirshberg: Vilsack's Exit "A Bit Of A Tragedy" (NHUL) 96
Former Iowa Gov. Vilsack Ending '08 Bid (AP) 97
Vilsack Calls It Quits For '08 (WT) 98
Vilsack Exits Presidential Race, Citing Lack Of Funding (LAT) 100
Vilsack Drops Out Of '08 Race, Cites Money As Reason (HILL) 101
Vilsack Drops Presidential Bid (DMR) 101
Harkin Aide: 'No Truth' To Retirement Rumor (RC) 102
Rommey Amused As Clinton, Obama Go After Each Other (AP) 102
Obama Reels In Austin Crowd (DMN) 103
Obama, Rezko Neighborly Relationship Ends (CHIT) 104
In Clinton's Backyard, It's Open Season As An Obama Fund-Raiser Lines Up Donors (NYT) 105
Clinton Sees Role For Husband (SFC) 107
S.C. Democratic Party Chief To Lead Campaign (TSSC) 108
Can Governors Regain Spotlight In 2008 Race For The White House? (WSJ) 108
Could Gore's Road To The Oval Office Begin In Hollywood? (CNN) 109
Gore Film Odds-On Favorite To Win Oscar (AP) 110
Carter Endorses Gore, Says Former Veep Can Win More Than Oscars (ABC) 111
Abortion Doubts Dog GOP Top Three (POL) 111
Rudy & Mitt Hem & Haw On Abortion (NYT) 113
McCain Woos Seattle Voters (SEATIMES) 114

DOJ_NMG_0136813

McCain Says Iraq Could End His Career (AP) 115
Father Of Slain Teen Urges McCain To Speak Against Gun Violence (NSDY).....115
A Cat Without Whiskers (NYT) 116
Nevada Republicans Reject Holding Early Caucus (NHUL)117
Early Stops On The Sweet-Talk Circuit (NYT).....118
Arnold Defends Hillary, Mulls Senate Run (POL) 120
Panel Calls Adult Stem-cell Study Flawed, Wrong (WT/AP).121
Cheney Tackles Beijing On Military Expansion (FT) 122
Cheney: 'All Options' Available For Iran (AP).....123
West Aims To Agree New Iran Sanctions (FT) 124
Leaving The Options Open With Iran (NYT).....124
Iranian Leaders Decry Critics' 'Bullying' Over Nuke Program (WT/AP).....126
Diplomacy, Not War, With Iran (WP).....126
N. Korea Invites U.N. Inspector (WT/AP).....127
US 'Very Pleased' About North Korean Invitation To UN Watchdog: Rice (AFP).....128
N. Korea, U.N. To Develop Plan To Dismantle Nukes (LAT)129
Report: North Korea's Main Nuclear Envoy To Visit US Within Days (AP).....130
Blast That Killed U.S. Diplomat Tied To Qaeda (NYT).....130
Pakistan Successfully Tests Nuclear-capable Missile (AFP)132
Turks Charge Kurd With Inciting Hatred (WP/AP).....133
46 Nations Push For Cluster Bomb Ban (WT/AP).....133
U.S. In Talks With Britain On Installing Missile Defense System (NYT) 134
UK Wants US Missile Defence Sites (FT).....135
Misguided Missiles (NYT) 136
Fear Of Return Of Berlusconi Reunites Left Behind Prodi (NYT).....137
Prodi Aims To Secure Centre-left Vote (FT).....138
Italian President Weighs Prodi's Support (AP) 138
Chávez Ends Busy Week Aiding Venezuela's Latin Neighbors (NYT).....139
Is Citgo Program For Poor, Or For Chávez? (WP) 140
Tsangfroid (WSJ).....141

TERRORISM NEWS:

Canadian Court Limits Detention In Terror Cases (NYT)

By Ian Austen

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

OTTAWA, Feb. 23 — Canada's highest court on Friday unanimously struck down a law that allows the Canadian government to detain foreign-born terrorism suspects indefinitely using secret evidence and without charges while their deportations are being reviewed.

The detention measure, the security certificate system, has been described by government lawyers as an important tool for combating international terrorism and maintaining Canada's domestic security. Six men are now under threat of deportation without an open hearing under the certificates.

"The overarching principle of fundamental justice that applies here is this: before the state can detain people for significant periods of time, it must accord them a fair judicial process," Chief Justice Beverley McLachlin wrote in the ruling.

The three men who brought the case are likely to remain jailed or under strict parole because the court suspended its decision for a year to allow Parliament to introduce a law consistent with the ruling.

The decision reflected striking differences from the current legal climate in the United States. In the Military Commissions Act of 2006, Congress stripped the federal courts of authority to hear challenges, through petitions for writs of habeas corpus, to the open-ended confinement of foreign terrorism suspects at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

A federal appeals court in Washington upheld the constitutionality of that law this week, dismissing 13 cases brought on behalf of 63 Guantánamo detainees. Their lawyers said they would file an appeal with the Supreme Court. In two earlier decisions, the justices ruled in favor of Guantánamo detainees on statutory grounds but did not address the deeper constitutional issues that this case appears to present.

At a news conference in Montreal, a defendant, Adil Charkaoui, praised the Canadian court's decision.

DOJ_NMG_0136814

"The Supreme Court, by 9 to 0, has said no to Guantánamo North in Canada," said Mr. Charkaoui, who is under tightly controlled, electronically monitored house arrest.

Stockwell Day, the Canadian minister of public safety, said Friday, "It is our intention to follow the Supreme Court ruling."

He added, "We are taking in stride what they did say and we will look at the changes that are necessary."

The decision is also the latest in a series of events that has seen Canada reconsider some national security steps it took after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. Last September, a judicial inquiry rebuked the police for falsely accusing a Syrian-born Canadian, Maher Arar, of terrorist connections. Those accusations, in 2002, led United States officials to fly Mr. Arar to Syria, where he was jailed and tortured. Earlier this year, the Canadian government reached a $9.75 million settlement with Mr. Arar and offered a formal apology. The commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police also resigned for reasons related to the affair.

Canada's Parliament is divided over whether to continue two antiterrorism measures introduced in 2001 that are set to expire on March 1. The opposition Liberal Party, which had brought in the law, does not want to continue its special preventive arrest powers or the secret court hearings it permits, which resemble grand jury hearings in the United States. Two other portions of that law have been struck down by courts in Ontario.

"We've started to see the rollback," said Alex Neve, the secretary general of Amnesty International Canada. "Today the Supreme Court of Canada has said, 'Make sure you put human rights at the center of how you prevent terrorism.' "

The security certificate system was introduced in a 1978 immigration law and has been used 27 times, mostly before September 2001. It allows the government to detain people indefinitely if the minister of public safety and the minister of immigration conclude that they are a threat to national security. The certificates, once signed, are reviewed by a federal judge who can rule to keep any or all of the evidence secret.

While Amnesty International and other groups have long campaigned against the certificates, the issue attracted relatively little attention for many years. Historically the certificates were issued against people who were accused of spying in Canada and who were swiftly deported.

The current cases, however, have become more prominent because they generally involve people who have been jailed for years without charges, using secret evidence and, in many cases, without bail.

The sparseness of evidence makes it difficult to assess if there is any connection linking the men. The authorities say they have tied five of them in various ways to Al Qaeda. A sixth was arrested in 1995 and has been out on bail since 1998. He is charged with being a fund-raiser for the Tamil Tigers in Sri Lanka.

Hassan Almrei, a Syrian arrested in Mississauga, Ontario, in 2001, is the only one directly involved in this case who remains in jail.

A document from the Canadian Security and Intelligence Service charges that Mr. Almrei, who entered Canada on false papers in 1999, forged documents for the Sept. 11 attacks and is a member of "an international network of extremist groups and individuals who follow and support the Islamic extremist ideals espoused by Osama bin Laden." He was also accused of sending money to Mr. bin Laden's network through a honey and perfume business he ran in Saudi Arabia. The government said that a computer belonging to Mr. Almrei contained images of Mr. bin Laden, guns, a jet cockpit and a security badge.

Like most of the other suspects, Mr. Almrei remains under a certificate because the government's efforts to deport him to Syria conflict with Canadian laws that ban sending people to places where they are likely to be tortured.

Based on the limited information available, other security certificate cases appear to be circumstantial. Mr. Charkaoui, a Moroccan who was arrested in 2002 and released on house arrest in 2005, is accused of having trained in Afghanistan.

"I am innocent," he said Friday. "I was never charged, I was never accused of a crime. If the government has anything to accuse me of, well, there's the criminal code."

Much of the judgment provides a blueprint for Parliament on how to make security certificates fit with Canada's charter of rights and freedoms. As part of that, one of the court's suggestions seems to be adopted from Britain, whose legal system provided the basis of Canada's. After the House of Lords struck down a similar law in 2004, Britain adopted a system that allows security-cleared lawyers to attend the hearings, review the evidence and represent the accused.

DOJ_NMG_0136815

A provision of the ruling that is effective immediately requires people held under certificates to receive a bail hearing within 48 hours.

For terrorism suspects in the United States, whose situation is most directly analogous to that of the men in Canada, the legal situation is cloudy at best. In the two years after Sept. 11, 2001, the government detained more than 5,000 foreign citizens.

Most were charged with offenses no more serious than overstaying a tourist visa, and many were held for months, awaiting clearance by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, after they had agreed to leave the country. Not one was convicted of a crime of terrorism.

Judge John Gleeson of Federal District Court in Brooklyn ruled last June on a class-action lawsuit brought by eight detainees. All have left the country and are seeking damages for what they argued was an illegitimate incarceration. Judge Gleeson dismissed that portion of the lawsuit, ruling that the courts should not "encroach on the executive branch in a realm where it has particular expertise" and "legitimate foreign policy considerations."

Even if the plaintiffs could demonstrate that their right to constitutional due process was violated, Judge Gleeson wrote, the officials they sued would be entitled to immunity because any right to "immediate or prompt removal" had not been "clearly established" at the time. The case, Turkmen v. Gonzales, is now on appeal.

Dalia Hashad, the United States program director for Amnesty International, said the Canadian decision should serve as "a wake-up call that reminds us that civilized people follow a simple and basic rule of law, that indefinite detention is under no circumstances acceptable."

Canada Rules Indefinite Detention Wrong (AP)

By Beth Duff-Brown

AP, February 23, 2007

OTTAWA (AP) - One of Canada's most contentious anti-terrorism provisions was struck down Friday by the Supreme Court, which declared it unconstitutional to detain foreign terror suspects indefinitely while the courts review their deportation orders.

The 9-0 ruling was a blow to the government's anti-terrorism regulations. Five Arab Muslim men have been held for years under the "security certificate" program, which the Justice Department had insisted is a key tool in the fight against global terrorism and essential to Canada's security.

The court found that the system violates the Charter of Rights and Freedom, Canada's bill of rights. It suspended the judgment from taking effect for a year, to give Parliament time to rewrite the part of the Immigration and Refugee Protection Act that covers the certificates.

The security certificates were challenged on constitutional grounds by three men from Morocco, Syria and Algeria - all alleged by the Canadian Security Intelligence Service to have ties to al-Qaida and other terrorist networks.

The law now allows sensitive intelligence to be heard behind closed doors by a federal judge, with only sketchy summaries given to defense attorneys.

The men have spent years in jail while fighting deportation orders. They risk being labeled terrorists and sent back to their native countries, where they face possible torture.

The court called this a fundamental violation of their human rights.

"The overarching principle of fundamental justice that applies here is this: Before the state can detain people for significant periods of time, it must accord them a fair judicial process," Chief Justice Beverley McLachlin wrote in a ruling for all nine justices.

"The secrecy required by the scheme denies the person named in a certificate the opportunity to know the case put against him or her, and hence to challenge the governments case," she said.

The court said the men and their lawyers should have a right to respond to the evidence used against them by intelligence agents and noted that a law in Britain allows special advocates to review sensitive intelligence material.

The Justice Department said it would have no immediate comment.

Two of the men are out on bail and remain under house arrest. Three others are being held in a federal facility in Ontario that has been dubbed the "Guantanamo Bay of the North," a reference to the prison at the U.S. base in Cuba.

DOJ_NMG_0136816

Human rights activists and lawyers for the men hailed the ruling as a victory for those who believe fundamental rights and freedoms have been overshadowed by the demands of national security since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on the United States.

"This is a judgment that, quite frankly, I think we should all be very proud of, because our court has not bought into the rhetoric of national security," said John Norris, who represents one of the five. "They have recognized the fundamental importance of preserving the security of all of us, but at the same time has stated, in the clearest possible terms, that that must never be done at the expense of human rights."

Barbara Jackman, who represents another detainee, said the Supreme Court decision in no way compromises national security.

"It only strengthens our democracy," she said. "It's an indication to other countries that to detain people and mistreat them , it's not satisfactory. There are ways to provide fair hearings in the face of national security concerns."

Although the security certificates have been around for decades, their use became more contentious after 9/11, and more suspect since Ottawa used faulty intelligence in a case that led to a $9 million apology to another former terror suspect, Maher Arar.

In that case, the Syrian-born Canadian was seized by U.S. authorities in New York and sent to Syria for questioning about suspected ties to terrorists. He was held in a cell for a year and tortured before being sent back to Canada, where he was cleared by a federal inquiry of any links to Islamic extremists.

Five Arab Muslim men now stand accused of terrorist links under the certificates, and all deny any ties to terrorism. It was not immediately clear if the three men still in detention would be released, or remain jailed until the law is rewritten.

The most notable is Adil Charkaoui, 33, a native of Morocco. The former University of Montreal student and pizzeria operator was arrested in Montreal in 2003 and freed on bail under strict conditions in 2005. He is accused by the Canadian Security Intelligence Service of belonging to the Moroccan Islamic Combatant Group, which has ties to al-Qaida and a history of terrorist attacks in Spain.

CSIS also claims Ahmed Ressam, convicted in 2001 of plotting to blow up Los Angeles International Airport, identified Charkaoui as someone he met at an al-Qaida training camp in Afghanistan - a contention denied by Charkaoui.

The others are Mohamed Harkat, an Algerian native arrested in 2002 and freed on bail last year; Mahmoud Jaballah, an Egyptian who remains in detention; Mohammad Mahjoub, also from Egypt and recently granted bail, although he has yet to be released; and Hassan Almrei, a native of Syria who was arrested in 2001 and is still in custody.

Jailing Without Trial Rejected In Canada (WP)

By Doug Struck, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, February 24, 2007

Court Leaves 6 Security Suspects in Limbo

TORONTO, Feb. 23 -- Canada's Supreme Court on Friday unanimously struck down the use of secret testimony to imprison and deport foreigners as possible terrorist suspects, ruling that the procedures violate Canada's Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

But the court suspended its ruling for a year, leaving the six men who are under a "security certificate" in legal limbo. Two are held in a special prison, three are free on bond and a fourth has been ordered released on bond.

Supporters of the men hailed the ruling as a victory for civil rights but acknowledged that it did not entirely sweep away the procedures for holding suspects without trial that critics here have called "Canada's Guantanamo North."

The court said Parliament should draft a new law that is more fair to security suspects.

"The court found the way secret evidence was used violated fundamental justice," said Sharry Aiken, a law professor who represented a coalition of groups that argued against the law before the Supreme Court. But "it doesn't mean security certificates are going by the wayside. It does mean that federal court judges are finally willing to scrutinize the procedures of detention to a greater extent than they were in the immediate aftermath of 9/11."

Stockwell Day, the government's minister of public safety, said in Ottawa that "in general, the Supreme Court upheld the security certificates. We will look at the changes the court said are necessary."

DOJ_NMG_0136817

The security certificate procedures allow police or intelligence agencies to present secret evidence against noncitizen immigrants or visitors in Canada. If two cabinet ministers agree the person is a security risk, the suspect can be imprisoned and deported without a trial and without seeing the evidence.

About 24 people have been deported since the mid-1970s, including an alleged Russian spy and a German Nazi sympathizer. But six men -- five from Arab countries and a Sri Lankan -- remain in Canada, arguing that they are unfairly accused and would be tortured if they were deported.

Most of those on bail are under strict conditions, including curfew, restrictions on use of computers or telephones, and a requirement to wear a security bracelet that identifies their location.

"I've been harassed for eight years," said Adil Charkaoui, a Moroccan who was imprisoned for 21 months on allegations that he trained in an al-Qaeda camp in Afghanistan. He is free on bond. "I am not a terrorist," he said at a news conference in Ottawa on Friday. "All I am asking for is justice, the chance to defend myself. If you have something against me, charge me" in court.

Egyptian Mahmoud Jaballah and Syrian Hassan Almrei, both accused of ties with al-Qaeda, have been on a hunger strike while in detention under the security certificates. Last week, a federal court ordered Mohamed Zeki Mahjoub, who once ran a farming operation for Osama bin Laden, moved to house arrest.

The Supreme Court ruling put the spotlight on security arrests during a visit to Ottawa by U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. At a news conference following meetings with Canadian, Mexican and U.S. officials on North American security and prosperity issues, Rice defended the U.S. insistence that Syrian-born Canadian Maher Arar remain on an airport "watch list."

Arar, who was whisked to Syria by American agents in a 2002 "rendition" that left him imprisoned in a dungeon for 10 months, was cleared in an exhaustive Canadian inquiry. The government here has apologized and agreed to pay him $9 million in compensation, but the U.S. refusal to acknowledge that his rendition was a mistake has rankled Canadians.

General Plays Down Value Of Capturing Bin Laden (WP)

The Washington Post, February 24, 2007

FORT WORTH, Feb. 23 -- The Army's highest-ranking officer said Friday that he was unsure whether the U.S. military would capture or kill Osama bin Laden, adding, "I don't know that it's all that important, frankly."

"So we get him, and then what?" asked Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the outgoing Army chief of staff, at a Rotary Club of Fort Worth luncheon. "There's a temporary feeling of goodness, but in the long run, we may make him bigger than he is today.

"He's hiding, and he knows we're looking for him. We know he's not particularly effective. I'm not sure there's that great of a return" on capturing or killing bin Laden.

Schoomaker pointed to the capture of Saddam Hussein, the killings of his sons, Uday and Qusay, and the killing of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi as evidence that the capture or death of al-Qaeda's leader would have little effect on threats to the United States.

Days after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, President Bush said he wanted bin Laden "dead or alive," and then-Secretary of State Colin L. Powell said, "It is not enough to get one individual, although we'll start with that one individual."

Bush reaffirmed the goal last September in a prime-time speech, warning bin Laden: "No matter how long it takes, America will find you, and we will bring you to justice."

But Schoomaker's remarks echoed comments last year by Vice President Cheney, who seemed to play down the value of capturing or killing bin Laden days before the Bush speech. "He's not the only source of the problem, obviously. . . . If you killed him tomorrow, you'd still have a problem with al-Qaeda," the vice president said.

Schoomaker, who is due to be replaced as chief of staff in April by Gen. George W. Casey Jr., commanded the U.S. Special Operations Command before becoming chief of staff. Special operations personnel have been leading the hunt for bin Laden along the mountainous border between Afghanistan and Pakistan.

Co-Defendants Of Padilla Are Seeking To Split Cases (NYT)

By Deborah Sontag

DOJ_NMG_0136818

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

MIAMI, Feb. 23 — As a competency hearing for Jose Padilla gets under way in federal court here, his co-defendants in a terrorism conspiracy case are seeking separate trials because of what they fear is the taint of his notoriety as the accused "dirty bomber."

Mr. Padilla, a Brooklyn-born American who was declared an enemy combatant by President Bush in 2002, was never charged with the plot to use a radiological dirty bomb that senior administration officials initially accused him of hatching.

But Adham Amin Hassoun and Kifah Wael Jayyousi, Mr. Padilla's co-defendants, say "spill-over prejudice" would be inevitable. They have filed separate motions to sever their cases from Mr. Padilla's, the latest in a series of challenges that are complicating the government's efforts to prosecute the case.

The government's years-long "campaign of public vilification" and its "branding of Padilla as a brazen terrorist" tied to Al Qaeda will make a fair trial impossible for his co-defendants, Jeanne Baker, one of Mr. Hassoun's lawyers, wrote in court papers filed earlier this week. The government has not responded.

Initial jury questionnaires, which were sent to about 3,000 potential jurors in South Florida, indicate Mr. Padilla is the only defendant whose name is familiar and "virtually all of those who are familiar with him have a negative prejudice against him," one of Dr. Jayyousi's lawyers, William W. Swor, wrote.

After being held without charges for three and a half years in a military brig in South Carolina, Mr. Padilla was indicted in late 2005, appended to a case involving Mr. Hassoun, a computer programmer, and Dr. Jayyousi, an engineer, and transferred to a civilian detention center in Miami.

The three men are accused of participating in a "North American support cell" that assisted "global jihad" from 1993 to 2000, sending money and goods to Muslim struggles overseas, particularly in Bosnia, Kosovo and Chechnya.

All three face possible life sentences and have pleaded not guilty. Their trial, which has been delayed twice, is set for April 16. But there is considerable pretrial litigation to be resolved, including the competency hearing for Mr. Padilla, which began Thursday and is set to resume Monday. The government is opposing efforts by Mr. Padilla's lawyers to have him declared unfit.

Dr. Jayyousi, a Jordanian-born American citizen who holds a doctorate in engineering, did not know Mr. Padilla until they met here in federal court, his lawyers say. They argue that Dr. Jayyousi, a former school system administrator in Detroit and Washington, should be tried separately not only from Mr. Padilla but also from Mr. Hassoun, partly because his supposed offenses predate theirs.

The only defendant free on bond, Dr. Jayyousi published a newsletter in the mid-1990s called The Islam Report. The indictment says the newsletter "promoted violent jihad as a religious obligation." Dr. Jayyousi's lawyer, Mr. Swor, said that the publication, which was based in California and distributed at mosques for about 16 months, issued "news about issues relating to Muslims all over the world" and often criticized the United States government.

Mr. Swor said Dr. Jayyousi, who also raised money to buy medicine and solicited contributions of clothing, boots and tents for Muslims in Chechnya, "grew disaffected with the violence in the Islamic world and movements," closed the newsletter in 1997, stopped fund-raising, moved to Detroit and concentrated on completing his engineering studies.

Mr. Hassoun, a Lebanese-born Palestinian who was living in South Florida, helped distribute Dr. Jayyousi's newsletter on the East Coast. The government began eavesdropping on their phone conversations in the early to mid-1990s. Prosecutors say that what they present as a charitable devotion to Muslim causes was really support for violent jihad, which both men deny.

It was Mr. Hassoun, prosecutors say, who lured Mr. Padilla, a member of his mosque in Fort Lauderdale, into the cell. Prosecutors say that Mr. Hassoun recruited Mr. Padilla, a former juvenile offender who had converted to Islam after a road-rage incident landed him in jail as a young adult, to go abroad in 1998 and wage violent jihad.

In asking for a separate trial, Mr. Hassoun's lawyers say that their defense of Mr. Hassoun could prove antagonistic to Mr. Padilla's interests.

Specifically, they want to introduce the evidence that it was a Qaeda operative in Saudi Arabia, and not Mr. Hassoun, who recruited Mr. Padilla — a chain of events laid out publicly by a former deputy attorney general, James B. Comey, in 2004.

In order for a jury to believe Mr. Hassoun, "they must necessarily disbelieve Padilla's presumed defense that he was never recruited into Al Qaeda at all," Ms. Baker wrote to the court.

DOJ_NMG_0136819

Judge OKs Lawyer's Request For Evaluation In Terror-plot Case (ROCKRS)

By Mike Wiser, ROCKFORD REGISTER STAR

Rockford Register Star, February 24, 2007

CHICAGO — A 22-year-old Genoa man whom authorities accuse of plotting to kill holiday shoppers with hand grenades will have to undergo psychological evaluation before the case against him proceeds.

U.S. District Judge David H. Coar ordered the evaluation of Derrick Shareef during a court hearing Friday in the Dirksen federal courthouse.

Shareef's attorney, Michael Mann of Maywood, requested the evaluation on behalf of his client, and Coar agreed.

The Justice Department says the man, who also goes by the name Talib Salam Ibn Shareef, had plotted to attack the patrons of CherryVale Mall in December by placing hand grenades in garbage cans in order to wage jihad.

Authorities said Shareef revealed his plans to an informant who was working with the Federal Bureau of Investigation's Joint-Terrorism Task Force.

The informant arrested Shareef after he allegedly exchanged stereo speakers for four nonfunctioning grenades and a pistol.

Coar also said that any legal motions regarding the results of the evaluation must be filed by April 6.

But before then, lawyers for both sides will have to meet in front of Coar again because Shareef has complained about the conditions under which he has been held.

Shareef has been in federal custody since his December arrest. He is currently in the Metropolitan Correctional Center in Chicago and has complained to Mann about sanitation problems, among other things.

Coar set a March 6 date to hear if the problems have been addressed.

Shareef faces five to 40 years on a charge of attempting to damage or destroy a building by fire or explosion and a possible life sentence on a charge of attempting to use a weapon of mass destruction.

Staff writer Mike Wiser can be reached at 815-987-1377 or mwiser@rrstar.com.

Mental Exam Ordered For Alleged Would-be Rockford Mall Bomber (AP)

By Mike Robinson

AP, February 24, 2007

CHICAGO - A federal judge on Friday ordered a psychological examination for an alleged terrorist wannabe who offered to trade his stereo speakers for grenades to set off in a Rockford mall at Christmas time.

Derrick Shareef, 22, of Rockford, is to be examined by a qualified psychiatrist or psychologist designated by the government under the order issued by U.S. District Judge David H. Coar.

Prosecutors say the 22-year-old Muslim convert plotted with an FBI undercover informant to commit acts of "violent jihad," or holy war, including blowing off hand grenades in garbage cans at the Rockford mall.

The idea was to blow the cans apart and spray the 130-store CherryVale Mall with deadly shrapnel at the height of the Christmas shopping rush, authorities said.

Federal officials said that Shareef had been under investigation long before his Dec. 6 arrest after he offered to trade the speakers for a pistol and four hand grenades. They said there had never been any danger.

Coar issued his order after defense attorney Michael B. Mann said there was a question of whether Shareef was competent to stand trial. Assistant U.S. Attorney Jake Ryan did not object to the examination.

Coar said the competency examination should be performed within 30 days and set April 6 for a hearing on the results.

Meanwhile, he set another hearing for March 6 after Shareef complained that he is unreasonably being held in "the hole" and that sanitation problems exist on the 11th floor of the Metropolitan Correctional Center.

Ryan said that technically the area where Shareef is being held is not "the hole," or solitary confinement, but it is reserved for special inmates.

Shareef, clad in an orange prison jumpsuit with his head shaven and a full beard, said he gets only three showers a week, is denied access to the law library and is handcuffed when he moves about the center.

DOJ_NMG_0136820

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Minneapolis / Man Gets 10 Years For Plan To Bomb Court (STPPP)

By Emily Gurnon

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press, February 24, 2007

A Kenyon, Minn., man who threatened to blow up the Rice County Courthouse was sentenced in federal court in Minneapolis on Thursday to 10 years in prison.

Allan Talmage Weatherford, 45, pleaded guilty in September to possession of a destructive device.

When officials searched Weatherford's 160-acre farm in 2005 and 2006, they found nearly 50 firearms, including a .50-caliber military sniping rifle, as well as an explosive device and two propane tanks filled with a mixture of fertilizer and petroleum — the same combination used in the Oklahoma City bombing.

Subsequent lab analysis determined the mixture was not of sufficient quality to produce an explosive, but Weatherford admitted his intention to manufacture a fertilizer bomb, federal officials said.

Weatherford initially was the target of a drug investigation but got greater attention from police after he threatened to blow up a Rice County judge, a prosecutor and a deputy sheriff.

He planned to target the courthouse and the county law enforcement center, officials said.

Mayo Researcher Under Investigation By FBI (MINNST)

By Dan Browning

Minneapolis Star Tribune, February 24, 2007

He is accused of buying potassium cyanide to use as a weapon in a domestic dispute. He is also charged with making terroristic threats.

A research scientist and associate professor of medicine at the Mayo Clinic in Rochester is under investigation by the FBI for purchasing potassium cyanide for use as "a chemical weapon" in connection with a domestic dispute, according to a federal search warrant unsealed this week in St. Paul.

According to a sworn affidavit filed by the FBI, the matter came to light when Rochester police arrested Sreekumar Raghavakaimal, 46, on domestic assault charges Feb. 4.

He was charged the next day in Olmsted County with felony terroristic threats, felony false imprisonment, gross misdemeanor interference with a 911 emergency call, and misdemeanor domestic assault, according to Julie Germann, the prosecutor in the case.

According to the FBI affidavit, here's what prompted the charges: Raghavakaimal's estranged wife said they had argued over a ring he wanted returned, and he got a knife from the kitchen and bolted the door when she tried to leave.

She said that he broke her cell phone in two when she tried to call 911, and that he threatened to cut the throat of their 11-year-old son if she screamed for help.

Raghavakaimal wanted to get back together, and made comments that led his wife and son to believe he was suicidal, the affidavit says. When she managed to leave, she took a vial with her that she believed contained pain pills. When police investigated her complaint that day, Raghavakaimal told them he was not suicidal, the FBI said.

But he offered that he did buy some potassium cyanide on the Internet after he and his wife had separated in December 2005.

Tests on the vial taken by Raghavakaimal's wife show that it contained nearly pure olive oil. According to an FBI expert cited in the search warrant affidavit, "The combination of olive oil and cyanide is specifically mentioned in The Mujahideen Poisons Handbook (authored by Abdel-Aziz)" as a way to increase the toxicity of cyanide when applied to the skin.

The FBI says it discovered that Raghavakaimal had actually ordered the potassium cyanide through the Mayo Clinic, although it was not used at the labs he supervised there.

DOJ_NMG_0136821

Raghavakaimal could not be reached for comment Thursday or Friday. He has a doctorate in chemistry and was the Director of Human Genomics and Proteomics Core at the Mayo Clinic College of Medicine's General Clinical Research Center before it was reorganized, said Adam Brase, a spokesman for the Clinic.

Brase said Raghavakaimal's main appointment is as a research scientist in endocrinology, and he also carries a title of director of the Microarray Core Facility.

Brase declined to comment further on Raghavakaimal's employment status. He said the Mayo Clinic would cooperate in the investigation.

The FBI obtained a search warrant for Raghavakaimal's house on Feb. 14, saying there was probable cause that other toxic chemicals would be found there. Agents seized a variety of computer equipment, documents, two point-and-shoot cameras and three rolls of film, records show.

New Airport X-Rays Scan Bodies, Not Just Bags (NYT)

By Paul Giblin, Eric Lipton

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

PHOENIX, Feb. 23 — X-ray vision has come to the airport checkpoint here, courtesy of federal aviation security officials who have installed a new device that peeks underneath passengers' clothing to search for guns, bombs or liquid explosives.

The new body scanning machine, which went into use on Friday at Phoenix Sky Harbor International Airport and will be tested later at airports in Los Angeles and New York, will screen only volunteers, at least initially. Transportation Security Administration officials want to make sure the machine is reliable and fast enough to replace the traditional pat-down — and that it does not provoke too many protests.

Security officials examining the head-to-toe images work in a closed booth, hidden from public view, agency officials said. Special "privacy" software intentionally blurs the image, creating an outline of a body that is clear enough to see a collarbone, bellybutton or weapon, but flattens details of revealing contours.

Kenneth Johnson, 64, of Mesa, was the first passenger screened on Friday in Phoenix. He said he had titanium implants in both shoulders and one knee that set off alarms at checkpoint metal detectors.

"I've been all over the world; I've been strip-searched," Mr. Johnson, who was traveling to Florida, told an Associated Press reporter. "This was very easy."

Others found the scans objectionable.

"I think that is a violation of people's personal rights," said Kara Neal, 36, a mental health counselor on her way to Philadelphia. She was not asked to undergo the screening, but said she would have refused. "I would rather take a pat-down than go through this," she said.

Lawyers for the American Civil Liberties Union have raised similar objections, calling the X-ray scan a "virtual strip-search," and have urged Congress to prohibit its use for routine screening.

The vending-machine-size device, which costs about $110,000, will be used only when passengers are pulled aside for a more thorough check, known as secondary screening, after passing through a metal detector. Other scanning machines will be installed this year at Los Angeles International Airport and at John F. Kennedy International Airport in New York.

While security agency officials say the machines, known as SmartCheck, pose no health hazards, some experts disagree. The machine, manufactured by American Science and Engineering Inc. of Billerica, Mass., generates about as much radiation as a passenger would get flying for about two minutes at about 30,000 feet, or in technical terms, fewer than 10 microRem per scan, according to security agency and company officials. The machine is already being used in some prisons, by United States customs and at Heathrow Airport in London.

Dr. Albert J. Fornace Jr., an expert in molecular oncology at Georgetown University Medical Center, said such a low dose was inconsequential, even for pregnant women.

"Obviously, no radiation is even better than even a very low level," Dr. Fornace said. "But this is trivial."

But David J. Brenner, a professor of radiation oncology at Columbia University, said that even though the risk for any individual was extremely low, he would still avoid it.

DOJ_NMG_0136822

"The question is, Do you want to add to your already existing risk?" Professor Brenner said, recommending that pregnant women and young children, in particular, avoid the device. "There are other technologies around that can probably do the job just as well without the extra radiation."

The machine beams a low-energy X-ray at the passenger, which after it bounces off the surface of the skin is processed by computer software that highlights metals or elements like nitrogen that are found in explosives or weapons.

The X-ray is not strong enough to penetrate much beyond the skin, so it cannot find weapons that may be hidden in body cavities.

"A lot of people aren't really comfortable with a pat-down," said Ellen Howe, a security agency spokeswoman, "so they may find this to be an alternative they may appreciate." She added that the X-ray images would be destroyed immediately.

Aviation security officials are rushing to bring new screening devices to airports because of the London-based plot last summer to use liquid explosives to blow up airliners headed to the United States.

The devices now used at the nation's airports, the X-ray machine for carry-on bags and the metal detector for passengers, rely on 1950s-era technology that cannot reliably detect liquid or plastic explosives.

Earlier efforts by the federal security agency to introduce more advanced checkpoint technologies have stumbled, including the so-called puffer machines, which blow air on passengers to search for minute traces of explosives.

After installing 94 of the machines at 37 airports, officials suspended the program last year, saying the devices broke down too often. More puffer machines may be bought if the problems can be resolved.

Officials intend to try other alternatives, like a so-called millimeter wave machine that uses harmless radio waves, instead of X-rays, to do a full body scan.

Ms. Howe said that until the tests on the SmartCheck were complete, it was unclear how widely used the machines would be. "We are committed to testing it," she said. "But we are not committed to deploying it widely until we learn more."

WAR NEWS:

White House Warns Against Iraq Pullout (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON — Brushing aside criticism from the White House, Senate Democrats said Friday their next challenge to President Bush's Iraq war policy would require the gradual withdrawal of U.S. combat troops beginning within 120 days.

The draft legislation also declares the war "requires principally a political solution" rather than a military one.

The provisions are included in a measure that would repeal the authority that lawmakers gave Bush in 2002, months before the invasion of Iraq, and replace it with a far more limited mission.

Democrats have said they are likely to seek a vote on the proposal within two weeks. The odds against it ever becoming law are high, and the White House and Senate Republicans were quick to denounce it.

White House spokesman Tony Fratto said the administration "of course" would oppose an attempt to alter the existing authorization, and he warned that a pullout of U.S. troops could bring chaos to Iraq. "We're operating under a mandate," he said.

Senate Republican leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky dismissed the proposal as an attempt by Democrats to produce "what could best be described as a Goldilocks resolution: one that is hot enough for the radical left wing, but cool enough for party leaders to claim that they are for the troops.

A spokesman for Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid said the White House is not only confused, but in denial.

"They can spin all they want, but the fact is that President Bush is ignoring a bipartisan majority of Congress, his own military commanders, and the American public in escalating the war," said Jim Manley. "The American people have demanded a change of course in Iraq and Democrats are committed to holding President Bush accountable."

As currently drafted, the Democratic legislation says the military "shall commence phased redeployment of U.S. forces from Iraq not later than 120 days" after the bill's enactment. The goal is to complete the withdrawal by March 31, 2008.

DOJ_NMG_0136823

In the interim, the military would be required to transition to a new mission involving "targeted anti-terrorism operations," as well as providing training and logistical support for the Iraqis and helping them protect their own borders.

The measure also pledges that Congress will "continue to support and protect" the armed forces, renewing a commitment that was included in an earlier non-binding measure that also criticized Bush's plans to deploy an additional 21,500 troops.

Republicans blocked action on the measure last week, demanding that Democrats allow a vote on an alternative that would rule out cutting off funds for the troops.

At the White House, Fratto said that changes in the existing authority for use of military force were unnecessary even though it dates from the days when Saddam Hussein was in power and there was an assumption — later proved false — that Iraq possessed weapons of mass destruction. The White House said that Democrats were in a state of confusion about Iraq but left room for compromise.

"There's a lot of ... shifting sands in the Democrats' position right now," Fratto said. "We'll see what Democrats decide to do."

He said the president would judge anything that comes out of Congress by whether it gives him "the flexibility and resources" necessary to proceed with Bush's decision to send 21,500 additional combat troops to Iraq to secure Baghdad and Anbar Province.

"It's clear that if there are efforts to remove troops out of Baghdad, there are consequences for Baghdad," Fratto said. "The only credible analysis that we've seen — the (National Intelligence Estimate) report and others — are pretty clear on this, that it would bring chaos to Baghdad."

Senate Republicans recently thwarted two Democratic attempts to pass a non-binding measure critical of Bush's troop-increase plan. Asked if Bush would oppose any effort to revoke his war authorization, Fratto said, "Of course we would."

In the House, a non-binding anti-war measure was approved last week. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi has said she expects the next challenge to Bush's war policies to be a requirement that the Pentagon adhere to strict training and readiness standards for troops heading for the war zone.

Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., the leading advocate of that approach, has said it would effectively deny Bush the ability to proceed with the troop buildup.

But Bush's Republican allies on Capitol Hill have fought that as denying reinforcements to troops already in the war zone, leading to the alternative approach in the Senate.

The measure Bush won from Congress in 2002 authorized the president to use the armed forces "as he determines to be necessary and appropriate ... to defend the national security of the United States against the continuing threat posed by Iraq" and to enforce relevant United Nations Security Council resolutions.

At the time, the world body had passed resolutions regarding Iraq's presumed effort to develop weapons of mass destruction.

Congressional Democrats Wrestle Over How To Force Bush To Alter Iraq Policy (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg, John M. Broder

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 23 — Congressional Democrats, divided over how to press President Bush to alter his policy in Iraq, are wrestling over whether to use the power of the purse to wind down the war, and they seem headed for a confrontation among themselves, possibly as early as next week, over a proposal to revoke the 2002 resolution authorizing the war.

Some Democrats acknowledge that they are in a sticky situation as they try to map out a strategy that will appease the antiwar left, which is pushing for conditions on war financing, without alienating moderate Democrats and Republicans who fear being painted as unsupportive of the troops.

“We’re going to come back, regroup, find a consensus position,” a senior House Democratic aide said Friday, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the continuing negotiations. “People are unhappy with the war. We have to conduct oversight. We have to push the president in a new direction. We have to find a way to do that that makes the caucus comfortable, and I think we can.”

DOJ_NMG_0136824

In the House, moderate Democrats are uneasy with a plan put forth by Representative John P. Murtha, Democrat of Pennsylvania, to attach stringent conditions to financing for the war. One skeptical Democrat, Representative Jim Cooper of Tennessee, said Friday that the Murtha plan was "as risky as catching a falling knife."

Representative Joe Sestak, a Pennsylvania Democrat and retired three-star admiral, also expressed criticism of the Murtha plan, saying that Congress should not meddle in tactical matters but should concentrate on setting a date for withdrawal of all forces from Iraq.

In the Senate, where at least four Democrats are running for president, each with an Iraq plan, Democratic leaders are pursuing a plan to repeal the war authorization and replace it with language narrowing the military mission. Democrats concede that the plan to revise the authorization, backed by Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., Democrat of Delaware and one of the presidential candidates, is unlikely to garner enough votes to pass, but they hope to pick up enough Republican votes to embarrass Mr. Bush.

Democrats say they are united in their desire to keep the pressure on the president, even as the House and Senate pursue different tactics. Senator Jim Webb, the freshman Democrat from Virginia who was elected on a strong antiwar platform, said Friday in an interview that Democrats agreed that Congress must reassert its authority, even if they had not yet figured out precisely how to do so.

"The true issue here is the federal system," Mr. Webb said, "the notion of accountability of the executive branch to Congress for not having conducted itself properly in the diplomatic arena."

As they search for consensus, Democrats must also worry about a wild card in the debate: Senator Joseph I. Lieberman, the Connecticut Democrat elected as an independent, a strong supporter of the war who has hinted that he might become a Republican if Democrats go too far in trying to rein in Mr. Bush.

With Democrats holding a razor-thin majority in the Senate, a Lieberman defection could put the chamber in Republican hands. That is one reason the Senate Democratic leadership is cool to the Murtha plan, and why Democrats must be careful about pursuing language changing the authorization for the war.

Republicans, sensing an opening, spent Friday trying to exploit Democratic divisions. The Republican Senate leader, Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, convened a conference call with reporters to taunt Democrats for failing to agree on a means for winding down the war.

At the same time, Vice President Dick Cheney kept the heat on the speaker of the House, Nancy Pelosi, one day after they engaged in a war of words over Iraq. "She accused me of questioning her patriotism," he told ABC News, reiterating a charge leveled by Ms. Pelosi on Thursday. "I didn't question her patriotism. I questioned her judgment."

Mr. Cheney went on: "The point I made and I'll make it again is that Al Qaeda functions on the basis that they think they can break our will. That's their fundamental underlying strategy, that if they can kill enough Americans or cause enough havoc, create enough chaos in Iraq, then we'll quit and go home. And my statement was that if we adopt the Pelosi policy, that then we will validate the strategy of Al Qaeda. I said it, and I meant it."

After an election that was widely viewed as a repudiation of Mr. Bush's policies in Iraq, coupled with the president's announcement that he was sending more troops there rather than moving to bring them home, Democrats have struggled with how to proceed. Last week, in a public rebuke to Mr. Bush, the House passed a resolution disapproving of the troop buildup plan.

But that vote was only a prelude to the coming debate over Mr. Bush's request for $99.6 billion in emergency financing for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan.

In the House, where the emergency spending bill is not scheduled to come to the floor for several weeks, lawmakers are awaiting details of Mr. Murtha's plan. Mr. Cooper, the Tennessee representative, said he opposed any attempt to add conditions to the supplemental appropriations measure, for policy and political reasons. "We should do what we've done with past supplementals: pass it," he said.

In the Senate, the Democratic leader, Harry Reid of Nevada, is said to be cool to Mr. Murtha's plan. Instead, Mr. Reid has thrown his weight behind Mr. Biden's idea of rewriting the war authorization. Democrats are expected to review it Tuesday at their policy luncheon, their first formal gathering after returning from recess.

DOJ_NMG_0136825

During his conference call, Senator McConnell suggested that Republicans might counter with their own plan to force Democrats to vote for or against cutting off financing for the troops entirely. “We have only one option, and that is to decide whether or not to fund the mission,” Mr. McConnell said.

But Democrats say they intend to make the debate about the military mission, not the money.

“McConnell presents a false choice,” said Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York. “The overwhelming majority disagree with the mission that this fighting has devolved into, which is policing a civil war, and what we’re looking at is far more in consonance with what the American people want.”

GOP Rejects Iraq Measure (WT)

By Jon Ward, Stephen Dinan, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 24, 2007

Republicans yesterday rejected the Democrats' plan to withdraw Congress' 2002 vote to invade Iraq, while Vice President Dick Cheney said House Speaker Nancy Pelosi was not unpatriotic but plain wrong to oppose President Bush's troop-reinforcement plan.

"There's only one way to end the war, if that's what our Democratic friends want to do. That is to cut off funds for the war," said Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican. "That's our constitutional role, and we shouldn't drag this into the morass of Democratic presidential primary politics."

Key Senate Democrats are writing a bill to rescind the broad authorization to go to war in Iraq that Congress passed in 2002 and replace it with a narrow mission that would take all combat troops out of Iraq by March 2008.

Drafted by two top committee chairmen, Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware and Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, the proposal would keep some troops in Iraq to assist with training, border security and counterterrorism but, Democrats hope, would keep U.S. troops out of what they say has become a civil war.

"The 2002 authorization is no longer relevant to the situation in Iraq," Mr. Biden said in a speech last week. The 2008 presidential candidate argued that the measure was predicated on the presence of Saddam Hussein as dictator and weapons of mass destruction in Iraq.

But the White House said the 2002 resolution, which passed the Senate 77-23, is still effective because it gave the president authority to enforce U.N. resolutions, which call for stability in Iraq.

"The resolutions that we have seen since then certainly authorize a threat to the region that's posed by instability in Iraq, and it envisions the United States forces staying there and bringing stability to Iraq and the region," spokesman Tony Fratto said.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, is considering attaching the Biden-Levin plan to legislation next week on recommendations from the September 11 commission, which has already passed the House.

"It's obvious that the authorization is outdated and needs to be reformed. But no final decisions have been made," said Jim Manley, a spokesman for Mr. Reid.

Mr. McConnell, though, said Republicans have enough votes to block Democrats' new plan from passing, leaving the new majority few alternatives other that withholding funding for the troops.

House Democrats are pursuing just that strategy, with Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat and chairman of the defense appropriations subcommittee, proposing to limit funding unless the Defense Department can meet strict conditions even Mr. Murtha says are unlikely to be achieved.

Mr. Murtha's plan to hamstring the president's use of war funds through the appropriations process, starting with the $93 billion supplemental bill next month, was considered a political compromise between the Democrats' increasingly liberal base and its more moderate wing.

Some Democrats, such as Sen. Russ Feingold, Wisconsin Democrat and Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich, Ohio Democrat and 2008 presidential candidate, favor cutting off all war funding.

But Mrs. Pelosi and other Democratic leaders have said they would not cut off funds for troops in the field, and were pursuing the Murtha strategy.

DOJ_NMG_0136826

The House has already passed a nonbinding resolution disapproving of the troop reinforcements, which would send 4,000 Marines to Anbar province to target al Qaeda, and about 17,500 soldiers to Baghdad to combat Sunni-Shi'ite violence.

But Republicans used a procedural maneuver to block a similar resolution in the Senate.

Democrats have complained that the Bush administration is attacking them unfairly.

After Mr. Cheney said Democrats favored a defeatist policy that would "validate" al Qaeda's strategy, Mrs. Pelosi called the White House to try to complain to Mr. Bush, who was not there.

"You cannot say as the president of the United States, 'I welcome disagreement in a time of war,' and then have the vice president of the United States go out of the country and mischaracterize a position of the speaker of the House and in a manner that says that person in that position of authority is acting against the national security of our country," Mrs. Pelosi said.

Yesterday Mr. Cheney defended his characterization.

"I'm not sure what part of it is that Nancy disagreed with," he told ABC News. "She accused me of questioning her patriotism. I didn't question her patriotism. I questioned her judgment."

Some military analysts have said the troop surge is the administration's last chance in Iraq, but Mr. Cheney said that's not the case.

"We keep trying until we get it right. I don't think we can afford to lose in Iraq," he said.

McConnell Threatens To Block Bid To Repeal War Resolution (WP)

By Shailagh Murray, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 24, 2007

Republican Wants to Force Vote on Guaranteeing Funding for Troops

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) warned yesterday that a new Democratic effort to repeal the 2002 Iraq war resolution would meet the same fate as two previous efforts to limit President Bush's authority: blocked by procedural obstacles, unless Democrats relent to GOP terms.

Speaking to reporters by conference call from his Louisville home, McConnell compared the latest Democratic move to "trying to unring a bell." He warned that Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, the U.S. military commander in Iraq, would "have to surround himself with lawyers" to comply with the new resolution that senior Democrats are drafting.

McConnell predicted he could muster Republican support to block the measure, unless Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) allows a vote on a nonbinding GOP measure to guarantee troop funding.

A showdown over both measures could come as early as next week. Reid has signaled that Iraq-related amendments may be offered to an upcoming homeland security bill. "It's a bit of a cat-and-mouse game," a senior Democratic Senate aide said.

Democratic leaders will present the repeal plan to their colleagues next week. The measure would replace the broad authority that Congress granted Bush in October 2002 with a narrower mandate establishing a March 31, 2008, goal for withdrawing combat troops. It also would restrict longer-term engagement in Iraq to a handful of high-priority realms, including counterterrorism, training for Iraqi troops and border security.

The Bush administration weighed in on the plan yesterday afternoon. "It's simply not necessary," said deputy press secretary Tony Fratto.

The 2002 resolution authorizes Bush to use military force "as he determines to be necessary and appropriate in order to defend the national security of the United States against the continuing threat posed by Iraq" and "enforce all relevant United Nations Security Council resolutions regarding Iraq."

Democratic architects of the new initiative, including Reid, Senate Foreign Relations Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr. (Del.) and Armed Services Chairman Carl M. Levin (Mich.), have argued that the 2002 authorization is no longer valid, because the intent was to destroy weapons of mass destruction -- which were never found -- and if necessary to depose Saddam Hussein, who has since been captured, tried and executed.

The second part of the authorization, Fratto said, "is still important and envisioned the changing nature there." Even Bush has acknowledged the shift, he said: "The president said this isn't the fight we entered in Iraq but it's the fight we're in."

DOJ_NMG_0136827

Fratto said the United States went in as a multinational force under United Nations authorization to take military action against Iraq and was there as an occupying force. "And now we're there at the invitation of the sovereign elected government of Iraq, he said, adding that "U.N. Security Council resolutions that came subsequent to the war authorization, you know, envisioned those kinds of changes."

Biden responded in a CNN interview that while the Constitution allows Bush to conduct war, it does so "only if the Congress gave him the authority in the first place."

"We are repealing the initial authority," Biden said. "And by the way, the United States Constitution cannot be trumped by the United Nations. It cannot be trumped by it. The implementation act of the United Nations treaty, when we passed it, said, it depends upon the Congress's authority."

McConnell noted that 29 Democrats voted for the 2002 resolution, including three Democratic presidential candidates: Biden, along with Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) and Christopher J. Dodd (Conn.).

"If the Senate doesn't support the mission in Iraq, it has only one option, and that's to decide whether or not to fund that mission," McConnell said. "That's our constitutional role, and we shouldn't drag this into the morass of Democratic presidential primary politics."

Defense Secretary Vows Action On Medical Center Conditions (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 23 — Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates said Friday that he would move swiftly to improve conditions for wounded soldiers being treated as outpatients at Walter Reed Army Medical Center and warned that senior officials would be held accountable for the poor conditions.

Mr. Gates, speaking to reporters after touring the facilities and speaking to several patients, said he was upset by recent reports in The Washington Post describing wounded soldiers living in dilapidated buildings near the Walter Reed campus and portraying the huge paperwork and other bureaucratic hurdles they had to overcome during treatment.

Mr. Gates announced the creation of an eight-member commission that would examine conditions at Walter Reed, on the outskirts of Washington, and other military hospitals, and then make recommendations for improvements within 45 days.

“After the facts are established, those responsible for having allowed this unacceptable situation to develop will indeed be held responsible,” Mr. Gates said.

As the number of service members wounded in Iraq and Afghanistan has climbed in recent years, Defense Department officials have long held up Walter Reed as a facility offering unmatched care. But the large number of patients there, currently about 650, has forced officials to rely on overflow facilities nearby more than they have in the past and has caused long waits for some treatments, officials acknowledged.

Pentagon officials have emphasized that the quality of care at Walter Reed and other Army facilities is generally high. They have said that the poor conditions, which included moldy walls, cockroaches, mouse droppings and stained carpets, were confined to a 54-room Army-owned facility across the street from the main Walter Reed campus where nearly 70 recovering service members are being housed.

But the Post reports prompted several days of damage control by Army and Pentagon officials that have veered between acknowledging the situation and playing it down. The Army’s top medical officer, Lt. Gen. Kevin C. Kiley, described the newspaper’s account as a “one-sided representation” at a news conference Thursday, emphasizing that he was objecting to the tone of the stories, not the facts.

Only a day before, Gen. Richard Cody, the Army vice chief of staff, said, “We were absolutely disappointed in the status of the rooms and found the delays and lack of attention to detail to the building’s repairs inexcusable.”

The outpatients at Walter Reed have received initial treatment but require further care or rehabilitation before retiring from the armed forces or returning to active duty.

Of the accounts in The Post, Mr. Gates said, “I have not seen anything or heard anything” that led “me to believe that those articles were in any substantial way wrong.”

DOJ_NMG_0136828

Mr. Gates said that no hospital officials had offered to resign but that several lower-level employees overseeing outpatient care had been relieved. He said he met with President Bush earlier Friday to discuss the situation.

Hospital officials in recent days have moved to clean up the most visible problems at the facility. Mr. Gates said the commission, to include retired officials from the Pentagon, Congress and the armed services, would also look at conditions at the National Naval Medical Center nearby in Bethesda, Md., and any other military medical facilities they chose to examine.

The members are Togo West, former secretary of veterans affairs and secretary of the Army under President Bill Clinton; Jack Marsh, former secretary of the Army under President Ronald Reagan; Dr. Joe Schwarz, a former Republican congressman from Michigan; Jim Bacchus, a former Democratic congressman from Florida; and four retired military officers, Gen. John Jumper, former Air Force chief of staff; Lt. Gen. Chip Roadman, former Air Force surgeon general; Rear Adm. Kathy Martin, former Navy deputy surgeon general; and Command Sgt. Maj. Larry Holland.

Review At Walter Reed Is Ordered (WP)

By Steve Vogel, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 24, 2007

Defense Secretary Vows Accountability

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates named an independent review panel yesterday to investigate what he called an "unacceptable" situation in outpatient care at Walter Reed Army Medical Center, and he said that some soldiers "most directly involved" in the problems have been removed from their positions.

Speaking to reporters during a visit to the Army hospital in Northwest Washington, Gates also warned that senior military leaders could be disciplined based on the findings of the review group.

"We empower commanders with responsibility, authority and resources necessary to carry out their missions," Gates said. "With responsibility comes accountability. Accordingly, after the facts are established, those responsible for having allowed this unacceptable situation to develop will indeed be held accountable."

The Senate Armed Services Committee has tentatively scheduled hearings on the facility for March 6, said a spokeswoman for the panel's chairman, Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.). Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), the ranking minority member of the committee, toured the facility yesterday.

The actions came after stories in The Washington Post on Sunday and Monday revealed that wounded soldiers recuperating at Walter Reed often become mired in red tape as they seek further treatment or decisions on whether they will stay in the military. The articles also disclosed poor living conditions -- including mold, filth and leaks -- in Building 18, an Army facility that houses recovering troops.

"I'm grateful to reporters for bringing this to our attention but thoroughly disappointed we did not identify it ourselves," Gates said in his first public remarks addressing the situation.

The eight-member review group appointed by Gates has been charged with taking a broad look at all rehabilitative care and administrative procedures both at Walter Reed and the National Naval Medical Center in Bethesda. Panel members "will be given free and unrestricted access" to visit medical facilities and interview personnel, Gates said.

The group will be co-chaired by Togo West, who was secretary of veterans affairs and secretary of the Army during the Clinton administration, and by John O. Marsh Jr., who was secretary of the Army under President Ronald Reagan and a former member of Congress from Virginia. Other members include two former members of Congress, three retired senior military officers and a retired command sergeant major. Their report is due within 45 days and will be made public, Gates said.

Gates said he had no information suggesting that there are problems at Bethesda similar to those at Walter Reed, but he said the naval facility is being included because "we need to know the scope of this problem."

There is rare unanimity in Washington on the need to treat wounded soldiers well, Gates said, "and so we're determined to fix it, and fix it fast." He described the medical care itself at the hospital as "unsurpassable" and said the shortcomings were confined to "the outpatient aspect of this."

DOJ_NMG_0136829

During his visit, Gates met a group of five soldiers being treated at the facility who spoke of a frustrating administrative bureaucracy at the hospital. "They battled our foreign enemies; they should not have to battle an American bureaucracy," Gates said.

Gates said caseworkers are "overwhelmed" by the numbers of patients they are assigned, and he indicated that more workers would be soon assigned to the hospital.

"There's just too much work for the number of people that are available," he said. "So that's one thing that can be addressed pretty quickly." Gates added that troops who had been wounded in service "should not have to recuperate in substandard housing."

The Army declined to identify publicly the personnel who have been moved to different positions at the hospital. Speaking on background, an Army official said they included several soldiers involved in supervising facilities at Walter Reed, including Building 18.

Gates met with President Bush yesterday morning to brief him on the actions underway. "He is, understandably, concerned and emphatic in wanting the best possible care for our wounded soldiers and for their families," Gates said.

Gates Orders Review Of Walter Reed Hospital (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, February 24, 2007

WASHINGTON — Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates announced plans Friday to form an independent review group to examine Walter Reed Army Medical Center and other military hospitals.

The move comes after news reports indicated that seriously injured soldiers had been caught in a bureaucratic morass and given substandard outpatient housing at Walter Reed. The review ordered by Gates will focus on rehabilitative care and administrative procedures at Walter Reed and the National Naval Medical Center in Bethesda, Md.

"The men and women recovering at Walter Reed and at other military hospitals have put their lives on the line and paid a considerable price for defending our country," Gates said. "They battled our foreign enemies. They should not have to battle an American bureaucracy."

Defense officials have said that there are no allegations of systemic problems at Bethesda or other military hospitals, but Gates said the commission would be able to examine all military hospitals. Articles in the Washington Post this week detailed shortcomings of the military health system, especially its outpatient facilities.

Gates said he was grateful to the reporters who brought the problems to light, and said he was disappointed that the Defense Department had not found the problems earlier. He promised that he would hold accountable the people who allowed the problems in outpatient care at Walter Reed to occur.

The Defense secretary's tone was in sharp contrast to comments Thursday by Lt. Gen. Kevin Kiley, the Army surgeon general, who challenged the Post report as a "one-sided representation." Kiley, who used to command Walter Reed and oversees the hospital as head of the Army Medical Command, said there was no "failure of leadership."

Gates did not criticize Kiley, but he said he was upset by the original articles and had not learned anything from Army officials that caused him to believe the articles were wrong.

The review panel is to report its results within 45 days. It will be lead by Togo West Jr. — who served as Army secretary and secretary of Veterans Affairs in the Clinton administration — and John O. Marsh Jr., who was Army secretary under President Reagan.

The Defense Department already has begun making repairs at Walter Reed and taking other steps to address the problems, officials said.

Gates said some of those directly involved with problems identified at Walter Reed had been "relieved" of their assignments. Army officials said later that no officers had been removed from command positions, but that there had been administrative reassignments of some midlevel officials at the hospital.

The review panel will deliver its report to Congress, Gates said.

Lawmakers have already begun drafting their own recommendations for an overhaul.

DOJ_NMG_0136830

A new bill drafted by Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), a presidential candidate, and Sen. Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.), a freshman member of the Armed Services Committee, seeks to simplify the paperwork for injured soldiers, force the Army to add more caseworkers, and increase the oversight of Walter Reed. A Democratic congressional staffer said the senators planned to introduce the bill next week.

Gates Vows Action On Walter Reed Worries (AP)

AP, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) — Defense Secretary Robert Gates said Friday that those found to have been responsible for allowing substandard living conditions for soldier outpatients at Walter Reed Army Medical Center will be "held accountable."

However, no one in the Army chain of command has so far offered to resign.

Gates spoke to reporters after visiting the medical compound, whose reputation as a premier caregiver for soldiers wounded in Iraq and Afghanistan has taken a hit following a Washington Post series of reports last weekend that documented problems in soldiers' housing and in the medical bureaucracy at Walter Reed.

"A bedrock principle of our military system is that we empower commanders with the responsibility, authority and resources necessary to carry out their mission," Gates said. "With responsibility comes accountability."

His comment suggested that senior officials in the Army chain of command would not be immune from disciplinary action.

Gates announced that two former Army secretaries, Togo West and Jack Marsh, would head an independent panel to review treatment and administrative processes at Walter Reed and the National Naval Medical Center at Bethesda, Md. Gates said the group has been asked to report its findings publicly within 45 days.

"After the facts are established, those responsible for having allowed this unacceptable situation to develop will indeed be held accountable," Gates said, adding that so far no one involved has offered to resign.

"We are not going to wait 45 days to begin addressing these problems," he said. "And so there have been some people who are most directly involved who have been relieved. But we will be looking and evaluating the rest of the chain of command as we get more information."

Asked about Gates' statement that some have already been relieved of duty, Army officials said they were unsure that any such actions had been taken. One Army official, speaking on condition of anonymity because the Army is conducting its own review of what happened at Walter Reed, said officials are considering personnel changes.

The Army's Preemptive News Briefing (WP)

By Howard Kurtz, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 24, 2007

To the Army's public affairs chief, it was simply an effort to "get the facts out from our perspective."

To Dana Priest, who covers national security for The Washington Post, it was a case of Army officials "shooting themselves in the foot, because reporters are not going to trust them."

The Post last week gave the Army six days to respond to the paper's investigation into decaying, cockroach-infested facilities and an overwhelmed patient-care bureaucracy at Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Northwest Washington. The Army's public affairs office used the time to summon journalists from other news organizations to a briefing at which Walter Reed's commander responded to the findings -- in an article that had not yet been published.

"It made us feel very uncomfortable that we were being set up to be the Army's public affairs arm," said Los Angeles Times correspondent Peter Spiegel, who attended the Pentagon session. "They were trying to brief us on a story when we didn't know what the story was about." Journalists from the Boston Globe, USA Today, the Associated Press and Fox News also attended the invitation-only briefing.

When journalists seek a response from a government agency on a pending story, there is generally an understanding that the information will not be shared with rival news outlets before publication. Such unspoken agreements, however, are hardly iron-clad. Treasury Department officials last year gave the Wall Street Journal declassified information about a secret program to track the banking records of terror suspects after failing to persuade the New York Times to kill a planned story on the subject.

DOJ_NMG_0136831

Col. Dan Baggio, the Army's chief of media relations, said Walter Reed's commander had already been thinking of briefing reporters on conditions at the medical center. But Baggio acknowledged that the timing was dictated by the upcoming Post stories, which ran Sunday and Monday and detailed inadequate care for wounded veterans.

Priest, who reported the two-part series with Anne Hull, says she told an Army public affairs officer this week: "How do you think this is going to affect our relationship? Do you think I'm going to be willing next time to give you that much time to respond, if you're going to turn around and tell my competitors?"

But Maj. Gen. George Weightman, Walter Reed's commander, viewed the matter differently, Baggio said. "Because we had a long holiday weekend coming up and we knew the story was coming out about Walter Reed, he felt an obligation to make sure to get the facts out from our perspective," Baggio said. "We have a responsibility to communicate with the public about things going on at our command, regardless of who says they had the right of discovery."

Priest first contacted the Army on Monday, Feb. 12, and provided a list of 30 questions about conditions at Walter Reed. She said that Weightman was responsive during a two-hour interview Thursday, Feb. 15, but that she initially thought he was joking when he said that he would be briefing other news organizations on Walter Reed's problems the following day.

At the Friday briefing, reporters were told that Weightman's remarks were embargoed until late Saturday afternoon, around the time that The Post's story was expected to be posted online. That, said Baggio, was done as a "courtesy."

After an internal debate, said Spiegel of the Los Angeles Times, "it seemed to us pointless to try to cobble something together" without The Post's findings.

But the Army succeeded in putting its stamp on some stories. An AP report Saturday evening began: "The commander of the Army's leading medical facility acknowledges problems in outpatient treatment but said the hospital is working to address the concerns of patients and their families." Spiegel's Times piece Sunday said Weightman "has acknowledged that the staff responsible for tracking patients after they receive treatment was overwhelmed by the number of wounded when violence spiked in Iraq two years ago." Both reports said Weightman spoke in advance of The Post's stories.

Army officials are now questioning the paper's handling of the probe. In a letter to Walter Reed's staff this week, Weightman said that "information for this article was covertly obtained over more than two years by reporters who did not wish to bring their findings to the leadership for action."

Priest, saying that the inquiry lasted four months, not two years, declined to explain how she and Hull repeatedly signed into Walter Reed without the knowledge of the Army brass. Every patient or family member quoted by name, she said, had agreed to be on the record.

"We never lied to anyone about who we were," Priest said. "We just tried not to be in a position to identify ourselves to anyone who would report us to public affairs and have us kicked off the base."

As for Weightman's complaint that the paper should have notified the Army of its conclusions earlier in the process, Priest called that "ridiculous," saying: "You find wrongdoing and you don't report it to the public first? You report it to them first? That's not our role."

Benefits Of The Doubt (WP)

The Washington Post, February 24, 2007

Badly wounded veterans should have an easier time getting disability compensation.

AFTER A WEEK of terrible publicity, the Defense Department seems to be responding quickly to many of the problems The Post found in a four-month investigation at Walter Reed Army Medical Center. But so far, the most disturbing problem uncovered in The Post's series is getting the least public acknowledgment from generals and journalists alike.

Over the past week, follow-up reports, news releases and news conferences have focused on Army and Navy efforts to improve the physical conditions at Walter Reed and other military facilities serving outpatients. Generals and their press attaches assure reporters that moldy walls will be replaced, holes patched and snow shoveled. The quick pace of repairs, while late, is encouraging. But it is only a start.

The upsetting state of Walter Reed's Building 18 is only part of a larger administrative problem. Post reporters found that confusing bureaucratic rigmarole and interminable waits caused by misplaced paperwork and poor advising were endemic.

DOJ_NMG_0136832

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates named an independent review panel yesterday and reassuringly promised that it will examine administrative procedures as well as the physical state of outpatient facilities. "They battled our foreign enemies; they should not have to battle American bureaucracy," Mr. Gates said.

However, Post reporters found that the stresses on outpatients at Walter Reed included not only their physical recovery, dank rooms or long waits but also the difficulty they have in getting fair disability compensation. Army review boards searched for reasons to deny maimed soldiers disability funds, often blaming "preexisting conditions," not wartime service, for physical and mental disorders. In one instance, a review board claimed that a middle-aged soldier's poorly healed broken foot was the result of "late-life atrophy," not a severe car wreck in Iraq. There's no excuse for the Army to try so hard to deny disability compensation to wounded soldiers. After sacrificing their health, they should get the benefit of the doubt in such decisions. After all, improperly denying compensation can bankrupt soldiers and their families for years.

After we asked, a Defense Department spokesman told us in an e-mail that the Disability Evaluation System will be improved "across the board" and that the Pentagon will ensure that it is a "full and fair due process with regard to disability evaluation and compensation." Even if the Defense Department weren't so committed, it might soon have little choice in the matter. Sens. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) and Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.) plan to introduce legislation next week that would require the secretary of defense to review the Disability Evaluation System as well as address some of the other problems The Post uncovered. Either way, veterans too seriously wounded to return to active duty should get the benefits they deserve without having to beg for them.

U.S. Seizes Son Of A Top Shiite, Stirring Uproar (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 23 — American troops seized and then released the eldest son of Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, perhaps the most powerful Shiite political leader in Iraq, after he crossed the border from Iran into Iraq on Friday morning.

The detention heightened tensions with one of Iraq's most formidable political movements just as the planned American troop buildup was beginning in Baghdad to try to rescue the capital from the grip of Shiite militias and Sunni insurgents.

Allies of the Hakim family denounced the detention as a serious insult, and a senior adviser to the family asserted that American forces also had assaulted several guards. The Hakims control the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, the backbone of the Shiite political alliance that has dominated politics during the occupation.

State-run television said Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, a Shiite who depends on Mr. Hakim's support, intervened to help release the son, Amar Abdul Aziz al-Hakim.

In an interview after he was released from an American military base in Kut, Amar al-Hakim said that American forces had treated him roughly and that their justification for seizing him — that he crossed the border with an invalid passport — was untrue.

An official with the Iraqi force that guards the border said American troops had been lying in wait to apprehend the Hakim convoy as it drove into Iraq. But a spokesman for the American Embassy in Baghdad, Lou Fintor, said that the Americans followed standard procedures and that there had been no effort to "single out" Mr. Hakim.

The American ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, said he was "sorry" for the detention. The son is himself a senior official in Mr. Hakim's political movement and has often taken a leading role in building support for his father's political efforts throughout Shiite-dominated southern Iraq. A Hakim aide suggested that the son was being groomed to take control of the family's political dynasty.

The detention worsened relations with the Hakims — who spent years in exile in Iran and remain close to Tehran — two months after American forces raided the Hakims' elaborate Baghdad compound near the Green Zone and detained two Iranians whom they accused of running guns and planning sectarian attacks.

That raid came just a few weeks after the elder Mr. Hakim met with President Bush in Washington. Mr. Hakim has generally been an ally of the United States presence, but he has criticized the Americans for what he said was favoring the interests of Sunnis over Shiites.

DOJ_NMG_0136833

The incident comes at a delicate moment in the relationship between the United States and Iran, which American officials have accused of fomenting violence in Iraq and supplying Shiite militias with the deadliest munitions employed against the American military's armored vehicles, armor-piercing explosives known as explosively formed penetrators, or E.F.P.'s.

One of Amar al-Hakim's most prominent public roles of late has been canvassing the Shiite provinces of southern Iraq to build support for his father's controversial plan to cleave nine Shiite provinces into an autonomous region that would have wide authority over its security and natural resources.

Sunni political groups as well as some Shiite parties have objected to the plan, saying it would drive Iraq toward a three-way partition, with a Kurdish state in the northeast, a Sunni state in the west and northwest, and a Shiite state in the south.

One Shiite coalition that objects to the plan is the bloc allied with Moktada al-Sadr, the anti-American Shiite cleric who controls the Mahdi Army militia and whose political movement is the only one within the Shiite alliance whose power rivals that of Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, or Sciri.

A senior adviser to the Hakim family, Haitham al-Husseini, described the son as being in his mid-30s and said he was considered an heir to his father's political movement. Mr. Hakim also has a younger son, Moshin, who serves as a political adviser, and two daughters.

Amar al-Hakim was in Iran no longer than five days, said Mr. Husseini, who added that he was probably visiting relatives or other people the family knew from their years in exile during the rule of Saddam Hussein. He said the Americans had held Amar al-Hakim a good part of the day. The convoy was stopped "without any justification," Mr. Husseini said. "Some of the guards were beaten by the U.S. forces."

He also said that United States military officers whom he would not identify had contacted aides to Mr. Hakim and apologized for the detention. Mr. Khalilzad, the American ambassador, was quoted by news agencies as saying that he regretted the episode and that "we do not mean any disrespect" to the Hakim family.

Mr. Fintor, the spokesman for the American Embassy in Baghdad, declined comment about whether an apology had been issued. But he said that American forces were investigating the episode.

"We're trying to determine the facts," Mr. Fintor said. "What I can tell you is that at this point we understand that Mr. Hakim was arrested by soldiers who were doing their duty. He was not singled out, and we understand the soldiers were following standard procedure."

The detention led to a large demonstration in front of the offices of Mr. Hakim's party in Basra by a crowd protesting the son's treatment. A senior Sciri party official in Najaf, Sadr al-Din al-Qubanchi, called for a demonstration there.

"This will shake the stability, and it's an insult to the Iraqi Shiite alliance and its leadership," he said.

An American military official declined to comment on the allegation that Mr. Hakim's guards had been beaten but said he had been detained because he possessed an expired passport and was traveling with men who had a large number of guns.

But after his release at the provincial governor's office in Kut, Mr. Hakim said his passport was valid and the Americans detained him a few miles from the Iranian border on Friday morning.

"They arrested me and my guards in an unsuitable way, and they bound my hands and blindfolded me," he said. "They took our phones, bags, money, documents and the guards' weapons, and sent us to an American base."

An Iraqi correspondent for The New York Times said Mr. Hakim showed a passport that had an expiration date of Sept. 17, 2007, and quoted him saying, "They claim the reason for the arrest was because my passport had expired, but as you can see my passport expires on the 17th of September."

Two news agencies also quoted Mr. Hakim as saying that the Americans had dealt with him harshly, but neither news agency reported that Mr. Hakim had shown them an unexpired passport. Whether Mr. Hakim had a valid passport could not be confirmed by late Friday.

Mr. Husseini, the Hakim aide, said some of Amar al-Hakim's guards were Iraqi Army soldiers and Iraqi policemen. The arrest was "very insulting to the Iraqi government and the sovereignty of the Iraqi government," he said.

He said American military officers had apologized. "Until now, we have only heard the usual answer, that it was a mistake and that they didn't know who he was," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0136834

Amar al-Hakim was educated mostly in Iran, according to Mr. Husseini, and is now secretary general of a major Shiite Islamic foundation, in addition to his position within Sciri.

Iraqi's Arrest Brings Apology From U.S. (LAT)

By Christian Berthelsen

The Los Angeles Times, February 24, 2007

BAGHDAD — The U.S. military detained the son of one of America's closest political allies in Iraq for several hours Friday, angering Shiite Muslim officials and straining delicate relations with the Iraqi leadership. The American ambassador here quickly apologized for the incident.

Meanwhile, the U.S. military announced that three soldiers attached to American-led forces were killed in combat in the Sunni-dominated Al Anbar province Thursday, but released few details pending notification of relatives. At least 3,154 American troops have died in Iraq since the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003, according to icasualties.org, a website that tracks casualties in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Soldiers arrested Ammar Hakim and at least three of his bodyguards around noon as they crossed into Iraq from Iran about 80 miles southeast of Baghdad. His father, Abdelaziz Hakim, heads the largest Shiite voting bloc in the Iraqi parliament. The elder Hakim met with President Bush in December in Washington and pledged to help end bloodshed in Iraq.

In a telephone interview with The Times, Ammar Hakim said troops arrested him because his passport was nearing expiration and they thought his identification picture did not match his appearance. He complained of being treated roughly at the hands of the soldiers, including being blindfolded as he was transported to a military base and having his underwear searched once he arrived there.

"We supported the new Baghdad [security] plan, and we hoped that it would succeed, but at the same time people's dignity should respected," he said, adding that the Iraqi government would seek answers from the U.S. about how the incident was handled.

Hakim was released after about seven hours, and U.S. officials rapidly began damage control. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad appeared on Iraqi government television, saying that the U.S. was "sorry about the arrest" and meant no disrespect.

Hakim's father leads the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, or SCIRI. The elder Hakim was an opponent of Saddam Hussein and spent much of the 1980s in exile in Iran as a commander of the Badr Brigade, the militia affiliated with SCIRI. The Badr Brigade has been criticized for close ties with Iran and has been accused of operating death squads targeting Sunni Muslims, but it is also viewed as among the more moderate Shiite forces in Iraq.

Ammar Hakim heads the Shahid al-Mihrab Foundation, a charity affiliated with SCIRI. News of Hakim's arrest drew widespread attention Friday, a day of relative calm in Iraq. Police patrols discovered the bodies of five men shot to death around the capital, a daily toll far lower than usual.

Meanwhile, religious leaders focused on allegations this week that Iraqi security forces had raped two Sunni women in the course of enforcing the new security crackdown. Sunni preachers condemned the alleged acts as evidence that the new effort was a failure.

"We thought that the security plan would stop the killing and the bloodshed," Sheik Jamaledin Ighidee said during a sermon at the Shawaf Mosque in west Baghdad. "But this week we heard about two of the most terrible crimes. These crimes deserve that the whole nation would die instead."

At least one Shiite prayer leader said the charges were false.

Sadruddin Qubanchi told worshipers at the Fatimiya Mosque in Najaf that the accusations were designed by "the enemies of Iraq … to use the rape of women to bring down the security plan."

U.S. Detains Shiite Leader's Son (WP)

By Ernesto Londono, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 24, 2007

Amar al-Hakim Held Several Hours Returning to Iraq From Iran

DOJ_NMG_0136835

BAGHDAD, Feb. 23 -- U.S. forces detained the son of one of Iraq's most prominent Shiite politicians for several hours Friday, a spokesman for the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq said.

The convoy of Amar al-Hakim, one of the sons of party leader Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, was stopped as Amar was returning from a trip to Iran, Haitham al-Husseini said.

The senior Hakim, whose party controls the largest number of seats in the Iraqi parliament and who met with President Bush during a visit to Washington in December, spent many years in exile in Iran and has close ties to that country. U.S. officials have said Iran has supplied weapons to militias targeting American forces in Iraq.

U.S. Embassy spokesman Lou Fintor said the younger Hakim was detained during a routine security operation.

"We understand Mr. Hakim was arrested by soldiers who were executing their duty at a checkpoint," Fintor said. "He wasn't singled out, but rather we understand the soldiers were following standard procedure," reflecting stepped-up enforcement along Iraq's border with Iran. "Once the facts of the situation were determined, Mr. Hakim was released."

Husseini, the party spokesman, said some of Hakim's bodyguards were asked to lie on the ground while the convoy was searched. "The guards were treated very badly by the U.S. force," he said, adding that some of the guards were members of the Iraqi police and army. "We believe this sends a very wrong message to the whole security process we are trying to assist."

Husseini said the detention appeared to have been a case of mistaken identity, but he said Hakim should not have been kept in custody for several hours.

"He identified himself and had his passport and Iraqi ID," Husseini said. "He's a very well-known figure in Iraq."

U.S. military officials raided the senior Hakim's compound in Baghdad in December and detained two Iranian men, one of whom was described by American officials as a high-ranking officer in an elite Iranian military unit known as the Quds Force. The men were released after appeals by the Iraqi government.

Also on Friday, the U.S. military said in a statement that three American soldiers had been killed Thursday in Anbar province in western Iraq. Their names were not released.

Correspondent Joshua Partlow and special correspondent Naseer Mehdawi contributed to this report.

U.S. Detains Top Shi'ite Leader's Son (WT/AP)

By Brian Murphy, Associated Press

The Washington Times, February 24, 2007

BAGHDAD -- U.S. troops detained the eldest son of Iraq's most influential Shi'ite politician for nearly 12 hours yesterday as he crossed back from Iran, sparking protests from Shi'ite politicians.

Even though the U.S. ambassador issued a rapid apology, the decision to hold Amar al-Hakim risks touching off a backlash from Shi'ite leaders at a time when their cooperation is needed most to keep a major security sweep through Baghdad from unraveling.

Shi'ite reaction to the detention was quick and sharp, with some officials suggesting it was a veiled warning about the limits of ties to Iran.

"What happened is unacceptable," Shi'ite lawmaker Hamid Majid Moussa told Al-Forat television. "The Iraqi government and the American forces must put an end to such transgressions."

The station is just one part of the multilayered clout of the al-Hakim family.

Mr. al-Hakim's father, Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, is the leader of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq (SCIRI), the country's largest political force. Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim met with President Bush at the White House in December.

The bloc carries the strongest voice in the 275-seat parliament and holds critical sway over the fate of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. It also maintains very close ties to Iran, which hosted Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim and other SCIRI officials before the fall of Saddam Hussein in 2003.

In December, American forces seized two Iranian security agents at Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim's compound in Baghdad. Six other Iranians were arrested Jan. 11 at an Iranian liaison office in northern Iraq. The U.S. military said they were members of Iran's elite Revolutionary Guard. Tehran denies the charges.

DOJ_NMG_0136836

Washington has repeatedly accused Iran of funneling weapons to militants, including lethal roadside bombs that have targeted U.S. troops.

But the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, tried to defuse any showdowns with Shi'ites that could upset a 10-day-old offensive seeking to reclaim Baghdad's streets from militants and sectarian death squads.

"I am sorry about the arrest," Mr. Khalilzad said. "We don't know the circumstances of the arrest, and we are investigating and we don't mean any disrespect to al-Sayed Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim or his family."

A U.S. Embassy spokesman in Baghdad, Lou Fintor, said Amar al-Hakim "was not singled out" and "soldiers were following standard procedure" since the border crossing was closed at the time.

Amar al-Hakim, 35, was taken into custody at the Zirbatyah crossing point southeast of Baghdad along with his security guards, said his father's secretary, Jamal al-Sagheer. Amar al-Hakim was freed about 12 hours later, but his bodyguards remained in custody, Mr. al-Sagheer said.

Amar al-Hakim heads a charity dedicated to the memory of his uncle, Grand Ayatollah Mohammed Baqir al-Hakim, who was killed along with scores of others in a car bombing in Najaf in August 2003. His father took over SCIRI after the killings, and Amar al-Hakim is apparently being groomed to take his place someday.

The U.S. military, meanwhile, said three U.S. troops were killed Thursday in combat in volatile Anbar province, but did not give specific locations or circumstances for the deaths.

In Basra, police said they arrested a suspected Sunni insurgent with links to al Qaeda. Issa Abdul-Razzaq Ahmed, 22, was on the Iraqi Interior Ministry's most-wanted list, accused of financing and recruiting fighters, said provincial police commander Gen. Mohammed al-Moussawi.

Baghdad Crackdown 'curbing Violence' (FT)

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, February 24, 2007

A week after the beginning of the security crackdown in Baghdad, US officials claim their forces are slowly expanding their presence in the capital and curbing the sectarian violence that left tens of thousands dead last year.

Many Iraqis, however, say that fighting has continued unabated, while a high-profile rape case linked to the crackdown has heightened tensions between the Sunni and Shia communities.

Nouri al-Maliki, the prime minister, announced the beginning of Operation En-forc-ing the Law on February 14, although US forces had already begun to filter into the city earlier this month to conduct large-scale sweeps of districts.

The plan hinges on the joint security stations – permanent outposts manned by US and Iraqi troops inside the capital. The military says it has learnt from previous operations where insurgents fled a sudden influx of US forces, only to come back when the troops had moved on.

US officers hope that a permanent presence will undermine the ability of armed groups to intimidate civilians, leading to an increase in tip-offs, which would allow them to track fugitives and discover weapons caches. Major General William Caldwell, US military spokesman, says four such stations were opened last week, bringing the total to 14.

Iraqi officials claim the sectarian death toll has already fallen as a result of the increased troop presence, which may indicate that militias are conducting fewer raids on districts aimed at driving out or abducting civilians from rival sects.

Maj Gen Caldwell and other commanders, however, have cautioned that it is too early to call the operation a success, and that the true impact will not be seen for months.

Some Iraqis living in mixed districts say that the level of day-to-day violence has not changed. One resident of Hayy al-Amal, a district of southern Baghdad, says insurgent snipers continue to fire from Sunni mosques at civilians, disappearing whenever the mosque is searched.

US troops admit that they are hard pressed to deal with such hit-and-run attacks unless they receive a steady supply of useful information.

Another resident of the same neighbourhood says some senior insurgent commanders and guerrilla leaders have fled, but that "carjackings" have increased as teenage fighters take over the guerrilla networks.

DOJ_NMG_0136837

A resident of the Shia suburb of Sadr City across the capital complains that the security sweep has created a vacuum and that criminal gang activity surged after the Mahdi Army militiamen – an unofficial police force in the slum – went to ground to avoid US troops.

Some Shia also say the disappearance of the militias has made their districts more vulnerable to attack by Sunni car bombers.

The political climate has been further poisoned by the alleged rape of a Sunni by Iraqi police following a raid on a house in Hayy al-Amal on February 8. The police said the woman had been providing food for insurgents. Sunni leaders, who had already accused the Shia-dominated government of singling out their neighbourhoods, have urged it to punish the rapists.

Mr Maliki, however, has accused the woman of making up the charges.

Car Bombings Kill 4 Civilians In Baghdad (AP)

AP, February 24, 2007

Car bomb blasts hit parts of Baghdad on Saturday in attacks apparently targeting security forces involved in an ongoing campaign to restore order in the capital. At least four civilians were killed and nearly 10 injured, police said.

In a separate blast, a bomb stashed on a minibus killed at least one passenger and injured five in central Baghdad.

A car rigged with explosives blew apart near a joint Iraqi-U.S. patrol in a mostly Sunni area in western Baghdad, damaging at least one Humvee, police said. Two civilians were killed, but there were no immediate reports of casualties among security forces.

In a commercial district in central Baghdad, a car bomb exploded near a police patrol, but missed the vehicles. At least two civilians were killed and five injured, police said.

Stryker Team Key To Iraq Security Plan (LAT)

By Tina Susman

The Los Angeles Times, February 24, 2007

BAGHDAD — In any other city, the sight of an old man standing next to a can on the side of a crowded street would go unnoticed. In Baghdad, it was enough to make U.S. Army Spc. Aurelio Cazares slow down his armored Stryker for a closer look and alert his gunner.

The vehicle's gunner fixed his viewfinder on the man and the object and zoomed in, just as a sedan stopped in front of them, blocking the view and adding further suspense to the moment. Then, the car pulled away, the old man crossed the road, and the Stryker's high-tech remote weapons system, which can detect heat in an object and determine the presence of explosives, confirmed that the can was harmless.

The Stryker moved on, and Cazares relaxed.

There aren't many things that worry him as he steers the 22-ton troop carrier, which resembles an oversized and massively overloaded camper van, through Baghdad's streets. Its steel-and-ceramic armor is far stronger than a Humvee's, making it the safest troop transporter by far on roads littered with explosives and snipers.

Nothing, though, can guarantee protection from some of the armor-piercing explosives plaguing U.S. forces in Iraq. Since August, three men from Cazares' 3rd Stryker Brigade Combat Team, from the Army's 2nd Infantry Division, have died in such attacks.

"We haven't been hit, thank God," Cazares said this week after another day of patrolling.

Since U.S. and Iraqi forces put a new Baghdad security plan into high gear last week, the Stryker team has been at the forefront of sweeps and patrols, some lasting 20 hours at a stretch.

For the soldiers of the brigade, it has meant little sleep and the majority of their waking hours inside the dark, cramped interiors of the Strykers, whose bulk, speed and armor have made them the vehicle of choice in Baghdad's riskiest operations.

"We're kind of like groundhogs," said 1st Lt. Yeng Lacanlale of Seattle after a patrol that began at 4:30 a.m. and lasted 16 hours. "We get back, shower, eat, try to get a little sleep, and go back out."

DOJ_NMG_0136838

Each Stryker can carry 14 people, making it easy to flood an area with troops, who pour out of the vehicle through a hatch in the back. The Strykers reach a speed of 65 mph and are relatively quiet as they trundle through the streets, giving them a stealth quality other troop carriers lack.

In addition to their armor, they are surrounded by a cage-like shield designed to repel rocket-propelled grenades. They lumber about on eight tires but can keep moving on fewer in the event of blowouts.

Cazares isn't sure why he was chosen to drive a Stryker. It wasn't his driving record back home in Weslaco, Texas, which the 28-year-old admits is less than stellar. He just knows that one day, someone higher up told him he was on his way to school to learn to handle a Stryker.

Cazares and the gunner view the outside world through periscopes, popping their heads out of the overhead hatches as little as possible to avoid snipers. As he moves through the streets, he eyes each trash pile, each rock and anything else that could hide a danger.

While he navigates, the rest of the unit shares the cigar-shaped back compartment, sitting kneecap-to-kneecap, shoulder-to-shoulder, on narrow benches in full battle gear, their M-4 rifles balanced between their legs. Two stand sentry, their heads poked out of overhead hatches.

Some talk about their families. Spc. Rany Grizz, on the same mission as Lacanlale last week, reminisced about his honeymoon in San Francisco a little over a year ago, and about his daughter, Evelyn, who shares his birthday: Aug. 29.

Some talk politics. Lacanlale speculated about the future of Iraq if Democrats opposed to the war hold sway in Washington. "It's pretty much a civil war between the two sects, and if we leave, they're just going to duke it out," he said as the Stryker streaked down a dark and deserted road.

Grizz chimed in, expressing doubts that the Iraqi security forces would be able to hold things together without the Americans to back them up. "They're good soldiers, but nobody takes care of them. They need more supplies, more support," he said.

Some just talk, like Pfc. Nathan Bratager, who wouldn't be in a Stryker if it weren't for a snowstorm in South Dakota.

A year ago, he was mopping floors and cleaning toilets on the graveyard shift at a truck stop there. The night of the storm, he spent all of his time shoveling snow. The floors and toilets went untended. The next morning, Bratager was fired.

Aimless, he wandered into a mall one day, walked through the door of the Army recruiting station that happened to be there, and signed up. Now he eagerly shows off the red blotch on his neck, the result of a sniper's bullet that grazed him in September as he stood sentry. "I even have a video of it," Bratager said.

Insurgents had filmed the attack and show it on their 24-hour satellite TV channel, which replays video of car bombs, mortar blasts and other attacks on U.S.-led forces.

Bratager, of Belle Fourche, S.D., said he had been considering enlisting since the Sept. 11 attacks. Now, he says, he has a job he loves, but a pessimistic view of Iraq's future.

"In about 20 years, I doubt we're going to be out of here. There will still be Americans in Iraq," Bratager said, accusing U.S. and Iraqi politicians of not doing enough to end the sectarian divisions.

He spoke as his patrol came to an early end. The mission had been changed, and the men had only to escort another patrol to the site of abandoned rocket launchers on Baghdad's far northeastern reaches. They were back at base by 1 p.m., cherishing a rare afternoon off but knowing there would be new orders the next day.

U.S. Disappointed In Iraq's Progress With Baathists (LAT)

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, February 24, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Serious new divisions have emerged between the Bush administration and its Iraqi allies over the Baghdad government's refusal to enact a reform that the White House considers crucial to its new strategy for bringing the country's violence under control.

In spite of a commitment by Iraq's prime minister to its passage, legislation that would ease rules barring former members of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party from government service has been blocked by the country's Shiite-dominated parliament.

DOJ_NMG_0136839

U.S. officials have repeatedly expressed confidence that Nouri al-Maliki, the prime minister, would work for passage of "de-Baathification" reform. However, they now have begun to express disappointment at the Iraqi stalemate, saying that the reform remains a top political priority and is essential to convince the country's Sunni minority that it can receive fair treatment in the new system.One U.S. official said the reform, far from advancing, as promised, was now "moving backward" and is "almost dead in the water."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and State Department official David Satterfield, her top Iraq adviser, paid an unannounced visit to Baghdad last weekend for consultations with top Iraqi officials. Aides said they came away discouraged on this issue.

Administration officials also have expressed disappointment in the work of a special Iraqi panel on de-Baathification headed by Ahmad Chalabi, the American-trained financier who became controversial as an advocate for the Iraq war.

The dimming prospects for reform hold troubling implications for the administration's new strategy on Iraq, which relies heavily on political reconciliation between Sunnis Arabs and Shiites as a way to stem the sectarian violence which has gripped the country for the past year.

President Bush ordered 21,500 additional combat troops to Iraq last month as part of a new U.S. strategy to establish order in Baghdad. But the objective of establishing order is to allow the government to achieve political progress and ethnic reconciliation, Bush and his aides have said.

The administration considers de-Baathification reform, along with legislation dividing up the country's oil wealth, to be the two most important political steps the country can take to reconcile its warring factions. But while U.S. military officials have been buoyed by early results of the security push, the reconciliation legislation has yet to advance.

The new conflict between the U.S. officials and their Iraqi counterparts underscores the difficulty of reaching reconciliation and the fragility of the American partnership with the Iraqi government.

After months of frustration last year trying to convince al-Maliki to take steps toward political reconciliation, U.S. officials late last year convinced him to commit to a series of "benchmarks." One of them was the de-Baathification reform, which al-Maliki committed to implementing by early this year.

How to handle former Baath party members has been an issue since 2003, when U.S. officials and their Iraqi allies began an aggressive effort to bar some 30,000 former members from government service. The drive affected some of the country's top talent, ranging from senior civilian and military officials to low-level government functionaries and even schoolteachers.

By 2004, U.S. officials came to the view that they had gone too far. They decided the rules had been too harsh, considering that the government is the country's biggest employer. The administration also began to fear that they were feeding the insurgency and convincing Sunnis that the Shiite majority in the new Iraq was vengeful.

Now, even Army Gen. David H. Petraeus, the new senior U.S. commander in Iraq, favors easing the rules so that mid-level military officers can rejoin the military, giving it the benefit of their experience.

Nevertheless, a large majority of Iraqi Shiites and Kurds oppose efforts to relax the rules. After decades of persecution by Saddam's government, many fear the Baath party still exists in the Iraqi underground, and some contend that many Baath party members, though low-level government workers, acted as enforcers and spies for Saddam's government, and should be excluded now.

Michael Rubin, a former official with the U.S.-led Coalition Provisional Authority, which ran the country from 2003 until 2004, said that "among more than 80 percent of the Iraqi population, the policy is quite popular."

"Putting it bluntly, if de-Baathification were left to Iraqi democracy, it would remain as the policy of Iraq," Rubin said.

The reforms need the approval of the Iraqi Council of Representatives. But the proposal has been opposed by key leaders of the two large Shiite parties, Dawa and the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq.

U.S. officials believe that a committee that drafted the reforms was not generous enough toward the thousands of Iraqis who are still excluded by the de-Baathification law. They have urged that only the two highest levels of Baath Party members be excluded, and that others who have been denied jobs should be reinstated.

Heading the commission overseeing the de-Baathification program is Chalabi, once a close ally of the Pentagon during Donald H. Rumsfeld's tenure as Defense secretary.

DOJ_NMG_0136840

Satterfield, Rice's top adviser on Iraq, told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee last month that he was then optimistic that the reforms would be approved. But he said that the proposal from Chalabi's de-Baathification panel was insufficient, and did not live up to Maliki's "expansive" vision of the needed reform.

A senior administration official, speaking on condition of anonymity when discussing internal administration assessments, said in an interview that the issue was one that top U.S. officials "have been watching pretty closely."

"We've been talking to the Iraqis consistently," the senior official said. "This is critical to ensuring you have a basis to believe that that this really is a government for all Iraqis."

But at this point, the official said, "There's real concern that it's stalled."

The impasse comes only one month after Chalabi, a secular Shiite who pushed hard in 2003 to remove the Baathists, announced in a news conference in Baghdad that his panel would try to be more lenient with former party members.

Officially, the government has reversed course on the policy of purging Baath party members from the public sector. But little change has been made on the ground. Shiite political parties have only deepened their hold on the civil service and the security forces.

The government has already set about dismantling statues and renaming public spaces that celebrate Baathist causes and anniversaries. Many Sunnis see such moves as a humiliating denigration of their experiences.

In daily life, anti-Sunni remarks by well-connected Shiite prayer leaders and politicians are common. Some, such as lawmaker Sheik Jalaldin Sagheer, regularly equate Baathists with terrorists.

"We think the main problem with security is the Baathists, and we should eliminate them," Sheik Sadraldin Qabanchi, an influential Shiite cleric, told worshippers in a televised sermon from Najaf last month.

Bachmann Backs Down From Iraq Comments (MINNST)

By Eric Black

Minneapolis Star Tribune, February 24, 2007

U.S. Rep. Michele Bachmann claimed two weeks ago to know of an Iranian plan for the partition of Iraq in which Iran would control half the country and set it up as "a terrorist safe haven zone" and a staging area for attacks around the Middle East and on the United States.

The existence of such a plan has not been suggested publicly by the Bush administration or other officials.

But on Friday, after her claim was highlighted on the Star Tribune's Big Question weblog, Bachmann issued a new statement asserting her earlier comments had been "misconstrued." The second statement in effect retracted the first in several important respects.

In her original statement, made at the end of a wide-ranging Feb. 9 interview with Larry Schumacher of the St. Cloud Times, the freshman representative from Minnesota's 6th District said, "Half of Iraq, the western, northern portion of Iraq, is going to be called ... the Iraq State of Islam, something like that. And I'm sorry, I don't have the official name, but it's meant to be the training ground for the terrorists. There's already an agreement made."

The Times did not publish a story about it, but the audio of the full interview was posted on the paper's website.

Bachmann declined interviews Thursday and Friday but her statement Friday afternoon said that Iran's intentions are "difficult to ascertain" and that she was not aware of a done deal to divide Iraq and create a haven for terrorists. Rather, she said, she is concerned about the possibility that partitioning Iraq could lead to such an outcome.

Top secret, or thoughts as fact?

University of Minnesota political scientist Kathryn Pearson, who specializes in Congress, said Bachmann's original statement was "extremely irresponsible."Members of Congress are privy to intelligence that the rest of the public isn't. So when a member of Congress says something of such significance, the first assumption is that she knows something that the public doesn't. So on that basis, people are going to take it seriously.

"Either this is top secret information that she's leaking, which is a problem. Or she's presenting her thoughts on a very serious topic as if they were established fact, and that's a problem for other reasons," Pearson said.

DOJ_NMG_0136841

Washington University Prof. Steve Smith, another Congress watcher who lives in the Sixth District, said Bachmann's first statement "was a pretty strong claim to make. If she can't back it up she should be held accountable."

Smith speculated the original statement was drawn from some ideas circulating in "the neoconservative network in which she circulates."

The idea of partitioning Iraq into separate enclaves for the Shiites in the south, the Kurds in the north, and the Sunni Arabs in the middle is a policy option that has been gaining adherents recently, notably Democratic presidential candidate Sen. Joseph Biden.

The neoconservatives who have been the strongest backers of the Iraq war policy have always opposed the idea of partition, in part because they fear it will create a Shiite Iraqi state heavily influenced by Iran.

Bachmann, who has also been a strong supporter of the war policy, may have picked up a version of these worries that included the idea that Iran had already worked out a plan to capitalize on any partition.

"But it's the kind of claim she couldn't possibly get from official sources," Smith said. "So it has to be unofficial sources, but if this is the basis for her public position on the war, then she's under some obligation to name her sources."

Americans Underestimate Iraqi Death Toll (AP)

By Nancy Benac,

AP, February 24, 2007

Americans are keenly aware of how many U.S. forces have lost their lives in Iraq, according to a new AP-Ipsos poll. But they woefully underestimate the number of Iraqi civilians who have been killed.

When the poll was conducted earlier this month, a little more than 3,100 U.S. troops had been killed. The midpoint estimate among those polled was right on target, at about 3,000.

Far from a vague statistic, the death toll is painfully real for many Americans. Seventeen percent in the poll know someone who has been killed or wounded in Iraq. And among adults under 35, those closest to the ages of those deployed, 27 percent know someone who has been killed or wounded.

For Daniel Herman, a lawyer in New Castle, Pa., a co-worker's nephew is the human face of the dead.

"This is a fairly rural area," he said. "When somebody dies, ... you hear about it. It makes it very concrete to you."

The number of Iraqis killed, however, is much harder to pin down, and that uncertainty is perhaps reflected in Americans' tendency to lowball the Iraqi death toll by tens of thousands.

Iraqi civilian deaths are estimated at more than 54,000 and could be much higher; some unofficial estimates range into the hundreds of thousands. The U.N. Assistance Mission for Iraq reports more than 34,000 deaths in 2006 alone.

Among those polled for the AP survey, however, the median estimate of Iraqi deaths was 9,890. The median is the point at which half the estimates were higher and half lower.

Christopher Gelpi, a Duke University political scientist who tracks public opinion on war casualties, said a better understanding of the Iraqi death toll probably wouldn't change already negative public attitudes toward the war much. People in democracies generally don't shy away from inflicting civilian casualties, he said, and they may be even more tolerant of them in situations such as Iraq, where many of the civilian deaths are caused by other Iraqis.

"You have to look at who's doing the killing," said Neal Crawford, a restaurant manager in Suttons Bay, Mich., who guessed that about 10,000 Iraqis had been killed. "If these people are dying because a roadside bomb goes off or if there's an insurgent attack in a marketplace, it's an unfortunate circumstance of war — people die."

Gelpi said that while Americans may not view Iraqi deaths through the same prism as American losses, they may use the Iraqi death toll to gauge progress, or lack thereof, on the U.S. effort to promote a stable, secure democracy in Iraq.

To many, he said, "the fact that so many are being killed is an indication that we're not succeeding."

Whatever their understanding of the respective death tolls, three-quarters of those polled said the numbers of both Americans and Iraqis who have been killed are "unacceptable." Two-thirds said they tend to feel upset when a soldier dies, while the rest say such deaths are unfortunate but part of what war is about.

Sometimes it's hard for people to sort out their conflicting emotions.

DOJ_NMG_0136842

"I don't know if I'm numb to it or not," said 86-year-old Robert Lipold of Las Vegas. "It's something you see in the paper every day there. And how do you feel when in the back of your mind it's unnecessary?"

Given a range of possible words to describe their feelings about the overall situation in Iraq, people were most likely to identify with "worried," selected by 81 percent of those surveyed.

Other descriptive words selected by respondents:

_Compassionate: 74 percent.

_Angry: 62 percent.

_Tired: 61 percent.

_Hopeful: 51 percent.

_Proud: 38 percent.

_Numb: 27 percent.

Women were more likely than men to feel worried, compassionate, angry and tired; men were more likely than women to feel proud, a finding consistent with traditional differences in attitudes toward war between the sexes.

For women, said Gelpi, "there is an emotional response to casualties that men don't show. ... It could be some sort of socialization that men get about the military or combat as being honorable that women don't get."

Charlotte Pirch, a lawyer from Fountain Valley, Calif., said she's "always appalled and just very upset at hearing about more casualties, whether it's U.S. troops or troops from another country."

Pirch said two of her nieces are married to men who served in Iraq and she doesn't live far from Camp Pendleton, which has sent many U.S. troops to Iraq. But she added, "Whether I knew someone personally or not, I would still feel it as a citizen of our country."

Perhaps surprisingly, the poll found little difference in attitudes toward the war between those who did and did not know someone who had been killed or wounded. There was a difference, however, in their opinions on whether opponents are right to criticize the war.

About half of those who know someone who has been killed or wounded felt it is right to criticize the war, compared with two-thirds of those who don't have a personal connection.

The AP-Ipsos poll of 1,002 adults, conducted Feb. 12-15, had a 3 percentage point margin of error.

___

AP writers Natasha Metzler and Ann Sanner and AP News Survey Specialist Dennis Junius contributed to this story.

Iraq Rebuilding Short On Qualified Civilians (WP)

By Rajiv Chandrasekaran, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 24, 2007

In Diyala, the vast province northeast of Baghdad where Sunnis and Shiites are battling for primacy with mortars and nighttime abductions, the U.S. government has contracted the job of promoting democracy to a Pakistani citizen who has never lived or worked in a democracy.

The management of reconstruction projects in the province has been assigned to a Border Patrol commander with no reconstruction experience. The task of communicating with the embassy in Baghdad has been handed off to a man with no background in drafting diplomatic cables. The post of agriculture adviser has gone unfilled because the U.S. Department of Agriculture has provided just one of the six farming experts the State Department asked for a year ago.

"The people our government has sent to Iraq are all dedicated, well-meaning people, but are they really the right people -- the best people -- for the job?" asked Kiki Skagen Munshi, a retired U.S. Foreign Service officer who, until last month, headed the team in Diyala that included the Pakistani democracy educator and the Border Patrol commander. "If you can't get experts, it's really hard to do an expert job."

Almost four years after the United States set about trying to rebuild Iraq, the job remains overwhelmingly unfinished. The provincial reconstruction teams like those in Diyala are often understaffed and underqualified -- and almost unable to work outside the military outposts where they are hunkered down for security reasons. Today, there are just 10 of the 30-person teams operating in all of Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0136843

President Bush proposed last month to double the number of teams, saying such civilians are central to American efforts to "pursue reconciliation, strengthen the moderates and speed the transition to Iraqi self-reliance." But the new plan is running into what Munshi and several officials familiar with their work described as the problems that have plagued the U.S. government effort from the start: Turf wars between federal agencies. Outright refusal to fill certain vital posts by some departments. A State Department in charge of the teams that just doesn't have any agronomists, engineers, police officers or technicians of its own to send to Iraq. "No foreign service in the world has those people," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice complained.

After Bush's new plan was announced, Rice asked the Pentagon for help filling 140 slots on the teams until State is able to hire private contractors to do the work, which could take up to a year. Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates said he was "troubled" by State's request, then grudgingly agreed. The teams are supposed to be up and running by next month.

It's time to "step up," a frustrated Bush lectured his Cabinet.

As State and the Pentagon were sparring over who would staff the reconstruction teams, Bush used his State of the Union address to call for the formation of a civilian reserve corps -- three years after the State Department first proposed it and several influential senators backed it. "It would give people across America who do not wear the uniform a chance to serve in the defining struggle of our time," the president said.

But the corps won't be built anytime soon: The administration's 2008 budget, which was sent to Congress earlier this month, includes no money for it. A senior administration official said the White House plans to wait another year before asking Congress for funding.Ambitious Plans Meet a Tight Purse

"There has been real inertia and myopia," said Sen. Richard G. Lugar (R-Ind.). "We have not really approached this in the right way."

By the fall of 2003, Lugar had grown worried about the U.S. reconstruction effort in Iraq. L. Paul Bremer, who was running the occupation government in Baghdad, had been pleading for more staffers with skills in post-conflict rebuilding -- people who could repair the electricity infrastructure, rehabilitate hospitals, retrain the police. Bremer urged Cabinet secretaries to send experts in their departments to Iraq. Some did; others blew him off. Pentagon officials, meanwhile, were recruiting young Republican Party loyalists for tours in Iraq. Many of them lacked reconstruction experience, but they were willing to work in Baghdad.

At the time, Lugar was thinking beyond Iraq. "We need to be ready for the next crisis," he told his aides.

They summoned experts in postwar rebuilding, among them James Dobbins, a Rand Corp. expert in post-conflict stabilization, and John J. Hamre, a former deputy secretary of defense. Most participants embraced the civilian reserve corps idea.

Lugar did, too, and in February 2004 he introduced a bill with Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) to create the Response Readiness Corps, its mission to stand prepared "to be called upon at a moment's notice to respond to emerging international crises."

State didn't bother waiting for the legislation to pass. Four months later, then-Secretary of State Colin L. Powell announced the formation of the State Department Office of Reconstruction and Stabilization (SCRS).

The job of running the SCRS was given to Carlos Pascual, a former ambassador to Ukraine. Pascual wanted to create a 200-person active-duty response corps, half of whom would be drawn from State and the rest from other parts of the federal government. They would serve in the corps for two years and then become reservists. In just four years, Pascual noted, the government would have 200 active reconstruction personnel and 400 reservists.

In addition, Pascual sought to create a 3,000-person contingent of people drawn from state and local governments and the private sector. That group was to include police officers, civil engineers and economists. And there would be a fund to hire and deploy private contractors to help with reconstruction within weeks of a crisis instead of waiting months for a special budget request, which is what State is now being forced to do.

The problem was the price tag: $350 million for the first year, Pascual and his staff figured.

The White House budget office balked. Pascual's request was whittled down to $100 million.

DOJ_NMG_0136844

Congressional appropriators were even more skeptical. Republicans questioned whether the initiative was a priority for the White House. Democrats expressed concern that the reserve corps might encourage the administration to invade another country.

The appropriators chopped so much that in the end the SCRS got just $7 million in 2005. The message from Congress was clear: If State wanted to fund the corps, it would have to find the money elsewhere in its budget.

"The bureaucratic antibodies were immediately activated," said MichÃ¨le Flournoy, president of the Center for a New American Security. "The rest of the State Department tried to kill SCRS because it was a competitor for funds. It never had a chance to succeed."Broad Support but Little Traction

In 2006, Pascual tried again. This time, he first hit resistance in his own department.

"There was this perverse cycle that began," he recalled. "The legislative staff at State would say, 'The Hill doesn't like this, therefore we shouldn't ask for much because we're not going to get it.' Then you had the Hill saying, 'The administration hasn't made this a priority so we're not going to fund it.' "

The Pentagon was in favor of the idea. "If you don't fund this, put more money in the defense budget for ammunition -- because I'm going to need it," one Marine general warned at the time.

Eventually, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Marine Gen. Peter Pace, persuaded Congress to allow the Pentagon to transfer up to $100 million to State for post-conflict civilian deployments. But Defense and State couldn't agree where to spend the money. Defense wanted much of it spent on stabilization operations in Haiti. State wanted to use it to help in the aftermath of last summer's war in Lebanon, officials on both sides recalled.

And then there was a round of fighting in State over which office should spend the money. Not everyone thought it belonged to the SCRS.

But the money had come with a condition: Spend it before the Pentagon could find other uses for it. By the time it was all sorted out some nine months later, the $100 million had dwindled to $10 million.

Some current and former SCRS staffers, as well as people familiar with the office, contend that Pascual should have focused his operation on helping with State's two biggest priorities: rebuilding Iraq and Afghanistan. Instead, he and Powell decided in 2004 to use the SCRS to prepare for future crises and to help with smaller-scale stabilization missions.

Pascual said the SCRS would have been "overwhelmed" if it had assumed responsibility for rebuilding Iraq or Afghanistan. "It would not have been able to have done either well," he said. "The intent was to learn from both of those missions."

But some current and former SCRS personnel believe the office should have sought to work on part of the Iraqi reconstruction -- perhaps assuming responsibility for a few provinces -- as a way to make itself more relevant. "If we had been working on Iraq instead of Haiti and Sudan, we would have had a better chance at getting the money we wanted," a State Department official said.

Had that occurred, the official said, "SCRS could have been producing many of the civilians we need in Iraq today."Little Eagerness to Work in Iraq

When Kiki Munshi started the Diyala reconstruction team last April, she expected she would have an agriculture specialist working for her. The Department of Agriculture had promised to send six farming experts to Iraq, including one to her team.

Since fruit and vegetable farming is the principal occupation in Diyala, Munshi figured she could generate support for the American presence in the restive province by helping growers increase their yields. "Knowledge is something the Iraqi farmers really need," she said.

Winning over the local population through small-scale projects was the logic behind the provincial reconstruction teams. While Washington was squabbling over whether to fund Pascual's proposed civilian reserve corps, the teams were established in Iraq last year by U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, who had pioneered the concept in Afghanistan. Before that, the U.S. government had essentially no civilian presence in Iraq beyond the Baghdad Green Zone and a handful of regional embassy outposts in four major cities. In theory, the teams would significantly increase the number of American civilians in places where they could actually help Iraqis on the ground.

But as Munshi found, that was often just a theory. Her agriculture specialist never even arrived.

DOJ_NMG_0136845

The USDA had trouble finding six people who wanted to work in Iraq among its more than 100,000 employees. Although a USDA official said the department encouraged its workers to apply, officials at State believe USDA did not move with alacrity because the two agencies had not agreed on a mechanism to reimburse the USDA for the services it would provide in Iraq. Eventually, USDA and State agreed that USDA would provide just two of the six. The other four would be private contractors hired by State.

The first USDA specialist, Randy Frescoln, a rural credit specialist from Iowa, landed in Iraq in December and was sent to the reconstruction team in Tikrit. Although he was supposed to stay in Iraq for a year, he said he plans to leave next month because he received a promotion while he was away. The second specialist has not yet arrived.

Even if USDA and State were to get an agriculture expert to Diyala now, Munshi believes, it is too late. Security conditions have deteriorated so significantly in the province that reconstruction personnel are lucky to make one or two trips a week off the military base where they live and work.

"At this point, nobody can do much in Diyala because of the violence," said Munshi, who returned to her North Carolina home in January for medical reasons. "The window is closed. I wish it weren't. I hope it opens. But it is."

Maj. Gen. Eric T. Olson, who is in charge of the provincial reconstruction teams in Iraq, called Diyala a "very, very tough place to work." He added that many of the staffing problems Munshi identified are "Diyala specific."

Reconstruction teams in Iraq, he said, "are, in general, doing good things under tough circumstances."Another Effort to Build a Corps

Today, the SCRS corps that Pascual envisioned as a rapid-response force with 200 federal employees ready to deploy has just 11 people on active duty.

Lugar and Biden reintroduced their bill this week. It mandates the formation of a 250-person active-duty response unit drawn from the federal government and the creation of a 2,000-strong civilian reserve corps. It also authorizes $145 million to fund the operation.

"Hopefully," Lugar said, "we've come to a point where we finally realize we need to do this."

Staff writer Thomas E. Ricks contributed to this report.

Army's Iraq War Objector Charged Again (AP)

By Gene Johnson,

AP, February 24, 2007

The Army refiled charges Friday against a lieutenant who refused to serve in Iraq, about two weeks after his first court-martial was declared a mistrial.

First Lt. Ehren Watada, 28, who refused to deploy with his unit last June, faces the same allegations he initially faced — missing movement and conduct unbecoming an officer — and could be sentenced to a dishonorable discharge and six years in prison if convicted. The Army has not set a date for a second court-martial.

"We're back to square one," Fort Lewis spokeswoman Leslie Kaye said.

Watada's first trial began early this month but ended abruptly when the judge, Lt. Col. John Head, said he did not believe the soldier fully understood a pretrial agreement he signed admitting elements of the charges. As part of that agreement, the Army dropped two of the charges against him, lowering his potential sentence to four years.

Watada's attorney, Eric Seitz, said he would seek to have the charges dismissed as a violation of the Constitution's protection against double jeopardy.

"When it's not going well for you, you can't just call a mistrial and start over again," Seitz said. "No matter how much lip service they give to wanting to protect my client's rights, that just doesn't exist in the military courts."

Fort Lewis spokesman Joseph Piek said double jeopardy did not apply in this case because the first trial was never completed.

Watada faces one charge of missing movement and another of conduct unbecoming of an officer. The latter charge accuses him in four instances of making public statements criticizing the war or President Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0136846

Watada freely admitted missing the deployment and making the statements in the pretrial agreement. Before the mistrial was declared, he had planned to take the witness stand to argue that his motives were to avoid committing war crimes by participating in an illegal war.

Iraq Objector Faces Another Court-martial (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 24, 2007

The Army refiled charges at Ft. Lewis against a lieutenant who refused to serve in Iraq. His first court-martial was declared a mistrial.

First Lt. Ehren Watada, 28, who refused to deploy with his unit in June, faces the same allegations he initially faced — missing movement and conduct unbecoming an officer — and could be sentenced to a dishonorable discharge and six years in prison if convicted. The Army has not set a date for the second court-martial.

Watada's first trial began early this month but ended abruptly when the judge, Lt. Col. John Head, said he did not believe that Watada fully understood an agreement he had signed admitting elements of the charges.

'Cry God For Harry!' (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 24, 2007

An English prince, still in his 20s, whose youth was famously spent in bad company and who sometimes goes by the name of Harry, takes his soldiers to war and finds his place in history and legend after an improbable victory over a foreign foe. No, Cornet Harry Wales is probably not a latter-day King Henry V. But it's hard not to be struck by the sight of a European royal who wants something more from life than to appear regularly in the pages of Hello!

The news is that Prince Charles's younger son, Harry, a junior officer in the Household Cavalry, will later this year deploy to southern Iraq even as the British government begins withdrawing some of its troops. "There's no way I'm going to put myself through Sandhurst [military academy], and then sit on my arse back home while my boys are out fighting for their country," he told one interviewer. The Prince's decision is all the more courageous given that he will surely become a prime target for jihadists seeking a trophy kill.

No less admirable is the Prince bucking the antiwar tide of British public opinion. A cartoon in the Guardian newspaper has him sitting backward in the saddle, his sword raised under the caption "Into the Valley of Death." That may typify the views of London's fashionable Islington set. But we suspect that most Britons, even those who oppose the war, will find reason to admire a young man who grasps that the essence of monarchy -- and its best justification -- lies not in its titles and luxuries but in its sense of duty, loyalty and honor.

More Troops Headed To Afghanistan (WT/AP)

By Courtney French, Associated Press

The Washington Times, February 24, 2007

LONDON -- Britain said yesterday it would send additional troops to southern Afghanistan in response to NATO's call to bolster forces in the region, days after the country said it plans to withdraw 1,600 troops from Iraq in coming months.

Defense Minister Des Browne confirmed the deployment in a statement late yesterday.

"We have decided that it is right for the UK to provide some additional forces for the southern region," Mr. Browne said, adding he would announce full details in Parliament on Monday.

The Defense Ministry refused to confirm reports in the British press that an additional 1,000 troops were to be sent.

Mr. Brown said the government made the decision after a NATO defense ministers meeting last week in Seville, Spain, where the alliance asked countries to send more troops.

"NATO must respond to this request, or we will put at risk everything we have achieved across Afghanistan in the last five years," he said.

"We have been trying hard to get other nations to live up to the joint commitment NATO made to Afghanistan and provide more forces, forces which are authorized to fight. We will continue to press. But we must be realistic," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0136847

On Wednesday, Prime Minister Tony Blair told lawmakers that Britain will be withdrawing 1,600 of its troops from Iraq in the next few months and hopes to make other cuts to its 7,100-strong contingent by late summer.

Britain has more than 5,000 troops in Afghanistan, concentrated in the southern part of the country -- a former Taliban stronghold where the government wields little power. In all, NATO has about 35,000 troops in and around Afghanistan.

NATO issued a statement earlier this week that the Taliban is planning to increase suicide and roadside bomb attacks in the south and west.

A senior Taliban commander told a news agency yesterday that new weapons have strengthened the militia.

"This year will prove to be the bloodiest for the foreign troops. It is not just a threat, we will prove it," Mullah Dadullah said by satellite phone. "The Taliban's war preparations are going on in caves and in mountains. Our 6,000 fighters are ready for attacks on foreign troops after the change in weather and as it becomes warmer."

Mullah Dadullah said the extra weapons the Taliban were being supplied -- he did not say from where -- included the ability to bring down the NATO and U.S. helicopters crucial to their operations in this rugged, mountainous country.

Several European nations have resisted pressure to send more units to Afghanistan, especially to the south and east. In particular, the reluctance of France, Spain, Italy, Germany and Turkey to provide more combat troops has caused frustration among nations on the front lines. The United States, Britain, Canada and the Netherlands have provided most of the troops in the south.

New Al Qaeda Video Claims Attack In Afghanistan (AP)

AP, February 23, 2007

CAIRO, Egypt (AP) -- Al Qaeda posted a 56-second video Friday of rockets being fired at what it claimed was a U.S. military base in Afghanistan.

The tape appeared to be the latest in a series of videos that the terror network has released to convey that its insurgents are faring well in the Afghan war.

The base was not visible in the video, which showed several rockets being launched from a forested hillside in the Balwara area of Afghanistan in November, according to a subtitle.

The video, which opened with old footage of U.S. vehicles exploding as they were hit, surfaced on an Internet site where al Qaeda and other militant groups are known to post messages. Its authenticity could not be independently confirmed.

The pictures were accompanied by a song whose lyrics included the line: "Burn the Christians, fight the devious Christians who worship crosses."

The tape shows four missiles streaking into the sky from a single-tube launcher that is held down by sandbags and rocks. Two bearded young fighters squat next to the launcher, operating it in a perfectly relaxed way. One wears a dark-blue woolen hat, the other is bareheaded.

A third man, with a light brown scarf loosely wrapped around his head, stands and points across a valley, presumably at the target. A long aerial protrudes from his off-camera side as if he is holding a walkie-talkie.

Shouts of "Allahu Akbar," God is great in Arabic, are heard as the rockets are fired.

There is no sign of the four missiles hitting anything. The tape does not show them land.

The tape is titled "Holocaust of the Americans in the land of Khorasan, the Islamic emirate." Khorasan, a name from the Persian empire, is the militant word for Afghanistan. The subtitle says: "Launching, BM missiles on an American base in Balwara."

The tape bears the logo of As-Sahab, al Qaeda's media production wing.

A U.S. company that tracks militant statements, IntelCenter, said the video was the eighth that al Qaeda has released so far this month, making February 2007 the second busiest month for video issued by the terror network. In June 2006 al Qaeda released 11 videos, IntelCenter said.

On February 16 al Qaeda posted a video, also titled "Holocaust of the Americans in the land of Khorasan, the Islamic emirate," which purported to show a successful attack on a military position held by U.S. and Afghan forces.

DOJ_NMG_0136848

However, the video did not show the insurgents capturing the position and a NATO spokeswoman in Kabul called it "pure propaganda."

Afghans See Decline Since '05 (WP)

By Griff Witte, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, February 24, 2007

Violence, Corruption, U.S. Role Add to Unease, Report Says

Conditions in Afghanistan have deteriorated markedly since 2005, with rising violence, government corruption and misguided U.S. efforts contributing to growing unease among the population, according to a report released yesterday based in part on 1,000 interviews with ordinary Afghans.

Although there were bright spots -- a better overall economy and more rights for women -- the report's authors found diminishing security as the Taliban steps up its attacks, a discredited justice system and a severe lack of basic services such as electricity. The report, produced by the nonpartisan Center for Strategic and International Studies and funded in part by a grant from the U.S. Agency for International Development, also found that Afghans tend to be more negative in their outlook than official statistics or media accounts would suggest.

"Public fear and frustration are on the rise in Afghanistan. As a result, Afghans are beginning to disengage from national governing processes and lose confidence in their leadership," according to the report. "Dramatic changes are required in the coming weeks, or 2007 will become the breaking point."

That statement echoed remarks made earlier this month by the departing U.S. commander in Afghanistan, Lt. Gen. Karl W. Eikenberry, who told a congressional panel that "a point could be reached at which the government of Afghanistan becomes irrelevant to its people, and the goal of establishing a democratic, moderate, self-sustaining state could be lost forever."

A year ago, U.S. officials were speaking much more optimistically about Afghanistan. But an especially violent summer, fed by an increasingly aggressive insurgency, has convinced many policymakers that Afghanistan is at a precarious moment more than five years after a U.S.-led military campaign knocked the Taliban from power. Last week, President Bush pledged $11.8 billion in aid for Afghanistan over the next two years and said U.S. forces would be increased by 3,200 to 27,000, the highest level of the war.

Among the report's recommendations are to shift the focus away from eradicating poppy fields and toward interdiction, to give local communities more control over aid money, and to abandon major military sweeps that inflict damage on civilians in favor of rapid-response forces that can protect Afghans in emergencies. "NATO and the United States' 'big army' military operations and emphasis on foot soldier 'kills' are doing more damage than good," the report said.

Lt. Col. Todd Vician, a Pentagon spokesman, said he could not comment on the report's recommendations because he had not seen them, but he said part of the reason the United States is committing more troops to Afghanistan is to improve response times. Britain said yesterday it would also be sending additional troops.

DOJ:

Justice Department Fires 8th U.S. Attorney (WP)

By Dan Eggen, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 24, 2007

Dispute Over Death Penalty Cited

An eighth U.S. attorney announced her resignation yesterday, the latest in a wave of forced departures of federal prosecutors who have clashed with the Justice Department over the death penalty and other issues.

Margaret Chiara, the 63-year-old U.S. attorney in Grand Rapids, Mich., told her staff that she was leaving her post after more than five years, officials said. Sources familiar with the case confirmed that she was among a larger group of prosecutors who were first asked to resign Dec. 7.

DOJ_NMG_0136849

Chiara is the second female U.S. attorney to be dismissed. The other is Carol Lam of San Diego. Before the firings, 15 of 93 U.S. attorneys were women, department records show.

The firings have been criticized by lawmakers in both parties and have prompted proposals in Congress to restrict the ability of Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to appoint interim prosecutors indefinitely.

Chiara declined to comment on her departure, which is effective March 16. She will be replaced on an interim basis by Russell C. Stoddard, who recently joined the Grand Rapids office, officials said.

U.S. District Judge Robert Holmes Bell, the chief judge in Michigan's Western District, said in an interview yesterday that Chiara has an excellent reputation in Grand Rapids.

"This is a very classy, distinguished, highly regarded public servant," said Bell, who was appointed to the bench during the Reagan administration. "She's one of the best United States attorneys we've had in this district, and all of my colleagues agree. . . . To have her suddenly disappear without warning catches us all flat-footed."

Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty told senators earlier this month that all but one of the prosecutors were fired for "performance-related" reasons. McNulty said that former U.S. attorney Bud Cummins of Little Rock was removed so the job could be given to a former aide to presidential adviser Karl Rove.

Nearly all of the dismissed prosecutors had positive job reviews, but many had run into political trouble with Washington over immigration, capital punishment or other issues, according to prosecutors and others. At least four also were presiding over high-profile public corruption investigations when they were dismissed.

Chiara -- who had once studied to be a nun -- is personally opposed to capital punishment, but in 2002 she presided over the first death penalty case in Michigan in more than 60 years. A year later, then-Attorney General John D. Ashcroft rejected a plea agreement proposed by Chiara's office in a separate murder case, according to news reports.

Another of the fired U.S. attorneys, Paul K. Charlton of Phoenix, also clashed with Washington over the death penalty.

Justice officials have been evasive about the number of fired prosecutors. McNulty told the Senate Judiciary Committee that fewer than 10 had been dismissed, but he declined to elaborate.

Staff researcher Julie Tate contributed to this report.

Eighth U.S. Attorney Dismissed From Post (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 23 — A United States attorney in Grand Rapids, Mich., is leaving her job, the eighth federal prosecutor to be removed in a Justice Department shake-up of prosecutors, government officials said Friday.

The prosecutor, Margaret M. Chiara, told her staff that she would leave office on March 16, making her the latest casualty of Justice Department dismissals that Democrats in Congress have criticized as politically motivated.

Like the other ousted prosecutors, Ms. Chiara is a Republican. She took office in 2001 after twice being elected a county prosecutor. She had also served as policy director of the Michigan Supreme Court. Her office has said that she has emphasized reducing gun violence and improving law enforcement programs for American Indians.

Justice Department officials declined to comment on Ms. Chiara's removal, which was first reported on Friday by The Grand Rapids Press. A telephone call to her office was not returned, but other officials confirmed that she had been asked to leave.

Senator Charles E. Schumer, a New York Democrat who has criticized the removals, said he would seek a fuller explanation of the administration's actions in a public hearing and at private briefings.

Some Justice Department officials have said that most of the dismissals were intended to correct performance problems. But most of the ousted prosecutors have said they received highly favorable performance evaluations and were given no reason for their removal.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

DOJ_NMG_0136850

Former KB Officials Face U.S. Backdating Probe (WSJ)

By Charles Forelle And Michael Corkery

The Wall Street Journal, February 24, 2007

Federal prosecutors in Los Angeles are scrutinizing stock-options backdating at home builder KB Home, according to people familiar with the matter. These people say prosecutors appear interested in the conduct of former Chief Executive Officer Bruce Karatz and former human-resources chief Gary Ray.

A lawyer for Mr. Ray, Mark Beck, says he is "attempting to persuade [the prosecutor] that Gary Ray did not engage in any wrongdoing and certainly no conscious wrongdoing." A spokesman for Mr. Karatz declined to comment.

MORE ON OPTIONS

• Options Scorecard: Companies under scrutiny1

• Perfect Payday: Complete coverage2

It isn't clear precisely what the prosecutors are examining. Last year the Los Angeles-based company said an internal investigation found that Mr. Karatz had backdated his own option grants to increase his pay. He agreed to leave the company and forfeit about $13 million in gains from the backdating, becoming one of the highest-profile and best-paid CEOs to be forced out in the options scandal. Mr. Ray, whom KB Home has said participated in the backdating with Mr. Karatz, also left.

Company spokeswoman Caroline Shaw said the Department of Justice is looking into past stock-option grant practices at KB Home, but has told the company itself that it is "not a target of this investigation." She added, "KB Home has and intends to fully cooperate with any government agency looking into this matter."

KB Home, one of several dozen companies being examined by prosecutors in districts across the country, disclosed earlier this year that it was the subject of a formal investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission, a type of probe in which the agency's staff has the authority to issue subpoenas.

Federal authorities are examining whether stock options at roughly 140 companies were backdated -- a practice that increases the potential profit a recipient makes from the options. Backdating can lead to accounting errors, tax problems and, in serious cases, criminal fraud charges. Seven former executives of four companies so far have been charged with crimes related to backdating.

Earlier this month, KB Home restated seven years of financials, reducing its profit by $41.1 million over the period to account for the backdated options and related taxes.

A spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office in Los Angeles declined to comment.

Write to Charles Forelle at charles.forelle@wsj.com3 and Michael Corkery at michael.corkery@wsj.com4

DOJ Launches KB Home Stock Options Probe (AP)

AP, February 24, 2007

Justice Department Launches Probe Into the Handling of Stock Options at KB Home

LOS ANGELES (AP) -- The Department of Justice has launched a probe into the handling of stock options at KB Home, one of the nation's largest homebuilders, although it is not targeting the company directly, KB Home said Friday. As part of its inquiry, the Justice Department is interviewing current and former executives of KB Home, a company spokesman said.

The company last month acknowledged that the Securities and Exchange Commission had launched a formal investigation into its options practices.

Justice also is "looking into these practices but has informed KB Home that it is not a target of this investigation," according to a company release. "KB Home has and intends to fully cooperate with any government agency looking into this matter."

KB Home is one of at least 200 companies to disclose SEC, DOJ or internal investigations, according to an Associated Press review.

KB Home's former chief executive Bruce Karatz, along with its executive vice president and chief legal officer, were forced to step down late last year after it was disclosed that Karatz benefited from favorably dated option awards. He agreed to repay $13 million stemming from incorrect measurement dates for financial reporting of annual option grants between 1998 and 2005.

The company also has said it expects to record additional expenses of no more than $50 million and was investigating whether it needed to restate earnings for prior periods.

Shares of KB Home added 20 cents to $51.80 in aftermarket activity after slipping 96 cents to end at $51.60 on the New York Stock Exchange.

New Inquiry On Options At KB Home (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

The United States attorney's office in Los Angeles is looking into stock-option backdating at KB Home, the national home builder, but the company said yesterday that it was not the target of the investigation.

The inquiry appears to be in the early stages, and it may take months before prosecutors decide what, if any, charges they will bring in the case.

Still, news of interest by federal prosecutors raises the stakes for a man who was once one of the highest-profile and best-paid executives in corporate America, Bruce E. Karatz.

In November, KB's board forced out Mr. Karatz, who was the chairman and chief executive of the company, and Gary A. Ray, the top human resources officer, after an internal investigation concluded that eight stock-option grants since 1998 had been incorrectly dated.

Mr. Karatz's lawyer, John W. Keker, declined to comment yesterday on the case.

A lawyer representing Mr. Ray, Mark E. Beck, confirmed that he and his client have met with prosecutors but declined to discuss the facts of the case, aside from saying that "several million documents" would lead officials to "conclude that he did not engage in any wrongdoing."

KB Home said in a filing this month that the evidence it had collected suggested that after the company's board approved stock option grants, Mr. Karatz and Mr. Ray used "hindsight" to pick dates when KB's stock closed at or near a monthly low for seven of the eight grants.

KB estimates that the dates chosen understated the company's stock options expense by $36.3 million from 1999 through 2005 and lowered its tax bill by $4.8 million.

The choice of dates for stock options is significant because it sets the base price at which executives and employees are allowed to buy shares of their companies at some point in the future. A low price makes it more likely that option holders will make a profit, potentially a very large one for top executives, when they sell the stock.

Though the practice of backdating stock options is not illegal, it can pose complex tax, accounting and disclosure problems for companies and executives. More than 100 companies, including giants like Apple Inc. and UnitedHealth Group, have been ensnarled in stock-option backdating cases.

So far, most have drawn only civil investigations by the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Internal Revenue Service. Federal prosecutors have become involved in only a handful of cases, because to prove criminal charges in options backdating, they must show that executives intended to enrich themselves illegally at the expense of other shareholders. That often involves showing a pattern of egregious behavior that can include the destruction or forging of documents and lying to directors.

Shares of KB Home fell 96 cents, or 1.8 percent, to $51.60 yesterday.

In 2005, a year when KB's stock rose 39.2 percent, Mr. Karatz reaped gains of $118 million in stock options and $37 million in salary and bonus, much of which was also awarded in stock. As part of an agreement he reached with the company when he resigned in November, Mr. Karatz agreed to return $13 million in profits from backdated options.

KB and Mr. Karatz, however, have not resolved several important terms of his departure from the company, including whether he will receive retirement benefits and a severance package. In addition, the two sides have not decided if Mr. Karatz will be allowed to keep unexercised stock options and past restricted-stock grants.

SEC Probe Into Citigroup Associates Deal (FT)

By David Wighton In New York

Financial Times, February 24, 2007

Citigroup is under investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission over its accounting for Associates First Capital, the finance business it bought for $31.1bn in 2000.

The chief US regulator is looking into the treatment of tax reserves and releases during the four years to 2004, Citigroup disclosed in a filing on Friday night.

The SEC has subpoenaed witness testimony and accounting and internal controls-related information, the company said.

The SEC is also continuing its long-running probe into Citigroup's treatment of potential Argentina-related losses in the fourth quarter of 2001.

The disclosure of the accouting investigation in Associates underlines the task faced by Chuck Prince, chief executive, in escaping the legacy of Citigroup's acitivities during the bull market.

Mr Prince, who succeeded Sandy Weill as chief executive in October 2003, has spent much of his time dealing with legal and regulatory problems dating back to the late 1990s.

Friday's disclosure comes as Mr Prince's leadership is under renewed fire following his sacking of Todd Thomson as head of Citigroup's wealth managment arm.

People close to Mr Prince said Mr Thomson was sacked partly due to his mishandling of his friendship with Maria Bartiromo, the CNBC business reporter.

Mr Thomson, who became chief financial officer shortly before the Associates deal in 2000, held the post until 2004. He was seen as a potential successor to Mr Prince with whom he had repeatedly clashed. His removal prompted criticism of the lack of a perceived lack of management depth within the group and in particular the lack of potential successors to Mr Prince.

A number of senior executives have left the group since Mr Prince became chief executive amid criticism of his management style. Mr Prince has also been under intense pressure to boost Citigroup's sluggish stock price and stem rising costs.

The accounting investigation into Associates is the latest blow dealt by the acquisition of the controversial business which was one of the US's largest "subprime" lenders.

At the time, Mr Weill said that Associates had "an incredible growth rate" which justified the 50 per cent acquisition premium. But in his recent autobiography, Mr Weill described the deal as "one of the worst acquisitions of my career".

The business came under fire from consumers and regulators and in 2002, Citigroup agreed to pay $215m to settle Federal Trade Commission allegaitons of deceptive and abusive lending practices.

Citigroup also suffered serious headaches in Japan where the business ran into trouble quickly after the acquisition when the government cut the maximum interest rate on consumer loans from 40 per cent to 29.2 per cent. This year the government cut the rate again to 20 per cent prompting Citigroup to announce a drastic scaling back of the business at a cost of $415m.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Mrs. Moonda Asks To Remove Death Penalty From Case (PPG)

By Milan Simonich, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, February 24, 2007

Lawyers for murder suspect Donna Moonda today asked a judge to prohibit the federal government from pursuing the death penalty against her.

Her attorneys said capital punishment is "cruel and unusual in all cases" and should not be an option for jurors when Mrs. Moonda goes on trial in June.

Today was the deadline for pretrial motions to be filed, and Mrs. Moonda's three court-appointed lawyers peppered U.S. District Judge David Dowd with three separate filings aimed at eliminating the death penalty from the case.

Federal prosecutors have until March 15 to respond. Judge Dowd would then issue his ruling.

Prosecutors recommended that Mrs. Moonda, 47, of Mercer County, Pa., stand trial for her life because they say she coldly plotted the murder of her husband, Dr. Gulam Moonda.

DOJ_NMG_0136853

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales made the final decision in authorizing a capital case against Mrs. Moonda.

Damian Bradford, who was having an affair with Mrs. Moonda, has admitted that he shot and killed Dr. Gulam Moonda on the Ohio Turnpike in May 2005. He said he killed the doctor at Donna Moonda's behest.

Mr. Bradford, 25, said she promised him half of her inheritance, which she estimated at $3 million to $6 million. Dr. Moonda, 69, was a wealthy urologist.

At trial in Akron, Ohio, Mr. Bradford is to be the prosecution's chief witness against Mrs. Moonda. In return for his cooperation, the government has recommended that he serve 17 years in prison. With good time, he could go free before he turns 40.

Mrs. Moonda, though, faces life in prison or death if she is convicted. With today's motions, her lawyers hoped to emphasize that the man who pulled the trigger could get out of prison someday, but the woman accused of arranging the crime could be put to death.

The U.S. government has not executed a female convict since 1953. State governments, mostly in the South, have executed 11 women since 1984.

Suspect Sketch Issued (WHEELPI)

By Gabe Wells

Wheeling (WV) Post-Intelligencer, February 24, 2007

Artist's rendering of the suspect in the rape/abduction investigation.

WHEELING — A rendering of the man accused in the recent rape and abduction of a city girl has been released as the Federal Bureau of Investigation intensifies its efforts in the case.

FBI Supervisory Senior Resident Agent Mark Wheeler on Friday said a command post has been established in the basement of the City-County Building to accommodate the 50 city, county and federal law enforcement officers investigating the Tuesday rape and abduction of a North Wheeling girl. In addition to the release of the suspect's sketch, an updated description of the suspect's vehicle also has been released.

Wheeling police Lt. Gary Gaus said a number of registered sex offenders in the area already have been ruled out as suspects, but he would not comment on whether DNA evidence has been collected in the case. Gaus said progress is being made.

"We are learning new things every day," he said.

The victim, who turned 12 years old the day after the abduction, was taken at about 8:40 p.m. Tuesday in the 400 block of Kenney Street between Main and Market streets by an abductor who was not wearing clothes.

The girl was grabbed from behind and forced into a pickup truck.

The victim was walking with a friend, and that friend ran home and told her mother what had happened. That friend's mother called police. The abductor released the girl in Bridgeport near the the Kirkwood Presbyterian Church on Bennett Street.

Police now believe the suspect was also involved in an abduction attempt around 9 p.m. Sunday on Hughes Avenue in the south end of Martins Ferry.

Those with information in the case are asked to call 800-CALL-FBI (800-225-5324) or they can visit the Internet Web site at www.FBI.gov.

Russo, Former OB Mayor, Gets 10 Years (MR)

By Brendan Kirby, Staff Reporter

Mobile Press-Register (AL), February 24, 2007

Decrying the corrosive effect of public corruption, a federal judge in Mobile on Friday sentenced former Orange Beach Mayor Steve Russo to 10 years in prison for a wide-ranging conspiracy to enrich himself by influencing development projects.

U.S. District Judge Kristi DuBose also gave former Orange Beach City Attorney Larry Sutley, 58, two years and three months for his role in the conspiracy but allowed him to remain free while he appeals the case.

DuBose allowed Russo to remain free until the U.S. Bureau of Prisons determines in which facility he will serve his sentence.

DOJ_NMG_0136854

Butler said that generally takes about two or three months. At that point, the 45-year-old Birmingham native will have to turn himself in.

Prior to their sentencings both men addressed DuBose.

Russo indicated that he regretted not testifying during his trial and said he spent the time since then searching fruitlessly for "magic words" that would show the judge who Russo is beyond the allegations he faced in her

courtroom.

"For eight years I did my dead-level best to make decisions for thousands of people in my community of Orange Beach," Russo said. "No matter what happens here today, your honor, I'll walk out of here knowing that I did the very best for the city of Orange Beach."

Sutley said he rehearsed his speech each night when he woke in the wee hours. He maintained that he never "knowingly or willingly participated in any criminal activity."

"I have gotten an education in this. It's been very expensive, but an education it has been," Sutley told DuBose. "Whatever your sentence is, I'll have to live with it."

Less than minimum in guidelines

Both sentences were less than the minimum called for under advisory sentencing guidelines and far less than the recommendation by prosecutors, who sought maximum penalties under those guidelines.

Russo, who was up first in the 3½-hour hearing, stared stoically as DuBose announced his sentence. Her words prompted audible crying from Russo's mother and some other supporters.

Russo also received support from his wife, Crystal Russo, who had received special permission to attend the hearing despite the home confinement sentence she is serving in connection with the case.

In imposing Steve Russo's punishment, which also included three years of supervised release following his prison term and a $75,000 fine, DuBose rejected the ex-mayor's insistence that the allegations against him do not reflect his true character.

"The conduct for which you've been convicted may not define you. But nevertheless it has been sufficiently proven," DuBose said. "It is part of your history. It is now part of who you are."

Assistant U.S. Attorney Steven Butler, who served as lead prosecutor, described the stakes of DuBose's sentencing decision in sweeping terms.

"Can you imagine if every public official in the country did what this defendant did? Our republic would go the way of the Roman Empire," Butler said. "It would implode in the blink of an eye."

Sentencing guideline range

The guideline range determined by DuBose started at 12 years and seven months and ended at 15 years and eight months.

It was so high, in part, because of DuBose's finding that Russo's illegal take from various land deals and kickbacks orchestrated by developer Jim Brown amounted to more than $657,000.

Although DuBose said she felt that a prison term within the guidelines was excessive, she also expressed her desire to deter other political leaders.

"Public corruption of this type has to be addressed or it would mean the demise of our democracy," she said.

Although less than the guideline minimum, Russo's 10-year sentence is among the longest in decades for a public corruption case in southern Alabama. Several officials in the 1970s and 1980s got longer sentences, but that was before the federal government abolished parole, and those defendants served less time.

Like other federal prisoners, Russo will be eligible for a 15 percent reduction in his sentence for good behavior. Barring a successful appeal, though, he will not qualify for early release.

Butler said the longer sentence for Russo is due in part to stiffer sentencing guidelines, which have been made more severe since 2004, when former Mobile County Commissioner Freeman Jockisch was sentenced to two years and nine months for lying on tax returns and ethics forms.

DOJ_NMG_0136855

Lawyers for Russo and Sutley both indicated they would appeal their clients' convictions to the Atlanta-based 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. Butler objected to the sentences on "reasonableness" grounds since they were shorter than punishment prescribed by the advisory guidelines, but he declined to say whether his office also would appeal.

The U.S. Attorney's Office has appealed the year-and-a-day sentence that another of Russo's co-defendants, Ken Wall, received.

Butler urged DuBose to send a message with a stiff sentence and a $175,000 fine for Sutley, whom he accused of using his position with the city of Orange Beach to hide the illicit relationship between Russo and Brown.

"He did the worst thing any attorney can do," Butler said. "He thumbed his nose at the oath he took when he became a lawyer."

He called Sutley and Russo "tightly wound political cronies and confidants."

But DuBose questioned whether Butler's theory of the case fit the facts and also said she believes Sutley's actions represented "extremely aberrant behavior" given his long years of exemplary service in south Baldwin County.

But she said she was particularly troubled by Sutley's attempts to hide assets that the government targeted for forfeiture after he was named in the original indictment.

Brown cut deal, then testified

Before the trial in the summer, prosecutors cut a deal with Brown, who pleaded guilty to corruption charges and then testified that for years he provided favors for Russo that included free work on Russo's house in exchange for the mayor's help getting controversial development projects approved by the City Council.

A jury in September convicted Russo and Sutley of forming a secret partnership with Brown to buy a Gulf Shores beach house, with Brown putting up all of the money. At another point, Brown testified, he helped Russo buy a property off of Wolf Bay using none of the mayor's own money and then sell it for a $400,000 profit later the same day. At the time, Brown and business partner Wall were trying to get approval for a condo and retail project in the city.

The jury also found that Russo misused campaign contributions for personal expenses, accepted a $10,000 kickback in exchange for a contract related to hurricane debris removal and benefited from Brown's maneuvering to get a potential rival of Russo to move out of the city rather than challenge the mayor for re-election.

Russo, Sutley and Brown face an April 2 trial date in Baldwin County Circuit Court on similar state charges. Assistant Attorney General H. Clay Barnett III said the federal sentences will not impact that case.

"The only thing that will have an impact on a trial is a guilty plea at the state level," he said.

(Staff Reporter Ryan Dezember contributed to this report.)

Former Orange Beach Mayor Gets 10-year Sentence (BSH)

By Garry Mitchell

Biloxi Sun Herald, February 24, 2007

MOBILE, Ala. - A federal judge Friday sentenced former Orange Beach Mayor Steve Russo to 10 years in prison for a corruption scheme involving land deals in the beach resort.

U.S. District Judge Kristi DuBose also sentenced former Orange Beach City Attorney Larry Sutley to two years and three months in prison and a $50,000 fine for his part in the scheme. But DuBose said she expects Sutley's conviction may be reversed on appeal.

Russo was convicted in September of conspiracy, mail and wire fraud charges. He could have been sentenced to more than 15 years. Sutley was facing a maximum 10 years under the government's sentencing guidelines.

DuBose said the sentence she imposed on Russo "has to be an example to other elected officials" about corruption in public office. Russo also was fined $75,000.

Russo showed no remorse during the three-hour hearing.

"I can walk out of here knowing I did the very best job for the people of Orange Beach I could do," he told the judge.

He also said he has "regained my knowledge of what's important in life."

After hearing Russo's comments to the judge, Assistant U.S. Attorney Steven Butler said Russo did do some good things while in office.

"That's what he was elected to do," Butler said.

But he said he also used his "official power to get rich."

Developer Tim James of Greenville, whose firm built the toll bridge into Orange Beach, testified at the sentencing hearing on behalf of Russo and Sutley, saying he had never heard anyone say either of them was "on the take."

"It's a shame what's happened here today," said James, the son of former Gov. Fob James.

He said the two had worked for the benefit of Orange Beach, but he did not know them personally.

Russo was first elected to the City Council in 1996 and then mayor in a special election in 1998. He served eight years as mayor before being forced to resign because of his conviction.

He maintained his innocence and did not testify at his trial.

Federal prosecutors accused Russo of scheming with two beach developers - Jim Brown and Ken Wall.

Butler described it as a "myriad kickback" scheme that included "corrupt land deals."

In determining the sentence, the judge estimated the amount of potential gain at $657,915, but said it was hard to put a value on it because it involved future property sales.

Brown pleaded guilty in June to bribing Russo in order to curry favor at City Hall. Wall was charged for his role in separate schemes to enrich the mayor.

DuBose allowed Sutley to be released on appeal bond and told attorneys that his case involved a "close question' that could lead to a reversal of his conviction.

"There was no evidence he received any bribe or paid any bribe," the judge said. She said Sutley, however, did obstruct justice.

"He failed when he should have given notice of conflict of interest," DuBose said. She said Sutley was not an "equal" to Russo in the scheme.

Sutley told the judge he had never "knowingly violated the trust of a client," including the city of Orange Beach.

Fairhope accountant Doug Montgomery testified for Sutley, telling the judge that his lifelong friend is "all law" and wouldn't be part of criminal activity.

The judge received about 58 letters on Sutley's behalf, noting that he's lived "an exemplary life."

Russo will allowed to report to prison on his own, but that reporting date was not set Friday.

Earlier this week, Russo was given two years probation after pleading guilty in Baldwin County to a state marijuana possession charge. The state drug charges will be dropped if he stays out of trouble for two years.

Ex-official Convicted In Bribery Case (MH)

By Cammy Clark

The Miami Herald, February 24, 2007

KEY WEST - James Hendrick, one of the brightest and most influential attorneys in Monroe County, was convicted Friday in federal court of obstructing justice and witness tampering in a wide-ranging, years-long Keys corruption case that might not be over.

Hendrick stood still after the 12-member jury convicted him on all four federal charges stemming from his role in an attempted coverup of a bribery scheme involving a Marathon hotel project.

His conviction came without the testimony of his one-time friend, former county Mayor Jack London, who died before trial. He had admitted that Hendrick helped steer a bribe to him with the help of lobbyist Randall Hilliard, known as ``the Prince of Darkness."

In the background of the three-week trial was an even more colorful character: Pritam Singh, a one-time hippie who became a Sikh and then a major developer. Never charged with a crime, Singh was mentioned in closing arguments by prosecutor Brenda Morris, who referred to him as Hendrick's ``cash cow."

DOJ_NMG_0136857

Hendrick, 59, faces a maximum of five years' imprisonment for conspiracy to obstruct justice and 10 years for two counts of witness tampering and one count of obstruction of justice. Sentencing is set for May 4 in Miami by U.S. District Judge Shelby Highsmith.

Hendrick will appeal, said his wife, Vera Vasek.

"Jim still believes he's innocent and will continue on with every step along the way to prove his innocence," Vasek said.

The case stems from a lengthy FBI investigation that uncovered a $29,000 bribe paid in 1997 to London, Monroe County's mayor at the time. In return for the bribe, London used his influence to win zoning approval for a stalled 79-room hotel project called Hall's Resort. Hendrick received no money in the deal.

By the time the FBI had evidence of the bribe, the five-year federal statute of limitations for bribery had expired.

CONSULTANT'S ROLE

But the feds pursued what they could and won the cooperation of political consultant Randall Hilliard, who paid the bribe after collecting $82,500 in fees from developer Marvin Rappaport, and testified with immunity that the bribe was orchestrated by London and Hendrick, a partner at the time in a high-powered law firm with U.S. Magistrate Judge Hugh Morgan.

While cooperating with the federal government, Hilliard recorded phone conservations and in-person meetings with Hendrick, including at Singh's 50th birthday party in Vermont.

In one of his most self-incriminating statements, Hendrick told Hilliard: ``I'm sure no one would counsel me to sit here and talk with you because it would be considered witness tampering."

Hilliard also testified that Hendrick helped concoct untrue "legitimate business" explanations for the $29,000 that London used to pay a house lien in Ireland. London pleaded guilty to tax evasion for not reporting the $29,000. But he was given immunity for three counts of lying to prosecutors in exchange for his testimony against Hendrick -- his former best friend for nearly three decades.

London died suddenly in November. That left Hilliard as a key witness.

The defense, led by Miami-based lawyer Ed Shohat, hammered at the credibility of Hilliard, also a former good friend of Hendrick's.

But London's wife of 24 years, Elaine London, gave damaging, voluntary testimony as well. She said Hendrick persuaded her husband to take a trip to Ireland to be ``out of sight, out of mind."

Hendrick, who took the stand in his own defense, explained that he told London to do so for health reasons -- not to avoid a grand jury subpoena.

Elaine London, who worked for 18 months for Singh before being fired, testified that her late husband trusted Hendrick until a conversation after London's arrest in March 2004.

"Jack was very angry at Jimmy," Elaine London testified. ``He said Jimmy had told him to basically plead guilty. That a couple of years at a country club prison wouldn't be bad. . . . Jimmy had been a good friend to me all these years, but I won't take the blame for this."

Shohat portrayed Hendrick, a partner at the Key West law firm Morgan & Hendrick, as simply trying to help his friends, who both had been clients.

Shohat said there was no evidence on the recordings that Hendrick ever told Hilliard or London to lie.

"Jim's life is destroyed with any guilty verdict," Shohat told the jury in closing arguments. 'This is not a case of sending a message to anyone. . . . This is not to solve corruption in Monroe County. The facts in this case scream out for `not guilty.' Put an end to Jim's nightmare of the last four years."

A `REAL TRAGEDY'

For Shirley Freeman, who was county mayor when Hendrick was hired as county attorney in 1995, the case was a "real tragedy," but an all-too-familiar one in a county where there's a major corruption scandal almost every decade.

"Jimmy is absolutely brilliant and highly, highly skilled. Unfortunately, though, sometimes power does corrupt," she said. ``At least he won't be around for awhile, pushing bad development."

Authorities Search For Gunman Who Abducted A Florida Boy (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0136858

By Lynn Waddell

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

PARRISH, Fla., Feb. 23 — A 13-year-old boy was abducted at gunpoint at a school bus stop on Friday morning and was found hours later in a wooded area where he had been left bound by his captor.

Sheriff Charles B. Wells of Manatee County said the gunman drove the boy, Clay Moore, to a large cattle ranch about 20 miles away from his neighborhood in the quiet Kingsfield Lakes subdivision on the outskirts of Parrish, near Tampa. His abductor eventually left. About two hours later, Clay, who had been tied up, was able to escape and walk until he came across a farm worker who let him use a cellphone to call his mother.

"It's miraculous, to tell the truth," Mr. Wells said. "Many people that have been bound similar to him have not been able to get free."

The gunman, who was driving an old red pickup, remained at large.

Clay was riding a skateboard about 9 a.m. while waiting for his school bus with four other youths when the truck pulled up, and the dark-haired young man driving it ordered him inside, said one of the four, Rabah Jaffal, 14.

"Clay kept saying 'What, sir? I don't know you. Leave me alone,' " Rabah said. The abductor "started getting angry, and that's when he pulled out the gun."

Three of the students ran home and called the police, who immediately began a manhunt involving the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the state police and surrounding counties' law enforcement.

"We all said earlier if there was any way out of the situation, Clay would find it," said Greg Moore, Clay's uncle.

FBI Agents Pose As Mobsters, Sting Florida Cops (AP)

AP, February 24, 2007

FORT LAUDERDALE, Florida (AP) -- Four veteran police officers were accused in federal court of taking thousands of dollars to protect what they thought were mob shipments of drugs, stolen art and jewelry.

Three of the officers made initial court appearances Friday and were ordered released on bond. The fourth was in the process of turning himself in and would likely appear next week, federal prosecutors said.

All serve in Hollywood, just south of Fort Lauderdale.

An FBI affidavit filed in federal court accused the four of taking thousands of dollars to protect a group they thought was a criminal organization based out of New York. The "mobsters" were undercover FBI agents during a two-year corruption sting.

Federal prosecutors said the operations included escorting a load of heroin from Miami Beach, providing security for an illegal poker game aboard a yacht and delivering $1 million worth of supposedly stolen diamonds to New Jersey.

Other deals involved purportedly stolen bearer bonds, watches, paintings and a tractor-trailer load of cigarettes, prosecutors said.

The four officers were charged with conspiracy. They have not entered pleas, and the case will go before a grand jury. All have been placed on leave without pay.

Lawyers for the three who appeared in court -- Detective Kevin Companion, 41; Sgt. Jeffrey Courtney, 51; and Officer Stephen Harrison, 46 -- declined comment on the charges but described their clients as devoted police officers and family men.

The fourth accused officer is Detective Thomas Simcox, 50.

Each would face up to life imprisonment if convicted of drug trafficking conspiracy and up to 20 years in prison if convicted of conspiracy.

Chief: Probe Of Hollywood Cops Halted Early (MH)

By Dan Christensen And Todd Wright

The Miami Herald, February 24, 2007

A two-year federal undercover probe that led to corruption charges against four Hollywood police officers was shut down prematurely after two of those officers learned they were under investigation, according to Hollywood Police Chief James Scarberry.

More officers are under suspicion, Scarberry said Friday.

The chief said he found out the investigation was blown Thursday -- hours before the FBI swooped in and arrested Officers Kevin Companion, Jeffry Courtney and Stephen Harrison. Officer Thomas Simcox, who is cooperating, was picked up a month ago, Scarberry said.

"We called the FBI immediately yesterday after we found out that Companion and Courtney were at the pension office. They both called in sick all week and were putting in their letters of resignation," Scarberry said.

Harrison was unaware of the investigation when he was arrested, Scarberry said.

Federal corruption charges against the officers include a range of criminal activity that includes extortion, bribe-taking, dealing in stolen property, protecting a crooked, high-stakes card game, cargo theft and transporting a multi-kilo load of heroin.

One officer allegedly used his marked police motorcycle to provide a security escort for what he thought was a shipment of $400,000 in proceeds from the sale of stolen diamonds, authorities said.

The officers face maximum sentences of life in prison and fines up to $4 million if convicted on the drug trafficking charges. In addition, they face up to 20 years for each alleged use of their police positions for extortion.

During the two-year probe by the U.S. attorney and the FBI -- dubbed "Tarnished Badge" -- undercover agents convinced the officers that they were members of a New York crime family.

LEADER OF THE GROUP

According to agents, Companion, 41 -- a sworn Hollywood officer for more than two decades -- was the leader of the group of crooked cops and recruited the others for illegal capers.

Many of the meetings between Companion and the agents were audiotaped and videotaped, revealing a veteran officer eager to use his badge for illegal profit.

In March 2005, Companion was videotaped meeting with agents at the Borgata Hotel in Atlantic City.

At that time, agents said they needed more officers and an unmarked police car to protect a large amount of cash collected from the sale of stolen diamonds.

Companion was interested and told them he knew of some "old-school" guys whom he could approach for assistance.

In exchange for cash, Companion and others protected the collection of illegal gambling debts and the fencing of stolen watches; they personally delivered $400,000 in bearer bonds and a tractor-trailer full of cigarettes; and they protected a rigged, high-stakes poker game on a yacht.

But the crimes they are accused of did not appear that lucrative, compared to the hefty pensions and retirement benefits that were at risk if the cops were caught.

At a press conference on Friday, U.S. attorney Alexander Acosta indicated that during the investigation, Companion received $42,000; Courtney, 51, received $22,000; Simcox, 50, received $16,000; and Harrison, 46, received $12,000.

"There is some indication from the FBI that other names were brought up in the investigation," Scarberry said. "They were officers they never met but were supposedly also available [to join the criminal scheme] if needed," he said.

TO REVIEW TAPES

Scarberry plans to review FBI video and audio tapes that might shed light on which other officers might have been involved, he said.

And an FBI press release confirmed the agency would continue to investigate, ``targeting ongoing corruption within the Hollywood Police Department."

But that will be harder now that the investigation has been made public.

Scarberry said he knows how Courtney and Companion learned of the investigation, but he declined to discuss it.

"That's part of the FBI's investigation," he said.

A ranking federal law enforcement source said Scarberry and his assistant were the only outsiders taken into their confidence. They were told "in no uncertain terms" that they must not reveal what they knew, the source said.

But Scarberry immediately told City Manager Cameron Benson about the probe and revealed it to Hollywood Mayor Mara Giulianti a few days later.

"I think it is appropriate when something this big is happening I know about it," Benson said. ``The chief has got to inform me because I am the boss and the mayor is my boss, and I have to let my bosses know."

DOJ_NMG_0136860

UNAWARE OF ORDERS

Benson said he was unaware that Scarberry had been told by the FBI to keep quiet.

Federal agents decided to tell Scarberry about the investigation about a month ago as part of an attempt to get Simcox to flip and cooperate, the federal source said.

Simcox, accompanied by the chief, went to FBI headquarters on a ruse. It wasn't long before Simcox began implicating other officers, the source said.

When the FBI learned Thursday that the targets of their investigation had learned about it, agents moved in quickly.

But Giulianti said the FBI is to blame if there was a leak that limited the agency's chance of snaring more crooked cops.

``To pick up the guy and not follow through . . . is their fault. They put their trust in a criminal."

Courtney, Harrison and Companion appeared in federal court Friday morning and pleaded not guilty. An arraignment is scheduled for March 15.

Officers Face Life In Prison For Running Diamonds, Drugs For Fake Mafia (FLSUNSEN)

By Brian Haas And Vanessa Blum, South Florida Sun-Sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, February 24, 2007

It started with one Hollywood police officer interested in doing the bidding of a New York crime family for cash, authorities said. As the stakes grew, they say he enlisted what he called some "old school" cops he knew would want in.

Federal authorities on Friday released detailed charges against four Hollywood officers in an investigation dubbed "Operation Tarnished Badge," accusing the four of protecting and transporting stolen diamonds, artwork, bonds and heroin for undercover FBI agents pretending to be involved in organized crime.

LocalLinks

The officers face up to life in prison for accepting sums of money authorities concede instead could have easily and legally been made with overtime. But the officers kept taking on riskier off-duty jobs for larger payouts, according to the federal complaint against them. Authorities said the four joked about being in the Mafia, promised to use their clout as police officers if they ran into trouble, and used police equipment and techniques to help the agents they thought were mobsters.

Identified as the ringleader was Detective Kevin Companion, 41, who met with undercover FBI agents in late 2004. He recruited Sgt. Jeffry Courtney, 51; Officer Stephen Harrison, 46; and Detective Thomas Simcox, 50. All are charged with extortion by using their public positions, and conspiracy and attempted possession of a controlled substance with the intent to distribute.

In total, the complaint says, Companion was paid $42,000; Courtney $22,000; Simcox $16,000; and Harrison $12,000. They each make between $66,000 and $89,000 a year in their police jobs.

Companion, Courtney and Harrison appeared before U.S. Magistrate Lurana Snow in federal count in Fort Lauderdale on Friday morning. All three looked dejected. Companion, hands cuffed, dabbed at tears with his sleeves. Snow set bond at $350,000 for Companion; $375,000 for Courtney; and $300,000 for Harrison. None of them had posted bail early Friday night, detention officials said. Simcox has not yet been arrested.

Companion's attorney René Sotorrío called the charges "a horrible tragedy" for his client's family, which has a tradition in law enforcement, but he declined to comment on the charges. Courtney's and Harrison's attorneys could not be reached for comment later Friday.

Simcox may turn himself in to federal authorities as soon as Monday, said his attorney, Bruce Udolf. Udolf declined to comment on the charges or say whether Simcox is cooperating with authorities.

The FBI received "information based on reliable sources" about illegal activity at the department about 21/2 years ago, U.S. Attorney Alex Acosta said at a news conference in Fort Lauderdale. Authorities declined to describe the information, but said Companion first met with an undercover agent in December 2004. The jobs were small at first: collection of an illegal gambling debt, protecting the sale of stolen watches.

To pull off more lucrative deals, agents told Companion he needed more muscle, according to the federal complaint. Companion replied he knew some "old school guys" willing to do the jobs, the complaint says.

DOJ_NMG_0136861

Companion recruited Courtney, according to authorities, and Courtney helped in April 2005 to escort $400,000 in stolen money through Broward County with his Hollywood Police Department-issued motorcycle. Two months later, authorities said, Companion and Courtney drove $400,000 in stolen bonds to New York City. On the way, the duo passed a car with a license plate that read "mafia guy." The two later joked to agents that the officers "should have been riding in that vehicle," authorities said.

Companion brought in Simcox and Harrison in November 2005 and in the following months the officers protected an illegal, high-stakes gambling operation, delivered $1 million in stolen diamonds and artwork to Atlantic City, N.J., and helped steal a truckload of cigarettes, authorities said.

On Nov. 29, 2006, the officers agreed to escort several kilos of heroin from Miami Beach through Broward , the complaint says. Authorities said that at a meeting with an agent at a Miami Beach hotel, Simcox would only discuss the deal on the balcony. One officer, who was not named, wanted them to use the codeword "jewelry" for drugs.

The deal took place without a hitch the next day, authorities said.

Authorities said they had video and audio recordings of nearly every meeting and job the officers did. Acosta said no one was hurt during the sting.

Hollywood police officers openly wept when they heard of news of the arrests Thursday, said Police Chief Jim Scarberry. Three of the four officers have faced departmental scrutiny before.

"They're as sickened about this as I was when I first heard about it," Scarberry said. Scarberry, who was named chief in 1999, said later, "We know there have been some problems, but we've worked hard to change the culture here, and there is a big difference."

Companion was named in a federal sexual harassment lawsuit filed in 1994, which the city settled with a woman for $205,000. Courtney's hiring came under fire after a 1995 department-wide investigation revealed he had been arrested twice. He also accidentally shot a sergeant in 1991 while working as a Pembroke Pines officer.

Simcox was convicted of battery in 1996 for grabbing and slapping a 9-year-old boy who mocked him at a Boynton Beach daycare center while the officer was off duty. The incident led to a one-month suspension from the department without pay and he was kicked off a countywide organized crime taskforce.

Douglas K. Haas, a former Fort Lauderdale lieutenant and Broward Sheriff's Office lieutenant colonel, ran the now-disbanded Metropolitan Organized Crime Intelligence Unit and said Simcox was on the taskforce for less than a year.

"He wasn't in a position at MIU where he could have hurt us," Haas said. "But it's still disconcerting."

Staff Writers Paula McMahon and John Holland contributed to this report.

Area Man Faces Charges In FBI Sting (PALMBEACHP)

By Michael LaForgia, Palm Beach Post Staff Writer

Palm Beach Post (FL), February 24, 2007

A suburban Boynton Beach man is among four Hollywood police officers accused of taking money to run errands for FBI agents posing as mobsters.

During a two-year sting operation, the undercover agents paid Detective Thomas Joseph Simcox and three others to provide security for an illegal, high-stakes poker game, transport stolen diamonds and art to Atlantic City, N.J., and protect the theft of a tractor-trailer load of cigarettes, according to an FBI affidavit filed in federal court. All four officers also agreed to protect a multi-kilo heroin shipment, court records show.

Simcox, who bought a house in suburban Boynton Beach with his wife in 1989, is making arrangements to turn himself in to federal authorities next week, his attorney said Friday.

"I believe that he should be surrendering Monday," said Bruce Udolf, the Fort Lauderdale attorney representing Simcox.

Simcox, a detective assigned to the family services unit, joined the Hollywood Police Department in 1982, the affidavit said.

The other three detectives facing charges - Detective Kevin Companion, 41; Sgt. Jeffry Courtney, 51; and Officer Stephen Harrison, 46 - made initial court appearances Friday and were ordered released on bond.

DOJ_NMG_0136862

The affidavit filed in federal court accused the four of taking thousands of dollars to protect a group they thought was a criminal organization based out of New York. The "criminal organization" was made up of undercover FBI agents conducting a two-year corruption sting.

The four officers face conspiracy charges. They have not entered pleas, and the case will go before a grand jury.

Lawyers for the three who appeared in court Friday declined comment on the charges but described their clients as devoted police officers and family men.

Ex-FBI Man Gets 7 Years For Child Sex (FREDFLS)

By Bill Freehling

Fredericksburg Free Lance-Star, February 24, 2007

Former FBI analyst sentenced in child sex case

A 17-year veteran of the FBI will serve seven years in prison for having sexual relations with a young girl in Spotsylvania County, a judge ruled yesterday.

Anthony John Lesko, 44, entered an Alford plea yesterday in Spotsylvania Circuit Court to nine counts of felony indecent liberties upon a child.

Lesko, who later moved to Jacksonville, Fla., worked as an intelligence analyst at the FBI for 17 years, according to his attorney, James A. Carter II. He is a major in the U.S. Army Reserves and has received numerous military awards.

An Alford plea means Lesko doesn't admit guilt but believes there is enough evidence for a conviction. Under the terms of the plea, he was sentenced to seven years in prison with another 15 years suspended.

Lesko engaged in a sex act with a girl, 9 and 10 at the time, at least nine times in 2003-2004, according to evidence put forth by Spotsylvania Commonwealth's Attorney William Neely.

The girl told a member of the Spotsylvania Department of Social Services about the activity in February 2004, according to the evidence. Lesko at first denied the allegations, but later spoke with a U.S. Navy counselor about them.

Lesko told the counselor that he was the victim of the sexual assault; he said the girl initiated the contact, according to the plea. Lesko entered the plea partly to spare the girl the pain of a trial, his attorney said.

Lesko is married with two sons. His wife asked Circuit Judge Ann Hunter Simpson to allow Lesko to delay reporting to prison until June 1 so he could sell their Florida house.

Simpson denied the request, and Lesko went to jail after yesterday's hearing.

In addition to serving the prison time, Lesko will have to pay up to $10,000 in restitution to the girl's parents to cover the cost of her mental-health counseling.

Bill Freehling: 540/374-5424

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Gonzales' Spiel Riles Some Christians (UPI)

UPI, February 23, 2007

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' Feb. 20 announcement to Southern Baptist Convention leaders about a new Justice Department focus on religious freedom garnered some praise — and significant criticism — from other Christian leaders. Gonzales announced the launch of the department's "First Freedom Project" in a speech during a regularly scheduled SBC Executive Committee meeting.

"Religious freedom is a fundamental part of our nation's history and one of its core principles," Gonzales said. The effort will include educational efforts to inform government officials, employers and everyday Americans about their religious-liberty rights under law, Associated Baptist Press reported Thursday.

The department simultaneously released a 43-page report touting its record, under President Bush, in defending religious freedom. Gonzales and the report implied that the Bush Justice Department's record on prosecuting religious-discrimination cases was significantly stronger than that under former President Bill Clinton.

DOJ_NMG_0136863

But several in the religious-liberty community said Bush's record on the issue has been mixed, at best. Brent Walker, executive director of the Washington-based Baptist Joint Committee for Religious Liberty, said he appreciates the administration focusing on the First Amendment — but that the amendment covers two aspects of religious freedom that are inextricably linked to each other.

"The First Amendment has two protections for religious freedom — prohibition on religious establishments and protection for free exercise of religion," Walker said in a statement provided to Associated Baptist Press. "The administration has often ignored the importance of the no-establishment principle by supporting attempts of governments to endorse a religious message, using tax dollars to fund pervasively religious organizations, allowing religious discrimination in hiring for federally funded projects, and going to the Supreme Court to cut back on the rights of citizens to challenge such practices."

Walker also noted that Bush's record on free-exercise protections is "not perfect." He pointed to a Supreme Court case last year in which the administration attempted to limit a small religious sect's ability to use hallucinogenic tea for sacramental purposes. A unanimous Supreme Court rejected the administration's position.

Americans United for Separation of Church and State went further, releasing a statement Feb. 22 saying Gonzales' announcement "reeks of hypocrisy." It called attention to actions detailed in the report that the Justice Department touts as religious-freedom successes — but that are actually quite controversial in the religious-liberty community.

For instance, the report features cases in which the department argued for employees who had been discriminated against on the basis of religion. But, in a different section, the report also touted the Justice Department's advocacy on behalf of the Salvation Army, which was sued for using government social-service funds but continuing to take religion into account in its hiring decisions.

"Thanks to the Justice Department, the Salvation Army could literally place newspaper ads reading, 'Help Wanted for Government-Funded Jobs: No Jews, Buddhists, Muslims, Liberal Christians, Atheists Or Gays Need Apply' and this would be perfectly acceptable to Gonzales," said Barry Lynn, the executive director of Americans United. "This is a perverse way of supposedly defending our religious-freedom rights."

On the other side of the coin, a conservative Christian group praised Gonzales' announcement.

"We applaud Attorney General Gonzales for recognizing the ongoing threat to religious freedom and for taking firm steps to defend our 'first freedom,'" wrote Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council, in his Feb. 21 e-mail newsletter. And the head of the SBC's public-affairs agency praised the actions of the Bush Justice Department.

"The attorney general's desire to address a major meeting of SBC leaders to announce this initiative shows both the importance of the issue and the commitment of the Justice Department at the highest levels to defend every individual American's religious freedom rights, particularly their free-exercise rights, which are too often infringed," Baptist Press quoted Richard Land, president of the SBC Ethics and Religious Liberty Commission, as saying. "This initiative is needed and should make a real difference."

But others questioned Gonzales' choice of settings for the announcement. He said he sought out SBC leaders for the opportunity because of their historic support of religious liberty.

The head of the National Council of Churches said he wished the attorney general had chosen a more representative body to hear his announcement. SBC leaders have been among Bush's strongest and most consistent supporters.

NCC General Secretary Bob Edgar, in a statement prepared in response to an ABP reporter's request for comment, said his organization thinks it is "unsettling that only a single denomination, representing a fraction of the rich diversity of religious life of America, was selected to receive the attorney general's personal presentation. It would seem more appropriate had he made such an appearance before an ecumenical or interfaith gathering, symbolically underlining the vision of a nation in which the law plays no favorites but sees all faiths as equal before the Constitution."

After his speech, in response to a question, Gonzales told reporters he chose an audience of Southern Baptists to announce the government's new effort because "this is a group very interested in the protection of religious freedom." He noted the "timing worked out where this was a good venue to speak to a receptive audience."

Baptists in America were early champions of religious liberty and influenced the development of the Constitution's First Amendment, which guarantees religious liberty and other freedoms.

DOJ_NMG_0136864

Gonzales also granted an interview on the topic to The 700 Club, the television program hosted by Christian Coalition founder Pat Robertson.

The NCC's statement said Edgar had invited Gonzales to appear at the NCC Committee on Religious Liberty meeting, slated for March 12 in Washington, to "extend to this very diverse group of interfaith advocates for religious freedom the same courtesy of a face-to-face visit that he has already extended to the Southern Baptist Convention."

The NCC also encouraged Gonzales to make similar appearances before leaders of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, the National Association of Evangelicals and "Jewish and Muslim faith groups who together make up the complex tapestry of religious life in our nation."

One religious-liberty expert faulted Gonzales' implicit swipes at the Justice Department under Clinton. Wake Forest Divinity School professor James Dunn said that, while the Clinton administration may have pursued fewer legal cases against alleged religious discrimination than Bush, the former president and his appointees defended religious freedom in other significant ways.

Dunn, who was executive director of the Baptist Joint Committee during the Clinton years, noted that the former president pushed strongly to improve religious freedom. Besides pushing legislation like the Religious Freedom Restoration Act and the bill that established the United States Commission on International Religious Freedom, Clinton officials also produced a document that has had a concrete impact on religion in public schools, Dunn said.

"Perhaps ... the most extensive and statistically significant action for religious freedom in recent history was [Clinton's] aggressive promotion for the guidelines for religion in public education and making clear that the public school was not a religion-free zone," Dunn said.

"Not only did the White House give leadership in that regard, but the Justice Department ... and the Education Department developed guidelines that literally transformed the attitudes of public educators about the free expression of religion in public schools and the necessity for maintaining the separation of church and state at the same time," he continued.

Officials from the Justice Department did not immediately return an ABP reporter's request for comment for this story Thursday.

FBI May Reopen Cold Cases On 1950s And '60s Slayings In The South (AP)

AP, February 24, 2007

JACKSON, Miss. (AP) — The FBI is considering reopening dozens of cold cases involving slayings suspected of being racially motivated in the South during the 1950s and '60s.

An announcement could come as early as Tuesday, according to a law enforcement official who spoke with the Associated Press on condition of anonymity because the plans have not yet been finalized.

In addition to the FBI's own investigations, the Southern Poverty Law Center submitted its own list last week of 74 potential unsolved slayings that involved white-on-black violence.

Thirty-two of the deaths happened in Mississippi. The others were in Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Tennessee, Louisiana, North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida, Kentucky and New York.

Mark Potok, director of the Intelligence Project for the Alabama-based Southern Poverty Law Center, said each case was researched in the late 1980s when the group was putting together a civil rights memorial. But it is unclear if each could be considered a civil rights case, he said.

"The truth is we don't know," said Potok, whose group investigates hate crimes. "In each case there was some evidence to suggest that these were racial murders, but it absolutely was not proven. Had we been able to nail them down, their names would've been literally chiseled into the civil rights memorial that sits outside our building here."

U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton in Jackson reviewed the list of Mississippi killings for the Associated Press on Friday and said based on the limited amount of information available that none would qualify for federal prosecution under civil rights statutes. But he said many could still be prosecuted on a local or state level as murders.

The deaths outlined by the center happened in a variety of ways, from police-involved shootings to trysts with white women broken up by gunfire.

DOJ_NMG_0136865

In most cases, the statute of limitations under federal civil rights laws will have run out, Lampton said. In others, charges could not be brought because the accused already have faced charges and been cleared by a jury.

Last month, FBI Director Robert Mueller said the bureau was aggressively seeking to solve cold civil rights cases, vowing to "pursue justice to the end, and we will, no matter how long it takes, until every living suspect is called to answer for their crimes."

Most recently federal prosecutors brought kidnapping and conspiracy charges against James Ford Seale, 71, who allegedly participated in the 1964 kidnappings and murders of Charles Eddie Moore and Henry Hezekiah Dee in southwest Mississippi.

Seale was arrested Jan. 24 after the U.S. Justice Department reopened its investigation and learned that he was still alive. He has pleaded not guilty and is due for trial in April. The case qualified for federal prosecution because the captors allegedly took Moore and Dee across the state line into Louisiana while they were still alive.

In 1994, Mississippi won the conviction of Byron de la Beckwith for the 1963 sniper killing of NAACP leader Medgar Evers.

In Alabama, Bobby Frank Cherry was convicted in 2002 of killing four black girls in the bombing of a Birmingham church in 1963. In 2001, Thomas Blanton was convicted.

Edgar Ray Killen, an 80-year-old former Ku Klux Klansman, was convicted last June of manslaughter in the killings of three civil rights workers in Mississippi in 1964.

Lara Jakes Jordan in Washington, D.C., contributed to this report.

FBI Building Database On Victims Slain Amid Civil Rights-era Violence (JCL)

By Jerry Mitchell

Jackson Clairon-Ledger, February 24, 2007

The list of "forgotten killings" from the nation's civil rights era continues to grow for the Justice Department.

The FBI's field offices already have compiled a list of 51 victims slain during that era. The Montgomery-based Southern Poverty Law Center has since turned over information on 74 victims to the FBI. Altogether, the center has collected the names of 127 victims of racial violence between 1954 and 1968 - 40 of them listed on a monument outside the center.

"We ask that the FBI use its considerable investigatory resources to uncover more information about these cases," Richard Cohen, president for the center, wrote the Civil Rights Unit of the Criminal Investigative Division of the FBI. "Those responsible for these forgotten deaths - those who may still be alive today, like James Ford Seale, who was recently arrested for the murders of Henry Hezekiah Dee and Charles Eddie Moore - have gone unpunished too long."

U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton said last week: "As we've shown in the past, we'll investigate any case that comes to light."

Since 2005, he has worked closely with the FBI to piece together a case against Seale, who has pleaded not guilty to federal kidnapping and conspiracy charges in connection with the May 2, 1964, killings of Dee and Moore, who were hitchhiking when Klansmen reportedly picked them up, beat them, weighted them down and tossed them into the Mississippi River, where they drowned.

Seale's arrest marked the 28th in the nation since 1989 involving unpunished killings from the civil-rights era. The most recent of the 22 convictions came in 2005 when a Neshoba County jury convicted Edgar Ray Killen of Union of orchestrating the 1964 killings of Andrew Goodman, Michael Schwerner and James Chaney.

Congress now is debating the Emmett Till Unsolved Civil Rights Crime Act, which would create a cold-case unit for the Justice Department to re-examine these murders. The House version of the bill has 67 co-sponsors, led by U.S. Reps. John Lewis, D-Ga., and Kenny Hulshof, R-Mo.

Creating such a unit is important, Cohen said. "For too long, people thought that nothing could be done about those who had literally gotten away with murder during the civil-rights era. But as we've seen in recent years with the successful prosecutions of murderers like Edgar Ray Killen, Dr. King was right when he said that the moral arc of the universe bends toward justice."

One of the forgotten killings Cohen pointed out to the FBI is that of Clinton Melton, an African-American service station attendant shot to death Dec. 3, 1955, in Glendora. Elmer Otis Kimbell, a white man, was tried and acquitted of killing Melton.

DOJ_NMG_0136866

Melton's son, Kenneth, was 5 months old when his father was slain. Two months later, his mother was found drowned - a death his family questioned.

"We live it every day," said Kenneth Melton, now 51 and living in Memphis. "You see people with their mothers and fathers. All that was taken away."

Growing up in the Delta, "I wanted to find the person who killed my dad - not to do anything, but to ask him, 'Why?' " he said. "That was something always on my mind."

He never got the chance, he said, because he heard Kimbell died in 1976 in Tennessee.

Kimbell happened to be the best friend of J.W. Milam, one of the killers of Till, a 14-year-old from Chicago who was murdered after he reportedly wolf-whistled at a white woman. In fact, the car Kimbell reportedly was driving when he shot Clinton Melton belonged to Milam.

At trial, Kimbell insisted he shot Clinton Melton in self-defense after being fired on first, but Melton's white employer, Lee McGarrh, testified at Kimbell's trial that Melton had no weapon.

McGarrh said an argument began after Kimbell, who had been drinking, asked Melton to fill the car with gas, only to change his mind and say he'd only pay $2.

A black employee, John Henry Wilson, testified Kimbell had said he was "going to kill that n-." Wilson said he tried to dissuade the man, only to be told, "Get back, or I'll kill you, too."

McGarrh testified Kimbell returned with a weapon and killed Melton without provocation.

The local Lions' Club denounced the killing, but that didn't stop an all-white jury from doing the same thing for Kimbell that it did for Milam and Roy Bryant - letting them walk free from the Tallahatchie County Courthouse.

David Halberstam covered the trial as a 21-year-old freelancer, one of the few journalists to cover the trial.

In his April 19, 1956, article for The Reporter, Halberstam wrote, "There's open season on the Negroes now. They've got no protection, and any peckerwood who wants can go out and shoot himself one, and we'll free him." (The entire article can be read at clarionledger.com.)

The trial taught "you didn't have to be a civil rights activist" to wind up dead, Halberstam said in an interview last week. "If someone was ill-tempered, it was a free-fire zone."

He talked of the "cowardice" of those who killed Melton. "It wasn't just Kimbell," he said. "It was all the people who were complicit - the jury and the ones who defended him."

Federal Supervision Of Race In Little Rock Schools Ends (NYT)

By Steve Barnes

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

LITTLE ROCK, Ark., Feb. 23 — The Little Rock School District was released on Friday from federal court supervision of its desegregation efforts, almost 50 years after President Dwight D. Eisenhower dispatched federal troops to enforce an integration order that the Arkansas governor defied.

In a written order, Judge William R. Wilson Jr. of Federal District Court declared the district “unitary.” That meant it had met its obligations under court-ordered remedies to address lingering questions about its commitment to equal opportunity in education.

Judge Wilson said the school board could “now operate the district as it sees fit, answerable to no one” save its students, patrons and voters.

Superintendent Roy G. Brooks, who is black, told The Associated Press, “I think that this is a clear indication that 1957 is not 2007.”

But John W. Walker, a civil rights lawyer here who is counsel to the Joshua Intervenors, a group of black children and parents who were a party in the long-running case, disagreed.

“In 2007, we have people in neckties living in big houses celebrating the return to 1957, a return to the concept of white supremacy,” Mr. Walker said in an interview.

DOJ_NMG_0136867

In 1957, Gov. Orval E. Faubus, a conservative Democrat, resisted the federal court order to desegregate Central High School by surrounding it with National Guardsmen who blocked the entry of nine black students. Eisenhower responded by federalizing the Guard troops and sending paratroopers from the 101st Airborne Division.

The black pupils were admitted to classes, with the military providing security on campus for the duration of the school year.

The confrontation was a seminal part of the civil rights movement. It was followed by decades of litigation that devoured millions of dollars in legal fees and went through several judges, dozens of school board members and more than one superintendent.

Judge Wilson granted the district —the largest in Arkansas, with 27,000 pupils — conditional release from supervision several months ago, but retained jurisdiction until it could demonstrate a resolve to monitor progress in reducing racial disparity in student achievement.

The order on Friday said the district "has gone the extra mile" in doing so.

Mr. Walker said he had not decided whether to appeal the order.

Arkansas' Historic School Case Ends (AP)

By Andrew Demillo, Associated Press

AP, February 24, 2007

LITTLE ROCK, Ark. -- A judge in one of the nation's longest-running school desegregation cases released the Little Rock district from federal supervision yesterday, nearly 50 years after President Dwight D. Eisenhower sent in troops to escort nine black students into all-white Central High.

U.S. District Judge William R. Wilson Jr. said the district is substantially complying with a 1998 desegregation plan worked out in the 27,000-student district.

With blacks gaining a majority on the school board last September, the judge said he felt comfortable that the district would keep working to improve academic achievements among its 19,000 black students.

In 1957, despite a U.S. Supreme Court order, Gov. Orval Faubus tried to prevent black students from enrolling at Central High, setting off one of the biggest crises of the civil rights era. The president sent in the 101st Airborne to enforce the order.

"The district has been given back to the people of this community, and my pledge to them is to continue to work hard and recognize that we're all going to have to work hard," said Superintendent Roy Brooks, who is black. "I think that this is a clear indication that 1957 is not 2007."

The 1998 desegregation plan was negotiated among the district, federal monitors and a group called the Joshua Intervenors, which represented black students. Judge Wilson noted that another nine years had passed before its conditions were satisfied.

"LRSD's board can now operate the district as it sees fit; answerable to no one except LRSD's students and patrons and the voters who elected [the board] to office," he wrote. "I want to express my heartfelt best wishes as LRSD continues to operate, as our Founders intended, under control of the citizens of the City of Little Rock."

A final sticking point among the parties had been whether the district adequately assessed black achievement in its academic programs.

"I am optimistic that the board will continue to ensure that the comprehensive program assessment progress remains a permanent part of [the school district's] curriculum for as long as it takes to improve the academic achievement of African-American students," Judge Wilson wrote.

Under previous orders from Judge Wilson, the Little Rock district was to evaluate its academic programs annually to determine whether test scores among black students were rising. The judge said yesterday he was now satisfied with the response, which included the board's December resolution that it would continue evaluations even if Judge Wilson released it from monitoring.

The Little Rock district is now 70 percent black; Central High School is 53 percent black.

John Walker, a lawyer for the Joshua Intervenors, said black students would not be served by the ruling.

DOJ_NMG_0136868

"We're certainly disappointed in view of the lack of progress this district has made in addressing the needs of African-American students," he said. "The standard was not high for the district to meet, but they certainly have not met it. We will have to pursue other means."

In Little Rock, as is the case nationwide, black students on average score below their white classmates on standardized tests. The gap in Little Rock is as large as 40 points on both state and national standardized tests. Little Rock has seen some improvement.

Board member Michael Daugherty said the district must spend its money to close the achievement gap among students.

"I would have liked to have seen us a little bit farther along right now than where we are," said Mr. Daugherty, who is black. "I think the district needs to be further along in the allocation of resources in the district."

School board member Baker Kurrus, who is white, called Judge Wilson's decision "a well-deserved endorsement."

"We have to prove that we're capable of managing our district and make sure that the mistakes of the past are never repeated," Mr. Kurrus said. "We simply must reach all students in our district."

Rhode Island Official OKs Gay 'Marriage' (WT)

By Cheryl Wetzstein, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 24, 2007

Rhode Island Attorney General Patrick Lynch says research persuaded him to decide that Rhode Island can recognize same-sex "marriages" from Massachusetts -- not his sister's recent same-sex union in Massachusetts.

"No disrespect to my sister, who I love very much, but it has zero impact on it," Mr. Lynch told the Providence (R.I.) Journal last week, saying his nonbinding legal opinion made on Wednesday was well researched and based on a 1904 Rhode Island State Supreme Court ruling on interstate marriage.

On Feb. 15, Mr. Lynch attended the "marriage" ceremony in Attleboro, Mass., of his older sister, Pawtucket, R.I., City Solicitor Margaret Lynch, and her longtime partner, Patricia Gadaleta. The women have twin daughters.

On Wednesday, Mr. Lynch issued a six-page opinion to the Rhode Island Board of Governors for Higher Education that said their homosexual employees who have "married" in Massachusetts should be treated as spouses.

"Rhode Island has not enacted any legislation prohibiting same-sex marriages or stating a public policy against same-sex marriage, even though they have been validly performed in neighboring Massachusetts for approximately three years," Mr. Lynch wrote.

Mr. Lynch later said his opinion was "essentially guidance" and nonbinding. However, Steven Maurano, a spokesman for the Board of Governors, which oversees higher education in Rhode Island, said the board intends to follow Mr. Lynch's advice.

Bishop Thomas Tobin of the Catholic Diocese of Providence criticized Mr. Lynch's opinion as being overly influenced by a "relentless gay agenda."

Raymond T. McKay, president of the Rhode Island Republican Assembly, said Mr. Lynch should have deferred to lawmakers or federal law, specifically, the 1996 Defense of Marriage Act, which says states do not have to recognize same-sex unions from other states. "This is a great miscarriage of justice and law by the individual who is charged with the responsibility of enforcing Rhode Island law and protecting our state constitution," Mr. McKay said.

Meanwhile, in other states:

•Wyoming House Speaker Roy Cohee, a Republican, on Thursday cast the committee vote that killed a constitutional amendment defining marriage as the union of one man and one woman. The measure had passed the Senate last month.

•Illinois state Rep. Greg Harris, a Democrat who is openly homosexual, introduced a bill on Thursday to legalize marriage between "two persons," rather than a man and a woman, in that state.

•In Maryland, hearings are scheduled for early March on constitutional marriage amendments offered in the Senate and House. Both bills define marriage as the union of one man and one woman but do not outlaw civil unions. The House bill also bars public schools from teaching about same-sex relationships.

Protecting All Students (NYT)

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0136869

Like all too many school districts, Toms River, N.J., has done a poor job of protecting gay students from bullying. According to the New Jersey Supreme Court, the district punished students for being one minute late for class, but made harassing another child for being gay punishable only after a third offense.

In a landmark ruling this week, the court unanimously held that public school districts like Toms River's are liable for damages if they fail to take reasonable steps to stop prolonged anti-gay harassment of a student by another student. It correctly found that students had a right to be protected against this sort of abuse.

The decision changes the legal landscape in New Jersey, and we hope it will be the start of a new national approach to the problem.

A study by the National Mental Health Association a few years ago found that more than three-quarters of teenagers reported that students who were gay or thought to be gay were teased and bullied in their schools and communities.

The anonymous student who brought the suit against Toms River schools clearly deserved better. He complained of being taunted almost daily from fourth grade on. In high school, he was physically attacked twice, and he said he eventually had to change schools. School administrators disciplined the worst offenders, but failed to address the overall school climate by taking such basic steps as talking to parents and holding student assemblies to make it clear that harassment would not be tolerated.

The court's ruling provides much-needed support to some of the nation's most vulnerable young people, and it sets a worthy standard for courts and educators nationwide.

ANTITRUST:

Buyout Firms Seek Utility TXU For $32 Billion (WSJ)

By Henny Sender, Dennis K. Berman And Rebecca Smith

The Wall Street Journal, February 24, 2007

KKR, TPG Pursue Texas Power Company, A Target of Criticism

Private-equity firms Texas Pacific Group and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. were close to a deal Friday night to acquire Texas utilities powerhouse TXU Corp. for about $32 billion, said people familiar with the matter, a massive buyout that would give them control of one of the nation's most successful and controversial power companies.

One person close to the matter said the firms would pay about $70 a share for the big utility, about $10 a share over Friday's 4 p.m. price of $60.02 on the New York Stock Exchange. The company also had $12.38 billion in debt as of September 30.

A deal could be finalized over the next few days, this person said, though it was possible it could fall apart at a late moment.

The transaction, first reported by CNBC, would be the latest massive deal engineered by private-equity firms. Enjoying record profits and a flood of cash from investors seeking ever-greater returns, the large investment firms have accounted for the majority of the biggest mergers and acquisitions in the last year. Among recent deals, Blackstone Group paid $23 billion for Equity Office Properties and assumed $16 billion of debt, while Bain Capital, KKR and Merrill Lynch & Co. paid $21 billion and assumed $11.7 billion in debt to acquire hospital operator HCA Inc. in 2006.

KKR, once known as the original barbarian at the gate for the $25 billion buyout of RJR Nabisco in 1988, is now the industry doyen, flush with cash and on a world-wide hunt for prey. "I have never seen a time like this when money is so available and so global," Henry Kravis, its co-founder, said in a recent interview.

For its part, Texas Pacific Group has a less venerable history and a policy of preferring to not be in the limelight its peers seek. It recently raised a $15 billion fund, which puts it in second place in asset size behind Blackstone's $20 billion fund -- at least for the moment.

Dallas-based TXU has emerged in recent years as one of the nation's dominant utilities by asserting itself aggressively over the deregulated electricity market in Texas. That state has what is considered the most advanced deregulation plan in the nation, having recently lifted most limits on what companies can charge the general public for electricity.

TXU owns both Texas's largest power-generation company and its biggest electricity retailer, giving it a powerful grip on one of the nation's largest markets. Its assets include the largest fleet of power plants in Texas and interests in a single nuclear plant. It also owns a transmission and distribution system and strip-coal mines with substantial reserves.

DOJ_NMG_0136870

That powerhouse combination of assets has produced big profits and strong returns for investors. In the third quarter of 2006, TXU earned net income of just more than $1 billion on revenue of $3.51 billion. The company's stock has made huge gains under Chief Executive C. John Wilder, with its shares increasing sixfold since he arrived three years ago.

But TXU also has stoked controversy in Texas over the rates it charges and an ambitious plan to build new power plants. That may require the buyers to make concessions in order to overcome regulatory hurdles.

Additionally, the company has been planning to expand by building 11 big coal-fired power plants in the state in coming years. That project has drawn harsh criticism from environmental interests, which accuse TXU of adding to its bulk with plants that release substantial amounts of carbon dioxide, a heat-trapping gas many scientists blame for global warming.

The company also has drawn criticism for its dealings with customers. During its ramp-up to a deregulated market, TXU raised rates repeatedly, and now charges some of the highest power rates in the nation. Critics say it also is quick to disconnect late-paying customers, while offering perks to those who pay on time.

Those factors have made TXU a flashpoint for criticism, especially in Texas. This past week, Mr. Wilder faced uncomfortable questioning before a Texas senate committee concerning whether his firm had amassed too much "market power," the ability to influence power prices. Legislators have been considering setting firmer limits on TXU's might, responding to market analyses suggesting that at times it possesses the ability to influence prices on the Texas wholesale electricity market.

Steve Wolens, a former legislator who is one of the authors of the Texas deregulation law, said he was disappointed by the buyout news. One goal of deregulation, he said, was to "discourage the need for in-state utilities to sell to out-of-state" interests.

The suitors may plan to address concerns in part by removing TXU from public ownership, said one person familiar with the matter. They also plan to scale back some of TXU's plans to build new generating plants and consider a rate rollback, the person said.

A person familiar with the proposed deal said the buyers plan to retain current management. TXU has been in exclusive negotiations with KKR and TPG in recent weeks, this person said. Such exclusivity makes a rival bid more difficult.

Private-equity firms have attracted scrutiny from shareholders and government regulators who claim the firms may be extracting too much value from publicly traded firms, leaving stockholders and customers in the lurch. A buyout plan will have to quell criticism while steering clear of legislators eager to politicize the issues.

Approval of a deal could take months and serve as a critical test for the suitability of private investors plunging ever deeper into highly regulated industries. Both state and federal officials would have to sign off, with state utility regulators finding that the sale was in the public interest.

Any deal appears likely to deliver a windfall to Mr. Wilder, who negotiated a lucrative contract when he joined TXU in February 2004 from neighboring utility Entergy Corp. Under the terms of that agreement, he could be eligible for a change in control payment.

The Texas market is especially appealing to investors because it is geographically constrained, with almost no electrical connections to other states. This makes the entire state a sort of captive market, unable to import cheaper electricity from outside. Because prices mostly are set by expensive gas-fired generators, this gives lower-cost generators like TXU the ability to reap extraordinary profits from its power-generation business.

Write to Henny Sender at henny.sender@wsj.com3, Dennis K. Berman at dennis.berman@wsj.com4 and Rebecca Smith at rebecca.smith@wsj.com5

At $45 Billion, New Contender For Top Buyout (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin And Clifford Krauss

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

The biggest leveraged buyout ever is about to be surpassed. Again.

A group led by the private equity giants Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company and the Texas Pacific Group is near a deal to acquire the TXU Corporation, a Texas utility, for about $45 billion, according to people involved in the talks.

The amount of private money that is being offered is a huge financial endorsement of the company's energy strategy. TXU has irritated environmental advocates by proposing to build 11 coal-fired power plants in Texas. Despite calls for regulating greenhouse gases, TXU has been the most aggressive in the power industry in pushing coal as the answer to growing electricity demands. Nationwide, power companies are planning to build about 150 coal plants over the next several years.

DOJ_NMG_0136871

The deal itself, if approved at a TXU board meeting tomorrow, would be a landmark. It would exceed the Blackstone Group's recent $39 billion acquisition of the office landlord Equity Office Properties, the largest buyout ever. And that would mean that Henry R. Kravis, a co-founder of Kohlberg Kravis Roberts, has managed to upstage, at least for the time being, his longtime rival in deals, Stephen A. Schwarzman, a co-founder of Blackstone.

Energy has been fairly recent territory for private equity. While energy deals accounted for 16 percent of all mergers last year, only 9 percent of those deals involved buyout firms, according to Thomson Financial. The first big foray came last year, when Kinder Morgan, the Texas pipeline giant that was created from some assets of the former Enron, was sold to a group that included Goldman Sachs, the American International Group, the Carlyle Group and Riverstone Holdings for $27.5 billion.

Awash in hundreds of billions of dollars, private equity firms, which raise money from pension funds and wealthy individuals, have taken on new targets in a buying spree. In 2006, private equity firms raised more than $174 billion for 205 funds, according to Thomson Financial.

Having just finished raising new supersize funds — K.K.R. and Blackstone are about to complete funds each worth more than $20 billion — and with banks and hedge funds willing to lend them money in record amounts with few restrictions or covenants, private equity has now begun to aim at even bigger prey. A deal the size of TXU will probably require that the private equity firms raise more than $30 billion in debt.

People involved in the talks cautioned that the deal still faced approval by TXU's board and several negotiating points remained, so the talks could collapse.

TXU did not respond to telephone requests for comment.

"It's a pretty dramatic development because TXU's position in electricity in Texas is controversial and uncertain," said Amy Myers Jaffe, an energy expert at the James A. Baker III Institute for Public Policy at Rice University in Houston.

TXU, based in Dallas, has 2.4 million customers in the state. It also owns and operates one of the largest lignite coal surface mining operations, producing 23 million tons a year. With its large, low-cost nuclear and coal-fired group of plants, it has been able to raise electricity prices to match the rise in natural gas prices the last three years.

Like other utility companies in recent years, TXU has sought to reinvent itself. A new management came in three years ago and sold natural gas assets after the price of natural gas soared, got out of speculative marketing, cleaned up its books and went back to its core business of electricity generation and transmission. The company's shares have been a favorite of Wall Street, rising from a low of $5.44 in 2002 to $60.02 yesterday.

But after being on the rise, the company has now hit strong headwinds. TXU's plans to build 11 coal-fired plants have faced increasing political opposition from environmental organizations, civic groups and prominent politicians like the mayor of Dallas, Laura Miller.

Rallies, hearings and informational meetings have been attracting crowds of critics around the state who view the plants as a symbol in the struggle to reduce global warming. Environmentalists believe if they can stop at least some of the plants in a conservative state like Texas, it will be a boon to activists around the country who oppose coal and favor renewable energy like solar and wind.

TXU has said that the growing population and economy in Texas need more energy and has claimed that the plants will be cleaner than many older coal-fired plants in the state. They have also argued that coal gasification technologies, which environmentalists say would produce cleaner energy, are not yet ready for the marketplace. The 11 plants would have a capacity of more than 9,000 megawatts, about 3.5 percent of the nation's current coal-fired power and would cost an estimated $10 billion.

Recently, in response to criticism, TXU promised that the new plants would leave vacant space for future deployment of equipment designed to capture carbon dioxide so the climate-warming gas does not enter the atmosphere. Moreover, the company says it is conducting research on oxygen firing, chilled ammonia and other technologies to capture carbon.

TXU's plan was dealt a sharp blow, at least for the short term, by State District Judge Stephen Yelenosky, who on Tuesday ruled against a 2005 executive order by Gov. Rick Perry to put the plants' permit process on a regulatory fast-track. The judge issued a temporary injunction stating that the Texas governor, whose powers are limited compared with most state governors, did not have the authority to decide how much time regulatory agencies should take before issuing decisions.

DOJ_NMG_0136872

The Texas Commission on Environmental Quality will make the ultimate decision on the permits, but not before administrative law hearings that promise to be rancorous.

Still, despite the uproar over the coal plants, TXU has many attractions for a potential buyer, analysts said. It is a strong company in a profitable business made all the more valuable because it operates in Texas, which has a growing economy and population base.

"Utilities right now have a lot of value because they have guaranteed cash flows and guaranteed rates of return which gives them guaranteed income," said Barbara Shook, an analyst with the Energy Intelligence Group, a publications and research firm. "And they have hard assets. In the post-Enron world, hard assets carry a lot of value."

"TXU is going to grow no matter what, because the state of Texas is growing and that translates into higher demand for electricity," she added.

The Texas energy scene is evolving. Still the center of the nation's oil business, it is also now the state with the most wind power production. Austin and other cities have become centers for renewable energy companies. But unlike California, Texas has been slow to develop conservation policies and has no goals for cutting carbon emissions.

Under the terms of the deal being discussed, the investors would pay about $70 a share for TXU, these people said. TXU's market value is about $27.5 billion. The company has more than $12 billion in debt.

Other private equity firms may join the group, these people said. A spokeswoman for K.K.R. declined to comment as did a spokesman for Texas Pacific.

TXU Set To Approve Record Private Equity Deal (FT)

By James Politi And Peter Smith

Financial Times, February 24, 2007

The board of TXU, one of America's largest utilities, was meeting on Sunday to approve a $44.5bn (€33.8bn, £22.7bn) takeover by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts and Texas Pacific Group, in what would rank as the largest private equity deal on record.

People familiar with the matter said that in the absence of any last-minute glitches in the negotiations, the deal, which would trump Blackstone's recent $38.9bn acquisition of Equity Office Properties in terms of size, could be announced as early as Sunday evening.

The two private equity buyers are expected to pay about $32bn in cash, or just under $70 a share, for TXU. This represents a 17 per cent premium over the company's market value on Friday. KKR and TPG will also agree to take on a $12bn chunk of TXU's outstanding debt.

A private equity takeover of TXU would extend a flurry of dealmaking by the world's largest buy-out groups, which have emerged as leading forces in high finance and business in recent years as they snapped up some of the biggest companies in a wide range of industries.

Based in Dallas, TXU is the top provider of electricity to the state of Texas, and has recently locked horns with environmentalists over plans to build 11 coal-fired power plants.

In advance of clinching a deal, KKR and TPG gained the backing of several environmental groups by agreeing to scrap plans to construct 8 of the 11 controversial plants.

The private equity buyers also pledged to support a reduction in carbon dioxide emissions to 1990 levels by 2020.

However, a private equity takeover of TXU could still face resistance if it is viewed as jeopardising the reliability of the electricity grid in Texas – or if it results in higher rates for consumer.

In Europe, an intense political debate has erupted over whether private equity takeovers harm or benefit the economy, with union leaders and some politicians lining up the world's largest buy-out titans.

That tension is expected to intensify on Tuesday, when union protestors gather outside the Super Return conference in Frankfurt at which both TPG's David Bonderman and Blackstone's Steve Schwarzman are due to speak.

DOJ_NMG_0136873

The structure of the TXU takeover is typical of the ways in which large leveraged buy-outs are being assembled on Wall Street. A number of large investment banks, including Goldman Sachs, are financing the deal through a massive package of bonds. The two buyers will be putting in $2.5bn of equity each into the deal, with Goldman adding a further $1.5bn of its own money and Lehman Brothers contributing $1bn of equity, one person involved in the talks said.

It remained unclear whether John Wilder, the TXU chief executive who will reap a large pay-out in the deal, will remain at the helm after the takeover. One person involved in the talks suggested TPG and KKR planned to bring in a number of high-profile business figures to help manage the process of gaining regulatory approval.

Some recent private equity deals have faced criticism for not securing a high enough price for shareholders. The merger agreement with TPG and KKR will allow TXU to shop itself to alternative bidders for 50 days, thanks to a "go-shop" clause that has become fairly standard in US public-to-private transactions.

$45 Billion Deal Near For Texas Power Firm (WP)

By David Cho And Steven Mufson, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, February 24, 2007

TXU Purchase Would Set Leveraged Buyout Mark

A consortium led by private-equity firms Kohlberg Kravis Roberts and Texas Pacific Group is nearing a deal worth close to $45 billion for a Texas energy giant in what would be the largest leveraged buyout ever, according to a source with knowledge of the negotiations.

News of an offer for TXU Corp., the largest power company in Texas, came a mere two weeks after the buyout record was set by the Blackstone Group's $39 billion purchase of Equity Office Properties Trust.

TXU's board could vote on the offer as soon as tomorrow.

Shares of TXU closed at $60.02 Friday, up $2.38. In after-hours trading the stock soared to $71 a share, up more than 18 percent.

A spokesman for Kohlberg Kravis Roberts and Texas Pacific Group declined to comment on the matter.

TXU has 2.4 million electricity customers in Texas and a network of generating stations, including two nuclear-powered and nine coal-fired plants. Deregulation recently took effect in the state, and the company has divided itself into three parts -- a regulated utility, a power wholesaler and a power generation unit with 18,300 megawatts of capacity.

But the company's claim to fame recently has been a controversy over its plan to build 11 conventional coal plants. That would more than double the company's emissions of carbon dioxide, the most prevalent of greenhouse gases, at a time when Congress is looking at ways to cap greenhouse gas-emissions.

It is not clear how a buyout would affect those plans. Part of the attraction of TXU is its location in a fast-growing state. The new plants could take advantage of its rapidly growing energy demand. But leveraged buyout firms usually trim costs and rarely expand a company's operations. And many executives in the industry have said they never expected the company to build all those plants anyway.

The private-equity firms are expected to propose around $70 per share for TXU and assume about $12 billion of its debt, putting the total value of the transaction at $44 billion to $45 billion.

If a buyout goes through, TXU would become a private company and no longer have to reveal its financial statements publicly or comply with federal regulations such as the Sarbanes-Oxley Act. But it probably would still have to disclose some information to state and federal power regulators.

That change is likely to draw scrutiny from members of Congress, especially those now devising ways to cap and reduce greenhouse gases. Some lawmakers have alleged that TXU might be expanding now so that the new plants would be included in its baseline emission levels. That would be important if Congress adopted a cap-and-trade system similar to Europe's, with allocations distributed to companies based on their past emissions.

Jeff Bingaman (D-N.M.), chairman of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, and Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.), chairwoman of the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee, last month wrote an op-ed article in the Dallas Morning News warning TXU and its investors that such a strategy wouldn't work.

DOJ_NMG_0136874

"In fact, companies that appear to be inflating their emissions right before legislation is passed are likely to find themselves in a position of having to make even larger emissions reductions than companies that do not attempt this strategy," they wrote.

TXU says its expansion plans reflect the needs for more electricity in Texas.

"Because our state is seeing such phenomenal economic growth, we're expected to add the population of Tennessee over the next decade in Texas," said Kimberly Morgan, a TXU spokeswoman. "Combine that with no new baseload generation being built. That presents a prime setup for generation in the state." (Morgan gave the interview before the proposed buyout became known.)

The TXU deal would exceed the infamous $31.3 billion leveraged buyout Kohlberg Kravis Roberts made for RJR Nabisco in 1989, memorialized in the book "Barbarians at the Gate."

In 2004, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts and Texas Pacific Group were part of a consortium that paid $3.7 billion for what was then the second-biggest power generating company in the state, Texas Genco. The investing group sold that utility for about $5.8 billion last year.

TXU Sale Could Cost $32 Billion (LAT)

By Janet Wilson, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 24, 2007

Sources say a deal for the utilities giant is expected to be the largest leveraged buyout ever.

Private investment companies Texas Pacific Group and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. are close to a deal to buy Texas utilities giant TXU Corp. in what is expected to be the largest leveraged buyout ever, according to people familiar with the negotiations.

The sale, slated to be announced Sunday, will include "not only the acquisition, but some very major announcements related to global warming," one person told The Times.

The Wall Street Journal, citing unidentified sources, said on its website that the buyout firms were expected to pay about $32 billion, or about $70 a share.

Dallas-based TXU has been moving aggressively to build an additional 11 coal-fired power plants upwind of Dallas and elsewhere in the state.

Environmental Defense and numerous other environmental groups and civic leaders have sued or otherwise protested the plants, saying they would add 78 million tons of greenhouse gases to the atmosphere annually. Texas already leads the nation in greenhouse gas emissions, widely believed to cause global warming. Smog, mercury emissions and other harmful pollutants also would be emitted.

Many private equity firms are jumping into solar, wind and other "alternative energy" investments, as dozens of states have adopted "renewable portfolio standards" requiring diversified energy, including so-called clean sources. Several members of Congress, including Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), have introduced or are preparing legislation that could cap greenhouse gases from coal plants and other electricity providers.

Fort Worth-based TXU lost a key legal round in building its new coal plants Tuesday when an administrative law judge threw out an executive order by Texas Gov. Rick Perry that fast-tracked environmental scrutiny of such plants. The next day, a state office about to begin air permit hearings on six of the proposed power plants instead postponed the hearings for four months.

Spokesmen for Texas Pacific and New York-based KKR declined comment. Calls to TXU were not returned.

Shares of TXU surged as high as $71 in after-hours trading, valuing the company at about $32 billion. The company has about $16 billion in debt, signaling the transaction may be valued at more than $48 billion.

Blackstone Group's purchase this month of Equity Office Properties Trust for $39 billion, including debt, was the largest previous buyout.

The possible TXU sale was first reported by CNBC.

TXU May Cut Rates In Buyout Bid (DMN)

DOJ_NMG_0136875

By Elizabeth Souder And Katherine Yung, The Dallas Morning News Esouder@dallasnews.com And Kyung@dallasnews.com

The Dallas Morning News, February 24, 2007

Equity firms to bid up to $45 billion to take utility private

Two private equity firms are about to offer $40 billion to $45 billion for TXU Corp. in what would be the biggest buyout ever.

Texas Pacific Group and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. planned to announce their offer for the Dallas power company on Monday, said people with knowledge of the deal. The purchase would take TXU private.

TXU is facing public and political backlash over a plan to build 11 more coal-fired power plants and over high electricity prices.

The offer set off speculation that new owners of Texas' largest power company may trim the plant building program and drop electricity rates to please regulators.

TXU officials didn't return phone calls Friday afternoon.

"It's staggering," said one Wall Street professional who preferred to remain anonymous. He said TXU is probably attractive to the buyout companies because the shares haven't risen in value as much as the shares of rival power companies.

"They'd be buying it because it's outrageously cheap," he added.

As for why TXU would sell, some experts said going private could allow the company to innovate without worrying about putting the share price on a roller coaster and facing the ire of Wall Street.

TXU shares rose 4 percent Friday afternoon, to close at $60.02, after news of the offer began to leak out. In after-hours trading, shares rose as high as $70.

The share price has dropped from all-time highs during the past few months as concern mounts about possible state and federal legislation that could limit the size of the company or the amount of pollution it would be allowed to emit.

If approved, the deal would be the largest acquisition ever, reflecting the current buyout binge sweeping the country. The previous record – the $39 billion purchase of Equity Office Properties Trust by the Blackstone Group – closed earlier this month.

The buyers, KKR and Fort Worth-based Texas Pacific, have teamed up before to make millions in the Texas energy sector. They were among a group of buyout firms that earned a more than sixfold return in little more than a year by buying and then quickly selling Texas Genco, a Houston wholesale power generation company, to NRG Energy Inc.

Utilities hold appeal for private equity firms because of their steady cash flows, which can be used to pay off the high debt levels usually loaded onto companies taken private.

But getting state regulatory approval for such deals has proven an obstacle for both firms. KKR and Texas Pacific failed to win approval for two separate buyouts involving utility companies in Oregon and Arizona.

Timing questioned

"This changes the entire landscape for everybody," said Dallas Mayor Laura Miller, who has spent the past six months trying to block permits for TXU's proposed coal plants.

"The timing is rather unsettling because it appears that this rush for the coal plants may have been to help build up the value of the company, because they would have had a nice corner on the electricity market with low-cost production units," she said.

Still, the mayor, who formed a coalition of cities that is taking part in TXU permit hearings, said she worries that a new owner might move TXU's headquarters out of Dallas.

The company's plan to build 11 plants ran into opposition from environmentalists, politicians, business leaders, rivals, and even Southern Baptists. The plan prompted the biggest environmental debate that Texas have ever seen, encompassing concern about pollution that can cause asthma and heart problems, as well as Texas' contribution to global warming.

This week, the administrative law judges handling TXU's permit hearing case delayed the hearing schedule by four months. The hearing officers bowed to a ruling from a state district court that an order from Gov. Rick Perry to speed up power plant permit hearings is probably unconstitutional. The decision was a setback for TXU's building program. Rather than getting a decision on permits this spring, the company will probably have to wait until the autumn.

DOJ_NMG_0136876

And key Republican legislators have lashed out at the company for increasing retail electricity prices last year. The current session has brought a slew of legislation that could force TXU to break apart, cut its market share or drop prices.

Some lawmakers were briefed on the deal this week.

If TXU were private, executives wouldn't have to worry about the share price being affected by political shifts and public outrage.

Going private may also allow TXU to revolutionize the model of what it thinks a utility can be at a faster rate and with less hassle than if it remained a public company, said Ren Plastina, director of CIT Energy, which is part of the CIT Group, a New York-based commercial finance company.

"Utilities over the years have been relatively conservatively run," he said. "They haven't been particularly innovative. There's a lot that can be done with respect to new technologies."

Innovations

TXU executives have made it clear they wish to innovate. They will add technology to the TXU grid to support Internet service, and their strategy to design one, standard coal plant and replicate it across the country is novel.

Still, TXU has limited its risk in its coal plant program. While it has already ordered equipment for the proposed coal plants, at least one of the contracts could offer some flexibility for the new owners to build fewer plants.

Tim Curran, president of Alstom U.S., said in an interview last week that TXU has ordered eight sets of emission control equipment from Alstom for the new plants. But Alstom is only working on three of the sets; he said work on five sets is suspended until he gets a green light to begin.

Both of the buyers, KKR and Texas Pacific Group, are flush with cash, after attracting more than $15 billion from investors for each of their latest funds.

Buyout firms are enjoying unprecedented boom times, thanks to a flood of cheap debt that has allowed them to team up with each other to make giant acquisitions. With so much money floating around, they are moving into nontraditional areas like casinos and high tech.

Texas Pacific has ownership stakes in two major local companies, the Neiman Marcus Group of Dallas and Southlake's Sabre Holdings Corp.

ABOUT TXU CORP.

Headquarters: Dallas

CEO: John Wilder

Revenue: $10 billion in 2005

Employees: 7,615

Retail customers: 2.4 million

Generating capacity: 18,300 megawatts

HISTORY

1882: Company is founded.

1917: It becomes Dallas Power & Light.

1945: DP&L joins two other utilities under the Texas Utilities holding company.

1984: The three utilities merge to become TU Electric.

1999: The TXU name is adopted.

Record Fine Expected For Univision (NYT)

By Stephen Labaton

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 23 — When Univision began broadcasting a show three years ago about the misadventures of 11-year-old identical twin girls who swapped identities after discovering they had been separated at birth, it characterized the episodes as educational programming for children.

DOJ_NMG_0136877

That decision is expected to cost Univision, the nation's largest Hispanic network, $24 million in what would be the largest fine the Federal Communications Commission has ever imposed against any company. The penalty is also expected to send a strong signal to broadcasters that they will be expected to meet their required quota of shows that educate and inform children, after years of permissive oversight in this area.

The commission has decided to impose the heavy fine — disclosed by Kevin J. Martin, the chairman of the commission, in an interview — as a tough rebuke to Univision for claiming to meet its obligations to broadcast educational children's programs by showing the Latino soap opera "Complices al Rescate" ("Friends to the Rescue") and other so-called telenovelas.

The penalty, part of a settlement that will allow the company to proceed with a buyout deal, is nearly three times the previous record fine of $9 million, imposed against Qwest Communications for violating telephone interconnection rules in 2004, and significantly more than the largest indecency penalty, $3.5 million, levied against Viacom that same year for remarks by Howard Stern and other so-called shock jocks on the radio.

It also represents an unusually aggressive enforcement of the 1996 regulations that interpreted the Children's Television Act. Those regulations, adopted after some broadcasters characterized cartoons like "The Flintstones" and "The Jetsons" to be educational programs, imposed more substantive requirements on the networks as they comply with the mandate to broadcast at least three hours a week of programs of intellectual value to young people.

Although some television critics say it is common for stations not to comply, only a handful of complaints have been filed. An even smaller number have resulted in modest penalties of several thousand dollars for stations found to have violated the rules.

Reflecting the views of many policy leaders in Washington who were appointed by President Bush, Mr. Martin said that he was committed to deregulation "and an environment where companies can be investing and competing and driving innovation." But he also said that he was not driven simply by ideology, and that there remain important areas where thorough regulation plays a valuable social role.

"I generally think consumers are better served by less regulation, not more," he said in an interview. "But I also think the commission has a key role to play in some areas, such as children's television, and I take those obligations seriously."

The agency under Mr. Martin adopted new rules last year to make the children's television programming requirements apply to new digital television stations.

The $24 million fine, along with a plan to show more programming that would comply with the rules, are part of a consent decree that Univision has tentatively agreed to that would resolve complaints by viewers. It covers violations at 24 Univision stations over a 116-week period from 2004 to early last year.

Mr. Martin has already signed onto the decree. Once the full commission approves it, as expected, Univision will be able to complete its $12 billion sale to a consortium of private equity firms. Those investors include Providence Equity Partners, where a senior executive is Michael K. Powell, the former F.C.C. chairman, and Haim Saban, a wealthy investor who built a major business on the Mighty Morphin Power Rangers action figures.

Lawyers representing Univision before the commission declined to comment about the case.

The fine was applauded by some Democrats in Congress who have long been dissatisfied with the agency for failing to press broadcasters to provide higher- quality programming for children.

"As the prime House author of the Children's Television Act, I am pleased the commission is pursuing serious and vigorous enforcement of violations," said Representative Edward J. Markey, the Massachusetts Democrat who heads the House subcommittee on telecommunications and the Internet. "This is a particularly egregious case and the level of the proposed fine reflects it. Rather than giving kids programming that is educationally nourishing, Univision elected to give them the Spanish-language equivalent of a soap opera.."

The case dates to the summer of 2005, when the United Church of Christ raised concerns about Univision's programming lineup, complaining that it was failing to provide adequate children's programs. The network claimed it was meeting its obligation by repeatedly rebroadcasting the same episodes of the telenovela. The commission's staff found that 24 stations had violated the programming guidelines over a two-year period.

DOJ_NMG_0136878

Angela J. Campbell, a telecommunications expert at Georgetown University Law Center who represents the church, appeared stunned by the decision.

"Assuming it's true, I'm pleased to see the commission finally taking action and I hope they will take action soon on other petitions we have filed in this area," Professor Campbell said. "Broadcasters need to know that they have to take these obligations to children seriously."

Univision had maintained that it satisfied its programming obligations for children by broadcasting several telenovelas, including "Complices al Rescate"

"A significant purpose and key educational objective of this program is to illustrate how friendship, love and kindness can help overcome life's adversities," the network's lawyers said in their brief before the commission. " 'Complices al Rescate' follows the lives of two 11-year-old girls, Silvana and Mariana, who have both experienced sadness, loss and injustice in their lives. Throughout the shows, the girls learn to appreciate that happiness is not found in popularity and money, but in true friendship, good will towards others and love."

But Mr. Martin said the commission found little merit to that argument, and critics said the show, with complex subplots and occasional adult themes, had little value for young children.

In an affidavit accompanying the United Church's complaint, Federico Subervi, a media consultant to such shows as "Dora the Explorer" and "The Misadventures of Maya and Miguel" said that "Complices" contained many adult plots and complex themes that were hardly suitable for young children.

As further evidence that the program did not comply with the rules, Mr. Subervi noted that 80 percent of the advertising during the show was geared toward adults.

A Software Maker Goes Up Against Microsoft (NYT)

By Steve Lohr

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

VMware, a young Silicon Valley company, is the early leader in a fast-growing market for what is called virtual-machine software. And that puts it on a collision course with Microsoft, the industry's Goliath.

A virtual machine essentially mimics a computer so that several copies of an operating system — say, Windows or Linux or both — can run on one physical machine. It allows computing chores to be done on fewer computers, using less electricity and taking up less space, promising a way to control costs at corporate data centers straining to keep up with the ever-increasing demands of the Internet age.

It is also a product that occupies strategic ground in computing, as a layer of code that resides between a computer's hardware and the operating system, usurping some tasks, and potentially undermining the importance of the operating system.

In a meeting with corporate customers in New York last month, Steven A. Ballmer, Microsoft's chief executive, said, "Everybody in the operating system business wants to be the guy on the bottom," the software that controls the hardware. And he vowed that Microsoft, whose Windows operating systems are the main source of its corporate wealth and market power, would "compete very aggressively with VMware."

When quizzed on Microsoft's plans, Mr. Ballmer replied, "Our view is that virtualization is something that should be built into the operating system."

Bundling new technology into Windows has long been the Microsoft game plan. The most storied case came a decade ago when Microsoft overcame the challenge posed by another Silicon Valley highflier, Netscape, offering another crucial layer of software, the Internet browser. Microsoft feared a competitor's Web browser, running on top of the operating system, could reduce the power of Windows.

"There are certainly some analogies here to what Microsoft did with Netscape," said Mendel Rosenblum, a founder of VMware and its chief scientist.

The tactics Microsoft used in the browser battle, of course, led to a host of antitrust troubles for the big software maker in the United States and Europe.

DOJ_NMG_0136879

This time, in the market for virtual-machine software, Microsoft is more restrained. Bowing to customer requests, Microsoft began more than a year ago to change its software licenses so its products could run in virtual machines like VMware offerings.

But in recent months, according to VMware, Microsoft has introduced new restrictions on how Microsoft products can be used in virtual machines in new ways, beyond simply dividing a single physical computer into several virtual ones.

This next wave of virtual technology, analysts say, includes software that lets virtual machines move freely across many physical machines, juggling computing chores, so that applications do not crash and Web response times are faster. Another promising new ability is running desktop personal computers as virtual-machine software, hosted and managed securely from a data center.

VMware, however, points to license changes on Microsoft software that it says limit the ability to move virtual-machine software around data centers to automate the management of computing work. A white paper detailing VMware's concerns will be posted Monday on its Web site (www.vmware.com), the company said.

"Microsoft is looking for any way it can to gain the upper hand," said Diane Greene, the president of VMware.

Yet VMware is making no antitrust claims against Microsoft, and legal experts question whether the friction between the companies is anything more than two rivals taking different paths to an emerging market.

"This seems to be a far more subtle, informed and polished form of competitive aggression than we've seen from Microsoft in the past," said Andrew I. Gavil, a law professor at Howard University. "And Microsoft has no obligation to facilitate a competitor."

In the past, said Mike Neil, general manager of virtualization strategy at Microsoft, customers paid a license fee when Windows was installed on a physical machine. But he said virtual-machine software breaks the tight link between the operating system and the hardware, raising the possibility that customers could be using Windows more but not paying for it. So now, he said, the license fee is based on when a copy of Windows is used, whether in a virtual or physical machine.

The license changes, Mr. Neil added, were not designed as a competitive tool. And he sees no evidence of any anticompetitive impact. "Look at VMware's financial success and you have to ask, How disadvantaged are they really?" he observed.

VMware is certainly thriving these days. Its sales reached $709 million in 2006, nearly double the previous year's figure. In the fourth quarter, revenue was $232 million, growing 100 percent from the year-earlier quarter.

VMware was founded in 1998 by Mr. Rosenblum, an operating-systems expert and an associate professor at Stanford University; Ms. Greene, a veteran of Silicon Graphics, Tandem, Sybase and a couple of start-ups, who is also Mr. Rosenblum's wife; and three other computer scientists, Scott Devine, Edouard Bugnion and Edward Wang.

Virtual-machine software dates to the 1960s, when I.B.M. used the technology to coax greater performance from costly mainframes. The achievement of Mr. Rosenblum and his team of Stanford-trained researchers was to develop virtual-machine software that worked, fast and reliably, on today's lower-cost machines powered by microchips made by Intel and Advanced Micro Devices.

By late 2003, VMware was profitable and growing strongly, and its payroll was approaching 400 people. Its future would depend on keeping its talented team of computer scientists in place, and Google and others were dangling offers. So VMware agreed to sell itself for $635 million in cash to EMC, a leader in data storage systems that was expanding into software. VMware had talked to other companies including I.B.M. and Microsoft. But EMC, not being a major software company, offered VMware more independence.

This month, EMC said it would give VMware an added measure of independence with a separate stock listing and its own shares to help retain its current work force of more than 2,500, and lure new talent. EMC will sell 10 percent of VMware in an initial public offering in the summer that analysts say is likely to value the company at 10 times what EMC paid for it just three years ago.

VMware's growth is explained by the experience of customers like the International Truck and Engine Corporation, a producer of diesel engines, trucks and school buses. A few years ago, Barry Naber, a technology manager at International Truck, the operating company of Navistar International, began looking for ways to curb the growth of server computers in its data center.

DOJ_NMG_0136880

Mr. Naber opted for VMware virtual-machine software, and today the company runs 230 applications, including expense, accounting, training and Web programs on 18 computers in its computer center in suburban Chicago. He estimates the savings for each virtual machine at $7,500 in hardware and maintenance costs avoided, or about $1.7 million.

Mr. Naber also looked at Microsoft's virtualization offering, but in tests found it was far slower and less reliable than VMware. "We're entrenched with VMware for now," he said.

One thing that Microsoft has lacked is a hypervisor, the lowest level of software that rests on the hardware and partitions the computer so it can cleanly and efficiently run several virtual machines. Microsoft is developing a Windows hypervisor code-named Viridian. It will be tailored for the next version of the Windows server operating system, called Longhorn, scheduled to ship by the end of 2007. Viridian will be ready shortly after that. "Virtualization, frankly, is a feature," Mr. Neil, the Microsoft manager, said. "It's a great operating system feature."

Microsoft has built up its virtual-machine team in the last few years with internal hiring and a couple of small acquisitions. And having identified virtual software technology as a core ingredient to its operating system, Microsoft promises to become a daunting competitor eventually.

Yet today, VMware holds an estimated 80 percent of the market for virtual-machine software that runs on computers powered by industry-standard Intel and A.M.D. microprocessors. "The market could change depending on what Microsoft does down the road, but VMware is the 800-pound gorilla of virtualization," said John Humphreys, an analyst at IDC, a research firm.

In the long term, VMware will also face competition from start-ups in the virtual-machine software market like Virtual Iron and XenSource. The start-ups note that only 5 to 7 percent of computers in data centers use virtual software. They see a market that is just beginning to take off with plenty of opportunity, if they can match VMware's technology and charge less.

Virtual Iron and XenSource take opposing views on Microsoft's recent moves. "Microsoft sees VMware coming between them and their customers," said John Thibault, president of Virtual Iron. "So Microsoft is manipulating its license terms to see if it can freeze the market and slow down the trend."

For its part, XenSource signed a deal last year with Microsoft to collaborate so that XenSource's software will work well with the virtualization technology Microsoft is developing for the Windows Longhorn server. "We set out to partner with Microsoft," said Peter Levine, president of XenSource, "and VMware chose to compete with Microsoft."

VMware, according to Microsoft, should see the wisdom of the path XenSource chose. In his meeting with corporate customers recently, Mr. Ballmer sketched out a future in which Microsoft would put fundamental virtual-machine software in its operating systems, and "VMware builds on top."

VMware is leery of such an accommodation, fearing it would prove to be a one-sided bargain. "We will not sign agreements that give Microsoft control of this layer," Ms. Greene said.

Tuning In To One Company (NYT)

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

Vigorous competition in the private sector has served the United States economy and consumers extremely well, providing a greater array of choices, more innovation and lower prices. The two — and only — satellite radio companies are now eager to merge and are arguing that together, they will prove to be the exception to the rule.

The industry is important and still young. We urge regulators to take a hard look at the companies' proposal before leaving the field in the hands of a single player.

Sirius and XM provide subscription radio services for some 14 million customers, with each company beaming more than 100 channels of music and talk radio, much of it without commercials. The services — both less than six years old — have generated considerable excitement with things like high-profile and high-price deals, including the $725 million in cash and stock that the shock-jock Howard Stern is reported to have signed for.

Together the two services have also managed to accumulate $6 billion in losses since receiving their licenses a decade ago.

The companies' managers argue that the $13 billion merger could finally make them profitable by letting them cut costs and redundant programs, while giving consumers more programming options for their bucks. As for the fear of creating a monopoly, they argue that competition will still come from terrestrial radio (commonly known as AM and FM), iPods and other next-generation technologies.

It is important to remember that these are not widget makers. Radios carry important discourse and debate — they are vital to the free exchange of ideas protected by the First Amendment. Recent experience shows that media consolidation usually leads to more homogeneous content, politically as well as artistically, and it rarely benefits the consumer or the country.

There is also the question of what precedent would be set if regulators accepted the broadest possible definition of audio competition, and whether that could lead to even more mergers in radio. No less troubling are reports that the companies believe that they have an incentive to merge before the Bush administration and its overly friendly-to-business regulators leave office.

The companies should, of course, be allowed to argue their case. And consumers should voice their opinions as well. Unless they want to pay for both services, subscribers are currently missing out on exclusive shows: Mr. Stern can be heard only on Sirius, and the nation's empathizer in chief, Oprah Winfrey, only on XM. Sports fans who want football and baseball have to pay for both services.

Consumers should also recognize that XM and Sirius compete vigorously for customers, talent and corporate partners. Both even charge the same rate, $12.95 a month, a price that might well rise if there was no competition.

When XM's and Sirius's licenses were granted, the Federal Communications Commission stipulated that "one licensee will not be permitted to acquire control of the other." The chairman of the F.C.C., Kevin Martin, reiterated that point this week but left the door open to a possible merger, saying, "The companies would need to demonstrate that consumers would clearly be better off with both more choice and affordable prices." We are skeptical about the chances of that happening.

MP3 Patent Verdict Harmless To Music Fans -- For Now (WP)

By Alan Sipress And Mike Musgrove, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, February 24, 2007

Don't worry. The authorities aren't coming to confiscate your MP3 player because of a patent infringement ruling this week that involves the technology behind digital music.

The verdict, if upheld, could cost Microsoft $1.52 billion or more in damages. And that could end up costing you, as manufacturers pass on the expense of paying royalties to Alcatel-Lucent, which a federal jury in San Diego found to be the rightful owner of the technology.

But those costs aren't likely to come for some time, if at all, industry analysts and patent lawyers said yesterday.

The technology industry was abuzz over Thursday's unexpected verdict, which included what lawyers said was the largest patent award in history, and its significance for the MP3 format that is at the heart of the booming market for digital music.

Though the verdict could affect hundreds of companies that use the technology in various devices, experts said consumers would not suddenly be unable to obtain or play MP3 files. Even in the long run, there may be no effect on consumers if the verdict is overturned on appeal. Microsoft's lawyers have said they will appeal both the jury's finding that the company infringed on the patents and the amount of its award to Alcatel-Lucent.

Paul Saffo, a Silicon Valley technology forecaster who teaches at Stanford University, said he thought there was a good chance that the verdict would be overturned. "I don't think there's a credible worst-case scenario," he said.

But Roger L. Kay, a technology industry analyst, said small companies working on low margins to manufacture MP3 players could be vulnerable if the verdict results in licensing fees beyond what they can afford.

"For some of those guys, something like this could be catastrophic," Kay said. While larger companies such as Apple and AOL may be able to pay Alcatel-Lucent's fees, "there will be others that are marginal to begin with, and something like this could put them out of business."

The legal dispute turns on two patents for technology developed at Bell Laboratories, which later became part of Lucent Technologies. Alcatel bought Lucent last year and inherited the patents.

Both patents relate to how music is converted into small digital files. One of the patents is for a method of analyzing sound to gauge whether it is more like music or noise, then representing it in digital form based on that determination. The other patent pertains to the process for determining whether the sound is audible to the human ear and then converting only that audible part into digital form.

DOJ_NMG_0136882

Hundreds of companies that thought they had properly licensed the MP3 format from Germany's Fraunhofer Institute, which was also involved in developing the MP3 technology, could be financially liable for infringing on Alcatel-Lucent's patents.

"Because of the uncertainty created by the verdict, you are going to see Alcatel-Lucent out there trying to use the verdict as a lever to get companies playing in the MP3 area to get licenses now," said Martin M. Zoltick, a Washington patent attorney.

He predicted that some companies will wait for the outcome of the appeal before paying Alcatel-Lucent, while others will want to obtain licenses sooner to end the uncertainty. If the verdict is upheld in U.S. circuit court, more companies would give in while a few would hang on to see whether the case is accepted by the Supreme Court for consideration, Zoltick said.

Alcatel-Lucent sued Microsoft over audio-file technology that the software giant first included in its Windows operating system in 1998 and later built into its Windows Media Player.

But the MP3 format is now so widely used that the jury's verdict could affect manufacturers of products well beyond desktop computers. MP3 technology is also used in mobile phones, digital-music players, handheld computers, video games and car audio systems.

About 400 companies, including some of the world's largest technology companies, have licensed MP3 technology from Thomson Technology, a San Diego firm that identifies itself as a representative of the Fraunhofer Institute.

In a prepared statement, Thomson said yesterday that it does not license the two patents at issue in the court case. Thomson said it had the rights to 20 other families of patents that cover some of the standards for compressed audio files and are essential to implementing MP3 technology.

"MP3 is the world's most popular compressed audio technology, and we look forward to its continued popularity," the company said.

But some experts suggested that the fear of litigation and increased royalties could force companies to adopt other formats for audio files, including open-source technology. Apple, maker of the popular iPod music payer, uses a format called AAC for its iTunes music store.

ENVIRONMENT:

President Promotes Alternative Energy With A Car Show Of Sorts (NYT)

By Matthew L. Wald

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 23 — President Bush turned to alternative fuels, and alternative companies, to argue Friday that his goal for reining in gasoline consumption in the coming decade was realistic.

On the South Lawn of the White House, Mr. Bush inspected a version of the Toyota Prius, the popular Japanese gas-electric hybrid, that had been rigged with a Canadian-built battery pack to allow it to operate more of each day on electricity, along with a South Korean sport utility truck modified by a small California company to run entirely on batteries.

Neither is now a mass-market product, but each, the president said, is evidence that entrepreneurs will rush in to solve the nation's oil addiction. He called on Congress to approve financing that he has requested for research.

The administration has set a goal of reducing gasoline consumption within 10 years by 20 percent from current forecasts. The question is, Which technologies will prove viable?

The modified Prius shown Friday carried an extra battery pack in the space intended for the spare tire and had undergone software modification, so that it used more battery power than a standard Prius, reaching higher speeds before starting up the gasoline engine.

Ric Fulop, vice president of A123 Systems of Watertown, Mass., which modified the car, said a battery that would power it for about 40 miles between overnight chargings cost $10,000 and would last through 7,000 cycles of charging and discharging — "more than the life of the vehicle."

DOJ_NMG_0136883

The electric truck can go 130 miles between chargings, said Bryon Bliss, vice president at Phoenix Motorcars of Ontario, Calif. The company has orders for 75, at $45,000 each, and hopes to sell 500 this year and 6,000 next year, Mr. Bliss said.

To a repeated question as to whether he would consider one of the vehicles for his ranch in Texas, Mr. Bush simply wished the assembled reporters a good weekend and returned to the Oval Office.

Texas: B.P. Settles 2 Lawsuits (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

The energy giant BP has settled two more lawsuits stemming from a 2005 explosion at its Texas City oil refinery that killed 15 people and injured more than 170, the company and a lawyer for two injured contract workers said. Terms of the deal were not released. Jury selection had been set for next week over lawsuits filed by the workers, E. J. Godeaux and Clarence Kinard. Theirs would have been the first cases connected to the blast to go to court. Mr. Godeaux, 61, a painter and sandblaster from Texas City, had neck and back injuries, and his right eardrum was blown out. Mr. Kinard, 67, a boilermaker from Cleveland, Tex., injured his back and experienced hearing loss.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Arellano's Arrest Location Challenged (SDUT)

By Kelly Thornton, Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, February 24, 2007

Captain questioned on yacht's position

DOWNTOWN SAN DIEGO – The captain of the yacht on which suspected drug kingpin Francisco Javier Arellano Félix was arrested last summer has become the center of a fascinating legal debate with international political implications.

Capt. Edgar Omar Osorio took the witness stand yesterday during an unusual pretrial hearing, and questions by Arellano's lawyers seemed to lead in one direction: Did the arrest take place in international waters, as prosecutors maintain, or did U.S. officials apprehend him outside their jurisdiction, in Mexican waters?

Perhaps the more important question is, does it matter where the Aug. 14 arrest occurred?

Prosecutors say the questioning is an irrelevant sideshow with no impact on the facts of the case. But if the incident happened in Mexico, defense attorneys could seek dismissal of the case because Arellano was illegally arrested. Failing that, they could ask that evidence seized on the boat be thrown out because it was the result of an unlawful seizure.

It could also affect the U.S. government's ability to seek the death penalty.

Traditionally, Mexico has refused to send anyone to the United States who would face the death penalty, which is barred in Mexico. There could be political ramifications if the U.S. government violated international law and breached the sovereignty of Mexico to apprehend Arellano.

But cooperation on extradition matters between the two countries has improved significantly in recent months. Some legal observers wonder how motivated Mexican officials would be to intervene on behalf of an Arellano, and perhaps disrupt the dismantling of its most feared drug cartel.

Since Mexican President Felipe Calderón was sworn into office in December, he has cleared the way for the extradition of 15 reputed drug lords, including four who were indicted in San Diego years ago. The action was called "unprecedented in scope and importance" by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

Even if Arellano was taken in Mexican waters, the U.S. Supreme Court has already ruled in a case with similar allegations that the U.S. government violated Mexico's sovereignty and the extradition treaty between the two nations.

In 1992 the court upheld the kidnapping in Mexico of Humberto Alvarez Machain by operatives paid by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration. The operatives brought Machain to the United States to face charges in the torture and murder of drug agent Enrique Camarena.

DOJ_NMG_0136884

Although a U.S. district judge later acquitted the Mexican doctor, his abduction in Mexico was viewed as a violation of sovereignty – but the high court did not dismiss the case.

Security was tight at yesterday's hearing attended by Arellano and a co-defendant, Manuel Arturo Villarreal Heredia. Bomb-sniffing dogs swept the courtroom before anyone was allowed inside.

Arellano and Villarreal are charged, along with Arellano brothers Benjamín and Eduardo and seven others, with overseeing the shipment of tons of cocaine into the United States on fishing boats, private planes, trucks and commercial airliners.

The organization also is accused of the murders of at least 14 people in Mexico and six in Southern California. The family-operated cartel began building a power base in 1989 and has been linked to hundreds of murders in Baja California, including high-ranking police officials and others caught in the crossfire.

Defense attorneys said Javier Arellano was arrested off Cabo San Lucas, Baja California, aboard the 42-foot yacht Dock Holiday. Prosecutors have said signals from a secretly installed global positioning device indicated the arrest took place 1.1 miles into international waters.

Osorio, a longtime boat captain, initially refused to talk to prosecutors or testify before a grand jury. But recently, after almost six months in custody, he approached the government and agreed to talk, saying his wife had died in Mexico while he was jailed, and his children need him. The government said Osorio has no information that is germane to the prosecution's case and no longer opposes his release.

U.S. District Judge Larry Burns rejected a request by Arellano's lawyers yesterday to continue to hold Osorio. They had argued that they may need him to testify on behalf of Arellano at trial.

Burns said Osorio's videotaped deposition would suffice, and the captain will be released and returned to Mexico after his deposition, which is expected to conclude Monday. Osorio was held only as a witness and was never charged with a crime.

At the hearing, defense attorney Mark Adams said he and co-counsel David Bartick urged the judge to grant a request that the government provide more "pings" – the signals transmitted by the global positioning device on the boat to a satellite, which showed the position of the yacht.

The government has already turned over to the defense two such pings, one before the arrest, and one after, which they say indicates the arrests occurred in international waters.

The defense claims the pings they have are inconclusive and they want all signals from the weekend before the arrest to better track the boat.

The defense attorneys said they had previously questioned Osorio outside court and feel "he is not being truthful in regard to . . . the geographic location of the Dock Holiday during that weekend."

Kelly Thornton: (619) 542-4571; kelly.thornton@uniontrib.com

Homemade Pipe Bombs Often Lethal, Expert Says (EPT)

By Tammy Fonce-Olivas

El Paso Times, February 24, 2007

Each of the homemade explosives two Lower Valley men allegedly attempted to sell to undercover federal agents earlier this week had the destructive power to seriously injure or kill a person, a federal official said Friday.

"It could have caused a lot of damage," said Tom Crowley, spokesman with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

The bombs Alfredo Rubio, 23, of San Elizario, and Juan Ortiz, 22, of Socorro, allegedly tried to sell to an undercover ATF agent on Wednesday were explosive devices, each made of about 12 inches of PVC pipe that contained smokeless powder, steel BBs and a carbon dioxide cartridge.

Crowley said pipe bombs are so dangerous because they contain shrapnel -- usually nails, glass or other dangerous objects -- that become projectiles when the bomb explodes.

The size of the pipe bomb, which can range from 2 inches long to much larger, determines whether the detonation created by the explosive causes serious injury or even death, said El Paso police Sgt. Peter Pacillas, a supervisor on the department's bomb squad.

Advertisement

"It's an improvised explosive device, so it depends on who's making them and how they're making them," Pacillas said. "If they don't kill you, you're going to be seriously maimed."

The El Paso Police Department, one of several agencies involved in the case, was in charge of transporting and detonating the suspected pipe bombs as the only regional bomb squad in the area.

Rubio and Ortiz were arrested Wednesday. Each is charged with conspiracy to make at least 15 pipe bombs.

An affidavit attached to the criminal complaint against the men alleges that the men were "fully aware of the pipe bombs' capabilities as a destructive device" during their interaction with the undercover agents.

Tammy Fonce-Olivas may be reached at tfonce@elpasotimes.com; 546-6362.

El Paso Times reporter Darren Meritz contributed to this story.

IMMIGRATION:

Bush Plan To Allow Mexican Truckers Throughout U.S. Draws Criticism (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 23 (AP) — A Bush administration plan to allow 100 Mexican trucking companies to haul freight deeper into the United States than previously allowed drew an angry reaction Friday from labor leaders, safety advocates and members of Congress.

The administration plan, announced Thursday, would have United States inspectors oversee Mexican trucking companies that carry cargo across the border. The pilot project will let Mexican truck companies travel throughout the United States. No hazardous material shipments will be permitted.

Currently, trucks from each country are allowed only 20 miles into the other to deliver their cargo.

Offering details on Friday, Transportation Secretary Mary E. Peters said, “This program will make trade with Mexico easier and keep our roads safe at the same time.”

But opponents said Mexico had substandard trucks and low-paid drivers that would threaten national security, cost thousands of jobs and endanger motorists.

James P. Hoffa, president of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, said, “They are playing a game of Russian roulette on America’s highways.”

According to the Transportation Department, inspectors will examine every truck and interview drivers to ensure they can read and speak English. They will examine trucks and check the licenses, insurance and driving records of the Mexican drivers, and they will verify that their employers are insured by companies licensed in the United States.

The first Mexican trucks are expected to drive beyond the border area in about 60 days, the Transportation Department said.

Under the 1993 North American Free Trade Agreement, access to all United States highways was promised by 2000, as was access through Mexico for American carriers. That aspect of Nafta was stalled by lawsuits and disagreements.

Deborah Hersman, a member of the National Transportation Safety Board, questioned how the United States could spare sending inspectors to Mexico when only a tiny percentage of American truck companies were inspected every year.

Mexican carriers insist their equipment meets United States standards. According to the Transportation Department, 240 federal and 300 state government employees deal with Mexican truck issues.

Senator Patty Murray, the Washington Democrat who leads the Appropriations Subcommittee on Transportation, announced a March 8 hearing to determine whether the plan met safety requirements.

U.S. To Allow Mexican Trucks (WSJ)

By Robert Guy Matthews

The Wall Street Journal, February 24, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0136886

Pilot Program Resolves Nafta Issue but Upsets Teamsters, Lawmakers

WASHINGTON -- Following a decade of dispute, the U.S. will open its highways to Mexican cargo trucks, in a move that could alter the economics of the domestic trucking industry and is already uniting some American lawmakers, unions and trucking companies to oppose the change.

The Transportation Department on Friday said it is starting a pilot program that could begin as soon as April that will allow 100 Mexican trucking companies unfettered access to U.S. roads. Under the program, both drivers and trucks must first pass certain safety checks designed and overseen by U.S. officials in Mexico. The program could eventually be expanded to include additional Mexican trucking firms.

If the trial succeeds, the U.S. trucking industry could change drastically. Mexican drivers are paid one-third to 40% less than their U.S. counterparts, who make an average of about $40,000 a year. An influx of Mexican truckers would be a boon for U.S. businesses with production lines in Mexico, by decreasing costs and delays from the current need to shift U.S.-bound goods at the border to American trucks from Mexican ones. According to the Census Bureau, the U.S. imported $198 billion of goods from Mexico in 2006.

Some trucking companies in the U.S. vowed to block the move, which they say will hurt them. The opposition comes against a backdrop of rising protectionist sentiments that helped propel Democrats to take back Congress in November and increasingly is coloring trade-policy debates in Washington.

The issue of whether to allow Mexican freight trucks on U.S. roads has been controversial for more than a decade. Under the North American Free Trade Agreement, ratified by Congress in 1993, the U.S. and Mexico were supposed to open their roads to each other's trucks, at least partially, as part of a broader push to strengthen bilateral economic and trade ties. But the trucking agreement was put on hold in 1995 after U.S. trucker unions and other opponents lobbied lawmakers to block such a move. They argued that Mexican trucks were unsafe, caused pollution and would facilitate illegal immigration.

Implementation of the agreement ran up against other barriers, including Congress's imposition in 2001 of a set of safety requirements that had to be met before the U.S. could open the border to Mexican trucks. In June 2004, the Supreme Court ruled that the president had the power to decide whether Mexican trucks could enter the country, but it took three years for the U.S. and Mexico to reach an agreement, signed Thursday, that will allow U.S. officials to conduct safety inspections in Mexico. It will also allow U.S. trucks in Mexico, though that isn't usually cost-effective.

Andrew J. Gillespie, director of transportation for Ansell Healthcare Products LLC in New Jersey, said the new open-roads policy means his business won't lose time and money when transporting work-glove materials from Mexico to New Jersey for final assembly. "We have been waiting years and years for this change."

Currently, businesses shipping goods to the U.S. from Mexico must use three drivers and three tractors to move freight. Under the pilot program, Mexican trucks will be able to go directly to their destinations in the U.S.

The American Trucking Associations, the country's largest trucking-industry group and a representative of some U.S. trucking companies that operate out of Mexico, voiced support for the pilot program. It said the program would improve efficiency and reduce pollution from idled trucks.

But some past opponents of opening up vowed to continue to fight the move. "We are on this thing, and we are going to be contacting members of Congress, because we are very concerned about highway safety," said Jim Hoffa, president of the Teamsters union, which represents many truckers. "There is such political pressure to do things to save money for big corporations."

Todd Spencer, executive vice president of the Owner-Operator Independent Drivers Association, which represents mostly small-business truckers in the U.S., said his group would also fight the policy, which he expects will cause companies with divisions in Mexico to use more Mexican trucks to lower labor costs. "We are going to raise this as a safety issue, because this is a problem for us," he said.

Sen. Patty Murray (D., Wash.), head of the Senate Appropriations Committee's transportation subcommittee, said she will hold a hearing on March 8 to make sure safety regulations will be met.

DOJ_NMG_0136887

Rep. James Oberstar (D., Minn.), chairman of the House Transportation Committee, has opposed allowing Mexican trucks into the U.S. on the grounds that they aren't as safe as U.S. vehicles. He questioned whether the Transportation Department had the necessary systems in place to safeguard Americans on the road.

"The U.S. is obligated to live up to its commitments under the North American Free Trade Agreement, but not at the expense of the safety of our citizens," he said. "We cannot afford to pursue policies that represent a step backward in terms of safety."

U.S., Mexico And Canada Discuss Border Issues (NYT)

By Christopher Mason

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

OTTAWA, Feb. 23 — American, Mexican and Canadian cabinet ministers met here on Friday to set the agenda for a meeting later this year by the leaders of the three countries, with the discussions taking an increased focus on protecting cross-border trade in the face of increasing border security measures.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez met their Canadian and Mexican counterparts amid concerns that new United States border restrictions — particularly the requirement of passports, beginning in January 2008, for land and sea crossings — would hamper the $880 billion in annual trade among the countries.

No firm agenda emerged for a planned meeting later this year of President Bush, President Felipe Calderón of Mexico and Prime Minister Stephen Harper of Canada. But officials here were optimistic that the countries could continue to increase trade despite concerns by Canada over the passport requirement and by Mexico about United States plans to erect a security wall along their border.

“This is a broad agenda that is going to make life better for people, and it is the only way that we can achieve security and prosperity,” Ms. Rice said.

The passport requirement has been controversial in Canada, but its leaders have said they will adjust to, and not protest, the changes.

“We recognize that that will have an effect on life in general,” Public Safety Minister Stockwell Day said. “That is why we pursue the areas of seeing our countries being as competitive as possible.”

Borders Without Fences (NYT)

By Ted Kerasote

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

IN the debate over how to prevent illegal immigration from Mexico into the United States — armed patrols, electronic surveillance, prison time for first offenders and a 700-mile-long 15-foot-high fence — few politicians have voiced concern over the last option’s profound effects on wildlife.

Authorized by the Secure Fence Act of 2006, this barrier (83 miles of which have already been built) will bisect a border region that has some of the most ecologically diverse landscapes in the hemisphere. It is here — in a land of deserts, mountains, conifers and cactus — that bird species from North and Central America share territories and cross paths during migrations. It is here that endangered wildlife, like the jaguar and gray wolf, have an opportunity to reoccupy lands from which they were extirpated during the last century.

The list of other beautiful common or rarely seen animals that live along the border is long. A small sampling would include cougars, desert bighorn sheep, ocelots, pronghorn antelope, road runners, white-tailed deer and hundreds of species of birds and insects. The fence would physically prevent both large and small mammals as well as reptiles from traveling across the border, and the lights atop the fence would attract insects, making them easier prey for birds that feed on them. Some of these insects pollinate the plants of the region, including cactus.

Since the secretary of homeland security will have authority to waive laws that stand in the way of building the fence — like the Endangered Species Act — wildlife and habitats could be destroyed on a scale not seen since the 1960s, when the nation’s first wilderness and environmental laws were passed. Of course, many argue that the fence is an issue of national security and the safety of the American people trumps that of American wildlife. But that reasoning is flawed. The economic health of many people is increasingly reliant on the health of their natural surroundings.

DOJ_NMG_0136888

In fact, studies done at the Universities of Montana and Colorado show that intact natural landscapes attract not only tourists to a region but also new residents and businesses that pump dollars into local economies. It isn't just plentiful sunshine that has made the Southwest one of the fastest-growing regions in the nation, it's also the region's diverse natural attractions, one of which is wildlife.

The fence, however, will reduce wildlife-viewing opportunities in the many national parks, monuments, refuges, wilderness areas and forests that garland the United States-Mexico border. And its effects will be felt far to the north and south, along the mountainous backbone of the continent, where conservationists have spent decades mapping and preserving migration corridors that allow the free movement of wildlife between the two nations.

Such ecological damage has already been seen around the world, where a variety of high, long fences have been constructed. In Botswana, for instance, the government erected fences, starting in the 1950s, to separate wildlife and livestock. As a result, at least 250,000 wildebeest, unable to reach water, perished from 1970 to 1984 and tens of thousands of antelope have died. In Asia, the migration of gazelles has been curtailed by the fence that the Chinese government built along the border with Mongolia in the 1990s. And in Australia, a 3,300-mile-long fence built in the 1950s to keep dingoes out of the southeastern part of the continent deprived kangaroos of their natural predator. Thus, the kangaroo population flourished, reducing the number of sheep the land could sustain, a result that the backers of the fence — sheep ranchers — neither foresaw nor intended.

Unfortunately, since the fence along the United States-Mexico border is designed to keep people out, it can't be outfitted with features that allow wildlife to migrate over and under livestock fences and highways. Let's hope that when it comes time to appropriate the money to build the entire fence, cooler Congressional heads will prevail. There are better ways to protect our borders than building a wall that people will inevitably find ways around but wildlife won't.

TAX:

IRS Urged To Go After EBay Sellers (SFC)

By Verne Kopytoff, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, February 24, 2007

Tax experts say online auctions should report users' profits

When it comes to paying income taxes, eBay's legions of small-time entrepreneurs are on an honor system in which they are supposed to declare their profits to the Internal Revenue Service. Many users, however, ignore the law or are unaware of their obligation.

Now a growing chorus of tax experts is hoping to crack down on the cheating by requiring eBay -- and other online auctions, such as those on Yahoo, Ubid.com and Amazon -- to track users and report their gross sales to the federal government. Armed with such information, the IRS could better seek any taxes owed, potentially reaping millions of dollars in extra revenue for the U.S. Treasury.

But requiring eBay to out its sellers to tax collectors could send a shockwave across its vast online bazaar, where users trade everything from Ferraris to Ugg boots to pepper spray. Paying Uncle Sam could significantly reduce their profits or even make their businesses money-losers.

The latest call for more aggressive tax collection was heard last week at a congressional committee hearing focused on closing the tax gap, the hundreds of billions of dollars in taxes that go unpaid each year. Nina Olson, the national taxpayer advocate for the IRS, spoke of the heavy burden put on the nation by the shortfall and then cited undeclared online sales -- particularly on eBay, given its size -- as part of the problem.

"The IRS must have the tools needed to address under-reporting of this income," said Olson, whose job is to voice taxpayer concerns to the federal government.

DOJ_NMG_0136889

EBay, based in San Jose, has 97 million U.S. users, who, in 2006 sold $25.2 billion in merchandise, exceeding the gross national product of many countries. More than 720,000 Americans make their primary or secondary income from the Web site, according to a 2005 study.

How many eBay users pay the taxes they owe on their online earnings is unknown. But experts suspect the percentage is low.

Virtually all tax filers -- 96 percent -- pay what's owed on income that is reported to the IRS by a third party, such as when a bank reports interest earned on a savings account, according to the IRS. However, when a third party doesn't tip off the government, compliance drops dramatically, to below 50 percent.

The remedy, according to many federal officials, is to expand reporting requirements. The question is, which businesses and what kind of income should fall under the rules?

As part of his proposed federal budget for 2008, President Bush made what many believe is the first step to more vigorously collect taxes on online sales. Although vaguely worded, the proposal would require "brokers," or middlemen, to collect taxpayer identification numbers from clients and report their sales of personal property to the IRS on a 1099 form if sales surpass 100 transactions or more than $5,000 annually.

Under current law, eBay and other auction sites aren't considered brokers. But definitions can be changed.

In November, a citizen advisory group for the IRS recommended as much. Expanding the definition to include online auctions, the group said, would open the door to reporting and increased tax compliance.

Paul Heller, chairman of the citizen advisory group, made up of accountants and tax preparers, applauded the president's proposal, but called it so nebulous that it's unclear what kind of businesses he's targeting. Heller, a vice president for JP Morgan Chase, suspects that the provisions are at least partly aimed at Internet sales.

"I have no idea who it would be referring to," Heller said of the proposal, "if not online auctions."

Jennifer Zuccarelli, a spokeswoman for the Treasury Department, declined to name any companies the Bush proposal applies to. All she would say is that the provisions would affect both online and offline commerce, without discrimination as to the medium.

Other than Internet sales, tax experts said that art galleries and consignment stores could be potential targets of the Bush proposal.

Hani Durzy, a spokesman for eBay, insisted that his company would be unaffected if Bush's ideas are enacted as written. EBay doesn't meet the definition of a broker, he said, because it never takes possession of the merchandise its users sell.

In any case, Durzy said eBay doesn't even know whether any given transaction is completed and therefore can't report authoritatively about a user's sales to the IRS.

Simply reporting to the government, he added, would be a financial burden for his company.

David Yaskulka, marketing chairman for the Professional eBay Sellers Alliance, an industry group of more than 500 big eBay sellers, said it wouldn't bother him if eBay reported sales information about its users to the IRS. In his experience, big sellers already pay their fair share.

"Every professional seller I've ever talked to pays their taxes and has no problem with anyone finding out about the level of business they're doing," Yaskulka said.

His concern is that legislation will unfairly target eBay. All sales venues, online or off, should be treated the same, he said.

The next step for the proposed legislation, along with a number of other of Bush budget ideas, is to go through Congress, starting with the House Ways and Means Committee. Members are likely to address the issue during an upcoming hearing on closing the tax gap, tentatively scheduled for mid-March.

Matthew Beck, a spokesman for the committee's Democratic majority, declined comment, other than to say of the Bush proposal, "We certainly take that as a starting point, and we certainly look forward to addressing the tax gap."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Medicaid Cuts Would Cost Public Hospitals, Other Facilities (LAT)

By Ricardo Alonso-Zaldivar

The Los Angeles Times, February 24, 2007

WASHINGTON — At a time when states are striving to expand healthcare coverage, the Bush administration is pressing ahead with plans to cut nearly $4 billion in aid for public hospitals and other providers of last resort for the uninsured.

The cuts would affect hospital funding provided by Washington as part of Medicaid, the federal-state program known in California as Medi-Cal. It serves more than 55 million low-income people, including the working poor, elderly nursing home residents with few financial resources, and many children of low-income parents. In addition, it has provided funds for hospitals and other healthcare institutions that serve large numbers of uninsured patients.

Public hospital officials said California institutions could lose $500 million a year under the reductions, with the Los Angeles County public health system taking an estimated annual cut of $200 million.

"It's equivalent to shutting down all the outpatient clinics we own and operate, as well as those we contract with in the community," said county health chief Dr. Bruce Chernof.

The cuts are prompting sharp protests from governors and dozens of lawmakers, partly because they represent an end run around congressional defenders of the aid program. After failing to get Congress to approve the reductions last year, the administration is now trying to impose them through a regulation that does not require action on Capitol Hill.

"The administration is moving forward with these proposed changes without any input from Congress or governors," the National Governors Assn. complained Friday in a letter to congressional leaders. In an unusually direct challenge to the administration, the governors asked Congress to pass legislation that would block the rule from going into effect.

Separately, some independent experts have questioned whether the administration has the legal authority to make unilateral cuts. The confrontation recalls other recent cases in which the administration has tried to impress its will on Congress. For example: White House "signing statements" attached to anti-terrorism laws that assert the president's right to carry out the legislation according to his judgment.

Defending their actions, administration officials said the new rule was aimed at preventing some states from gaming the system. States have sometimes used the hospital funding for the uninsured to leverage more federal funding, officials said. The rule would limit the kinds of institutions eligible for such funding, as well as the rates the federal government would pay.

The goal is straightforward, said one federal official. "It's a simple concept: You can't get paid more under Medicaid than it costs to serve patients who are eligible for Medicaid," said the official, who asked not to be identified because of the politically sensitive nature of the issue.

Hospitals use the federal funding to offset the cost of caring for the uninsured, who are often members of working families that make too much to qualify for Medicaid and too little to afford their own coverage. Trauma centers, neonatal intensive care units, emergency departments and burn units could be among those jeopardized by the cuts, hospital officials said.

Other proposed healthcare cuts are included in the regulation, bringing the total nationwide to about $5 billion.

Officials in Sacramento said that Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger had expressed concerns to Washington about the cuts, but that the state had been assured that California would be exempt. The issue remains unresolved, and Schwarzenegger intends to pursue it when he visits Washington this weekend, said Michael Bowman, a spokesman for the state Department of Health Services.

Medicaid funding is governed by complex agreements between the states and the federal government, and federal officials say a deal negotiated by California last year already complies with the proposed regulation.

"We do not believe this rule would adversely affect" California's arrangement, said Mary Kahn, a spokeswoman for the federal Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services. "It is in compliance with the rule."

But California hospital officials say the language of the regulation says nothing about an exemption for the state. They say their own lawyers analyzed the new rules and have concluded the state would be affected.

"We don't understand how the [federal government's] statements square with the actual language of the proposed rule," said Melissa Stafford Jones, president and chief executive of the California Assn. of Public Hospitals and Health Systems. "If [Washington] had stated in the rule itself that the proposed provisions would not apply to California, then perhaps we would come to a different conclusion."

DOJ_NMG_0136891

Regardless of how California's case is resolved, opposition to the cuts is unlikely to melt away. The federal regulation — published last month with little fanfare — would become final this summer and take effect Sept. 1. President Bush's budget assumes the cuts will go through. But the timing doesn't leave much opportunity for states to come up with funding alternatives.

"The proposed rule [is] a significant cost shift to states that governors strongly oppose," said the governors association letter.

Ultimately, the controversy could wind up in federal court. Some independent experts said the administration's own actions suggested a recognition that it might be on shaky legal ground.

"Why did they think they needed legislation last year, and this year they can do it by regulation?" asked Diane Rowland, executive vice president of the Kaiser Family Foundation and an expert on the healthcare safety net.

"Usually, an administration tries to use its regulatory authority first before going to Congress, so this is an interesting flip."

In Congress, lawmakers of both parties say they will try to pass legislation that would block the cuts from going into effect. Forty-three senators and 226 House members have signed letters indicating their opposition.

Cheney Remark Rankles Pelosi (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 24, 2007

Vice President Says He's Not Questioning Her Patriotism

Vice President Cheney refused to back down yesterday from his assertion that the Democratic approach to Iraq would "validate the al-Qaeda strategy," as he continued a transpacific war of words with House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.).

Speaking with ABC News during a visit to Australia, the vice president addressed the criticism of Pelosi, who earlier this week said that Cheney's remarks were "beneath the dignity of the debate we're engaged in." She also spoke with White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten to register her complaint.

"She accused me of questioning her patriotism," Cheney said. "I didn't question her patriotism. I questioned her judgment."

"Al-Qaeda functions on the basis that they think they can break our will. That's their fundamental underlying strategy: that if they can kill enough Americans or cause enough havoc, create enough chaos in Iraq, then we'll quit and go home," Cheney added. "And my statement was that if we adopt the Pelosi policy, that then we will validate the strategy of al-Qaeda. I said it, and I meant it."

Cheney has previously described Pelosi's strategy as wanting to "get out" of Iraq. Pelosi has spoken in favor of a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops, starting in four to six months, and shifting the primary U.S. role to training.

Brendan Daly, Pelosi's spokesman, said the speaker is "moving on" but said Cheney "would rather launch partisan political attacks than focus on the fact that the administration has failed to support our troops in the field with the equipment and training they need."

The Cheney comments were another example of how the vice president's posture regarding Iraq has been more aggressive than President Bush's in recent weeks. While Bush has acknowledged that his previous policy had been headed toward failure and has offered conciliatory words to Congress, Cheney has emphasized "significant progress" in Iraq and warned that the war cannot be run by committee.

The remarks also reflected Cheney's frequent suggestion that al-Qaeda is the United States' principal adversary in Iraq, a stance disputed by many experts inside and outside the government. A recent National Intelligence Estimate concluded that factors in Iraqi violence include "extensive Shia-on-Shia violence, al-Qa'ida and Sunni insurgent attacks on Coalition forces, and widespread criminally motivated violence."

Asked by ABC reporter Jonathan Karl whether he was "out of touch" with the grim reality in Iraq, Cheney indicated optimism. "I think the key to the issue right now is the security situation in Baghdad," the vice president said. "I think the Maliki government is off to a pretty good start. Only time will tell. I'm fairly optimistic that going forward with this strategy will, in fact, work."

Former president Jimmy Carter, in a separate interview with ABC, came to Pelosi's defense. "If you go back and see what Vice President Cheney has said for the last three or four years concerning Iraq, his batting average is abysmally low," Carter said in an interview to be aired tomorrow on "This Week." "He hasn't been right on hardly anything in his prediction of what was going to happen."

DOJ_NMG_0136892

Cheney is on a week-long trip, with the main stops coming in Tokyo and Sydney, where he met today with Australian Prime Minister John Howard, a staunch U.S. ally. Howard told reporters that he raised concerns with Cheney about David Hicks, an Australian who has been imprisoned at Guantanamo Bay since 2002.

In the ABC interview, Cheney was also asked about a deal with North Korea in which the state agreed to shutter its main nuclear reactor in return for economic assistance from the United States. He contrasted that with a 1994 accord that has fallen apart, noting that the recent deal includes China, Japan, South Korea and Russia. "If you're going to be able to squeeze North Korea effectively to get them to change policy, China is in the best position to do it. And China is a part of this agreement," Cheney said.

The North Koreans carried out one of the initial steps in the agreement yesterday by inviting the top U.N. nuclear inspector to Pyongyang to begin talks. Mohamed ElBaradei, the director of the International Atomic Energy Agency, announced yesterday at a news conference in Vienna that, six years after his inspectors were thrown out, he would go to North Korea in mid-March to discuss "the shutdown and eventual abandonment" of North Korea's Yongbyon facility.

"I see this as a step toward the denuclearization of the North Korean Peninsula," he said.

Staff writer Dafna Linzer contributed to this report.

Democrats Offer Up Chairmen For Donors (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum, John Solomon, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, February 24, 2007

Party's Campaigns Had Faulted GOP For 'Selling Access'

Eager to shore up their fragile House and Senate majorities, congressional Democrats have enlisted their committee chairmen in an early blitz to bring millions of dollars into the party's coffers, culminating in a late-March event featuring House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and 10 of the powerful panel chairs.

In the next 10 days alone, Democratic fundraisers will feature the chairmen of the House's financial services panel and the House and Senate tax-writing committees. Senate Democrats also plan a fundraising reception during a major gathering of Native Americans in the capital Tuesday evening, an event hosted by lobbyists and the political action committee for tribal casinos, including those Jack Abramoff was paid to represent.

Critics deride the aggressive fundraising push as the kind of business as usual that voters rejected at the ballot box last November -- particularly the practice of giving interest groups access to committee chairmen in exchange for sizable donations -- but Democrats are unapologetic.

"Financial services companies are inclined to give to me because I'm chairman of the committee important to their interests," said Financial Services Committee Chairman Barney Frank, who will headline a breakfast Wednesday at a D.C. hotel, for which donations range from $1,000 to $15,000 for the Democratic National Committee. "I'm fundraising to give to others so I can help stay in the majority and do the public policy things I want."

Asked whether banking interests feel obligated to give to Democrats when he asks them for contributions, Frank answered: "Obligated? No. Incentivized? Yes." Frank said, however, that those donating "understand, and others do, too, that there are no guarantees of my doing what they want, or even my being pleasant."

"I'm getting a lot of fundraising invitations," said Robert E. Juliano, a Democratic lobbyist. "It's no different than any other year."

The invitation to Frank's DNC event, which notes in bold letters that the Massachusetts Democrat is chairman of the financial services panel, was sent to financial-industry lobbyists and financial companies, among others.

Earlier this month, Frank traveled to Charlotte, home to two of America's largest bank companies, for a similar fundraising breakfast, for a fellow Financial Services Committee member, Rep. Brad Miller (D-N.C.). Donors got to hear firsthand about Frank's plans for upcoming banking legislation. He assured attendees that more federal regulation of banking is on the way and that it will help banks to prosper.

DOJ_NMG_0136893

Financial interests will have several opportunities in the coming weeks to make contributions and attend events that will put them close to lawmakers important to their industries.

The leaders of the two tax-writing committees -- House Ways and Means Chairman Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.) and Senate Finance Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.) -- are planning a rare and expensive joint fundraising reception in New York on March 4. The event, which costs between $1,500 and $9,200 a person, is to be held at the Upper East Side home of public relations executive Howard J. Rubenstein.

The Democrats' push will culminate late next month when Pelosi and 10 of her chairmen huddle with donors at the Northern Virginia home of shopping-center developer Albert J. Dwoskin for an event to benefit the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

The asking price for the March 21 dinner is $28,500 per couple, making it one of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee's highest-dollar fundraisers since new campaign finance limits were enacted in 2002.

In addition to Pelosi and Frank, other senior House Democrats slated to attend include John D. Dingell (Mich.) of the Energy and Commerce Committee, David R. Obey (Wis.) of the Appropriations Committee, Ike Skelton (Mo.) of the Armed Services Committee, John Conyers Jr. (Mich.) of the Judiciary Committee, George Miller (Calif.) of the Education and Labor Committee, and James L. Oberstar (Minn.) of the Transportation and Infrastructure Committee.

House Democrats hope to raise between $650,000 and $1 million for each of the party's most endangered Democrats in hopes of keeping the party in control of Congress.

The tactics are hardly new. Republicans aggressively used their committee chairmen -- and the promise of access to them -- to raise money from interest groups and lobbyists during the party's 12 years of congressional control. They tracked donations closely and pressed lobbying firms to hire GOP lobbyists through the "K Street Project," promising "intimate" issue briefings with the chairmen in return for big donations.

And the GOP is hardly sitting on the sidelines this year. Republicans are also using their top lawmakers on committees to haul in donations. Rep. John L. Mica (Fla.), the ranking Republican on Transportation and Infrastructure, is scheduled to headline a "transportation luncheon" fundraiser in coming days for fellow House Republican Jerry Moran (Kan.).

The event was originally scheduled to be held at a Capitol Hill townhouse owned by the American Trucking Association but has since been moved to a restaurant. Donors are being asked to contribute between $1,000 and $2,500.

Likewise, Rep. Peter T. King (N.Y.), the senior Republican on the Homeland Security Committee, is advertised as the featured guest at a "homeland security dinner" at the French-style Les Halles restaurant on Pennsylvania Avenue NW to help raise money for sophomore Rep. Michael McCaul (R-Tex.).

But it was in part a Republican lobbying scandal -- GOP lobbyist Abramoff's defrauding of Indian tribal clients and the subsequent investigation into his efforts to influence lawmakers with lavish gifts -- that gave Democrats their opening to regain control of Congress. Democrats took over in January after a campaign that accused Republicans of fostering a "culture of corruption" in Washington and "selling access" to lawmakers. Abramoff has been convicted of fraud, tax evasion and conspiracy and is in federal prison.

Now, with the tables turned, Democrats are courting Abramoff's most famous clientele -- Indian tribes.

The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee's upcoming fundraiser was planned to coincide with a meeting in Washington of the National Congress of American Indians. It is being hosted by a law firm that lobbies for tribal casinos and the National Indian Gaming Association's political action committee.

The association represents more than 100 tribes with casinos or gambling operations, including those Abramoff was paid to represent. Last year, former Abramoff clients such as the Saginaw Chippewa, Agua Caliente and Mississippi Choctaw gave money to fund the PAC.

Organizers with the gaming association said they had no confirmation as of yesterday whether any of the Abramoff clients would be attending the event, but Democratic fundraisers said they were still trying to organize a second donor event that could involve a few of the tribes that were entangled with Abramoff.

DOJ_NMG_0136894

Democrats reject any parallels to the Abramoff saga. "Abramoff was involved in a pervasive culture of corruption," said Matthew Miller, spokesman for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee. "Native Americans have every right to participate in the political process just like Americans across the country do."

Government-watchdog groups are chagrined but not surprised by the rush of high-level Democratic fundraising. "Coming so close on the heels of winning last year's election based on changing the so-called culture of corruption in Washington, it's unseemly, but it's completely predictable," said Melanie Sloan, executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington. "Democrats, like the Republicans before them, need the cash to maintain their majority status, and when you are in the majority it is much easier to collect the money."

House Democrats' principal fundraiser, Rep. Chris Van Hollen (Md.), wrote a memo last month indicating that he wanted House members in difficult-to-defend seats to have $650,000 to $1 million in the bank by June 30 -- 16 months before Election Day -- in order to deter Republican challengers. Veteran fundraisers say that goal would be ambitious for the end of an election cycle, let alone the beginning.

Democratic spokesmen sought to portray the upcoming fundraisers as commonplace. "The senior Democrats on the committees and the leadership have always been very supportive of DCCC efforts," said Jennifer Crider, spokeswoman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

Passenger Bill Of Rights May Cause Some Turbulence (LAT)

By Martin Zimmerman

The Los Angeles Times, February 24, 2007

Do airline passengers really need a bill of rights?

Recent incidents in which travelers were left stranded for hours on parked airplanes have led to proposals in Congress for time limits on ground delays. But skeptics say the proposals could result in even longer waits and more canceled flights.

"Be careful what you wish for," said David Stempler, president of the Air Travelers Association, a Washington-area lobbying group. "After three hours, they'll bring the plane back to the terminal, but then the flight might be canceled and you can't get to your destination."

And that prospect concerns travelers such as Lorna Davie, who sat on a parked JetBlue Airways jet for five hours during that airline's recent operational meltdown.

"It's a tough call," said Davie, who lives in Stamford, Conn. "People should be given the choice to get off the plane, but then you have to taxi back and let them get off, and those who want to continue on with the flight are further inconvenienced."

Calls for a federal law that would prevent airlines from keeping passengers on grounded planes indefinitely grew louder after a Valentine's Day ice storm shut JetBlue's New York hub. That resulted in some planes loaded with passengers sitting on taxiways and tarmacs for as long as 10 hours.

Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., introduced a bill, dubbed the airline passenger bill of rights, that would give passengers the option to return to the airport terminal after three hours. Rep. Mike Thompson, D-Calif., plans to introduce a similar bill next week.

Backers say legislation is needed to prevent a repeat of the JetBlue debacle, as well as a similar incident Dec. 29 when dozens of American Airlines flights were stranded on the ground for hours in various cities after thunderstorms shut down the Dallas-Fort Worth airport.

But some believe that setting a three-hour deadline could set off a ripple of unforeseen consequences.

Lengthy ground delays typically occur during severe weather, which can ground dozens of airplanes at a single airport. Planes have to wait in line for takeoff once the weather clears, and any plane that returns to the terminal loses its place and must, in effect, start over at the back of the queue.

The hours that commercial pilots can spend in the cockpit are strictly regulated. If time spent taxiing back to the gate or idling at the end of the takeoff line pushes a crew past its allotted duty hours, a new flight crew has to be brought in or the flight will be canceled.

DOJ_NMG_0136895

"Once you get out of line, you've got to go to the end of the line," said Vivian Lee, an airline analyst with Alliance Capital Management in New York. "Should all of the passengers on the plane be at the mercy of the person with the least amount of patience?"

Of the 121 American Airlines flights that were diverted Dec. 29, 47 planes that were on the ground for three hours or more eventually made it to Dallas-Fort Worth that night. Had the three-hour time limit been in effect, many of those flights probably would have spent the night at other airports.

For these reasons, the airline industry is pushing a proposal that would allow airplanes that have to return to the terminal after three hours to resume their original place in the takeoff queue.

Kate Hanni, the Napa, Calif., resident who is spearheading the grass-roots campaign for a passenger protection bill, fears that the industry is trying to derail meaningful consumer regulation in the same way it did in 1999, after the stranding of a Northwest Airlines flight on the ground in Detroit for several hours sparked a similar furor.

"Somehow, we have to keep the consumer at the forefront of the issue," said Hanni, who sat on an American Airlines flight in Austin, Texas, for eight hours Dec. 29.

Hanni's group, the Coalition for an Airline Passengers' Bill of Rights, has collected more than 13,000 signatures on its online petition, and she is hopeful that Congress will adopt a law that goes beyond the three-hour time limit to include such measures as a committee to investigate customer complaints.

To ease concerns about safety and ensure a measure of pilot flexibility, the bill co-sponsored by Boxer and Sen. Olympia J. Snowe, R-Maine, would allow exceptions to the three-hour time limit if safety or security were an issue or if the pilot determined that the flight would be allowed to take off within 30 minutes.

Thompson said he also was conscious of concerns about a ground-delay deadline.

"We certainly don't want to cause flights to be unnecessarily canceled," the congressman said Friday. "However, it's important that passenger are not held on planes for hours on end."

The Politics Of JetBlue (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 24, 2007

Right on cue, politicians are making a fuss about a "passenger bill of rights" and demanding Congressional intervention after last week's JetBlue airline debacle. The irony is that the marketplace is already moving to address the problem, and the government could really help by relaxing some of the rules that incentivize airlines to discomfit passengers in the first place.

On February 14, an ice storm obstructed travel throughout the Northeast. At New York's JFK International, JetBlue's central hub, nine aircraft were frozen to the tarmac for more than six hours each, some longer. The reverberations caused thousands of cancellations and delays throughout the JetBlue schedule.

Clearly JetBlue would have done better to offload the stranded passengers as the waits grew longer, and by its own admission the company's communications and contingency planning were lousy. But moving to regulate now, through the introduction of a legally binding "passenger bill of rights," would amount to closing the hangar door after the plane has pushed back. The market is already punishing JetBlue with damage to its image and bottom line. In atonement, CEO David Neeleman has introduced a new, retroactive "bill of rights" of his own that will offer refunds and free flights to tardy JetBlue fliers, depending on the severity of their delays.

Nevertheless, Congress senses an opportunity to pander. Barbara Boxer (D., Calif.) recently introduced a bill in the Senate to let passengers deplane if they have been held too long before takeoff. Mike Thompson (D., Calif.) intends to introduce a similar provision next week in the House, as well as mandates for minimum standards of comfort and service. Members are at least holding off on punitive compliance measures, but in Washington a consensus for some sort of action seems to be building.

The benefits of any such rules are speculative, but higher costs are certain. The airlines would face more paperwork, bureaucracy and cost -- and just wait until the trial bar piles on. These costs would be passed on to consumers whether they wanted these new "rights" or not.

Two years ago, the European Union handed down a suite of "transport directives," including one mandating compensation for delays or cancellations, so far without a marked improvement in either problem. European airlines, meanwhile, note that they have been saddled with billions in extra outlays. In the case of discount airlines, the minimum compensation for delays is often many times larger than the price of the original ticket.

DOJ_NMG_0136896

Such regulation is both expensive and unnecessary. In 2006, according to the Department of Transportation, 75.4% of flights on U.S. carriers arrived within 15 minutes of schedule. Only 36 flights last year -- out of some 10 million flown -- left the gate and then waited more than five hours to take off.

For the record, most delays happen for three reasons, roughly distributed equally: errors on the part of the carrier; a jam-up caused by another plane; or a disruption due to the antiquated air-traffic-control system. When a flight is held up on the runway, FAA rules stipulate, it loses its slot in the takeoff line if it returns to the boarding gate, which is why the JetBlue planes were reluctant to turn back in the face of an indeterminate delay.

In hindsight, it's easy to say JetBlue waited too long, but we wonder how many passengers, offered a choice between the possibility of imminent clearance to take off and the certainty of many more hours in the terminal, would have opted for the departure lounge. A bill of rights mandating deplanings would take these decisions away from those trying, if sometimes futilely, to get their passengers where they're going as quickly as possible.

Ticket buyers who opt for low-fare airlines are generally aware that the choice comes with tradeoffs. JetBlue has supported its low-fare model in part by keeping its planes in the air, which has meant being reluctant to cancel flights. Until last week, that was an asset; it had found that passengers preferred to get to their destinations, even if late. Other airlines offer a different mix of conveniences, priorities and costs. This diversity is all to the good.

The self-styled consumer advocates who think that government action here will prevent a repeat of last week's debacle should be careful what they wish for. Meteorological mishaps can't be outlawed, and rules designed to address one situation will be found inappropriate when the next, no doubt different, crisis arises. Mr. Neeleman's solution of writing his own bill of rights has the virtue that consumers can decide for themselves if it meets their needs. If it doesn't, they'll book with someone else. And that's the most important right of all.

Better Pay For Judges (NYT)

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

Justice Anthony Kennedy of the Supreme Court told the Senate this month that the salaries paid to federal judges are so low that they threaten both the quality and independence of the judiciary. The problem is real, and Congress should quickly pass a bill to fix it.

Justice Kennedy gave some startling examples of judges who had left the bench in search of better-paying employment. In 2005, nine federal judges resigned or retired — the most in any single year. Four went to work for JAMS, a for-profit arbitration and mediation firm where, as Justice Kennedy noted, “they have the potential to earn the equivalent of a district judge’s salary in a matter of months.”

The $165,200 a year earned by a federal district court judge sounds like a lot. But it is not in the upper ranks of the legal world, from which the federal judiciary should be able to recruit new members. A district court judge’s salary is now about half of what a law school dean makes, and roughly what a starting lawyer makes at a top New York law firm. Since 1969, the real pay of federal district court judges fell by about 25 percent, while the real pay of the average American worker rose 18 percent. If judges’ pay had risen at the rate of the average worker, the $165,200 salary would now be $261,000.

One way the Constitution protects the independence of federal judges is by providing that — no matter whom the judges anger or disappoint — their compensation “shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.” But that independence is eroded when inflation erodes salaries and judges must go to Congress with hats in hand.

A bill to raise judges’ salaries would also be an ideal place to impose a much needed ethical reform: a ban on all privately financed “educational” junkets for judges. These trips, which are often paid for by groups that want to persuade judges to take a particular view of the law, inevitably raise worrisome questions about judges’ impartiality.

Capable, independent and impartial judges are essential to the workings of American democracy. Congress should come up with the money necessary to keep the judiciary strong.

DOJ_NMG_0136897

OTHER NEWS:

H&R Block, Roper Industries Rise (WSJ)

By Karen Talley

The Wall Street Journal, February 24, 2007

Lowe's Advances 3.9% On a Bullish Forecast; Microsoft Slides 1.7%

Though stocks pulled back Friday, Lowe's rose on comments on 2007 comparable-store sales, H&R Block advanced on plans to sell an ailing unit and Roper Industries gained on strong product demand.

Microsoft followed the market lower after a $1.5 billion jury decision, BEA Systems sold off on options issues and Circuit City Stores dropped on word of a key executive departure.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average lost 38.54 points, or 0.3%, to 12647.48, its third straight decline. The Nasdaq Composite Index dropped 9.84, or 0.4%, to 2515.10. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index lost 5.19, or 0.4%, to 1451.19.

"There is Iran poking into our mind-set again, higher energy prices and continued housing issues," said Art Hogan, chief market analyst at Jefferies. "But it's healthy that we're seeing the market take a pause. Investors often wait for a pullback to get back in, so this retracement will offer an opportunity for those who have been on the sidelines."

Lowe's rose $1.30, or 3.9%, to $34.93. The home-improvement retailer said fourth-quarter earnings dropped 12% but conditions may be bottoming and comparable-store-sales performance should gradually improve throughout the year. For the week, Lowe's gained 5%.

Lowe's optimism didn't erase general skepticism about the housing industry, and the session saw broad selling in the sector. Home Depot, Lowe's chief rival, lost 22 cents to 40.96. Mortgage lender Countrywide Financial declined 81 cents, or 2%, to 39.33; home builder NVR fell 35.40, or 4.9%, to 687.50; and mortgage-buying giant Fannie Mae dropped 66 cents, or 1.1%, to 59.49.

H&R Block rose 43 cents, or 1.9%, to 22.85. The largest U.S. tax preparer swung to a third-quarter loss on costs tied to its struggling subprime-mortgage operation but said it expects to sell the unit for at least $1.3 billion.

Roper Industries gained 3.72, or 7.2%, to 55.14, a record close. The industrial manufacturer reported a big increase in fourth-quarter orders for its products and voiced optimism for 2007.

Microsoft (Nasdaq) lost 49 cents, or 1.7%, to 28.90, the industrial average's biggest percentage decliner. Alcatel-Lucent's American depositary shares gained 22 cents, or 1.7%, to 13.36. Microsoft was told to pay $1.52 billion to compensate Alcatel-Lucent for patent infringements related to MP3 technology.

BEA Systems dropped 1.25, or 9.5%, to 11.95, among the top Nasdaq percentage decliners. The business-software maker reported fourth-quarter and fiscal-2007 revenue but said it wouldn't give earnings results because of an ongoing internal review of its stock-option grants.

Circuit City dropped 39 cents, or 1.9%, to 20.39 on news that the electronic-product retailer's chief financial officer is leaving.

Nymex Holdings lost 2.17, or 1.5%, to 138.61. The owner of the New York Mercantile Exchange said it is considering a secondary offering of shares of common stock.

KLA-Tencor (Nasdaq) gained 1.91, or 3.7%, to 54.16. The chip-equipment maker plans an accelerated share repurchase program in which it will buyback $750 million of its common stock.

Whole Foods Market (Nasdaq) slipped 1.64, or 3.1%, to 50.47. Shares rose 14% on Thursday when the health-food chain agreed to acquire small-cap Wild Oats Markets in a $565 million.

Rising Oil Prices, Lenders' Woes Give Dow Worst Week Since Mid-Aug. (WP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, February 24, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0136898

NEW YORK, Feb. 23 -- Stocks ended a lackluster week with a moderate decline Friday as higher oil prices worried investors and Treasurys rallied over concerns about a meltdown in the subprime mortgage market, in which companies offer loans to those with spotty credit.

It was the worst week for the Dow Jones industrials since mid-August, as the average fell 38.54, to 12,647.48. Broader stock indicators also fell. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 5.19, to 1451.19. The Nasdaq slipped 9.84, to 2515.10.

For the week, the Dow fell 0.94 percent, the S&P 500 fell 0.35 percent and the Nasdaq composite rose 0.75 percent.

The pullback followed several mixed sessions in which the tech-dominated Nasdaq composite index showed gains but blue chip stocks declined, in part because of inflation concerns. Bond prices rebounded from a sell-off a day earlier, as investors sought quality because of concerns that subprime lenders would be forced to book big write-downs because consumers would not be able to keep up with mortgage payments. The yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note fell to 4.67 percent from 4.73 percent Thursday.

"The defaults that you're seeing in the subprime market are a bit of a wake-up call for investors. I think you're going to see a continued flight to safety," said James Sonneborn, wealth manager at RegentAtlantic Capital.

Oil closed at its highest level of the year, eclipsing a year high set Thursday. Light, sweet crude settled up 19 cents at $61.14 on the New York Mercantile Exchange. For the week, oil prices were up 3 percent.

Gold Nears The $700 Level, Helped By Crude-Oil Gains (WSJ)

By Allen Sykora

The Wall Street Journal, February 24, 2007

Speculative buying sent gold futures inching back toward the psychologically important $700 level on Friday.

The nearby-month February contract added $3.70 to $683.10 an ounce on the Comex division of the New York Mercantile Exchange. Most-active April gold rose $3.70 to settle at $686.70. It peaked at $691.90, its strongest level since July.

At its high, April gold was up $32.90, or 5%, from the low for the week of $659 hit Tuesday.

"There has been some very aggressive fund buying over the last three days," said Bernard Hunter, director of precious metals at Scotia Mocatta. He described the market as "fairly one-way" and "really dominated" by the funds.

The metal was helped by technical chart-based buying and stronger oil, with April crude hitting $61.80 a barrel, its strongest level since Jan. 3. Also, the dollar sagged, which tends to help gold.

Crude backed down from its highs, limiting gold's gains for now. All eyes will be on the psychological $700 level in the coming week, however. Gold shot above here in May for the first time since 1980, before correcting lower over the last several months.

"The speed of gold's recent rally does leave the metal vulnerable to a correction; however, $700 and possibly beyond seem inevitable before this occurs, while our target of $800-plus later in the year remains on course," said a research note from James Moore, precious-metals analyst with TheBullionDesk.com.

In other commodity trading:

CRUDE OIL: Futures settled at a nine-week high as gasoline futures continued advancing and traders focused on plunging U.S. petroleum-product stockpiles and recent refinery and pipeline glitches around the country. April crude oil on the Nymex gained 19 cents to $61.14 a barrel, its highest close since Dec. 22.

NATURAL GAS: Futures ended slightly higher after trading lower most of the day ahead of contract expiration Monday, and as traders awaited more details on the weather. March natural gas on the Nymex settled 2.8 cents higher at $7.755 a million British thermal units, its highest close since Feb. 9.

Dollar Declines On Rate Worries (WSJ)

By Dan Molinski

The Wall Street Journal, February 24, 2007

The dollar exited lower across the board Friday amid concerns that interest rates will rise in Europe but could remain frozen or even decline in the U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0136899

Dollar sentiment turned negative as investors, who a day earlier had pared expectations for Federal Reserve rate cuts, began to waffle. Dollar gains earlier in the week, based on slightly higher-than-expected inflation figures, were deemed overdone and investors began selling dollars to book profits.

"There are still some concerns about the structural outlook for the dollar, in terms of interest rates," said Daniel Katzive, foreign-exchange strategist at UBS.

The dollar could retreat further if the market, which is looking for the Fed to cut rates in the fourth quarter of 2007, moves up its expectations to an earlier date, said Mr. Katzive.

Higher oil prices Friday also weighed on the greenback as higher energy costs could place more strain on a U.S. economy that's already dealing with a softening housing market and a weak manufacturing sector. The price of a barrel of crude settled at a 2007 high above $61 in New York.

The rise in oil prices came amid lower U.S. supplies and a row with oil-producing Iran after the United Nations nuclear watchdog agency Thursday said Tehran had failed to comply with a deadline to stop nuclear enrichment.

Late Friday in New York, the euro stood at $1.3166 from $1.3124 late Thursday, while the dollar was changing hands at 121.09 yen versus 121.58 yen. The euro traded at 159.43 yen versus 159.56 yen late Thursday. The dollar was at 1.2330 Swiss francs versus 1.2384 francs, while sterling was at $1.9635 versus $1.9564 late Thursday.

During London trading Friday, the dollar advanced some against the euro after data showed business confidence in Germany was a bit less than expected. But the greenback quickly reversed itself as analysts digesting the data said it doesn't change consensus view that the European Central Bank in March is likely to lift its key lending rate to 3.75% from the current 3.50%.

Higher local interest rates tend to boost a currency because investors' in those currencies are paid higher returns. The Fed's benchmark rate currently stands at a relatively high 5.25%.

Meanwhile, a report Friday showed the United Kingdom economy expanded above trend in the final quarter of 2006, which gave sterling a boost and provided marginal help to other European currencies as well.

"The [gross domestic product] data out of the U.K. continue to argue for further rate hikes ahead and our house view remains that the Bank of England will hike next at its May meeting" by a quarter point, said analysts at ABN Amro Bank in an email note.

States Set Big Spending Plans As Washington Preaches Austerity (WSJ)

By Christopher Cooper

The Wall Street Journal, February 24, 2007

Washington may currently be focused on fiscal austerity. But a major spending spree is shaping up in the states, as local legislators abandon a half-decade of fiscal conservatism to pursue bigger budgets.

From New York to Montana to California, states are proposing budget increases that outpace inflation and far exceed the 1% rise in domestic outlays -- outside of defense and homeland security -- that President Bush recently proposed in his fiscal 2008 federal budget. In Montana, Gov. Brian Schweitzer is cutting taxes and boosting spending by 26% over two years, including $100 million for new "meth prisons" that blend incarceration with intensive drug rehab for those convicted of methamphetamine crimes. In Vermont, Gov. Jim Douglas wants to borrow $40 million to create "the nation's first e-state," where free wireless broadband is available to all. And in Arizona, the only dispute between a Democratic governor and a Republican legislature over a half-billion-dollar road-repair program is whether to borrow the money or pay cash.

The binge is bipartisan. Last year, the Massachusetts legislature approved a $1.56 billion universal health-care plan under Republican Gov. Mitt Romney, who is now running for president. This year, at least ten states -- most notably Republican Arnold Schwarzenegger's California -- are weighing similar programs.

But that's just one of many areas where state governments are seeking to expand services that were long considered distant dreams by advocates. Universal prekindergarten is being championed by several incoming Democratic governors, such as New York's Eliot Spitzer, Deval Patrick of Massachusetts and Mike Beebe of Arkansas. Democratic leaders in Colorado and

DOJ_NMG_0136900

Pennsylvania and several other states want to create funds for state "energy independence." Many of these proposals will be topics of conversation at the National Governors Association's annual meeting, which begins in Washington today.

The new state activism is driven in part by the Bush administration's budgetary focus on Iraq, defense and homeland security, which leaves states to grapple with domestic concerns on their own. Higher tax receipts and growth in energy royalties, from higher oil and natural-gas prices, have also left many states flush.

But even states faced with declining revenue are mulling ways to ramp up spending -- not with unpopular tax increases, but by privatizing valuable public assets in return for big slugs of cash. Michigan and Illinois, among others, are looking at selling off their lotteries, while Missouri is considering doing the same with its student-loan portfolio.

The growing popularity of health-care programs and higher teacher salaries raises the risk that states, giddy from surging revenue, may be in danger of expanding beyond their means, using short-term windfalls to create new long-term obligations at a time when tax increases remain unpopular with voters.

It was just a few years ago that states last found themselves in financial dire straits. In the early 2000s, many state governments were hit hard by recession and constitutional requirements to balance budgets. Reluctant to unwind fresh tax rollbacks, states were forced not only to cease creating new services but also to cut back on many basics, such as road repairs and prisons. In 2003, the National Governors Association reported that states collectively were undergoing the worst budget crisis since World War II.

Even after their economies and revenue streams recovered in the middle part of the decade, state governments concentrated on building surpluses and kept spending relatively in check. But now, many states are returning to their old ways: along with spending more, several governors are proposing hefty tax cuts as well.

Like many governors, Arizona Democratic Gov. Janet Napolitano faced a looming budget shortfall -- $1 billion in her case -- when she took office in 2003. Now, thanks to strong economic growth, surging sales-tax revenue and low unemployment, the state has $650 million in reserves. For fiscal year 2008, Ms. Napolitano has proposed a $10.4 billion budget that calls for a 6.9% increase in spending on top of the 18% increase last year.

The extra money allows Ms. Napolitano to put tens of millions of dollars toward her priorities: pay raises for teachers, 12% more for state universities, and $60 million for projects to train and attract high-tech workers and businesses. "Somewhere out there is the next Microsoft," Ms. Napolitano said. "I'd just as soon that it be in Phoenix or Tucson."

Montana's Mr. Schweitzer, who also faced an austere outlook when he first took office, is now enjoying a $1 billion surplus, largely due to higher tax revenues on capital gains and energy production. As he sees it, states spend nearly all of their money to "educate, medicate and incarcerate." His two-year, $7.7 billion budget boosts spending on all three. Legislative analysts peg the budget increase at 26%; Mr. Schweitzer excludes the rainy-day fund and payments towards pension obligations and says the jump is closer to 13%.

The state's prison system will see one of the largest increases. Mr. Schweitzer says Montana leads the nation in the per-capita number of citizens incarcerated. Because the vast majority of those are for drug-related crimes, he's proposing a program that would marry the state's prison system with its Department of Health.

The resulting "meth prisons," as he calls them, would combine incarceration with intensive rehab programs, which he says would allow for more early releases and, over the long term, would lower the state's cost of maintaining its prisoners. It's an unusual idea, and one he says that the federal government is unlikely to help finance. "The feds aren't really interested in new and novel things," he says.

Mr. Schweitzer's budget also offers about $150 million in tax cuts and a $170 million capital construction program. "The best part is I don't have one dollar of bonding in my program," Mr. Schweitzer said. "We're paying cash."

Another reason states are loosening their purse strings is to compensate for a sustained decline in federal revenue sharing. In the past, the federal government could often be relied on to help finance big projects such as highways and new state initiatives, such as antipoverty programs. But the days of expanding federal revenue sharing have been on the wane for years. And the Bush administration, with its focus on war and antiterror spending, has shown little interest in supporting these efforts.

DOJ_NMG_0136901

In fact, governors and others say they expect cutbacks in federal support. "I don't think anyone feels the federal government is going to be a source of revenue increases any time in the near future," says Robin Prunty, a credit analyst, who specializes in state finances for bond-rating firm Standard & Poor's Corp.

In New Mexico, Democratic Gov. Bill Richardson, who is running for president, is proposing a $5.7 billion budget, 11% bigger than last year's. The spending plan not only provides more than $100 million in raises for school employees, but includes some projects he had originally intended to supplement with federal grants, such as the state's commuter-rail system. "We had a commitment from the feds for $65 million but we haven't seen it yet, so I'm putting it in my own budget," Mr. Richardson says. His budget also includes a $77 million proposal to expand health care.

In many states, universal-health-care proposals are potentially the most expensive propositions, and none top the gargantuan plan offered by California's Mr. Schwarzenegger. His $12 billion health-care plan would insure an estimated 6.5 million people by imposing new fees on doctors and hospitals and giving $1 billion in tax breaks to individuals who purchase their own health insurance.

Mr. Schwarzenegger is touting his plan over the objections of many legislators in his own party, who argue that the program will cause budgetary havoc if the state's economy sours.

It wouldn't be the first time an ambitious insurance plan created fiscal problems for a state. Tennessee launched such a plan in 1994 but was forced to painfully unwind the program in 2005, when it had grown into a $7.8 billion behemoth that accounted for nearly a third of all spending and threatened to throw the state into deficit. The biggest contributor to costs: insuring middle-aged citizens, especially those with pre-existing medical conditions. They were the first of the estimated 170,000 Tennesseans to be tossed out of the program.

Scott Pattison, executive director of the National Association of State Budget Officers, says the Tennessee experience is unlikely to be an anomaly. While it's relatively cheap to insure healthy children, "a 52-year-old diabetic is a lot more expensive to cover," he says.

To be sure, some states, fearing a quick reversal of fiscal fortunes, are trying to keep a lid on spending. In Alaska, a state that derives much of its revenue from oil royalties, high energy prices are expected to increase general-fund revenue to $5 billion this year, from $2 billion in 2003. Yet freshman Republican Gov. Sarah Palin vowed to limit budget growth to $3.3 billion, up less than 3% from this year. She points to a recent legislative report that predicts falling energy prices will result in declining revenue for the state as early as next year and a potential $1 billion deficit by fiscal 2010.

Already, there are indications that the flush times are ending. One early sign: by late 2006, nearly a third of those states participating in an annual survey by the National Conference of State Legislatures -- 14 of them -- were either experiencing or expecting to see a decline in revenue. Moreover, the group says, for the first time in years, projected spending increases this year seems likely to outstrip revenue growth, with outlays expect to rise 7.5%, and receipts, just 3.1%.

The obvious solution to flagging revenue is new taxes. But while many governors seem disposed to spend more, those same politicians remain largely conservative on taxes. Big increases, particularly on broad levies like income and sales taxes, are still considered political suicide. Instead, states from Arizona and Montana to New York, Florida and New Jersey have enacted or are considering tax rollbacks.

Many states are looking at other ways to raise cash. In Massachusetts and New York, Messrs. Patrick and Spitzer are toying with the idea of legalizing gambling to raise money. In New Jersey, which already has legalized gambling, Democratic Gov. Jon S. Corzine is entertaining a wager of another sort: leasing a portion of the state's turnpike to a private company in order to raise cash. Governors in Pennsylvania and Texas are considering similar proposals.

The schemes can be a windfall for states: In Indiana last fall, Republican Gov. Mitch Daniels essentially sold Interstate 85 under a 75-year lease that garnered a $3.8 billion cash payment. Now he is proposing to lease the state's lottery in return for a similar windfall -- as are several other states, including Illinois, Texas and New Jersey.

But lease deals have proven controversial. Critics fret that states won't properly value the assets or will strike deals that somehow hinder future growth. Chief among the critics is the Owner-Operator Independent Drivers Association, a trucker lobby. The lease deals being considered involve sections of some of the nation's busiest roadways. Because the deals almost always include provisions that bar states from building new roadways that might compete with the toll routes being sold, future gridlock is all but assured, the group says.

DOJ_NMG_0136902

In some states, there's plenty of cash -- at least for the moment. In Arizona, Ms. Napolitano finds herself allied with the conservative Goldwater Institute as she tries to beat back a proposal by the Republican-dominated legislature to raid the state's rainy-day fund for a $400 million road-improvement program. Like her Republican brethren, Ms. Napolitano wants to fix the roads. But she would rather borrow the money and keep the $650 million rainy-day account for the economic downturn she assumes is all but inevitable.

"When I came in, we had no rainy day fund," says Ms. Napolitano. "I wouldn't wish that on anybody."

Voting Machines Found Not At Fault In Fla. Election (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, February 24, 2007

TALLAHASSEE, Feb. 23 -- An audit of touch-screen voting machines at the center of a dispute in a congressional election found no evidence of malfunction, Florida's secretary of state said Friday.

The audit was conducted after more than 18,000 ballots were cast in Sarasota County without a selection in the District 13 congressional race in November between Republican Vern Buchanan and Democrat Christine Jennings. Buchanan was the certified winner by 369 votes, but Jennings sued, alleging that the machines malfunctioned.

Third-party voter advocate groups, along with Jennings, have been asking to examine the machines' source code or programming chips to find out whether they malfunctioned. The audit report released Friday said an independent study of the source code of the machines used in the election found no evidence of malfunction.

"Governor [Charlie] Crist and I are committed to ensuring that every Floridian's vote is counted, and I am confident that the race in Sarasota County was fair and accurate," Florida Secretary of State Kurt Browning said in a statement about the official audit report.

Buchanan was seated in Congress in January, but Jennings has yet to concede the race.

Jennings spokesman David Kochman said in a statement that the audit was flawed.

Panel Cites Voter Error, Not Software, In Loss Of Votes (NYT)

By Christopher Drew

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

Florida election officials announced yesterday that an examination of voting software did not find any malfunctions that could have caused up to 18,000 votes to be lost in a disputed Congressional race in Sarasota County, and they suggested that voter confusion over a poor ballot design was mainly to blame.

The finding, reached unanimously by a team of computer experts from several universities, could finally settle last fall's closest federal election. The Republican candidate, Vern Buchanan, was declared the winner by 369 votes, but the Democrat, Christine Jennings, formally contested the results, claiming that the touch-screen voting machines must have malfunctioned.

Legal precedents make it difficult to win a lawsuit over ballot design, but a substantial error in the software might have been grounds for a new election.

The questions about the electronic machines arose because many voters complained that they had had trouble getting their votes to register for Ms. Jennings, and the machines did not have a back-up paper trail that might have provided clues about any problems. The report said some voters might have accidentally touched the screen twice, thus negating their votes, while most of the others probably overlooked the race on the flawed ballot.

Still, the difficulty in resolving these complaints has helped fuel a drive in Congress to ban the paperless machines. Voting experts said the audit of the software code also was the first time any state had gone to such lengths to resolve a close election.

While some voters in Sarasota bristled yesterday at the idea that they had done anything wrong in casting their votes, or that nearly 13 percent of all voters could have failed to spot the race on the ballot, members of the investigative team said that those remained the only plausible theories.

DOJ_NMG_0136903

The report acknowledged that the huge undervote — in which voters cast a ballot in other races but not for the Congressional seat — was both "abnormal and unexpected." But it said that all eight members of the investigative team, including some experts who have long been skeptical about the paperless machines, agreed that the basic programming "did not cause or contribute to" the loss of votes.

The study suggested instead that the confusion over the ballot design, which had also drawn complaints from voters, probably accounted for the bulk of the problem, much as the infamous "butterfly ballot" distorted the vote in Palm Beach County, Fla., during the 2000 presidential election.

In the Sarasota race, the names of Mr. Buchanan and Ms. Jennings were sandwiched between larger lists of candidates for the United States Senate and for governor. The House race was also squeezed in at the top of a ballot screen, and it lacked the kind of colorful headings that highlighted the other races.

Ms. Jennings said in an interview yesterday that further investigation should still be done. Hayden Dempsey, a lawyer for Mr. Buchanan, who was seated in the House last month pending the outcome of the challenges, said the state had now "looked at every aspect of the election and found nothing wrong."

Clare Ward-Jenkins, a Sarasota resident who had trouble registering her vote, said she felt insulted by the report's implication that "we're too stupid to know how to vote."

Ms. Ward-Jenkins and more than 100 other voters contacted The Sarasota Herald-Tribune shortly after the election to complain that even though an "X" appeared on the touchscreen when they pressed the box for Ms. Jennings, their votes had disappeared by the time they got to a final screen for reviewing their choices. Ms. Ward-Jenkins and most of the others said they had to go through the process at least one more time to make their votes stick, raising concerns in the Jennings camp that other voters might have failed to notice similar problems that voided their ballots.

The report also left open the possibility that aging hardware could have caused isolated problems. But the investigative team leader, Alec Yasinsac, a computer science professor at Florida State University, and David Wagner, a professor at the University of California, Berkeley, both said in interviews that if there had been any widespread problems, they would have affected other races as well.

"I'm persuaded that this wasn't caused by machine failure," Professor Wagner said.

But other voting experts said that because the machines used in the election have been sequestered by a court, only a portion of them have been examined closely.

The software experts said they also found several security vulnerabilities in the programming for the voting machines, made by Election Systems and Software in Omaha. But the report said there was no evidence that any of them had affected the Sarasota race.

Edward W. Felten, a Princeton University computer scientist, wrote last night that the security weaknesses need to be fixed before this type of machine is used again. He also wrote: "The study claims to have ruled out reliability problems as a cause of the undervotes, but their evidence on this point is weak, and I think the jury is still out on whether voting machine malfunctions could be a significant cause of the undervotes."

David Dill, a Stanford University professor who has been critical of the machines, added that the study "is an admirable, but limited, piece of work" and could not rule out all possible errors.

Vilsack Drops Out Of Prez Race (DMR)

Des Moines Register, February 24, 2007

Former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack withdrew as a candidate for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination today, saying he could not raise enough money to compete with his nationally known rivals.

"This process has become to a great extent about money, a lot of money," Vilsack said during a late morning news conference at his campaign headquarters in Des Moines.

"And it is clear to me that we would not be able to continue to raise money in the amounts necessary to sustain, not just a campaign in Iowa and New Hampshire, but a campaign across this country," he said. "So it is money and only money that is the reason we are leaving today."

DOJ_NMG_0136904

The news ends Vilsack's bid less than four months after he launched a federal campaign organization on Nov. 9.

Polls showed Vilsack trailing three better-known candidates in Iowa, scheduled to host the leadoff presidential nominating caucuses in less than 11 months.

However, Vilsack said in bowing out today that he had developed an Iowa organization that put him in a position to win the caucuses.

With his wife, Christie, and two adult sons at his side, he thanked his staff and key supporters. The campaign had seven field offices throughout the state and had put out a statement this month claiming the campaign had 1,000 activists who had promised to caucus for the former governor.

Former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards has led in early Iowa polls, followed by Illinois Sen. Barack Obama and New York Sen. Hillary Clinton.

Vilsack raised more than $1 million between his campaign launch in November and the end of the year, most of which came in a fund-raiser held in Des Moines during his ceremonial kickoff week.

But Clinton, Obama and others are expected to have raised much more since launching their campaigns last month.

The Iowa polls were also a factor, he said. Vilsack said it had been difficult to tell potential donors "that you're not the prohibitive favorite in the caucus process."

Vilsack declined to say whether he would endorse one of his former rivals. But he advised the still large field of candidates organizing in Iowa to avoid blockbuster campaign events and meet party activists one-on-one.

"Here's my hope and my prayer, that you understand that it isn't just about large crowds. It isn't just about the cameras," he said, speaking to the Democrats who remain in the race. "It's about ordinary folks in living rooms, and kitchens and church basements, who genuinely care about this country who need to be listened to and need to have an opportunity to interact with candidates."

The former Mount Pleasant mayor and state senator, who won an unlikely

victory to governor in 1998, said the outsider campaign he launched on Nov. 9 was his life's first undertaking where hard work was not enough.

He affirmed the two major policy positions he had outlined in recent weeks: One calling on Congress to cut off money to support the Iraq war and the other, a detailed 50-year plan to convert the nation's energy system to renewable sources.

Vilsack said public financing for campaigns would have put him on a more level playing field with his better-financed rivals.

"I think we have to have a real debate about public financing and the ability for the primary and caucus process to be about ideas," he said.

Vilsack, First Democrat In, Is Quickly Out (WP)

By Dan Balz, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 24, 2007

Former Iowa Governor Cites Financial Demands in Ending Bid for Presidency

Former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack, the first Democrat to announce a 2008 candidacy for the White House, abruptly dropped out of the race yesterday, a victim of the prodigious fundraising demands of an early-starting campaign and the star appeal of rivals Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.).

"This process has become to a great extent about money -- a lot of money," Vilsack said at a news conference in Des Moines yesterday. "And it is clear to me that we would not be able to continue to raise money in the amounts necessary to sustain not just a campaign in Iowa and New Hampshire but a campaign across this country. So it is money and only money that is the reason that we are leaving today."

Vilsack, who called for a swift end to the Iraq war and proposed an ambitious plan for reducing dependence on foreign oil, was considered a long shot for the nomination, so his early departure does not fundamentally change the shape of the Democratic contest. But it does change the dynamic in Iowa, the state whose caucuses will kick off the nomination battle early next year.

DOJ_NMG_0136905

Rival campaigns immediately began scrambling for endorsements of Iowa elected officials and prominent party activists and to hire Vilsack staff members. Clinton's team was on the phone reconnecting with Iowa activists with whom she and her husband, former president Bill Clinton, have had relationships dating back years. Obama made calls into both Iowa and New Hampshire to speak with Vilsack supporters, encouraging them to join his campaign.

None of the other candidates had conceded Iowa to Vilsack, as Democratic candidates did in 1992 when Sen. Tom Harkin of Iowa was seeking the Democratic nomination. But Vilsack's presence in the race -- he had vowed to win the caucuses when he launched his campaign -- offered at least a thin rationale for a poor finish by those in the top tier of the Democratic field.

For the leading candidates -- Clinton, Obama and former senator John Edwards of North Carolina -- that excuse is now gone, adding to the pressure on each of them to organize the state as early as possible or risk an embarrassing finish, Democratic strategists said yesterday.

Vilsack's decision underscored the enormous financial challenges facing lesser-known candidates as they compete for contributions against Clinton and Obama. It also highlighted how the intense start to the 2008 campaign has dramatically escalated the cost of running, even in the opening months of competition.

In past years, candidates rarely dropped out until they had spent three to six months trying to raise money. This year, however, candidates have been forced to build larger campaign operations and begin serious organizing earlier than ever.

"This is a nomination process on steroids," said Josh Earnest, Vilsack's press secretary. "It started earlier than anybody expected, and it's requiring more money than ever before."

Jerry Crawford, one of the leading Democratic strategists in Iowa, said everyone knew that Clinton would be a formidable fundraiser, but "when Obama got in the race, it just took all the cash out of the room and all of the fundraisers out the room."

Vilsack formally launched his candidacy Nov. 30 and raised about $1.13 million by year's end. Aides said he was on track to add only about $1.3 million more by the end of the first quarter -- an amount Obama raised at a Hollywood fundraiser on Tuesday -- and already was in debt.

Strategists predicted yesterday that the same problem could befall other second-tier candidates -- particularly later this year, a point when fundraising generally becomes more difficult for most campaigns.

Vilsack served two terms as governor of Iowa and developed a reputation as one of the most thoughtful students of public policy among the nation's governors. He served as chairman of the Democratic Governors Association and was a leading voice in the National Governors Association.

Vilsack Ends Bid For Presidency (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 23 — Former Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa ended his candidacy for the Democratic presidential nomination on Friday, saying the crowded field had made it impossible for him to raise enough money to remain competitive in an accelerated coast-to-coast campaign.

After making his announcement, Mr. Vilsack spent the afternoon taking calls from former rivals. They sent their best wishes, even as they began seeking his endorsement in Iowa, where the caucus early next year will kick off the process of selecting a nominee.

“I’m not thinking about that today,” Mr. Vilsack said in a telephone interview, pausing for a moment after juggling a string of calls from a variety of suitors, including Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton and Barack Obama.

Candidates also issued statements praising his candidacy.

Mr. Vilsack was the first Democratic candidate to enter the 2008 race, opening his campaign on Nov. 30 as the not-from-Washington candidate who pledged to renew a forgotten sense of community across America. He also became one of the most outspoken critics of the Iraq war and called for an immediate withdrawal of American troops.

But Mr. Vilsack, 56, said he struggled to compete financially in a field of nine candidates, particularly as California, Texas, Florida and Illinois are among the states working to move up the dates of their primary elections next year and candidates are expected to campaign earlier in these states. Already in debt, he said he wanted to abandon his bid before his finances worsened.

DOJ_NMG_0136906

"So much of this process now is about perception and money," Mr. Vilsack said, lamenting the end of the days when a long-shot candidate could prosper by courting one voter at a time. "In a setting where you have thousands of people in a convention center, it's hard to develop a relationship or intimacy."

Earlier, at a news conference in Des Moines, he said: "I came up against something for the first time in my life that hard work and effort couldn't overcome. I just couldn't work harder, couldn't give it enough."

The scramble set off by his announcement was not only for Mr. Vilsack's endorsement, but also for his Iowa advisers and supporters, all of whom are seen as immensely valuable to other candidates. Officials from at least four other campaigns called the Vilsack headquarters on Friday, searching for a staff list.

Monica Fischer, a top Iowa activist and Vilsack loyalist, said: "It is a whole new day in Iowa. It's a sad day for the people who supported him, but it opens everything up for the caucuses now."

Ms. Fischer added, "Everybody will be waiting to see who he supports and where his supporters and staff go."

In the three months of his candidacy, Mr. Vilsack faced a burden unlike that of any other person in the race: persuading voters in his own state to view him as presidential material. The steady parade of high-profile, well-financed rivals in his own backyard complicated his efforts.

Still, Mr. Vilsack's decision to end his campaign startled many of his admirers in Iowa and across the country. Only two days ago, he appeared alongside his fellow Democratic candidates at a forum in Nevada, and he was scheduled to attend a campaign rally Friday evening in Iowa.

But early Friday morning, he began making calls to party officials and supporters, saying his campaign was spending more money than it was taking in. A few hours later, at his news conference, he criticized the intense focus placed upon fund-raising and urged candidates to continue on-the-ground campaigning in early voting states.

"It is money and only money that is the reason we are leaving today," Mr. Vilsack said, adding that presidential campaigns should be publicly financed.

While Mr. Vilsack reported raising $1.1 million from Nov. 9 to Dec. 31, according to campaign finance reports, he had spent all but $396,000 by the end of the year. After Mr. Obama, of Illinois, and Mrs. Clinton, of New York, entered the race in late January, Mr. Vilsack's advisers said, he struggled to raise money.

During his brief campaign, Mr. Vilsack sought to use his life story as an American metaphor: from orphaned infant in Pittsburgh to governor of Iowa, the native state of his college sweetheart-turned-wife, Christie. He served as mayor of Mount Pleasant, Iowa, and as state senator, and in 1998 he was elected governor. He served two terms.

"This has been a great experience," Mr. Vilsack said Friday. "When you start out life in an orphanage and you run for president of the United States, that's what this country is supposed to be about."

Hirshberg: Vilsack's Exit "A Bit Of A Tragedy" (NHUL)

By John DiStaso

New Hampshire Union Leader, February 24, 2007

Stonyfield Farms chief executive Gary Hirshberg says Barack Obama telephoned him asking for support "literally 120 seconds" after word of Tom Vilsack's exit from the Presidential race became public.

Hirshberg, one of only two well-known New Hampshire backers of the Democratic former Iowa governor's short-lived Presidential effort, said yesterday Vilsack called him on Thursday night to say he would be dropping out of the campaign.

State Rep. Jim Ryan, a longtime friend who organized Vilsack's announcement tour in New Hampshire in December, said he heard from Vilsack yesterday morning.

"He said, 'I can't financially compete in 10 front-loaded markets, and being a frugal man, I not going to go into personal debt,'" Ryan said.

DOJ_NMG_0136907

Hirshberg called Vilsack's decision "a bit of a tragedy" because it shows that the nominating process has become so front-loaded and money-oriented that lesser-known, less flashy and relatively under-funded candidates quickly realize they no longer have a chance to win their parties' nominations.

State Democratic Party Chairman Kathy Sullivan agreed, blaming Vilsack's exit on the unchecked rush to the front of the nominating calendars by nearly two dozen states, including the populous and expensive California, Florida and New Jersey.

"We still continue to hear nothing from either (national) party's leadership on what will be done to stop the front-loading of the primary calendar so candidates can have a chance to raise the funds they need," Sullivan said. "How many qualified and dynamic leaders do we have to lose in this race before something is done?"

Ryan targeted Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean.

"I'm slightly less and furious at him," Ryan said. "He should know better. He achieved national fame through retail politics, and he initiated this process in the name of diversity. It created a pell-mell rush to the front."

Dean supported opening the primary and caucus calendar through a DNC review that ended with Nevada and South Carolina joining New Hampshire and Iowa's traditional early contests.

"I get the sense it's payback because he lost" the New Hampshire primary in 2004, Ryan said.

Hirshberg said, "We now have an 'American Idol' approach to choosing our President now. It's all about name recognition. That is not consistent with the New Hampshire tradition."

Obama is a chief beneficiary of the current "rock-star" mentality in politics, but Hirshberg said the Illinois senator's call to him "in some respects vindicated the New Hampshire process. He raised $1.3 million in Hollywood the other night, but at the same time, he's picking up the phone and calling a New Hampshire businessman."

Hirshberg said he has not decided on a future endorsement, but, said he and Obama "had a good talk and we agreed absolutely to meet on his next visit. I'm sure we'll host him here at Stonyfield," a nationally known producer of organic yogurt.

Hirshberg called Vilsack "an absolutely superb candidate, qualified by any measure. He has been successful in a bi-partisan environment, which I consider to be a requirement for our next President."

Hirshberg said the he does not blame the media for identifying front-runners early in the process.

He said the public has "a desperate hunger to find an alternative to what's going on in Washington. People are eager to pick a winner right now. They want an election today."

Hirshberg said Vilsack's exit shows a need for the country to seriously consider public financing of campaigns in order to level the playing field.

Sullivan also praised Vilsack's "wisdom, experience and optimism," and said he and his family "spent a lot of time talking to and meeting people all across New Hampshire, not only embarrassing our grassroots process but thriving in it."

Ryan said he "felt real bad" for Vilsack, just as he did for former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner and Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh, Democrats who also decided against running for financial reasons.

"With Florida, California, New Jersey, Alabama and the rest of the states moving up," Ryan said, "we may well end up with a national primary on February 5 and you're going to have to have millions to be competitive."

Ryan said he also heard from a candidate yesterday, but refused to name the person. He also heard from four campaigns, but told them, "We haven't had the wake so I wasn't about to make those decisions yet."

Former Iowa Gov. Vilsack Ending '08 Bid (AP)

AP, February 23, 2007

DES MOINES, Iowa (AP) -- Democrat Tom Vilsack, the former Iowa governor who built a centrist image, abandoned his bid for the presidency on Friday after struggling against better-known, better-financed rivals.

"It is money and only money that is the reason we are leaving today," Vilsack told reporters at a news conference, later adding, "We have a debt we're going to have to work our way through."

Vilsack, 56, left office in January and traveled to early voting states, but he attracted neither the attention nor the campaign cash of his top-tier rivals -- Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, Sen. Barack Obama and John Edwards. He even faced obstacles in his home state.

DOJ_NMG_0136908

In the most recent financial documents, Vilsack reported raising more than $1.1 million in the last seven weeks of 2006 but only had around $396,000 in the bank. Some campaign finance experts contend candidates will need $20 million by June 2007 to remain viable.

"I came up against something for the first time in my life that hard work and effort couldn't overcome," he said, his wife, Christie, and two grown sons at his side. "I just couldn't work any harder, couldn't give it enough."

Vilsack's withdrawal still leaves a crowded field of eight Democrats. He will remain an important figure in the presidential race as former rivals undoubtedly will seek his endorsement and help to win Iowa.

Vilsack, who likely will be considered as a vice presidential nominee, repeatedly declined to endorse another candidate at his news conference.

Other campaigns immediately began to seek out Vilsack's well-respected staff, hoping to pick up talented political operatives with experience in the first nominating state, and his political backers.

Gary Hirshberg, CEO and founder of Stonyfield Farm yogurt, was one of Vilsack's earliest and most prominent New Hampshire supporters. He said two minutes after Vilsack's announcement, Obama called seeking his support. Hirshberg told Obama he wasn't ready to commit to another candidate yet.

"Although we're absolutely undecided, I was very impressed," Hirshberg said. "Though we can wring our hands now about the role of money in these campaigns, it's still really vindicating to me to see, particularly here in New Hampshire, that grass-roots, house-to-house, person-to-person politics is still the order of the day. I think Senator Obama just proved that."

Vilsack was the first Democrat to formally enter the 2008 race when he announced his candidacy in November. His February departure underscores the warp speed of the 2008 race. In previous presidential cycles, candidates didn't announce until the fall, just a few months before the first caucuses and primaries, not more than a year before.

Trying to counter perceptions that as one of the least known of the prospective candidates he was too much of an underdog to succeed, Vilsack said in a campaign video: "I've never started a race that I've been expected to win, and I've never lost."

But the struggle for money proved too difficult, leaving a debt that Hirshberg described in the "hundreds of thousands."

"I told Tom last night that a number of us intend to get to Des Moines after the dust settles and help retire that debt, to do something, even if we have to sell yogurt in the street," Hirshberg said.

As governor of Iowa, Vilsack had carved out a reputation as a centrist balancing his state's budget and refusing to raise taxes, while emphasizing increased spending on such priorities as education, health care and higher wages. Until recently he chaired the Democratic Leadership Council, the party's signature centrist group.

Vilsack initially made the focus of his long-shot campaign a plan to end U.S dependence on foreign oil by promoting alternative energy sources.

"Energy security will revitalize rural America, re-establish our moral leadership on global warming and climate security, and eliminate our addiction to foreign oil," Vilsack, a prominent proponent of ethanol, biodiesel and wind power, said at the time.

More recently, Vilsack has been among the more aggressive Democratic candidates in his call to bring U.S. troops home from Iraq, calling for Congress to cut off funding.

Beyond his record as governor, Vilsack tried to sell himself as a candidate with a compelling personal story, which he hoped would spark national interest in his candidacy. He was left as an infant at a Catholic orphanage in Pittsburgh and adopted by what he has described as a "troubled but loving family."

His parents were well-to-do and sent him to a private preparatory school, but his mother was an alcoholic who beat him and his father suffered trying financial reversals.

Vilsack managed to transcend his difficult childhood to build a successful career in law and politics, serving as a mayor, state senator and two terms as Iowa governor.

In a sign that Vilsack might abandon the race, he recently accepted a position lecturing at the Drake University Law School in Des Moines and had become a consultant for MidAmerican Energy Co.

Vilsack Calls It Quits For '08 (WT)

DOJ_NMG_0136909

By S.A. Miller, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 24, 2007

Tom Vilsack, the first Democrat to officially enter the 2008 presidential race, dropped his bid for the White House yesterday, saying he could not raise enough money to compete and underscoring the power of top-tier candidates Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Barack Obama to crowd out the rest of the field.

"We have everything to win the nomination and general election -- everything except money," he told supporters at his campaign headquarters in Des Moines, Iowa, as he announced his decision.

He will be viewed as a casualty of the new campaign world, in which big states such as California, Florida and New Jersey are considering moving up their primaries and in which $100 million is considered the ante.

Even as a former governor of Iowa, who should have had an edge in that state's early primary season caucuses, Mr. Vilsack had struggled to attract money and attention from Mrs. Clinton, Mr. Obama and former Democratic vice presidential nominee John Edwards.

Mr. Vilsack, 56, said he had expected to win the Iowa caucus and finish near the top in the New Hampshire primary.

But he said that wouldn't be enough to win the race and that mounting debt forced him to call it quits.

"At the end of the day, it is not about good ideas or hard work; it's about money," he said later in a conference call with reporters.

His exit leaves eight confirmed candidates in the Democratic contest, with Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Obama leading the pack, and Mr. Edwards performing well in Iowa polls.

Mrs. Clinton, 59, and Mr. Obama, 45, also likely lead in fundraising for what is shaping up to be the most expensive presidential campaign in history, possibly costing $1 billion.

The campaign ended for Mr. Vilsack a little more than three months after he declared his candidacy Nov. 8 -- the day after midterm elections swept Democrats into control of the U.S. Senate and House of Representatives for the first time in a dozen years.

Mr. Vilsack wasn't the first to bow out, nor was his the shortest-lived run.

Sen. Evan Bayh, Indiana Democrat, threw in the towel in December less than two weeks after setting up his exploratory committee.

Mr. Vilsack, high on the list of vice presidential prospects in 2004, remains an attractive running mate in 2008. However, he said the No. 2 spot was "the furthest thing from my mind today."

Mrs. Clinton said she had "deep admiration" for Mr. Vilsack and his wife, Christie. She said she looked forward to hearing more ideas from the former governor, who had made the Iraq war and energy policy the focus of his campaign.

"We share a passion for protecting America's young people through expanded health care options, early childhood education initiatives and opening the doors to higher education to every American."

Mr. Obama called him "an outstanding public servant" and said his education, health care and energy policies made Iowa a model state.

"More than that, Tom brings a badly needed sense of honor and decency to our politics," said Mr. Obama, who has tried to stay above the political fray to distinguish himself from the perceived bare-knuckle campaigning by Mrs. Clinton.

Practically every poll shows Mrs. Clinton with a double-digit lead over Mr. Obama, who is double digits ahead of the next closest competitor.

Still, Mrs. Clinton is dogged by her 2002 vote authorizing the Iraq war and speculation on the left that she is unelectable.

Mr. Vilsack has always polled near the bottom, and several Democrats not in the race -- former Vice President Al Gore and retired Gen. Wesley Clark -- have closely trailed Mr. Obama.

Among Democrats in the race, only Mr. Edwards consistently garners about 10 percent in polls.

A Quinnipiac University poll of Democratic voters last week showed Mrs. Clinton with 38 percent, Mr. Obama with 23 percent, Mr. Gore with 11 percent and Mr. Edwards with 6 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0136910

The next closest candidates, Mr. Clark and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, each received 2 percent. Mr. Vilsack, Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich of Ohio and Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware and Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut each garnered 1 percent or less.

The remaining Democratic candidate, former Sen. Mike Gravel of Alaska, was not mentioned in the poll.

Vilsack Exits Presidential Race, Citing Lack Of Funding (LAT)

By Mark Z. Barabak

The Los Angeles Times, February 24, 2007

Tom Vilsack's abrupt departure from the presidential race Friday underscores the indispensable role of money in the contest, as well as an attention gap between voters and political insiders.

Less than three months after becoming the first major Democratic candidate to formally announce his bid, Vilsack reluctantly made his exit at a Des Moines news conference.

"It is money and only money that is the reason we are leaving," the former Iowa governor said. He had begun mulling a pullout several days before making his final decision Thursday, in the face of a severe cash crunch.

"I came up against something for the time in my life that hard work and effort couldn't overcome," Vilsack said. "I just couldn't work any harder, couldn't give it enough."

His withdrawal leaves a Democratic field dominated by Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois — and, to a lesser degree, former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina. Several other candidates are fighting, as Vilsack did, to elbow their way into that top tier.

"In a normal year, a successful governor — no less from Iowa, the first voting state — would be an ideal candidate," said Thomas Schaller, a University of Maryland expert on the presidential nominating process. "But this is a cycle where you have these two titans in Obama and Clinton, and they're sucking all the oxygen and the majority of money out of the race before it's even begun."

Vilsack's announcement came on the same day a new national poll showed that about three in 10 Democrats were paying attention to the presidential race, and fewer than half volunteered a candidate they might support. The survey showed Clinton and Obama running far ahead of the party pack.

"Despite the accelerated campaign, it's not something that's really engaging the public to any great extent," said Andrew Kohut, director of the Pew Research Center for the People & the Press, which conducted the poll.

But at this stage of the contest the candidates are playing to a much narrower audience — courting key activists and donors. It was in the latter category in particular that Vilsack was lagging far behind. He reported raising $1.1 million between his November campaign launch and the end of the year — less than Obama raised in a single night this week in Beverly Hills.

In a conference call with reporters after his Friday announcement, Vilsack said he had been contemplating his exit for some time. He pressed on with his candidacy, however, delivering a speech on energy independence in San Francisco, appearing on "The Tonight Show With Jay Leno" and drawing favorable reviews for his performance Wednesday at a candidate's forum in Carson City, Nev. He emerged as an especially vocal critic of the war in Iraq.

But financial realities — and especially the prospect of going deeply into debt — weighed heavily on Vilsack.

"You can spin whether $20 million can compete with $100 million," Vilsack's campaign manager, Craig Varoga, said of the financial disadvantage the ex-governor probably would have faced. "But you cannot spin solvency.

"So we just made a very responsible fiscal decision."

The departure of Vilsack is not expected to greatly alter the race. He trailed in polls even in his home state, which is scheduled to hold its precinct caucuses Jan. 14. But his absence will free up donors and Iowa activists whose expertise is highly valued; after Vilsack's announcement, his erstwhile rivals wasted no time.

"There's nobody, with the possible exception of John Edwards, who has anything remotely resembling a statewide organization," said Gordon Fischer, a former chairman of the Iowa Democratic Party who received a call Friday from Obama.

"It really opens up the state in a way it wasn't before."

DOJ_NMG_0136911

Unhappy with all the attention showered on Iowa — as well as New Hampshire, which hosts the nation's first primary — several states have moved to push up their nominating contests. That may create what amounts to a national primary Feb. 5, probably including California and several other big states. That, in turn, has put a premium on the kind of early, frenzied fundraising that Vilsack lamented Friday.

"This process has become a great deal about money," he said. "A lot of money."

His exit marks the third departure of a serious contender from the Democratic race in the last few months. Sen. Evan Bayh of Indiana — who for years inched toward an all-out run for the White House — decided in December that he could not compete as an underdog in today's campaign environment. Former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner announced in October that he was abandoning his presidential effort, citing family considerations.

Speaking to reporters Friday in a firm if somber tone, Vilsack said it was too early to consider endorsing another candidate and brushed aside a question about whether he would be interested in being considered for vice president, as he was in 2004.

"To be honest with you," Vilsack said, "that's about the furthest thing from my mind today."

Vilsack Drops Out Of '08 Race, Cites Money As Reason (HILL)

By Klaus Marre

The Hill, February 23, 2007

Facing better-known candidates with deeper pockets, former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack (D) declared Friday that he would bow out of the 2008 presidential race. The decision will shift the balance of power in Iowa, which holds the first caucus of the primary season and is an important bellwether for candidates.

Flanked by his family, Vilsack declared he would drop out of the race for the sole reason that he would not be able to financially sustain a national campaign.

"It is money and only money that is the reason that we are leaving today," Vilsack said in Des Moines, Iowa. He lamented that the primary process has become "to a great degree" about raising campaign cash.

As a former two-term governor of Iowa, Vilsack had significant support there and polled in the double digits. But nationally, Vilsack trailed far behind name-brand Democratic candidates like Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) and Barack Obama (Ill.), as well as former vice presidential candidate John Edwards.

These top-tier candidates are now expected to vie for Vilsack's endorsement in the state, or at least to bring his supporters to their camps.

Vilsack, a centrist who ran as a Washington outsider, focused his campaign on ensuring energy security, getting U.S. troops out of Iraq and making healthcare more affordable.

Vilsack Drops Presidential Bid (DMR)

By David Yepsen

Des Moines Register, February 23, 2007

Former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack plans to drop out of the 2008 race for president later this morning because he lost the 2007 money primary.

His move will make the 2008 Iowa Democratic caucuses just a bit more important to the other candidates.

Key insiders cited Vilsackâ€™s inability to raise enough cash to compete against the two financial powerhouses in the race, Hillary Rodham Clinton and Barack Obama.

Vilsackâ€™s departure does little to change the nature of the national race - he was getting less than 1 percent in the polls.Â But it does reconfigure the Iowa caucus fight where he was running in third or fourth place and found support in the 10 percent to 15 percent range.

Many of his Iowa supporters - key organizational Democrats in some counties - will now be in the market for another candidate and the scramble will be on.Â A scramble will also be on for his staffers, many of whom are talented political operatives who know Iowa well.

DOJ_NMG_0136912

Historically, when a candidate drops out of the race, caucus supporters of that candidate go â€œundecidedâ€ for a while as they re-examine the field.Â That can be expected in this case as well because there is no clear heir to Vilsackâ€™s support.Â Clinton, Obama and John Edwards are all in a position to claim a portion of Vilsackâ€™s people.

One immediate effect on the race is to make the Iowa caucuses even more important.Â With no favorite son candidate in the field, Iowa again becomes a level playing field for the others.Â As long as Vilsack was in the race, many in the political community thought contests in Nevada and New Hampshire might prove to be fairer tests of strength for the other candidates.

Vilsack was always considered a long-shot for the nomination, in part because of the financial mountain he had to climb.Â Federal law limited him to raising $2,300 per person and he could not use money from a gubernatorial account to finance his bid. Obama and Clinton could transfer money from their Senate accounts, which means they could raise more per donor than Vilsack could.

Vilsack was also burning through about $500,000 a month in overhead expenses.Â While thatâ€™s a frugal operation by presidential campaign standards, itâ€™s a lot of money to raise, especially for a one percenter.

While Friday is a sad, though not unexpected, day for Vilsack and his supporters, they can take some solace in knowing he comes out of the race in a better political position than he entered.

As a result of his effort, he became better known to the nation's political and media communities.Â He presented himself well during the campaign, made no gaffes and can leave the race with his head up and with an enhanced stature.

Harkin Aide: 'No Truth' To Retirement Rumor (RC)

By Nicole Duran

RollCall.com, February 23, 2007

With former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack's decision today to end his quest for the Democratic presidential nomination, an aide to Sen. Tom Harkin (D-Iowa) shot down speculation that Harkin would not seek re-election and pave the way for Vilsack to run for Senate.

Some Democrats believed that the 67-year-old Senate Agriculture chairman would ultimately forgo a fifth term, but stall long enough to allow Vilsack to switch gears and take his place in the 2008 Senate race.

The theory was that the longer Harkin waited before formally announcing a decision, the less time potential Republican candidates would have to prepare to run for an open seat. Money Vilsack raised for his presidential bid could be transferred to a Senate campaign fund.

But Harkin, through a spokeswoman, again dismissed such talk this afternoon.

After speaking to Harkin, Maureen Knightly, his communications director, said there is "no truth" to the "conspiracy theory."

"He dislikes this lengthy campaign process," she said in explaining why he will not just say that he is running again.

"He's doing everything he can right now to prepare for a run and he's actively raising money," Knightly added.

Harkin's schedule is packed with fundraisers and he is hiring more campaign staff, Democrats in Washington, D.C., and Iowa point out.

He began the year with more than $1.1 million in his war chest, according to his latest campaign finance report.

He raised $363,000 in the last quarter of 2006 and listed five people on his campaign payroll.

Last month, Harkin told Capitol Hill reporters: "Don't put a lot of stock in that right now," when a comment by Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee Chairman Charles Schumer (N.Y.) about Harkin's reluctance to announce a re-election bid set tongues wagging about Harkin's political future.

Harkin refused to announce his re-election plans because modern campaigns are "too long," he said then.

Rommey Amused As Clinton, Obama Go After Each Other (AP)

By Glen Johnson

AP, February 23, 2007

MERRIMACK – Republican Presidential hopeful Mitt Romney said yesterday he relishes the infighting that has distracted two of his potential Democratic opponents, Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois.

DOJ_NMG_0136913

"It's great, isn't it?" Romney said to peals of laughter from crowd of employees at a solar-related equipment plant on the newly declared candidate's first visit to the leadoff Presidential primary state. "I love to see it when it happens on the other side."

The former Massachusetts governor described his leading Republican rivals, Sen. John McCain of Arizona and former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani, as "friends" and "national heroes," before adding, "I respect them. I'm sure we'll disagree on issues from time to time, but I doubt you'll see the rancor that apparently may exist elsewhere."

Earlier this week, Clinton aides called on Obama to repudiate criticism of the former first lady leveled by Hollywood producer David Geffen, a former Clinton backer now supporting Obama. Obama refused, saying Geffen spoke for himself.

The former Massachusetts governor's main message to workers during the visit was that it doesn't make sense for the country to send its oil dollars to nations that dislike the United States, so he's developing a plan for energy independence in the not-too-distant future.

?Romney: Divest from Iran

Expanding the use of wind, solar, nuclear and improved coal technologies could help the nation create as much energy as it uses within 20 to 30 years, some experts believe, a timeframe Romney cited but would not embrace until he delivers his formal speech on the subject at some future date.

"It doesn't make sense for us not to become increasingly energy independent, and for that to happen, we're going to have to rely on technology, innovation of the same kind that you're seeing right here," Romney told about 100 employees at GT Solar Inc., which makes equipment in turn used to construct solar energy panels.

"It will be the vision of that program to have America to produce as much energy as we use," Romney said.

Romney had been scheduled to visit New Hampshire amid a campaign announcement tour that also took him to early voting Iowa, South Carolina, Florida and Michigan, but he had to postpone his trip after a heavy snowstorm closed schools and highways.

Obama Reels In Austin Crowd (DMN)

By Wayne Slater

The Dallas Morning News, February 24, 2007

Sea of people brushes off rain to hear Democrat's promise of change

AUSTIN – Thousands of people jammed a lakeside venue used for rock concerts to hear Democratic presidential hopeful Barack Obama promise Friday to "galvanize a movement for change" in American politics.

The crowd – extraordinarily large for so early in a presidential campaign – cheered Mr. Obama's call to withdraw U.S. troops from Iraq and his denunciation of the Bush administration.

"The American people are tired of being afraid," the senator said. "They are tired of being pitted against each other."

Standing on a stage surrounded by a sea of supporters waving blue "Obama '08" placards, the Illinois Democrat presented himself as "an agent for change in Washington" who would unite an electorate polarized by fractious politics and an unpopular war.

"Regardless of what divides us, regardless of our differences in race and religion and political party, there is more than binds us together than drives us apart," he said.

The rally was Mr. Obama's first visit to Texas since formally announcing his candidacy for the Democratic nomination two weeks ago. He attended private fundraisers in Houston and Austin before Friday's midafternoon rally. Mr. Obama's campaign estimated that 20,000 people came to Austin's downtown Town Lake to see the candidate.

Many in the crowd were young and had waited hours in intermittent rain to see the political newcomer. Bands served as a warm-up; one rapper punctuated the chorus "Everything I do will be funky," with shouts of "Obama!"

The rally was an unusual burst of campaign activity long before Election Day, reflecting the full-bore contest already under way in both parties. Mr. Obama did not mention Democratic rival Hillary Rodham Clinton by name, but he alluded to her twice in seeking to contrast himself.

DOJ_NMG_0136914

He noted his recent fundraising swing through Hollywood, which sparked a war of words between the Clinton camp and a top Obama supporter. And he made the point that he has opposed the war in Iraq since 2002 – a key distinction with Mrs. Clinton, who voted to authorize the invasion.

"I said we should not give open-ended authority to a president because it would lead to an open-ended occupation," he said.

A top Clinton political supporter in Texas, former land commissioner Garry Mauro, acknowledged that Mr. Obama is charismatic but suggested the political newcomer is effectively auditioning for a second spot on the ticket.

"Two years ago, we were not sure a woman could be elected president," he said. "The polls clearly show that's not the case anymore. The same polls don't show that's the case for an African-American.

"What we're seeing at this point is the process of the American people deciding whether they are ready to elect an African-American president or vice president," he said. "It's a fascinating thing to watch."

In his 35-minute speech, Mr. Obama took sharp aim at the Bush administration, at one point ridiculing Vice President Dick Cheney for suggesting the decision by British Prime Minister Tony Blair to withdraw 1,600 troops form Iraq was a positive sign. He noted the U.S. is sending another 22,000 troops in.

"Now, keep in mind, this is the same guy that said we'd be greeted as liberators, the same guy that said that we're in the last throes. I'm sure he forecast sun today," he said amid the Austin rain. "When Dick Cheney says it's a good thing, you know that you've probably got some big problems."

A spokeswoman for Mr. Cheney said Friday that he had no comment.

In addition to his call for America to set a timetable for withdrawal of troops from Iraq by March 31 next year, Mr. Obama said he supports universal health care and programs to increase access to education.

And he noted that New Orleans "still looks like a war has been fought" and pledged to spend money to rebuild the city ravaged by Hurricane Katrina.

Obama, Rezko Neighborly Relationship Ends (CHIT)

By David Jackson, Ray Gibson

Chicago Tribune, February 24, 2007

A land sale recorded this month ended the neighborly relationship between U.S. Sen. Barack Obama and indicted political insider Antoin "Tony" Rezko, Obama's friend and former fundraiser.

On Dec. 28, 2006, land records show, Rezko's wife, Rita, sold the garden lot she owned next to Obama's home, transferring it to a company that plans to develop housing there. That sale deed became public this month when it was registered with the Cook County recorder of deeds.

On Friday, a spokesman for the Democratic senator and presidential candidate issued a written statement saying Obama hadn't communicated with Rezko about the deal: "The senator knows only that development is planned, but not any of the details. Sen. Obama was informed by his counsel of the plan for development."

Rezko's wife and Obama bought the adjoining South Side lots in 2005 and then engaged in a series of personal financial transactions to re-divide and improve their parcels. After their dealings were disclosed by the Tribune, Obama said he was "bone-headed" to enter the financial arrangements because Rezko was reported to be under grand jury investigation during that period.

In October, Rezko was indicted in a state government kickback scandal and in an alleged business fraud. He has pleaded not guilty to both indictments.

As he campaigns for president, Obama has distanced himself from his longtime friend.

Rezko's wife appears to have netted roughly $54,500 from her dealings with the parcel, although that figure does not include expenses and property taxes. She bought the parcel for $625,000 in June 2005, the same day Obama bought his home for $1.65 million. Both lots had once been part of the same estate, but the owner listed them for sale separately.

In January 2006, Rita Rezko transferred a 1,500-square-foot strip of her land to Obama for $104,500. Her recent sale of the rest was for $575,000.

DOJ_NMG_0136915

The vacant lot once owned by Rita Rezko will be developed by a company owned by former Rezko business attorney Michael J. Sreenan. Rezko has no involvement with the new development, Sreenan said. "He's not a silent partner or anything like that," Sreenan said.

Sreenan said he has hired an architect and is discussing plans for the land with the alderman and the city Landmarks Commission.

When they owned the adjoining properties, Obama paid his landscaper to mow Rezko's lawn. Obama hired an attorney and architect to design a wrought iron fence on their property line and secure city permits, but Rezko agreed to pay the $14,000 cost of building that fence.

Since Rezko was indicted, six creditors have filed lawsuits against him in Cook County Circuit Court, including one this month that contends Rezko owes $12.2 million over a real estate deal.

A separate lending firm filed a $3.5 million judgment lien on Rezko's Wilmette home, and the IRS filed another lien saying his Rezko Enterprises LLC food firm owes $95,258 in taxes.

In Clinton's Backyard, It's Open Season As An Obama Fund-Raiser Lines Up Donors (NYT)

By Eric Konigsberg

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

Twenty-eight stories above Sixth Avenue in Manhattan, Jeh Johnson was dialing away.

The race was on for New York's prized political donors, and Mr. Johnson, one of Senator Barack Obama's leading fund-raisers in the city, was trying to poach in the heart of Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton's financial territory.

Before the day was up, Mr. Johnson got about a dozen people on the phone with the pitch that Mr. Obama represented "a generational shift" away from the partisan chokehold gripping Washington. A few told him they were not ready to give, but more than half said they were willing to sign checks and come to a March 9 fund-raiser at the Grand Hyatt New York.

He called Joyce Johnson, a family friend (she was once his baby sitter) who lives on the Upper West Side and who has run unsuccessfully for State Assembly and the City Council over the past few years. She said she was on board with Mr. Obama's campaign, with some trepidation.

"A lot of the women who supported me are supporting Hillary," Ms. Johnson said. She named a West Side activist who has, in the past, raised money for Gov. Eliot Spitzer and Representative Charles B. Rangel, Democrat of New York.

"Ricki Lieberman is like my godmother," Ms. Johnson said, "And she's going with Hillary and I'm going the other way. Keep talking to me, Jeh. Give me some sea legs. Tell me what to say."

Mr. Johnson, whose name is pronounced jay, leaned back in his chair and said: "Joyce, we had 30 or 40 people here in my office last night for a preliminary meeting on this, and another 30 on the phone. One thing you learn quickly is that when the name Barack Obama is involved, you always have more people show up than you expected."

Mr. Johnson, a lawyer at Paul, Weiss, Rifkin, Wharton & Garrison, is a linchpin in uphill efforts to build a donor base for Mr. Obama in New York, where many potential supporters have at some time in the last 16 years aided the Clintons.

Mr. Obama's ability to raise significant amounts of money depends on the success that people like Mr. Johnson have among New York's all-important Democratic fund-raising circles, which the Clinton camp has moved aggressively to corral by battling any perception that elements of the party are drifting away. And part of Mr. Johnson's pitch must be that by contributing to the Obama campaign, Democrats are not showing disloyalty to the Clintons, a fear that can be heard in his conversations with donors.

"Look, if it doesn't work out, then hopefully the nominee will get over it," he told one donor in discussing the possibility of a Clinton victory and its ramifications for the Obama camp. "She'll need all the help she can get, particularly from the people associated with his campaign."

The Clintons have dominated the fund-raising race for Democratic-party money in New York since long before Mrs. Clinton held office in the state, Mr. Johnson said. "She and her husband have been working New York for 16 years and they know where they are," he added. "But I think we're going to surprise a lot of people with who signs up."

DOJ_NMG_0136916

The Obama campaign has already attracted a number of fund-raisers with ties to Mrs. Clinton or her husband, like Orin Kramer, a prominent hedge fund manager from New Jersey, and James S. Rubin, a private equity manager and son of Robert E. Rubin, the former Treasury secretary. The younger Mr. Rubin was also a finance director for New York during President Bill Clinton's 1996 re-election campaign, and held positions at the Federal Communications Commission during the second Clinton administration.

Other former Clintonites who are raising money for Mr. Obama include Joshua L. Steiner, a private equity principal; Michael Froman, a Citigroup executive; and Brian Mathis of Provident Group. All of them are young (in their 40s) and served in senior positions in Mr. Clinton's Treasury Department a decade ago (Mr. Froman and Mr. Mathis were friends with Mr. Obama at Harvard Law School). Another high-profile Obama fund-raiser is Earl G. Graves, the publisher of Black Enterprise magazine, who in 2000 was listed by the White House as an overnight guest of the Clintons.

The Obama campaign hopes to draw from pools that barely existed four years ago, particularly hedge fund and private-equity fund principals who only recently acquired their money and their interest in the political process.

But another strategy holds that in order to keep up with Mrs. Clinton, Mr. Johnson and his cohorts will have to succeed at poaching traditional Clinton donors.

Already, the bulk of New York's traditional Democratic money elite — people on the level of Alan Patricof, Steven Rattner, and Hassan Nemazee — has pledged to support Mrs. Clinton.

But the drift of some New York donors, along with the switch by some former Clinton backers on the West Coast, like David Geffen, has elevated hopes among Mr. Obama's supporters. There is no consensus among his financial supporters as to whether the feud this week over Mr. Geffen's critical comments about the Clintons is helping or hindering their efforts. Still, several of them said privately that they had been enjoying the sparring.

"It's important to demonstrate that Barack's willing to hit back, though I'm not sure this is the opportunity I would've picked," one said.

Mr. Kramer, the hedge fund manager, remains an admirer of Mrs. Clinton, and said he agonized over the move but was swayed partially by the grass-roots approach of the Obama campaign. "Making choices involving people you genuinely care about is harrowing," he said. "I made the decision when I did to bring the pain to an end."

Still, of his new endeavor, Mr. Kramer said, "It's like the Red Sox looking for fans at Yankee Stadium."

Mr. Johnson, 49, is aware that his taking up with Mr. Obama marks a defection from the Clintons. He was the general counsel to the Air Force for more than two years during President Clinton's second term. Mr. Clinton's trusted adviser, Vernon E. Jordan Jr. — an old family friend of Mr. Johnson —helped him get that job.

Mr. Johnson urged almost every person he reached by phone to look up the speech that Mr. Obama made before the Illinois Senate in October 2002. In the speech, Mr. Obama outlined his opposition to going to war in Iraq, highlighting the sharp contrast to Mrs. Clinton's vote that year to authorize military action against Iraq.

He is working his connections, which include a 300-person master list heavily weighted with fellow lawyers, members of a black professionals fraternity to which he belongs, and veterans of John Kerry's 2004 presidential campaign, for which he served as special counsel.

"Among the attorneys on the Ivy League side, he definitely is appealing," Mr. Johnson said of Mr. Obama. His pitch to one fellow lawyer with whom he had previously traded calls, was this efficient:

"So, Barack." Pause. "Sounds like all your buddies from Harvard Law are involved too." Pause. "Have you met him before?" Pause. "The base level is $1,000."

Although campaign-finance regulations bar individual donors from giving more than $2,300 per election to a campaign, as a "bundler" Mr. Johnson is expected to raise much more on the breadth of his Rolodex and the depth of his persuasive skills. The invitation to the March 9 event lists Mr. Johnson and his wife, along with about a dozen other couples or individuals, as gala "chairs" who have pledged to raise $100,000 — all in increments of $2,300 or less.

Despite Mr. Johnson's considerable experience in the political sphere, participation in one of the Renaissance Weekend retreats made popular by the Clintons, and his volunteer position on the Kerry campaign, he did not until last June become a legitimate fund-raising player. He has since been sought out by candidates.

DOJ_NMG_0136917

"I got a call from the Menendez Senate campaign, and they asked me to host a party with Bobbi Brown, who has the cosmetics line," Mr. Johnson recalled (his family and Ms. Brown's live in Montclair, N.J., a state where Robert Menendez is a senator). "Menendez got Barack and Cory Booker to do this event with us. That was when I met Barack. We raised between $300,000 and $500,000 in one day, and my name was associated with that event."

In the months that followed, Mr. Johnson said: "John Edwards, Bill Richardson, Jim Webb, Harold Ford, they all came here. Harold Ford, he has his little entourage. He sat right there in the chair next to the TV."

He had expected to wait for the outcome of the 2008 primaries before signing on with a candidate, but after seeing Mr. Obama hold forth at a fall book-signing on the Upper East Side, Mr. Johnson was won over.

Then, the day before Thanksgiving, Mr. Johnson received a call at home from Mr. Obama.

"He said, 'I'm thinking about running for president. Can you not commit to anybody until I decide?' " Mr. Johnson said. "Now, we really hit it off. I said, 'Barack, I'm with you.' "

Clinton Sees Role For Husband (SFC)

By Carla Marinucci

San Francisco Chronicle, February 24, 2007

Democratic presidential front-runner Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton -- coming off a week of caustic comments from Hollywood mogul David Geffen and a campaign squabble with rival Sen. Barack Obama -- was exactly where she wanted to be Friday: in front of an adoring crowd in the Democratic stronghold of San Francisco, raising boatloads of campaign cash.

And the New York senator used the occasion to defend a man who is potentially a source of controversy: her husband, former Democratic President Bill Clinton.

In response to a question from the audience, she called her husband "the most popular person in the world right now" and said that when she reaches the White House, "I will continue the tradition of using former presidents" as diplomats around the world.

Clinton visited San Francisco at the invitation of major Democratic Party donor Susie Tompkins Buell on the same day the first declared Democratic candidate for president, former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, dropped out of the race. Vilsack said he could not raise enough money to continue the 618-day marathon to the Nov. 4, 2008, election.

But Clinton appeared to have no such problems in San Francisco, where 900 people attended her sold-out, $250-a-head fundraiser at the Palace Hotel, including such political leaders as state Sens. Don Perata of Oakland and Carole Migden of San Francisco, Republican Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's chief of staff Susan Kennedy, and such major party donors as developer Walter Shorenstein, whom the senator helped serenade with a chorus of "Happy Birthday."

At the hourlong "town hall"-style appearance, billed as "Hillary Makes History," Clinton supporters munched on boxed lunches of sushi and salad -- organic and locally produced in accordance with the candidate's wishes, they were told -- and listened as the senator spoke in detail about her views regarding the war in Iraq, contraceptives funding, affordable housing, health care, the environment and climate change.

"I'm not running as a woman candidate, I'm running because I think I'm the best candidate to hit the ground running," Clinton said.

The senator said her experience as first lady during her husband's eight years in the White House would help shape her presidency. For example, she acknowledged that "the mistakes that I made during the health care debate" showed that "a president is powerful ... but the president has to lead in a collegial way, bring people along."

With the Academy Awards just two days away, Clinton also gave her husband's former vice president -- who still is viewed as a potential rival for the Democratic nomination -- a thumbs-up for his Oscar-nominated film about global warming, "An Inconvenient Truth."

"We're all pulling for Al Gore to get that Oscar," she said. "Nobody has done more to sound the alarm" on hydrocarbons.

The senator's appearance in San Francisco highlighted her strengths as a powerhouse fundraiser and illustrated her ability as a seasoned public figure with the background to discuss details on a wide range of policy matters.

DOJ_NMG_0136918

Clinton was briefly interrupted by protesters from CodePink, the anti-war group, who raised six large pink banners with slogans such as "We Want a Peace President" and "Hillary Stop the War Fund." Five members of the group were escorted from the room by security officers and arrested by police, according to Medea Benjamin, who heads the grassroots organization.

Clinton did not directly acknowledge the protesters -- some of whom yelled "Stop the war" as they were led outside -- but said to cheers, "Yes, we do have to end the war in Iraq."

Some Democrats have questioned the senator about her October 2002 vote in favor of giving President Bush the authority to use military action against Iraq. While Clinton has said she wouldn't vote that same way knowing now what she didn't know then, she has been criticized for refusing to simply label the vote a mistake.

In her remarks, Clinton noted "a great deal of unrest and anger and deep, deep, frustration" on Iraq and said it's time "to begin to rein this president in" regarding U.S. involvement in the war. She has introduced legislation calling for a limit on the number of U.S. troops in Iraq.

The issue of Clinton's war position was raised earlier this week at a forum in Nevada where almost all the declared Democratic presidential candidates met for the first time. Former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, who has publicly apologized for his Iraq vote as a mistake, appeared to jab Clinton for not going that far.

Clinton's stance was more harshly criticized this week by Hollywood movie mogul David Geffen, a supporter of Obama, who said Clinton's refusal to apologize for the war vote is an example of the problems that make her unelectable.

Geffen, who once raised millions for the Clintons, also criticized the former president and said both members of the powerful couple lie for political expediency. Hillary Clinton's campaign spokesman immediately criticized Obama for allowing a supporter such as Geffen to engage in "slash and burn" tactics and called on the Illinois senator to repudiate the remarks.

Clinton didn't directly engage the week's political criticisms during Friday's appearance in San Francisco, but a question from the audience gave her a chance to extol her husband's virtues.

Asked if, as president, she would appoint her husband secretary of state, the senator laughed and joked there may be "a law against that" (although there isn't).

She proudly defended her husband, an enormously popular figure among Democratic voters, saying she would rely on his expertise. She pointedly remarked that his approach to foreign policy and international relations while he was in the Oval Office from 1992 to 2000 was "a lot better than what we've recently seen."

Ellen Malcolm, who heads Emily's List, the powerful Democratic pro-choice women's political action committee -- one of the hosts of the event -- said Democrats "need to focus on the big picture, and that's the general election."

"Hillary Clinton has spent 15 years on the world stage," she said. "Hillary Clinton is the front-runner, and everybody is going to come after her. ... She knows how to defend herself."

Other supporters were livid at Geffen's comments.

"(Geffen) sucked up every benefit he could when Bill Clinton was president. He spent the night in the White House, and he had private briefings with the president," said attorney Martha Whetstone, a longtime friend of the Clintons from Arkansas. "The values of loyalty are important, and the Clintons have that in spades ... and to try to go after them on a national scale to settle a personal vendetta is unconscionable."

S.C. Democratic Party Chief To Lead Campaign (TSSC)

The State, February 24, 2007

The executive director of the state Democratic Party is leaving the post to run New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson's presidential campaign in South Carolina.

Lachlan McIntosh will head the S.C. arm of Richardson's bid to become the nation's first Hispanic president. McIntosh said he will start working for Richardson on March 15.

Can Governors Regain Spotlight In 2008 Race For The White House? (WSJ)

By Christopher Cooper

The Wall Street Journal, February 24, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0136919

This week's nasty tit-for-tat between Democratic senators Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama may have raised the appetite among partisans to take a fresh look for somebody -- anybody -- outside the Beltway as their 2008 presidential choice.

What about the folks running the states? As the National Governors Association gathers for its annual meeting in Washington this weekend, it hopes that some of its members will grab the spotlight that has largely eluded them in the nascent rounds of the 2008 presidential campaign. Makes sense: Governors have dominated nearly every presidential field of the past 30 years.

So far, this campaign hasn't been kind to the governor candidates. On Friday, ex-Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack dropped his presidential bid just three months after formally launching it. His tent-folding followed demurrals by former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner and Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh, who had been touting his time as governor more than his time in Washington.

New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson remains as the only state executive in the Democratic field, though he lags far behind Mrs. Clinton, Mr. Obama and former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards. Among Republicans, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney is considered top-tier, though the lower part of it, behind a senator and a former mayor. Ex-Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee toils far behind.

And, yet, the facts are these: Only four U.S. senators have become president since Warren Harding won in 1920, and one of them was Richard Nixon -- who left the Gang of 100 a full 16 years before ascending to the Oval Office.

Historically, conventional wisdom holds that governors have a better shot at making the presidency. They have the grassroots political organization to turn out state delegates and the sophisticated fund-raising machines that can Hoover up astonishing amounts of money. Running a state also parallels the demands of the presidency far more closely than a seat in the Senate does.

As executive officeholders, governors often have the clean record of accomplishment that senators lack. And they don't spark the long trail of compromise that Senate votes often bring. "The campaign trail is no place to be talking about cloture and amendments and getting caught up in 'Senate-speak,' " says Scott Reed, former campaign manager for vanquished presidential candidate and former Sen. Bob Dole.

Mr. Reed said one of his first tasks as manager was to examine the votes Mr. Dole cast during his long tenure in the Senate -- he says there were 17,000 of them.

But, then, even Mr. Romney -- who has begun airing ads touting himself as "the Republican who turned around a Democratic state" -- is having some "Senate-speak" trouble of his own. During a failed run for U.S. Senate in Massachusetts in 1994, the conservative Republican let slip that he favored gay rights. It has come back to haunt him in the early going.

Mr. Romney is a Mormon and, at the beginning, "everybody thought his weakness would be his religion," says Mr. Reed. "Funny that it turns out to be his political philosophy and his flip-flopping."

Could Gore's Road To The Oval Office Begin In Hollywood? (CNN)

By Bill Schneider

CNN.com, February 23, 2007

LOS ANGELES, California (CNN) -- We've seen plenty of political moments at the Oscars before. But on Sunday, we could see the most unusual political moment ever.

Consider this scenario: It's Academy Awards night. Best documentary feature is up. And the Oscar is favored to go to . . . "An Inconvenient Truth," starring former Vice President Al Gore.

Lawrence Bender, producer of "An Inconvenient Truth," and the film's other producers come up to accept the Oscar -- with Gore. (Watch Bender explain while it might be Gore's time)

The audience roars its approval -- this is liberal Hollywood -- and Gore speaks.

"There's even some speculation that he would use his Oscar as the occasion to announce that he's running," Martin Kaplan, director of the University of Southern California's Norman Lear Center, told CNN. "Imagine that: a billion people worldwide! Take that Jay Leno, as an announcement venue!"

Could it happen? Gore's producer thinks a potential Gore speech would be a historic moment, but not the way Kaplan envisions.

DOJ_NMG_0136920

"It's electrifying, not politically, because is Al Gore going to run or not going to run. There's nothing going to happen like that," Bender told CNN. "It's electrifying because the man who is responsible for solidifying the forces around global warming is going to" be acknowldged.

But could an Oscar start the momentum for a draft-Gore movement? USC's Kaplan thinks it could.

"People think that he's paid his dues, he's had more of an impact on issues that people care about than many people who have been in office and there's a feeling that he's finally lost that student council condescension that was fingernails on a blackboard to a lot of supporters," Kaplan said.

Democrats are desperate to win. Doubts have begun to surface about the electability of the party's current front-runners. How's this for an argument? Now is the time for all good men to come to the aid of their party.

"He was right on Iraq. He was right on global warming. He has an issue that is so formidable and has attacked it, tackled it," Bender said. "So I would love to see him run, sure, but I don't see that in the cards."

But once that envelope is opened, there will be a new card to play.

Maybe Mr. Gore will get up and say, "I have new song to sing." After all, the film has been nominated in the best song category, too.

Gore Film Odds-On Favorite To Win Oscar (AP)

By Beth Fouhy

AP, February 24, 2007

NEW YORK (AP) -- Forget about sharing the stage with fellow Democrats on cable TV. Al Gore goes prime time, red carpet Sunday night at the Academy Awards before tens of millions, reviving talk of a possible presidential run.

"An Inconvenient Truth," the documentary about the former vice president's crusade against global warming, is the odds-on favorite to win an Oscar. Gore plans to attend the ceremony as well as the glitzy before and after parties.

If the movie takes top honors, director Davis Guggenheim would accept the golden statuette and Gore would join him onstage. He doesn't plan an endless "thank you" speech, but the liberal-leaning Hollywood audience may have a different idea.

And all the buzz on the West Coast and in Washington on Friday was about another special Gore appearance during the ceremony.

An Oscar would be the latest accolade in a remarkable year for Gore, who became a best-selling author, announced plans for a seven- continent series of concerts to fight global warming and was nominated for a Nobel Peace Prize.

His narrow loss to Republican George W. Bush in the disputed 2000 presidential election is still a sore subject for many Democrats. An Oscar win is certain to spark new questions about Gore's political future.

He has said repeatedly he has no plans to join the field of presidential aspirants dominated by Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Barack Obama. Yet, Gore's unwillingness to rule out a run completely has given some activists hope that he might change his mind.

A group of key supporters, led by his former policy adviser, Elaine Kamarck, even met in Boston earlier this month to mull a possible Gore candidacy.

"I think there are still an awful lot of Democrats who rightly believe Gore won in 2000," said Roger Salazar, a Democratic strategist and former Gore spokesman. "With this movie and the Oscar nomination, people are taking another look at him and feel more warmly about him than they have in some time."

Interviews with Democratic activists attending this week's presidential forum in Nevada produced some optimism and some reservations about another Gore candidacy.

Gary Poirier, a food service worker from Davis, Calif., said he thinks Gore should run. "Obama is new and interesting, but I haven't heard him address the issues. And Hillary Clinton is just a little too political," Poirier said.

But John Emerson, another activist and retired minister from Sparks, Nev., said he was quite satisfied with the current crop of 2008 contenders even though he described himself as a Gore fan.

It's quite unlike 1988, Emerson said, when many Democrats hoped then- New York Gov. Mario Cuomo would parachute into a field disparaged by some as "the seven dwarfs."

DOJ_NMG_0136921

"We have a tremendously skilled group this time. No one sees any real weakness in the bunch," Emerson said.

Besides Clinton and Obama, the Democrats running are John Edwards, the 2004 vice presidential nominee; Sens. Chris Dodd of Connecticut and Joe Biden of Delaware; New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson; Ohio Rep. Dennis Kucinich and former Alaska Sen. Mike Gravel.

Other activists expressed frustration with Gore's performance in the tense days following the 2000 election, when Florida's electoral votes _ and the presidency _ hung in the balance. At the time, many observers criticized Gore and his political team for not aggressively challenging the many court rulings that eventually cleared the way for a Bush victory.

"Gore outright won, and he was cheated. Yet he gave in so easily," said Joyce Yates of San Diego. "He should have fought a lot harder, especially for those of us who fought so hard for him."

Yates said Gore should have sought a rematch against Bush in 2004.

"It's too late now. People have lost faith in him," she said.

Friends say Gore has built a nice life out of the wreckage of 2000. He is worth millions, thanks to his membership on the Apple, Inc., board and a significant stock windfall from his advisory relationship with the Internet search giant Google. He also chairs a private investment company and Current.tv, a cable network aimed at young viewers.

He and his wife, Tipper, own several homes and travel extensively, much of it to raise awareness of global warming. Tickets to a Gore appearance in Toronto this week sold out within minutes, with some being scalped for as much as $500 apiece.

And a man once so fastidious about his appearance that he hired an image consultant is older and heavier, raising questions about whether he's fleet enough for another run.

Gerald McEntee, international president of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees union, said Gore still had broad support in the labor movement. But he saw no evidence that Gore planned to join the race.

"I think he's a happy man," McEntee said.

Carter Endorses Gore, Says Former Veep Can Win More Than Oscars (ABC)

ABCNews.com, February 23, 2007

ABC News' George Stephanopoulos Reports: In an exclusive interview with former President Jimmy Carter set to air on Sunday's "This Week with George Stephanopoulos", Carter lavished praise on "(his) favorite Democrat) former Vice President Al Gore.

Carter told ABC News, "If Al should decide to run -- which I'm afraid he won't -- I would support Al Gore."

The former Democratic President asserted Gore could accomplish much more in the White House than he ever could as a private citizen, saying to Stephanopoulos, "His burning issue now is global warming and preventing it. He can do infinitely more to accomplish that goal as in the incumbent in the White House, than he can making even movies that get -- you know, that get Oscars."

"An Inconvenient Truth", a documentary based on a global warming lecture Gore has delivered around the world, is nominated for an Academy Award and the former Vice President will walk the red carpet at the Oscars this Sunday.

Despite public pressure from Carter and others, the former President does not believe Gore will make a second bid for the White House saying, "I don't think he will. I've put so much pressure on Al to run that he's almost gotten aggravated with me."

Carter told Stephanopoulos that he had not called Gore "lately" adding, "He almost told me, the last time I talked, 'Don't call me anymore.'"

Carter joked that Gore had offered to support him in 2008 and referred to Gore as "my favorite" in the interview, concluding, "I really have not expressed any public approval or endorsement or preference for any of the Democratic candidates except (Gore)."

Tune into 'This Week' on Sunday, February 25, to watch George's full interview with former President Carter.

Abortion Doubts Dog GOP Top Three (POL)

By Jonathan Martin

The Politico, February 23, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0136922

An increasingly tense war over abortion has emerged as the early test of conservative bona fides among the leading GOP presidential contenders. To many on the right, the top three candidates are failing it because they're faking it.

"Come off it, guys, this is kind of unseemly," says David Keene, the influential president of the American Conservative Union. "The people you're doing this to aren't stupid. Eventually they'll figure out this is all bull."

Keene's harsh words reflect a harsh reality for the top-tier candidates: Many conservatives consider Arizona Sen. John McCain a less-than-passionate abortion foe, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney a flip-flopper and former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani as downright hostile to the pro-life movement.

"I don't see any consensus on any candidate right now," says Steve Scheffler, president of the Iowa Christian Alliance and an influential voice in his state's caucuses. "All three have got challenges."

The fight to reverse that perception is getting personal. McCain and Romney, through aides and supporters, are hitting each other almost daily over the issue.

McCain, a consistent opponent of abortion in his more than two decades in Congress who nonetheless is viewed with suspicion by many in the anti-abortion community, pushed the issue to the front by declaring his support for overturning Roe v. Wade Sunday on the campaign trail in the conservative upstate region of South Carolina.

This prompted Romney to go on the attack. "Ask the pro-life movement where his leadership has been in the six years since 2000 that he's been running for president," said Gary Marx, who is charged with handling conservative outreach for Romney, of McCain. "What has he done?"

Romney, though, has even more challenges on pro-life issues. He was, in his words, "effectively pro-choice" until recent years and argued vehemently in both his unsuccessful run for the Senate in 1994 and in his 2002 gubernatorial bid that he would not lift a finger to take away a woman's right to an abortion.

Giuliani has smartly avoided the spat. Unlike Romney, he remains pro-choice. But even Giuliani has sought to lessen the gulf between his views and the GOP conservative base on the issue, saying on Fox News that he "hate[s]" the practice of abortion and telling South Carolinians that he'd appoint conservative judges in the mold of John Roberts and Samuel Alito.

"Giuliani is just starting to tip-toe into the pandering business, but he'll get there," quips Keene.

Some social conservatives, while appreciative of Roberts and Alito, are distraught at how little President Bush has done to put the topic at the forefront and fear even less will be done should any of the top three 2008 contenders be nominated. This only increases the pressure on presidential hopefuls to embrace the pro-life movement.

Michael Franc of The Heritage Foundation says that with the prospect of a Democratic-controlled, or at least closely divided, Congress and a Republican president who lacks ardor for the issue, not "losing any ground" on abortion may be the best that right-to-life activists can hope for.

"The real battle," Franc notes, "is going to be fought in the states and in scaling back judicial activism."

"What a lot of people are looking for," said former presidential candidate and conservative activist Gary Bauer of the GOP's White House hopefuls, "is do they understand the issue and do they understand that Roe v. Wade is the ultimate example of judicial activism?"

And do they?

"The jury is still out," says Bauer. But, he adds, McCain should win praise for speaking out against Roe. Merely offering rhetorical bows to "strict constructionist judges" isn't sufficient, argues Bauer, who is neutral in the race and backed McCain in the 2000 primary. "Strict constructionists think that precedent should stay," says Bauer, and thus their appointment wouldn't lead to Roe being overturned.

For McCain, Scheffler points out, it's just that he's not identified with the right to life movement. "Part of it is a perception problem because of his maverick streak," Scheffler says. Bauer notes that part of the problem is that McCain's ardent support for campaign finance reform angered some in the right to life movement who felt that the McCain-Feingold bill hurt their advocacy ability.

Asked to discuss the issue, McCain's campaign had Marlys Popma, a veteran Iowa social conservative activist now backing the Arizonan, defend the senator's record.

DOJ_NMG_0136923

"People are almost better identified by those who oppose them," notes Popma, a former head of Iowa Right to Life. And when she researched McCain's record before signing on, she was pleased with what she saw.

"I went and looked at how Planned Parenthood and NARAL had ranked Sen. McCain. For the last several years -- zeros. That spoke volumes to me."

But doesn't McCain at least have, as Scheffler puts it, "a perception problem?"

"Any campaign's job is to teach people about the candidate," Popma replies, and "if they take the time to look at his record, it speaks for itself."

Romney's campaign, despite their candidate's past protestations that he backed abortion rights, makes a similar argument.

"His record is his record," argues Kevin Madden, Romney's spokesman. When it came to actual governing decisions in his sole four-year term, Romney, Madden boasts, has "the luxury of having a strong pro-life record on this issue."

But, Madden adds, they've not sought to spotlight the issue and have tried to highlight other matters.

"The narrative is being driven by the media's focus on it more than the public's focus on it."

Madden laments that instead of talking about issues like health care, the economy or the threat of "Jihadists," Romney holds press conferences where "60% of the questions are about his Mormon religion and 40% are about abortion."

Giuliani's camp would also rather talk about more advantageous issues like homeland security and defense with the Republican base.

"This election is being viewed in terms of leadership in that Republican primary voters are looking at the bigger picture and want the best candidate to move this country forward," argues Giuliani spokeswoman Maria Comella.

On abortion, Giuliani has "been consistent on the issue, that's what voters respect about him," Comella says. Giuliani, Comella reiterates, "personally opposes abortion, but he believes it's a woman's rights to choose."

But how can Giuliani reconcile such a construction with past comments where he embraced the language of abortion rights supporters and praised the very groups that Popma, McCain's supporter, used as her litmus test?

Partially, at least, by pointing to what took place in New York while Giuliani was mayor. "He presided over a decline of abortions, promoted adoption as a real alternative and saw adoptions increase and abortions decrease," says Comella.

Rudy & Mitt Hem & Haw On Abortion (NYT)

By Ann Althouse

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

We're seeing some awfully complicated positions on abortion from some of the presidential candidates. It's easy to hoot with derision.

Rudy Giuliani did an elaborate dance the other day. Speaking in South Carolina, he said that "as a lawyer," he liked having "strict constructionists" on the federal courts. But he didn't specify what he wanted those "strict constructionist" judges to do with Roe v. Wade. Instead, he shifted to talking about how it's "part of our freedom" for the legislatures in the various states to make their own decisions about law.

More recently, on Larry King's show, Giuliani said he was pro-choice, though he hates abortion, and retreated again into ideas about the sort of judges he would appoint. King dogged him for blunter answers, and Giuliani must have sounded evasive to most people.

When King assumed that "strict constructionist" judges would overrule Roe v. Wade, Giuliani said, "We don't know that." When King asked, "Would it hurt you if they overturned it?" Giuliani turned the focus away from himself: we need good judges, and then there are always the states.

Meanwhile, Ruth Marcus of The Washington Post is pointing at a contorted pose that Mitt Romney struck, explaining something he said when he ran for governor of Massachusetts: "What I said to people was that I personally did not favor abortion, that I am personally pro-life. However, as governor I would not change the laws of the commonwealth relating to abortion.

DOJ_NMG_0136924

"Now I don't try and put a bow around that and say what does that mean you are — does that mean you're pro-life or pro-choice, because that whole package — meaning I'm personally pro-life but I won't change the laws, you could describe that as — well, I don't think you can describe it in one hyphenated word."

If you're already opposed to Giuliani or Romney, I'm sure the ridicule practically writes itself. Something so convoluted has got to be manipulation. Right? Compare them with straight-talking John McCain, who said: "I do not support Roe v. Wade. It should be overturned." That's harder to mock.

But it is the candidate who sets out to deceive us who has the most reason to keep it simple. By contrast, complexity may signal that the candidate is actually trying to tell us something about how he thinks. He may have a sophisticated grasp of the role of the executive in relation to the courts and the legislatures. We might do well to tolerate some complexity.

What should a candidate say about abortion? To represent what the country as a whole thinks, the president ought to take account of the deep beliefs Americans have about both reproductive freedom and the value of unborn life. To deserve the trust embodied in appointment power, the president should have a sound understanding of the judges as independent decision makers who follow an interpretive methodology that operates differently from political choice.

So instead of smirking, we should welcome the kind of complicated statements we're hearing from Romney and Giuliani. Any individual who is offering to wield presidential power should resist assuring us about what his judicial appointees will do. To do otherwise is to tip us off that he means to populate the judiciary with politicos.

If we listen with a decent sympathy, the things Giuliani and Romney say about abortion make sense. When Romney ran for governor, he made a commitment to Massachusetts voters not to attack the law he knew they supported. That was politically expedient, of course, but it also took an admirably limited view of executive power and acknowledged the independence of the legal system.

Similarly, Giuliani respects the distinctive work of judges and the separate role of the state legislatures. If Roe were overruled, those legislatures would decide how to regulate abortion. And decentralized legislation really is fairly called "part of our freedom" because the Constitution's framers saw the balance of power between the national government and the states as a safeguard against tyranny.

So I'd like to see a little more patience with what Romney and Giuliani are saying. But that doesn't mean we should be naïve. The next president will select real individuals to be judges, and no matter how diligent they are, they will bring something of their humanity to their interpretation of the law, a version of humanity that will express something of the president's cast of mind.

McCain Woos Seattle Voters (SEATIMES)

By Jim Brunner

The Seattle Times, February 24, 2007

Presidential hopeful Sen. John McCain, during a Seattle appearance today, said Congress should give President Bush's planned "surge" of more U.S. troops in Iraq a chance to work.

McCain called the recent Congressional debate on a nonbinding resolution opposing the surge "a charade" and said if members of Congress oppose the war, they should use their budget authority to cut off funding instead. He joked that he skipped that vote to "spend more time in the sunny climes of Iowa."

The Arizona Republican was at Seattle's Westin Hotel to deliver a speech urging greater U.S. trade with China and other Asian nations, but questions from the audience quickly turned to the war in Iraq.

McCain, a decorated Vietnam veteran who spent more than five years as a prisoner of war, said he hopes Americans will be patient and give the new Iraq strategy, led by Gen. David Petraeus, an opportunity to succeed. He said it should be clear within "some months" whether the plan is working.

"I believe that if we fail and leave you will see chaos and genocide. I also believe that unlike the Vietnam War when we lost and they didn't want to follow us home, these people want to follow us home," McCain said.

During his prepared speech, McCain cited the importance of Asian trade to Washington State and the country and said America should "reject the failed policies of isolationism."

DOJ_NMG_0136925

Instead, McCain said the U.S. should encourage more trade with China and other Asian countries, while also demanding those nations become more democratic and free. "With every export of wheat or software must travel the values that have always been the chief source of our greatness."

McCain, 70, is officially in an exploratory phase of a possible presidential bid. But he has begun laying the groundwork for a well-organized campaign in Washington. He received an early endorsement today from State Attorney General Rob McKenna.

And following his speech McCain was scheduled to meet at Boeing Field with Christian conservative leaders and anti-abortion activists -- a voting bloc considered key to his chances to win the 2008 Republican nomination.

"He is making the right moves," said Joe Fuiten, pastor of Bothell's Cedar Park church and one of the state's top evangelical leaders. Fuiten said he likes what he's heard from McCain so far, but called the meeting "a coffee date, not a marriage."

McCain Says Iraq Could End His Career (AP)

By Curt Woodward,

AP, February 24, 2007

Republican presidential hopeful John McCain said Friday that British Prime Minister Tony Blair has sacrificed his career to support the Iraq war, and the Arizona senator acknowledged that he could face the same fate.

McCain, a staunch defender of President Bush's new Iraq troop deployment strategy, said he worries that a cutback of British troops in southern Iraq announced by Blair this week could lead to stronger control by "Iranian-backed Shiite" forces. But he said Blair and the British deserve gratitude for their efforts.

"He has literally sacrificed his political career because of Iraq," McCain said during an appearance before the World Affairs Council and the City Club of Seattle. "That is a great testament to his political courage."

Asked later by a reporter if he was in danger of making the same sacrifice, McCain responded, "Sure."

McCain, who lost the Republican nomination to Bush in 2000, is expected to formally announce his second campaign for the White House next month.

His appearance in Seattle initially focused on trade, security and diplomatic policy in Asia, which has strong economic and cultural ties to the Pacific Northwest. Iraq quickly came up, and McCain said Americans should give Gen. David Petraeus, the new commander of U.S. forces in Iraq, a chance to succeed.

"I believe that if we fail in Iraq, you will see chaos and genocide," McCain said.

The state Democratic Party criticized McCain for his support for the war, calling him "worse than Bush" in a statement.

After the speech, McCain was asked by an audience member if he was "sucking up to the religious right." He drew laughs by responding: "What's wrong with sucking up to everybody?"

___

On the Net:

McCain: http://www.johnmccain.com

Father Of Slain Teen Urges McCain To Speak Against Gun Violence (NSDY)

By Daniel Massey

Newsday, February 24, 2007

Before his daughter was shot to death in an Arizona parking lot last Sunday, Ronald Schiffman never considered himself a political person. Now he says he might be ready for a change.

Less than a week after his daughter, Nicole, 19, and her best friend, Carol Kestenbaum, 20, were killed, Schiffman called on Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) to speak out against gun violence.

"This is his state. John McCain should make a statement about this incident," said Schiffman. "He cries, rightly so, about all the boys who die in Iraq. I'd like to see him talk about gun control. It's a topic I think has disappeared because of all the problems the country is facing."

Schiffman, of Merrick, said replaying his daughter's death in his mind "haunts" him and that he wanted to "prevent this from happening again." Nicole Schiffman and Kestenbaum were shot last Sunday night in Tempe by 22-year-old Joshua Mendel, who had called 911 two weeks earlier asking for help with an alcohol problem.

DOJ_NMG_0136926

McCain was, a 2008 GOP presidential candidate, was traveling and unavailable for comment Friday, said Melissa Shuffield, a spokeswoman.

Family and friends of the victims gathered Friday afternoon to sit shiva. Kestenbaum's grandmother said the family did not want to comment, but that people had lined up and down the block Thursday night to pay their respects.

At the Schiffman home in Merrick Friday, unopened fruit baskets sat on a dining room table and a steady stream of mourners came to offer condolences.

Meanwhile, Tempe police were continuing with their investigation into the shooting by Mendel, who also killed himself. Mendel came to Tempe from St. Charles, Ill., and was described by friends as being fascinated by guns. "We have a good idea of what occurred," said Tempe Police Sgt. Mike Horn. "We're just trying to figure out why."

Horn said Alexandra Wake, a student at Arizona State University in Tempe, who had gone to high school with Mendel in St. Charles, Ill., and was his girlfriend until earlier this month, told police she had no inclination that he was violent.

"I don't buy that," said Schiffman. "Obviously he was proud of his guns." Wake did not return calls seeking comment.

Schiffman asked that contributions in his daughter's name be sent to Schneider Children's Hospital of North Shore and said that donations would be directed to help teenagers with psychological problems.

Schiffman said he also wanted to set up a scholarship in his daughter's name at her alma mater -- John. F. Kennedy High School in Bellmore -- for a student interested in journalism. Nicole Schiffman dreamed of becoming a journalist.

A Cat Without Whiskers (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

So some guy stands up after John McCain's luncheon speech here yesterday to a group of business types and asks him a question.

"I've seen in the press where in your run for the presidency, you've been sucking up to the religious right," the man said, adding: "I was just wondering how soon do you predict a Republican candidate for president will start sucking up to the old Rockefeller wing of the Republican Party?"

Mr. McCain listened with his eyes downcast, then looked the man in the eye, smiled and replied: "I'm probably going to get in trouble, but what's wrong with sucking up to everybody?" It was a flash of the old McCain, and the audience laughed.

Certainly, the senator has tried to worm his way into the affections of W. and the religious right: the Discovery Institute, a group that tries to derail Darwinism and promote the teaching of Intelligent Design, helped present the lunch, dismaying liberal bloggers who have tracked Mr. McCain's devolution on evolution.

A reporter asked the senator if his pandering on Roe v. Wade had made him "the darling and candidate of the ultra right wing?" (In South Carolina earlier this week, he tried to get more evangelical street cred by advocating upending Roe v. Wade.) "I dispute that assertion," he replied. "I believe that it was Dr. Dobson recently who said that he prayed that I would not receive the Republican nomination. I was just over at Starbucks this morning. ... I talk everywhere, and I try to reach out to everyone."

But there's one huge group that he's not pandering to: Americans.

Most Americans are sick and tired of watching things go hideously backward in Iraq and Afghanistan, and want someone to show them the way out. Mr. McCain is stuck on the bridge of a sinking policy with W. and Dick Cheney, who showed again this week that there is no bottom to his lunacy. The senator supported a war that didn't need to be fought and is a cheerleader for a surge that won't work.

It has left Mr. McCain, an Arizona Republican, once the most spontaneous of campaigners, off balance. He's like a cat without its whiskers. When the moderator broached the subject of Iraq after lunch, Mr. McCain grimaced, stuck out his tongue a little and said sarcastically, "Thanks."

Defending his stance, he sounds like a Bill Gates robot prototype, repeating in a monotone: "I believe we've got a new strategy. ... It can succeed. I can't guarantee success. But I do believe firmly that if we get out now we risk chaos and genocide in the region."

DOJ_NMG_0136927

He was asked about Britain's decision to withdraw 1,600 troops from Iraq. "Tony Blair, the prime minister, has shown great political courage," Mr. McCain said. "He has literally sacrificed his political career because of Iraq, my friends," because he thought "it was the right thing to do."

He said he worried that Iranian-backed Shiites were taking more and more control of southern Iraq. (That was probably because the Brits kept peace in southern Iraq all along by giving Iranian-backed Shiites more and more control.) And he noted that the British are sending more troops to Afghanistan, "which is very necessary because we're going to have a very hot spring in Afghanistan."

But then he got back to Tony Blair sacrificing his political career, and it was clear that he was also talking about himself. When a reporter later asked him if Iraq might consume his candidacy, he replied evenly: "Sure."

I asked him if he got discouraged when he reads stories like the one in The Wall Street Journal yesterday about Ahmad Chalabi, the man who helped goad and trick the U.S. into war, who got "a position inside the Iraqi government that could help determine whether the Bush administration's new push to secure Baghdad succeeds."

Or the New York Times article yesterday about a couple of Iraqi policemen who joined American forces on searches in Baghdad, but then turned quisling, running ahead to warn residents to hide their weapons and other incriminating evidence.

He nodded. "I think one of the big question marks is how the Maliki government will step up to the plate," he said.

And how, I asked him, can Dick Cheney tell ABC News that British troops getting out is "an affirmation that there are parts of Iraq where things are going pretty well," while he says that Democrats who push to get America out would "validate the Al Qaeda strategy." Isn't that a nutty?

But Senator McCain was back on his robo-loop: "I can only express my gratitude for the enormous help that the British have given us."

Sometimes I miss John McCain, even when I'm with him.

Nevada Republicans Reject Holding Early Caucus (NHUL)

By John DiStaso

New Hampshire Union Leader, February 24, 2007

Nevada Republican leaders have decided not to follow their Democratic counterparts by moving up their Presidential caucus to near the front of the pack of nominating contests.

After considering it, the Nevada Republican Party's executive board decided against a calendar move that would have violated a rule of the Republican National Committee, the party's executive director said yesterday.

"Our executive board has made the decision that we can't move up and we don't want to violate the RNC's bylaws," Zachary Moyle said in a telephone interview.

The Democratic National Committee has handed Nevada a Democratic Presidential caucus set for Jan. 19, 2008. The DNC wants the Nevada caucus to be the second nominating event on the calendar "" four days after the leadoff Iowa caucus and three days before the New Hampshire primary.

The New Hampshire primary date is not guided by the DNC rule, however. It is a state-run election and Secretary of State William Gardner has sole authority under state law to set the primary date. He has indicated he may set it for a date earlier than the one set by the DNC. He is expected to make that decision in the fall.

Still, Democratic Presidential candidates have been flocking to Nevada. Earlier this week, all the candidates except Illinois Sen. Barack Obama participated in a forum that drew nationwide media attention.

Republicans in Nevada had been considering following the state's Democrats to a date near the front of the pack. Former Nevada GOP Chairman Paul Adams told the New Hampshire Union Leader in early January that because a RNC rule forbids a delegate-selecting caucus prior to Feb. 5, 2008, his state party was considering holding a straw poll on the same day as the Democrats hold their caucus.

Yesterday, a Nevada Republican political consultant, Peter Ernaut, was quoted by a Las Vegas newspaper as saying that after seeing the attention the Democrats received from the forum, "I'm absolutely green with jealousy that we Republicans haven't followed suit. But we're working hard at remedying that, and I'm very confident Republicans will have caucuses organized for 2008 as well."

DOJ_NMG_0136928

Moyle said that while Ernaut is a prominent local party activist, he is apparently unaware of the RNC rule.

Moyle said Republican officials in Nevada are considering moving up their caucus from the current date of April 26 to mid-February, but there are no plans to break the national party rule and hold it before Feb. 5.

"There has been zero talk about moving into January," Moyle said. "That has been 100 percent decided. We can't feel compelled to move our thing just because the Democrats have."

Moyle said he does not begrudge the Democrats for having the early event.

"Anytime Nevada gets attention, it's a good thing," he said. "Anytime you bring in the Democrats, we get attention as well. And we've had all the major Republican candidates in the state over the past two years."

Moyle said that officials of his party "have met and said we don't want to move up the caucus. It is possible we could move it up, but we won't have it before February 12."

Early Stops On The Sweet-Talk Circuit (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

KEENE, N.H. — Hillary Rodham Clinton ordered a chai latte. Molly Kelly went with the regular latte.

Then the just-acquainted pair settled in at a cafe table and gabbed for 20 minutes or so about their children, jobs and Senate careers (United States Senate for Hillary; New Hampshire Senate for Molly). It was all very cozy. Just as it was a few weeks ago when Mrs. Clinton called Ms. Kelly out of the blue to say 'hi' and introduce herself, like a new neighbor ready with a casserole.

This is the beginning of the quadrennial groveling season. While the presidential campaigns have turned against one another in the news media in recent days, the candidates are making serious nice to would-be supporters.

Ms. Kelly is a financial adviser, a mother of four and a lawmaker, but her chief attribute — as far as Mrs. Clinton and every other Democratic presidential candidate is concerned — is that she is a local person-of-influence in a state with early voting. Her potential support gives her a disproportionate say in picking the next president and, more to the point, entitles her to disproportionate attention, flattery and testimonials from the procession of Very Ambitious People blowing through town.

"It all seemed very natural," Ms. Kelly said of her chats with her new friend, the New York senator.

It also seemed very natural that Ms. Kelly would catch a ride on Feb. 11 with Mrs. Clinton from Brewbakers Cafe to Keene High School, where Ms. Kelly introduced the former first lady at a campaign rally, and the former first lady thanked the audience "for electing Molly Kelly."

The next day, Senator Barack Obama, Democrat of Illinois, who was visiting New Hampshire for the first time, called Ms. Kelly, and they agreed to get together the next time he was in the area. Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware and Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico attended events during her State Senate campaign last year, as did Senators John Kerry and Evan Bayh before they decided not to run for president.

Ms. Kelly is uncommitted, which ensures that she will be a fixture on the presidential butter-up circuit along with a relatively tiny population of geographically blessed campaigners, party leaders and elected officials. Few outside their communities have ever heard of them, but the presidential candidates most assuredly have.

"We get calls on our birthdays, when someone is born, when someone dies," said Deborah Arnesen, who is known as Arnie, a former Democratic candidate for governor in New Hampshire and a television host in the state. It is all in the spirit of currying favor, or "the care and feeding of the body politic," said Warren B. Rudman, a former Republican senator from New Hampshire.

Some bodies politic require more care and feeding than others. Former Senator Bob Kerrey, Democrat of Nebraska, who ran for president in 1992, once offended a local advocate in New Hampshire by neglecting to offer her a cookie during a visit to a Manchester bakery. Mr. Kerrey managed to apologize and keep her support, but it took some doing.

DOJ_NMG_0136929

"I had to take her to breakfast," Mr. Kerrey recalled, declining to name the advocate. "I think I brought her a cookie and we mended fences."

Most recipients of this boot-licking readily acknowledge the reason for it.

"It's not our personal charisma that's getting us all this attention," said Katon Dawson, chairman of the Republican Party in South Carolina and object of affection from new friends Rudy and Mitt, among others. "It's all our position on the calendar. We understand that."

Some fully exploit that. "I have been entrusted with a very important responsibility," said Lou D'Allesandro, a longtime Democratic state senator in New Hampshire known for his deliberate style of public presidential decision-making. "I'm not going to make a decision until I've gotten to know all the candidates."

This could take months. Before the New Hampshire primary in 2004, Mr. D'Allesandro enjoyed several months of visits, birthday calls, handwritten notes and inquiries about his health, wife and family. He finally settled on John Edwards, the former North Carolina senator.

But Mr. D'Allesandro is a free agent in 2008. He had a half-hour visit with Mrs. Clinton at Pappy's Pizza in Manchester two weekends ago ("impressive woman"); a quick meeting with Mr. Obama in Concord two Mondays ago ("his demeanor was outstanding"); and recently took phone calls from Mr. Biden ("an old friend") and Senator Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut ("also an old friend"). He met with Mr. Richardson at a union event in Concord, and Mr. Richardson later introduced him as "the famous Lou D'Allesandro." And Mr. Edwards's wife, Elizabeth, called last week; no hard feelings over Lou's seeing other people.

Relationships with campaigners tend to be intense and temporary, said Senator Lamar Alexander, Republican of Tennessee who ran for president in 1996 and briefly in 2000. "And then, just like that, it's over," Mr. Alexander said.

He recalled paying at least six private visits to an Iowa state representative who wound up supporting former Senator Bob Dole for president in 1996. What was the gentleman's name?

"I don't recall," Mr. Alexander said.

(In the goodbye-to-all-that department: Mr. Kerrey finished a disappointing third in the New Hampshire primary and posed for a photo while making an obscene gesture next to a "Leaving New Hampshire" sign.)

Early-state players generally harbor few illusions that the attention would persist if they ever up and moved to, say, Indiana, whose primary comes considerably later than New Hampshire's.

For instance, Senator Michael E. Gronstal would probably not be getting "Hey, this is Barack" calls on his cellphone if he were the Democratic leader in the Indiana Senate rather than the Iowa Senate. Mr. Obama (that would be the Barack on the line) was just checking in. The two got together on Wednesday at the capitol in Des Moines.

Locals in Iowa and New Hampshire can be fiercely protective of their states' special status whenever other states threaten to supplant them at the front of the voting calendar, which happens periodically. Campaigners often trumpet how vital the New Hampshire primary and Iowa caucuses are "to the democratic process." True enough, but let's be honest, "it's a great ego trip for a lot of people," Mr. Rudman said.

Tom Rath, a former attorney general in New Hampshire and a longtime Republican campaigner in the state, said: "It's really nice that all these important people want to know what my summer plans are. Karl Rove used to joke that I never have to shovel my own driveway because the candidates would do it for me."

Candidates are also inclined to shovel it on thick to local media muck-a-mucks like the political columnists David Yepsen of The Des Moines Register and John DiStaso of The Union-Leader in Manchester, N.H., among others. "I'm a person that people want to have a relationship with," said Ms. Arnesen, who hosts "Political Chowder," a television show on New Hampshire politics. "When I'm in a room, the candidates know I'm there."

Last month, Ms. Arnesen was attending a cocktail party at the Capitol in Washington after a seminar for talk-show hosts when Mrs. Clinton happened by. " 'Arnie Arnesen, oh my God, what the heck are you doing here?' " Mrs. Clinton said, according to an account in The Telegraph of Nashua, N.H. They chatted for 15 minutes or so, and Mrs. Clinton complimented Ms. Arnesen on her outfit — "a very chic and yet subtle ensemble" is how Ms. Arnesen describes her multilayered skirt, long scarf ("with ribbons cascading off of it") and calf-length coat. "It was sort of a Vogue look that came from the Salvation Army," Ms. Arnesen said.

DOJ_NMG_0136930

Whatever, Mrs. Clinton dug the outfit, and Ms. Arnesen said she made a good impression.

Arnold Defends Hillary, Mulls Senate Run (POL)

By Roger Simon

The Politico, February 23, 2007

SACRAMENTO, Calif. — If Arnold Schwarzenegger had been born in Austin instead Austria, he might be president today.

But because that office is denied him by the U.S. Constitution, he is concentrating on other things.

He told me in a 45-minute interview in his office in the state capitol Thursday:

He will not rule out running for future public office including U.S. senator or mayor of Los Angeles when his term as governor expires in January 2011.

He will not endorse a presidential candidate until after the Republican Convention in September 2008, even though he thinks Rudy Giuliani and John McCain are strong candidates and either could win the California primary.

He wants a deadline for getting U.S. troops out of Iraq, even though he recognizes that President Bush does not.

He thinks Democrats should stop criticizing Hillary Clinton for refusing to say she made a mistake by voting for the Iraq war.

His wife, Maria Shriver, will "absolutely not" run for governor of California or any other public office, quashing speculation that a Schwarzenegger dynasty was in the making.

Schwarzenegger, a Republican who favors abortion rights, stem-cell research, gay rights and gun control, will give a speech at the National Press Club on Monday stressing the importance of centrism in American politics.

In my interview with him Thursday, he decried excessive partisanship and said the current system of political gerrymandering in which the vast majority of seats in the House of Representatives are heavily weighted in favor of one party or the other "creates extremism."

He said he favors redistricting such seats and also said he favors open primaries in every state so that Republicans can vote for Democrats and vice versa.

John McCain and Rudy Giuliani, he said, symbolize the kind of political positioning that he thinks can win his state 2008. "Both of them are very appealing for Californians, I think, because they are in the center," he said.

He also said: "I don't know as much about [Mitt] Romney yet. I've never had time to really hang with him and to really talk with him and get a feel about how much we have in common."

There is some feeling among those close to Schwarzenegger that Romney may be avoiding "hanging" with Schwarzenegger because Romney is wooing Republican conservatives who think Schwarzenegger is too moderate.

Although Schwarzenegger employs Democrats on his staff and has been working closely with California's Democratic legislature, he said he would definitely endorse the Republican nominee for president. (That would also mean that New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg, a friend and political ally of Schwarzenegger, would not get his endorsement should Bloomberg run for president as an independent.)

"I am very glad we have Republican candidates that are very much in the center and can appeal to both Republicans and Democrats," Schwarzenegger said.

During the interview, Schwarzenegger sat in a leather chair at the end of a long oak table in his cabinet room. He still uses a cane to walk, the result of a skiing accident in which he broke his right femur last December. He said that while he was no longer on painkillers, full recovery was going to be "a long, long process."

Schwarzenegger said that he believes politicians should be honest about admitting their mistakes but that "people are too tied down with analyzing" whether Hillary Clinton's vote to authorize the Iraq war was a mistake.

"Is that what makes the country operate well, if she becomes president?" he asked. "How you twist that or spin that? We should look at what has she done as senator. What has Barack Obama done as a U.S. senator or [a state] senator. What has Rudy Giuliani done? What has McCain done? You've got to judge people not by this one little thing."

Schwarzenegger also said candidates should not be judged on a single issue like abortion. No pro-life presidential candidate has carried California since George H.W. Bush did so in 1988. So I asked Schwarzenegger if he thought McCain, who is also pro-life, could possibly win the state in 2008.

DOJ_NMG_0136931

"I think he can," Schwarzenegger said. "What is important is that you look at overall picture, what does he have to offer California and the country. It will be hard. I am not saying it is not a challenge. But the bottom line is I would not, because of one issue, discount anybody."

Regarding Iraq, Schwarzenegger said: "I think what is important is that we support the war, but we need to have a timeline to let the Iraqis know it is not an open-ended thing. It shouldn't be another Vietnam or Korea where we are there for decades."

Schwarzenegger said he supports President Bush in the "need to do everything that we can to come out of it with a victory" but he disagrees with Bush's refusal to set a deadline for U.S. support.

"We've got to say [to the Iraqis] you guys got to get this [done] next year and got to get your act together and after that we start pulling the troops back," Schwarzenegger said.

Schwarzenegger, 59, is term-limited and is in his second and final term as governor. When I asked him if he might run for the Senate or mayor of Los Angeles, both of which have been the subject of speculation, he said: "If you serve the people well, your options are open and you can decide at the last minute anything. If you want to go back to show business, or just go into business or to run for another office, all those options are available."

Schwarzenegger's wife, Maria Shriver, played a crucial role in Schwarzenegger's re-election campaign and is said to be his chief political adviser.

So does Schwarzenegger think she would make a good governor?

"My wife has no interest in that," he said flatly. "Absolutely not. She grew up in a political family, she has tremendous instincts when it comes to politics. But she has no interest in being in the political arena or run for office or anything like that or to manage the state."

Schwarzenegger said he wanted his own legacy as governor, aside from specific achievements, to be his bipartisan approach to "fighting for the people."

"That is my primary goal," he said. "That's why sometimes Republicans are up in arms and saying this is not our philosophy or sometimes Democrats are up in arms. That's OK."

Schwarzenegger concluded the interview by saying with some emotion, "Remember one thing: You will never hear me complain that I can't run for president. I look at the things I was able to do rather than the things I am not able to do. I am very, very happy about how America has received me and the kind of things I was able to accomplish here."

Panel Calls Adult Stem-cell Study Flawed, Wrong (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, February 24, 2007

MINNEAPOLIS (AP) -- A scientific panel says a 2002 study that suggested adult stem cells might be as useful as embryonic ones was flawed and its conclusions may be wrong, a finding that raises questions about the promise of a less-controversial source for stem cells.

The research by Catherine Verfaillie at the University of Minnesota concluded that adult stem cells taken from the bone marrow of mice could grow into an array of biological tissues, including brain, heart, lung and liver.

So far only embryonic stem cells, which are commonly retrieved by destroying embryos at an early stage of development, are known to hold such regenerative promise. Many scientists think these cells might one day be used to treat certain diseases and other conditions.

Opponents of stem-cell research seized on the 2002 findings as evidence that stem-cell science could move forward without destroying embryos. But Miss Verfaillie has acknowledged flaws in parts of the study after inquiries from the British magazine New Scientist, which first publicized the questions last week.

A panel of specialists commissioned by the university concluded that the process used to identify tissue derived from the adult stem cells was "significantly flawed, and that the interpretations based on these data, expressed in the manuscript, are potentially incorrect," according to a portion of the panel's findings released by the university.

The panel concluded that it wasn't clear whether the flaws mean Miss Verfaillie's conclusions were wrong. It also determined that the flaws were mistakes, not falsifications.

DOJ_NMG_0136932

Tim Mulcahy, vice president of research at the university, said it would be up to the scientific community to decide whether Miss Verfaillie's study still stands up.

Other researchers have been unable to duplicate Miss Verfaillie's results since the 2002 publications, increasing their skepticism about her claims. But that may only be an indication of how difficult the cells are to work with, said Amy Wagers, a Harvard University stem-cell researcher who was not involved in the investigation.

Miss Verfaillie did not respond to a phone message left with her current employer, the Catholic University of Leuven in Belgium. She told the Star Tribune of Minneapolis in a story published yesterday that the problem was "an honest mistake" that did not affect the study's conclusions about the potential of adult stem cells.

Her research was scrutinized after a writer for New Scientist noticed that some data from the original 2002 article in the journal Nature duplicated data in a second paper by Miss Verfaillie around the same time in a different journal, even though they supposedly referred to different cells. Miss Verfaillie told the Star Tribune that the duplication was an oversight and said she notified the University of Minnesota, which convened the panel to take a closer look at the research.

Diane Krause of Yale University, who (like Miss Verfaillie) has studied using bone marrow as an alternative to embryonic stem cells, said she thinks Miss Verfaillie's research will hold up, despite being hard to repeat.

Nigel Cameron, who runs the Institute on Biotechnology and the Human Future and is a bioethics professor at Chicago-Kent College of Law in the Illinois Institute of Technology, said scientists who have been trying to find a middle way on stem cells have seen their work seized by one side or the other for their own advantages.

"This is a fascinating example of the way in which science is becoming politicized, on both sides of this debate," said Mr. Cameron, who supported President Bush's 2001 ban on federal dollars spent on deriving new stem cells from fertilized embryos. "It's no longer scientists in white coats coming up with facts. There are uses being made of the facts on all sides, and I think it's quite problematic."

Cheney Tackles Beijing On Military Expansion (FT)

By Raphael Minder, Demetri Sevastopulo And Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, February 24, 2007

US Vice-president Dick Cheney on Friday accused China of pursuing military policies that were at odds with its stated ambitions of a “peaceful rise”.

Mr Cheney welcomed Beijing’s role in securing the six-party agreement with North Korea towards denuclearising the Korean peninsula.

But he said China’s recent anti-satellite missile test and the rapid expansion in its military budget was sending mixed signals.

“[They] are not consistent with China’s stated goal of a peaceful rise,” said Mr Cheney during a visit to Australia. “We hope China will join us in our efforts to prevent the deployment and the proliferation of deadly technologies, whether in Asia or in the Middle East.”

His comments about Chinese military spending come just weeks after the White House unveiled a military budget of $623bn (€473bn, £317bn) for 2008. While the US criticised the Chinese anti-satellite missile test, critics have pointed out that Beijing has been urging the US to work towards a treaty banning space weapons.

Mr Cheney, one of the leading hawks in the Bush administration, who has previously resisted any deal with North Korea that did not involved complete disarmament, expressed support for the six-party deal but said Pyongyang still had “much to prove”.

Chris Hill, the chief US negotiator in the talks, this week was highly complimentary about China’s role. He said Beijing had no interest in a situation of “strategic ambiguity” over North Korea’s nuclear arsenal, where Pyongyang would be “pretending to disarm” and the rest “pretending to believe”.

The visit of Mr Cheney to Sydney comes at a difficult time for John Howard, the prime minister, who is under pressure to justify his decision to maintain Australia’s military involvement in the US-led coalition in Iraq, while the UK announced this week that it would reduce its contingent.

DOJ_NMG_0136933

Mr Howard has also faced criticism over his inability to speed up legal proceedings against David Hicks, an Australian detained in Guan-tánamo Bay.

But Mr Howard rejected as “absurd” suggestions the US visit and the strong endorsement received yesterday from Mr Cheney was a political liability in the run-up to federal elections this year.

He said: “America and Australia are close allies and people should look beyond their personal prejudices and understand how fundamental the American alliance is to the security of Australia in our own region, and how important it is to have an engaged, committed America in our part of the world.”

North Korea on Friday asked Mohamed ElBaradei, the head of the International Atomic Energy Agency, to visit more than three years after expelling his experts and quitting the nuclear non-proliferation treaty. in an encouraging signal about its willingness to ultimately renounce nuclear weapons.

Mr ElBaradei said the visit was likely to occur in the second week of March.

Cheney: 'All Options' Available For Iran (AP)

By Rohan Sullivan, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 24, 2007

Vice President Dick Cheney renewed Washington's criticism of Iran on Saturday, saying "all options" remained on the table to deal with that country's regime after it ignored a U.N. deadline to halt uranium enrichment and said it would defy foreign pressure.

At a joint news conference with Australian Prime Minister John Howard, Cheney also said that Washington was "comfortable" with Britain's decision to withdraw troops from Iraq and that it was up to Australia to decide if it would do the same.

Cheney said the United States remained "deeply concerned" about Iran's activities, including the "aggressive" sponsoring of terrorist group Hezbollah and inflammatory statements by President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

He said top U.S. officials would meet soon with European allies to decide the next step toward planned tough sanctions against Iran for its pursuit of nuclear weapons.

"We worked with the European community and the United Nations to put together a set of policies to persuade the Iranians to give up their aspirations and resolve the matter peacefully, and that is still our preference," Cheney said.

"But I've also made the point, and the president has made the point, that all options are on the table," he said.

The White House has previously made similar comments.

"We believe it would be a serious mistake if a nation such as Iran became a nuclear power," he said.

Iran says its atomic program is aimed solely at generating energy, but the United States and some of its allies suspect it is geared toward making nuclear weapons.

The International Atomic Energy Agency reported on Thursday that Iran had not only ignored a U.N. Security Council ultimatum to freeze the enrichment program, but had expanded that program by setting up hundreds of centrifuges. Enriched uranium fuels nuclear reactors but, enriched further, is used in nuclear bombs.

The IAEA report came after the expiration Wednesday of a 60-day grace period for Iran to halt uranium enrichment.

Ahmadinejad said on Thursday that Iran would resist "all bullies," and appeared to dismiss the IAEA report, saying it was of no importance if countries did not believe Iran's nuclear activities were peaceful.

On Iraq, Cheney sidestepped a question about whether the White House had asked the British government to redeploy troops into another part of Iraq rather than withdraw them.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair has outlined a plan to withdraw about 1,600 troops from southern Iraq in the coming months, and to reduce Britain's 7,100-strong contingent further by late summer.

"They have to make decisions with respect to their forces based upon what they think makes sense," Cheney said.

"They are going to continue to have a major presence there. They are also, I believe, beefing up their operations in Afghanistan," Cheney said. "So we are very comfortable with that decision."

Britain said Friday it will increase its troop strength in Afghanistan to bolster NATO forces battling Taliban militants. British media reported 1,000 additional soldiers would join the more than 5,000 British troops already in Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0136934

Cheney declined to say if he had asked Howard during talks held Saturday to add to the 1,400 troops Australian has in and around Iraq.

"Those decisions are obviously to be made by the Australian government based on their considerations as well as ... the conditions on the ground in that part of the world," Cheney said. "It's not for us to stress to our allies what their appropriate response might be."

West Aims To Agree New Iran Sanctions (FT)

By Daniel Dombey And Mark Turner

Financial Times, February 24, 2007

Western countries said on Friday they would seek to agree new sanctions against Iran involving a travel ban, possibly an arms embargo, and a crackdown on export credits because of Tehran's failure this week to meet a United Nations deadline to curb its nuclear programme.

But they acknowledged some measures, such as the export credits, could be difficult to agree among the UN Security Council's five permanent members, which meet on Monday with Germany to discuss next steps.

The US and the European Union hope that by setting more modest goals, they will avoid the four-month long wrangle at the Security Council that preceded the imposition of previous sanctions against Iran last December.

"The question of export credits . . . is likely to be discussed but it is not an easy issue," said a senior British official. "Arms exports is another question – again, it's not straightforward. Identifying further entities and officials [for an asset freeze and a travel ban] is a third area."

Other EU diplomats said they had a similar agenda for Monday's talks.

The British official said the EU as a whole had outstanding guarantees supporting $20bn (€15bn) of exports to Iran, with Germany and Italy accounting for the biggest shares. But the EU will find it difficult to agree to phase out such support entirely.

Germany, which has more than $5bn in credits outstanding, has taken a political decision to grant fewer new credits but is unwilling to leave its exporters at a disadvantage by completely eliminating them. "EU countries will only end these export credits if there's a decision at the UN," said a western diplomat.

The British official also differed with Mohamed El-Baradei, director-general of the International Atomic Energy Agency, who says Iran has already learnt almost all it can from operating "research" centrifuges to enrich uranium. Mr ElBaradei concludes from this that Iran might have to be allowed to continue operating some centrifuges if it is to save face, and agree to a deal.

The official countered: "They haven't yet mastered the basic technology." There had also been signs of debate among Tehran's ruling elite. "President [Mahmoud] Ahmadi-Nejad's standing seems to have diminished and I think that's helpful for rational discussion and debate," he said.

The British official said the goal of the international community was still a complete suspension of Iran's uranium enrichment-related activities, but several countries wanted to give greater emphasis to the benefits to Iran of negotiations.

Leaving The Options Open With Iran (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 23 — As the Bush administration tries to rally allies to tighten sanctions on Iran yet again, it is sending mixed messages to Tehran about its commitment to a diplomatic solution, trying to create new openings for negotiations even while holding open, ever so vaguely, the possibility that the United States might some day resort to force.

In Australia on Friday, Vice President Dick Cheney, one of the strongest advocates of pressing for a "regime change" in Iran, reiterated his belief that a diplomatic solution was possible. But Mr. Cheney noted that "the president has also made it clear that we haven't taken any options off the table," a phrase that President Bush frequently uses but has conspicuously avoided in recent weeks while discussing the issue.

At the same time, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice restated her willingness to meet the Iranians anyplace to talk about anything as long as they first agree to stop producing nuclear fuel, even temporarily.

White House officials insist that there is no contradiction.

DOJ_NMG_0136935

"The idea that we are ginning up another war — there is no evidence for that," one senior administration official said Friday. The official added that Iran needed to know that it could not let negotiations drag on forever, and that any talk of military options was a signal that Washington would not negotiate endlessly while Tehran used the time to continue its work on uranium enrichment.

But, so far, the White House has declined to say at what point the Iranians will have pushed the United States too far — in other words, how many working centrifuges in Iran would be too many, or at what point it would be impossible to guarantee that Iran could not achieve a "nuclear option," the ability to turn ostensibly civilian nuclear facilities into bomb-making ones.

For now, administration officials say, Mr. Bush is happy to leave the Iranians guessing. He ordered an additional aircraft carrier into waters within striking distance of Iran and its nuclear facilities last month, a step that senior officials say they believe took the Iranian leadership by surprise. He has issued warnings to the Iranians not to meddle in Iraq and has focused on intelligence findings that the most deadly bombs used against Americans in Iraq bear marks of Iranian origins.

But Mr. Bush has denied that he is trying to provoke Iran into a response that would provide a pretext for direct confrontation. "To say it is provoking Iran is just a wrong way to characterize the commander in chief's decision to do what is necessary to protect our soldiers in harm's way," Mr. Bush said at a news conference on Feb. 15, shortly after accusing Iranian forces, but not necessarily the country's leadership, of worsening the violence in Iraq.

In interviews in recent days, three administration officials, all of whom insisted on anonymity because they were speaking about a strategy still being developed, said the carrier movements, the accusations about weapons in Iraq and the use of sanctions against the government were all intended to provide Mr. Bush with some leverage in dealing with Iran.

The officials have made little secret of their desire to fuel dissatisfaction inside Iran with the country's fiery president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who on Friday vowed anew to continue enriching uranium, saying, "If we show weakness in front of the enemies, they will increase their expectations."

R. Nicholas Burns, the under secretary of state for policy and the lead negotiator on Iran, said Thursday that the multipronged approach was showing an effect. "We've roiled their government, and I think we've shocked them a bit," he said.

Mr. Burns is headed to London for a meeting on Monday with France, Germany, Britain, Russia and China about devising a new, tighter set of sanctions against the Iranian government — one that might include a further crackdown on export credits or conventional arms sales.

Mr. Burns will undoubtedly run into more resistance from the Russians and the Chinese, who told American officials flatly in December that they would not put additional economic pressure on the Iranians. But Mr. Burns said he was not looking for a major escalation of sanctions, and other administration officials say that modest steps would be fine for now.

"The most important thing about the last resolution was that we achieved a consensus, we kept the Russians and Chinese on board," one senior administration official said. "And in the end, that's what has serious impact in Iran."

Administration officials say that the need to hold that consensus together is overriding the differences on Iran that roiled the administration in its first term. Back in 2002 and 2003, when the prospect of a nuclear-capable Iran was more distant, the administration decided not to explore several offers through intermediaries to open discussions. Mr. Cheney and others argued that the success they anticipated in Iraq would chasten the Iranians, bringing them to the table on more favorable terms.

Mr. Cheney, however, appears increasingly isolated now that many of his protégés have departed the Defense Department, the State Department and other corners of the administration. He was described by several top officials as only a minor player in the president's decision in May to offer incentives to Iran if it agreed to suspend its fuel production.

But the Iranians did not accept last year's offer, and if the administration and the Europeans are unable to find a formula that works for all sides, the talk of military options is bound to persist.

"No one has defined where the red line is that we can't let the Iranians step over," one senior official said. But Mr. Bush, the official said, is determined "not to let them get one lugnut turn away from having a bomb."

Some diplomats who are trying to bridge the differences between Washington and Tehran insist that Mr. Bush is going to have to give some ground. "To focus only on suspension in my view is not the right approach," Mohamed ElBaradei, the director general of the International Atomic Energy Agency, said early this week to The Financial Times.

DOJ_NMG_0136936

In Vienna on Friday, Dr. ElBaradei repeated his idea of a “time out” to allow talks, with Tehran halting uranium enrichment and the United Nations suspending sanctions. And he has consistently preferred to allow a modest amount of face-saving “research and development” in Iran, and focus instead on preventing the country from having an industrial capacity to produce nuclear fuel.

So far, though, Mr. Bush has said that even that much nuclear knowledge cannot be allowed in a country he does not trust.

Iranian Leaders Decry Critics' 'Bullying' Over Nuke Program (WT/AP)

By Nasser Karimi, Associated Press

The Washington Times, February 24, 2007

TEHRAN -- Critics of its nuclear program are "bullying" Iran, its current president and a former president said yesterday in response to a report by the U.N. nuclear watchdog that opens the way for additional sanctions against Iran.

The comments from President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and influential former President Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, in separate speeches, appeared to show that the Iranian ruling establishment is closing ranks ahead of the possible new measures.

The International Atomic Energy Agency report Thursday said Iran has ignored a U.N. Security Council ultimatum to freeze uranium enrichment -- a possible pathway to nuclear arms -- and instead has expanded its program by setting up hundreds of centrifuges.

Hours later, the United States said key countries would meet next week to try to develop a new U.N. resolution on the standoff.

In Washington, Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns said he will travel to London on Monday to meet with the United States' negotiating partners to try to draft a new resolution regarding Iran.

"It is effectively thumbing its nose at the international community," he said of Iran.

Mr. Burns said he hopes the United States and other permanent members of the U.N. Security Council, plus Germany, can quickly draft a resolution to "see Iran repudiated again." He said it was too soon to say what provisions the resolution might contain.

Among the permanent council members, Britain and France are likely to join the United States in a call for harsher sanctions than Russia and China will accept.

Chinese Foreign Minister Li Zhaoxing told his Iranian counterpart that his country hoped "to peacefully resolve" the nuclear issue, the Xinhua news agency reported yesterday. Russian U.N. Ambassador Vitaly Churkin likewise reiterated his country's desire for a negotiated solution.

Divisions had emerged within the Iranian leadership over Mr. Ahmadinejad's handling of the nuclear standoff since the council's adoption of limited economic sanctions against Iran in December.

Some Iranians think Mr. Ahmadinejad has been too antagonistic toward the United States and its allies. Mr. Rafsanjani in recent weeks has emerged as a high-level advocate of a more conciliatory stance toward the West in the nuclear dispute.

But Mr. Rafsanjani told worshippers gathered for Friday prayers in Tehran that Western countries would fail to achieve anything by pressuring Iran about its nuclear activities.

And state television quoted Mr. Ahmadinejad as telling a gathering of thousands in northern Iran: "The Iranian nation has resisted all bullies and corrupt powers, and it will fully defend all its rights.

"If a few states do not believe that Iran's nuclear activities are peaceful, this is of no importance whatsoever," he said at the rally in Fuman.

In a warning to the United States and its Western allies who want Iran to roll back its nuclear program, Mr. Rafsanjani, a high-ranking cleric who holds seats on two of Iran's most important government bodies, said, "If you continue this bullying way, you will definitely make many troubles for yourselves, the world and the region."

But he also reiterated Iran's offer for talks. "We -- all of us, our officials, our leader -- are ready to provide you full assurances." He did not elaborate.

Diplomacy, Not War, With Iran (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0136937

By Bill Richardson

The Washington Post, February 24, 2007

The recent tentative agreement with North Korea over its nuclear program illustrates how diplomacy can work even with the most unsavory of regimes. Unfortunately, it took the Bush administration more than six years to commit to diplomacy. During that needless delay North Korea developed and tested nuclear weapons -- weapons its leaders still have not agreed to dismantle. Had we engaged the North Koreans earlier, instead of calling them "evil" and talking about "regime change," we might have prevented them from going nuclear. We could have, and should have, negotiated a better agreement, and sooner.

As the International Atomic Energy Agency just confirmed, Iran has once again defied the international community and is moving forward with its nuclear program, yet the Bush administration seems committed to repeating the mistakes it made with North Korea. Rather than directly engaging the Iranians about their nuclear program, President Bush refuses to talk, except to make threats. He has moved ships to the Persian Gulf region and claims, with scant evidence, that Iran is helping Iraqi insurgents kill Americans. This is not a strategy for peace. It is a strategy for war -- a war that Congress has not authorized. Most of our allies, and most Americans, don't believe this president, who has repeatedly cried wolf.

Saber-rattling is not a good way to get the Iranians to cooperate. But it is a good way to start a new war -- a war that would be a disaster for the Middle East, for the United States and for the world. A war that, furthermore, would destroy what little remains of U.S. credibility in the community of nations.

A better approach would be for the United States to engage directly with the Iranians and to lead a global diplomatic offensive to prevent them from building nuclear weapons. We need tough, direct negotiations, not just with Iran but also with our allies, especially Russia, to get them to support us in presenting Iran with credible carrots and sticks.

No nation has ever been forced to renounce nuclear weapons, but many have chosen to do so. The Iranians will not end their nuclear program because we threaten them and call them names. They will renounce nukes because we convince them that they will be safer and more prosperous if they do that than if they don't. This feat will take more than threats and insults. It will take skillful American diplomatic leadership.

Diplomacy is more than just talking to people. It requires speaking credibly from a position of strength. As the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, as energy secretary, as a member of Congress and as a diplomatic envoy, I have always believed in and worked to achieve tough, credible and direct negotiations with adversaries. To be tough, you need strong alliances and a strong military. And to be credible, you need a record of meaning what you say. By alienating our allies, overextending our military, making idle threats and antagonizing just about everyone, the Bush administration has undermined our diplomatic leverage.

We need to change course. Iran's nuclear program is a threat to peace, but it also presents an opportunity to start rebuilding America's credibility and leadership, which have been weakened by six years of incompetence.

This is no time for chest-beating and dangerous brinkmanship. It is time for alliance-building, direct engagement and tough face-to-face negotiations. For the United States to attack Iran without exhausting all diplomatic options would be a terrible mistake.

The writer, a Democrat, is governor of New Mexico and a presidential candidate.

N. Korea Invites U.N. Inspector (WT/AP)

By George Jahn, Associated Press

The Washington Times, February 24, 2007

VIENNA, Austria -- North Korea yesterday asked the chief U.N. atomic inspector to visit -- four years after expelling his monitors and dropping out of the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty -- an encouraging sign the reclusive regime is serious about freezing its weapons program.

Mohamed ElBaradei, the head of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), offered few details about his upcoming trip, which other agency officials said would likely occur in the second week of March.

The announcement signaled the North's willingness to subject its nuclear program to outside scrutiny for the first time since withdrawing from the Non-Proliferation Treaty in January 2003, just weeks after ordering nuclear inspectors to leave.

DOJ_NMG_0136938

U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon hailed the invitation -- which came five months after the North conducted its first nuclear weapon test -- as a "good beginning," an interpretation shared by the U.S. administration.

"We are really very pleased that the IAEA is now receiving the initial steps to be able to go back into North Korea to be able to verify compliance. It is indeed a good sign that it has happened as quickly as it has," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in the Canadian capital, Ottawa.

White House spokesman Tony Fratto said the invitation shows North Korea is willing to begin executing the terms of the six-nation deal reached Feb. 13, under which the North said it would dismantle its nuclear facilities and normalize relations with South Korea, Japan and the United States in exchange for oil shipments and security guarantees.

"We'll be interested in hearing his report when he gets back," Mr. Fratto said.

Amid the news reports on North Korea's apparent new attitude, South Korean newspapers and wire services announced today that North Korea's chief nuclear negotiator plans to visit the United States next week for follow-up talks on the recent nuclear deal.

Vice Foreign Minister Kim Kye-gwan is expected to arrive in San Francisco Thursday en route to New York for meetings with his U.S. counterpart, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, South Korea's Yonhap news agency reported.

Mr. Hill said at the end of the negotiations that he had invited Mr. Kim to New York for normalization discussions.

Mr. ElBaradei's trip to North Korea will mark only an initial step in the long and complex process that the international community hopes will result in stripping the North of its nuclear weapons capabilities and ensuring that the communist country remains without such arms.

In a process that one U.N. official said "could take years," IAEA inspectors would be tasked with re-establishing the monitoring of the plutonium-producing Yongbyon nuclear facility, and then being on site while it is closed and eventually dismantled.

Conservatives in Washington have berated the Bush administration for caving in on its tough stance against the North. The United States agreed to resolve financial restrictions it placed on a Macau bank -- accused of complicity in counterfeiting and money laundering by North Korea -- to pave the way for the nuclear disarmament-for-aid deal.

Yesterday during a visit to Australia, Vice President Dick Cheney expressed caution about the agreement, but called it a "first hopeful step."

"We go into this deal with our eyes open," Mr. Cheney said. "In light of North Korea's missile test last July, its nuclear test in October and its record of proliferation and human rights abuses, the regime in Pyongyang has much to prove."

The Feb. 13 agreement signed by the two Koreas, the United States, Japan, China and Russia specifies only that IAEA inspectors should be tasked with supervising the closing of the Yongbyon reactor.

Mr. ElBaradei said he and North Korean authorities would meet on how to "implement the freeze of [nuclear] facilities" and the "eventual dismantlement of these facilities."

Mr. Ban, who was visiting U.N. agencies in Vienna, said he hoped the ElBaradei invitation would translate into concrete steps toward denuclearizing the Korean Peninsula.

The Feb. 13 deal requires North Korea to first shut down and seal its main nuclear reactor within 60 days of the agreement, accept international monitors and begin discussions with the United States on other nuclear facilities. In return, the nations would ship the North an initial load of fuel oil.

If North Korea reveals all its nuclear programs and begins to disable its nuclear facilities, it then would get a much larger shipment of fuel oil and aid. The United States also would begin the process of removing North Korea from its designation as a terror-sponsoring state and ending trade sanctions.

US 'Very Pleased' About North Korean Invitation To UN Watchdog: Rice (AFP)

AFP, February 24, 2007

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Friday the US administration is "very pleased" about an invitation to the chief UN atomic watchdog to visit North Korea and discuss a landmark deal to curb Pyongyang's nuclear arms program.

DOJ_NMG_0136939

Mohamed ElBaradei, head of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), announced in Vienna the trip to the North Korean capital, expected to take place in mid-March.

"We are really very pleased that the IAEA (will) ... be able to go back into North Korea to be able to verify compliance with the agreement that is to take place over the next 60 days that would shut down the Pyongyang reactor and would seal it," Rice told reporters during a visit to Ottawa.

This would allow a next phase, "which is the disablement of the nuclear facilities of North Korea on the way to the full denuclearization of the Korean peninsula," she said.

"It is indeed a good sign it has happened as quickly as it has."

In Washington, White House spokesman Tony Fratto earlier described the North Korean invitation as a step forward toward implementing a February 13 deal whereby Pyongyang would shut down a key nuclear facility in exchange for energy aid.

"It's a positive sign," Fratto told reporters. "It shows that we're beginning to execute the terms of the agreement.

"We'll be interested in hearing his (ElBaradei's) report when he gets back," the spokesman said. "But certainly, our view is positive on that."

N. Korea, U.N. To Develop Plan To Dismantle Nukes (LAT)

By Bob Drogin

The Los Angeles Times, February 24, 2007

VIENNA, Austria -- In a fresh sign of easing tensions, North Korean officials on Friday invited the chief of the United Nations' nuclear watchdog agency to come to their capital, Pyongyang, next month to develop plans aimed at dismantling the nation's nuclear weapons program, officials said here.

Mohamed ElBaradei, director of the International Atomic Energy Agency, said that he hopes to discuss the "shut-down and eventual abandonment" of the plutonium-producing reactor facility at Yongbyon, ending its ability to produce fuel for additional nuclear weapons.

North Korea, which tested its first nuclear device in October, pledged earlier this month to stop, seal and ultimately disable operations at Yongbyon. It also agreed to let IAEA inspectors return to examine its bombs, nuclear fuel stores and other nuclear facilities. Inspectors were ordered out in December 2002 when the reclusive regime withdrew from the Nonproliferation Treaty.

Pyongyang did not promise to relinquish its current arsenal, believed to be up to six bombs or the fissionable material to make them, but agreed to further negotiations in the future.

"I see this as a step toward the denuclearization of the North Korean Peninsula," ElBaradei told reporters in a joint briefing with U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon, who is visiting Vienna. A spokeswoman said ElBaradei probably will visit in the second week of March.

The White House, which is eager to see North Korea disarm, applauded the invitation as a sign of progress. "It's a positive sign," said White House spokesman Tony Fratto. "It shows that we're beginning to execute the terms of the agreement."

The breakthrough came a day after ElBaradei reported that Iran had defied a U.N. Security Council order to suspend its nuclear enrichment program. The report said Iran instead steadily has expanded low-grade enrichment of uranium, has installed further equipment used for enrichment, and continued construction of related facilities. The report cited numerous cases where Tehran has ignored IAEA requests for additional access or information.

In an interview Friday, Ali Asghar Soltanieh, Iran's representative to the IAEA, claimed that the report supported Iran because IAEA experts "found no evidence," he said, of diverted nuclear material that could be used for weapons. "It is a clean bill of health," he said.

The report, however, states that the IAEA "is unable to verify the absence of undeclared nuclear material and activities" unless Tehran provides additional cooperation to solve a series of outstanding concerns. Inspectors are restricted in their travel in Iran, and may visit only sites that Iran has declared formally.

Soltanieh said that the IAEA report disproved concerns in Washington, D.C., that Iran secretly is planning to use a civilian nuclear fuel program to build nuclear arms.

DOJ_NMG_0136940

"All these allegations have been proved by Mr. ElBaradei to be baseless," he said. "The report proves that all activities of Iran are for peaceful purposes."

Soltanieh repeated Iran's offer to start negotiations if Washington and its allies drop U.N. sanctions and their demands for an immediate freeze of nuclear activities as a precondition to talks. "We are a great nation and preconditions are a humiliation," he said.

Bush administration officials will meet other Security Council members in London on Monday to draft further U.N. sanctions proposals. The talks are expected to focus on European export guarantees that help prop up Iran's economy.

Ban, the new U.N. chief, urged Iran to follow North Korea's example and return to talks with the international community.

"I very much hope that the Iranian authorities learn from the case of the North Korean nuclear example," he said. "It should emphasize the better future of the nuclear issue through dialogue."

North Korea agreed Feb. 13 to freeze its production of plutonium at its five-megawatt facility at Yongbyon and to allow inspectors to monitor and verify its compliance. In return, the United States, China, South Korea and Russia agreed to provide about $400 million in food and fuel aid, plus security guarantees.

The United States also agreed to start the process of removing North Korea from its designation as a state that sponsors terrorism, and to discuss terms for normalizing relations and ending economic sanctions.

The pact defers several more difficult issues, including denuclearization of the Korean peninsula, a complete declaration of North Korea's nuclear activities. Some of President Bush's supporters have criticized the arrangement, saying the White House had rewarded Kim Jong-Il's government for testing a bomb.

Report: North Korea's Main Nuclear Envoy To Visit US Within Days (AP)

AP, February 23, 2007

SEOUL (AP) — North Korea's chief nuclear negotiator plans to visit the United States within days for follow-up talks on a recent disarmament deal, a South Korean news report said Saturday.

IAEA: Nation invites U.N. to discuss denuclearization

The North's Vice Foreign Minister Kim Kye Gwan is expected to arrive in San Francisco on Thursday en route to New York for meetings with his U.S. counterpart, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, South Korea's Yonhap news agency reported.

If Kim's trip takes place, it would be the first U.S. visit by North Korea's main nuclear envoy since the international standoff over the North's nuclear ambitions flared in late 2002.

Kim plans to spend one night in San Francisco to deliver a lecture at Stanford University, the report said, citing multiple unidentified individuals in the U.S.

The North Korean diplomat may also give a lecture at New York's Korea Society, Yonhap said.

Major South Korean newspapers carried similar reports. None of the reports said how long Kim was expected to stay in the U.S.

North Korea agreed at six-nation nuclear talks in Beijing days ago to shutter and disable its nuclear facilities in exchange for energy aid and political incentives, including the opening of two-way talks with the U.S. on establishing diplomatic relations.

Hill said at the end of the negotiations that he had invited Kim to New York for normalization discussions.

The breakthrough deal put a cap on rising tensions in the region since North Korea's nuclear test in October. But it also faced criticism for allegedly rewarding the communist nation for bad behavior.

The countries involved in the six-nation talks are the two Koreas, the United States, Japan, China and Russia.

Blast That Killed U.S. Diplomat Tied To Qaeda (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

KARACHI, Pakistan, Feb. 22 — The suicide bombing that killed an American diplomat here last March, just before a visit by President Bush, was organized by a small cell of Pakistani militants and masterminded by an operative of Al Qaeda based in the Pakistan's tribal areas, Pakistan says.

DOJ_NMG_0136941

The charge is being made by Pakistani officials as they present evidence — the result of months of investigations by the police, assisted by F.B.I. investigators — at the trial of two men accused in the plot.

The men, Anwar ul-Haq, 27, and Usman Ghani, 26, both ethnic Pashtuns from Pakistan's North-West Frontier Province, grew up in the teeming working-class neighborhoods of Karachi and fought with the Taliban in Afghanistan, the investigators say. On Thursday, they sat behind bars, wearing long beards and knitted prayer caps, at the back of a courtroom in Karachi's central jail, listening intently to an investigator outline the evidence against them.

The case is one of the first in Pakistan to underline in court the links between splinter cells of Pakistani jihad groups and Qaeda operatives in Waziristan, part of Pakistan's tribal areas, which have come under increasing scrutiny as a staging area for suicide bombers and Taliban insurgents battling NATO and American forces in Afghanistan.

Publicly, Pakistani leaders have sought to play down the importance of the tribal areas as havens for militants. But the evidence being presented by Pakistani investigators makes clear the threat contained in Waziristan, not only for Afghanistan but for Pakistan itself, which has suffered six suicide bombings in the last five weeks.

Two assassination attempts against President Pervez Musharraf in December 2003 were also traced to Qaeda and militants who enjoyed a haven in the same region, where the government has little control and foreign and Pakistani militants operate almost unimpeded, according to the home secretary of Sindh Province, Ghulam Mohatarem, a retired army brigadier.

"They mostly come from the north," he said of the bombers that have plagued Karachi and other cities. "But they are provided with logistics from small local cells that come up and then disappear." United States officials in Pakistan declined to be interviewed for this article.

The investigators' conclusions, which are largely drawn from a confession by Mr. Haq and from the infiltration of terrorist cells, are the latest indication that Al Qaeda and its local operatives are still able to operate from Waziristan.

Brigadier Mohatarem, the home secretary, said that the police in Karachi, a sprawling and violent city of about 16 million, tracked down and disrupted the activities of numerous terrorist splinter groups in recent months.

Although Karachi has seen some of the worst terrorist attacks in Pakistan since 2001, there have been no Qaeda-linked attacks here for nearly a year since the consulate bombing.

"We are slightly more confident because the logistics have become more difficult for them," Brigadier Mohatarem said. Yet the threat of terrorism remains, he and others agreed. "We cannot say it has been wiped out," a senior police official said of Al Qaeda.

Family members denied in interviews that the two defendants had gone to Afghanistan, knew the bomber, Raja Tahir, 23, also from Karachi, or had any jihad links. Both men are pleading not guilty, their lawyers said.

But the police say there is little doubt that the suicide bombing of March 2, 2006, which killed the diplomat David Foy, his driver and three others, had a Qaeda connection because of the timing, just two days before Mr. Bush's visit to Pakistan.

Investigators say they have traced other leads to Waziristan as well. The stolen car used in the attack was packed with explosives there and driven down to Karachi, according to one police report.

The police say all the suspects had spent time in Taliban ranks fighting the Northern Alliance in Afghanistan, and all three had links with the now banned Pakistani jihadi group, Jaish-e-Mohammed.

The mastermind of the plot, Qari Mohammed Zafar, a man from Karachi with known links to Al Qaeda, remains at large in Waziristan, the home secretary said. "Behind him we don't know who is there, if he is a puppet in a chain," he added.

Mr. Zafar is a local leader of Lashkar-e-Jhangvi, an outlawed militant group that has been found to provide the manpower for Qaeda bomb attacks in Pakistan in the past.

He bears the religious title of Qari, meaning he has memorized the Koran. He fought in Afghanistan with the Taliban in the 1990s, and forged links there with Al Qaeda, officials said, some of them speaking on condition of anonymity because of their work in counterterrorism.

After the Taliban government fell, Mr. Zafar took refuge in South Waziristan and sometimes has ventured into rural parts of Sindh Province, Brigadier Mohatarem, the home secretary, said. Three men arrested in Karachi this week with weapons and a suicide vest were also a splinter cell sent by Mr. Zafar, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0136942

Mr. Zafar is accused of recruiting the three men who carried out the consulate bombing, in which Mr. Tahir reversed his car into a diplomatic convoy, detonating an enormous blast that tore through the armored plating of the diplomat's car, killing him and his driver immediately.

F.B.I. investigators calculated that there were 880 pounds of C4 explosive packed into the car, Brigadier Mohatarem said. The security cars in front and behind the diplomat's vehicle were blown apart.

Three security men in the car behind were thrown up the street, one some 75 yards, but all survived. A police ranger posted on the street was killed, and two other security guards later died of their wounds. Mr. Haq stands accused as the main logistics organizer. On the day of the bombing, the police charge, he arrived with Mr. Tahir in his car, stood as a lookout and signaled Mr. Tahir by cellphone as the convoy approached.

Mr. Tahir was caught on security cameras in the area parking his car and crossing a nearby parking lot, dressed trendily in a long Pakistani shirt over jeans to allay suspicion, a senior police official familiar with the case said. His car, a two-year-old Toyota Corolla, was stolen, but also intended to give the impression of affluence, the official said.

Mr. Haq has confessed to being present near the consulate that day and to his connection with the bombing, the police said. His brother, Imanullah, 26, who like many Pakistanis uses one name, denied that that his brother was involved, or was acquainted with the bomber.

Mr. Haq's lawyer, Mohammed Ilyas Khan, said he was accused of prompting Mr. Tahir to carry out the bomb attack, and of paying money to the bomber's family. "He has made a confession due to threats and torture but he has told me he will retract that in court," he said.

That confession has also implicated Mr. Ghani, along with the testimony of two witnesses, neither of whom are convincing, according to Mr. Ghani's lawyer, Mushtaq Ahmed. Mr. Ghani's role is less clear.

Mr. Ghani's father, Abdul Rauf, a community social worker, said in an interview that the family knew Mr. Haq well and had rented a shop premises to him, but denied that his son was mixed up in militancy, or was anywhere near the bomb blast that day.

Mr. Rauf also denied that his son knew the bomber, or had ever been to Afghanistan.

But the police say the two were friends and imprisoned together in Afghanistan after they were captured along with thousands of other Taliban soldiers in northern Afghanistan in 2001, as the United States bombing helped topple the Taliban government.

Their incarceration in the notorious Shiberghan prison, run by the Uzbek general, Abdul Rashid Dostum, in northern Afghanistan — where scores of Taliban prisoners died from asphyxiation as they were transported in containers, or from disease and malnutrition — further radicalized the young men, Brigadier Mohatarem said.

Mr. Tahir was only 18 and Mr. Ghani 21 at the time of their capture, and Mr. Tahir contracted tuberculosis in the overcrowded prison before the Afghan government released him a year later. Mr. Ghani was held even longer.

The motivation behind the bomb attack was not hard to see. "The motive was hate for Americans," Brigadier Mohatarem said.

Pakistan Successfully Tests Nuclear-capable Missile (AFP)

AFP, February 23, 2007

Pakistan Friday test-fired its longest range nuclear-capable ballistic missile, two days after signing a deal with rival India to cut the risk of atomic weapons accidents, the military said.

The Shaheen II, or Hatf VI, missile with a range of 2,000 kilometres (1,240 miles) was launched from an undisclosed location, military spokesman Major General Shaukat Sultan told AFP.

"The test was very successful. It was carried out to validate technical parameters and it hit the target with 100 percent accuracy," Sultan said.

"It is a two-stage solid-fuel-based missile capable of carrying all types of warhead including nuclear."

Pakistan had informed "neighbouring countries" in advance about the missile test, foreign office spokeswoman Tasnim Aslam said. Pakistan is bordered by India, Afghanistan, China and Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0136943

"We conduct these tests from time to time according to our requirement and defence needs. It was not meant to convey any message to anyone. It was not any country-specific," she said.

Pakistan President Pervez Musharraf and Prime Minister Shaukat Aziz congratulated the missile's technical team "on its outstanding success," a military statement said.

"The missile test was part of (a) continuous process of validation and technical improvement, which Pakistan follows to consolidate and verify its various land-based strategic missile systems," the statement said.

The test comes at a key time in relations between New Delhi and Islamabad following the firebombing of a cross-border train at midnight Sunday, which killed 68 Pakistanis and Indians.

Pakistan Foreign Minister Khurshid Kasuri went ahead with a visit to India starting on Tuesday, during which the two countries signed the nuclear weapon safeguard agreement.

Friday's missile launch was watched by Pakistan's Chairman of Joint Chiefs of Staff General Ehsan Ul Haq, who said the test was "an important milestone in Pakistan's quest for sustaining strategic balance in South Asia."

India and Pakistan carried out tit-for-tat nuclear detonations in May 1998 and have routinely conducted missile tests since, even after the start of a slow-moving peace process in January 2004.

The neighbours have fought three wars since independence from Britain in 1947, two of them over the disputed Himalayan territory of Kashmir, which is divided between the two and claimed by both in its entirety.

Turks Charge Kurd With Inciting Hatred (WP/AP)

Associated Press

The Washington Post, February 24, 2007

Politician Made Remarks About Iraq

ANKARA, Turkey, Feb. 23 -- A politician was charged Friday with inciting hatred and threatening public safety after suggesting that fellow Kurds would rise against the state and fight if Turkey ever attacked their Kurdish brethren in neighboring Iraq.

Police detained Hilmi Aydogdu, leader of the Democratic Society Party's branch in the mainly Kurdish city of Diyarbakir, as he left a conference and questioned him over the remarks, said Nazmi Gur, a party spokesman.

Prosecutors later formally arrested Aydogdu and charged him with threatening public safety by inciting racial enmity and hatred. The charge carries a maximum three-year prison sentence.

In remarks published in several newspapers, Aydogdu had warned Turkey against taking action in the oil-rich Iraqi city of Kirkuk.

Turkey, which has been trying to quell a domestic Kurdish insurgency for more than two decades, fears that Iraqi Kurdish groups could seize control of the northern city and incorporate it into their semiautonomous region.

Some in Turkey have suggested that Ankara could take military action to prevent that from happening.

"The two sides in this war would be Turkey and the Kurds in Iraq. There are some 20 million Kurds in Turkey, and the 20 million Kurds would regard such a war as an attack against them," newspapers quoted Aydogdu as saying.

"Any attack on Kirkuk would be considered an attack on Diyarbakir," the politician was also quoted as saying.

Turkish leaders are concerned that Iraq's Kurds want Kirkuk's oil revenue to fund a bid for independence that could encourage separatist Kurdish guerrillas in Turkey who have been fighting for autonomy since 1984. The conflict has killed 37,000 people.

Turkey has not ruled out military incursions into Iraq to hunt separatist Kurds, despite warnings from the United States, which fears that such moves could lead to tensions with the Iraqi Kurdish groups allied with Washington.

Turkish authorities frequently accuse the Democratic Society Party of having links to an outlawed Kurdish guerrilla group, the Kurdistan Workers' Party, or PKK, which the United States and European Union consider a terrorist group.

Party members frequently are detained and branch offices raided.

46 Nations Push For Cluster Bomb Ban (WT/AP)

By Doug Mellgren

DOJ_NMG_0136944

The Washington Times, February 24, 2007

OSLO -- Forty-six nations adopted a declaration yesterday calling for a 2008 treaty banning cluster bombs, saying the weapons kill and maim long after conflicts end and inflict "unacceptable harm" on civilians, particularly children.

Some key arms makers -- including the United States, Russia, Israel and China -- snubbed the conference. Of the 49 nations attending, Poland, Romania and Japan did not approve the final text.

But organizers said the declaration was needed despite the absence of key nations to avoid a potential humanitarian disaster posed by unexploded cluster munitions.

Cluster bomblets are packed by the hundreds into artillery shells, bombs or missiles, which scatter them over vast areas, with some failing to explode immediately. The unexploded bomblets can then lie dormant for years after conflicts end until they are disturbed, often by civilians.

As many as 60 percent of the victims in Southeast Asia are children, the Cluster Munition Coalition campaign group said. The weapons have recently been used in Iraq, Kosovo, Afghanistan and Lebanon, it said. The United Nations estimated that Israel dropped as many as 4 million bomblets in southern Lebanon during last year's war with Hezbollah, with as many as 40 percent failing to explode on impact.

Children can be attracted to the unexploded bombs by their small size, shape and bright colors, activists say.

Mark Regev, spokesman for Israel's Foreign Ministry said: "During the recent conflict in Lebanon, Israel used no munitions that were outlawed by international treaties or international law."

Mr. Regev said if the declaration ever evolves into a treaty, then Israel would examine it and decide then how to respond.

While the document is not binding, organizers and activists hope it will pressure nations into halting the use of cluster bombs. Norway hopes the treaty would be similar to one outlawing anti-personnel mines, negotiated in Oslo in 1997.

"If you need proof that you can conclude a treaty without the United States, Russia and China, look at the land mine treaty," said Steve Goose of Human Rights Watch. Despite rejecting that treaty, Mr. Goose said, the major powers have stopped deploying land mines and the number of civilian casualties has been cut in half since 1997.

The declaration urged nations to "conclude by 2008 a legally binding international instrument" to ban cluster bombs. The treaty would "prohibit the use, production, transfer and stockpiling of those cluster munitions that cause unacceptable harm to civilians," the declaration said.

It urged countries take steps at a national level before the treaty takes effect. Norway has already done so, while Austria announced a moratorium on cluster bombs at the start of the conference.

The United States, China and Russia have refused to sign the land mine treaty and oppose the Norwegian initiative on cluster bombs. They did not send representatives to the meeting. Australia, Israel, India and Pakistan also did not attend. Those nations say the weapons should be dealt with in other arenas, such as the U.N. Convention on Conventional Weapons.

U.S. In Talks With Britain On Installing Missile Defense System (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

LONDON, Feb. 23 — Britain and the United States said Friday that they were discussing the stationing of an American antiballistic missile defense system on British soil.

The United States previously offered to locate the missile system in the Czech Republic and Poland, drawing furious objections from Russia, though Washington argues that the system is not built to defend against Russia but against Iran, principally, and other potential threats.

Prime Minister Tony Blair's spokeswoman said Friday that Britain had been secretly lobbying for inclusion in the system for some time. "It is our intention that whilst the United States are in the decision-making process, the U.K. should be considered as part of that," the spokeswoman said.

"The prime minister thinks it is a good idea that we are part of the consideration by the United States" she said, speaking on the condition of anonymity, which the British civil service requires. "We believe it is an important step toward providing missile defense coverage for Europe, of which we are part."

DOJ_NMG_0136945

The possible step, first mentioned in The Economist magazine, seems sure to prove contentious in Britain, and to cloud Mr. Blair's final months in office, along with two other events that surfaced Friday.

In one, relatives of British soldiers slain in Iraq began a peace vigil in blue nylon tents near Mr. Blair's office, and in the other, Mr. Blair pondered a new military deployment in Afghanistan.

Just two days after Mr. Blair announced a withdrawal of 1,600 of the 7,100 British soldiers in southern Iraq, Defense Secretary Des Browne said "some additional forces" — possibly about 1,000 soldiers — would be sent to join the 5,600 Britons who are part of NATO forces confronting an expected spring offensive by the Taliban in Afghanistan.

Word of the missile defense negotiations followed remarks in Washington on Thursday by Gen. Henry Obering III, who discussed the deployment of missile defenses in Britain, saying, "We are always looking for new ways to partner with the United Kingdom, whether that be co-development or a hosting, or any of the activities of that nature." He also said that radar systems were already in final testing in Britain.

At first the American Embassy in London made remarks that the British news media seized on as a rebuff of Mr. Blair's interest. David Johnson, the deputy chief of mission at the United States Embassy in London, told a BBC radio interviewer: "I would see as we go forward. There may be opportunities for us to talk to other countries about other needs, but right now we're concentrating on the Czech Republic and on Poland as the primary sites where we would be looking for this."

In a subsequent statement, Mr. Johnson said any suggestion that his remarks "were a rebuff to the British government is nonsense. We have been and will be in discussions with the British government as we develop our missile defense system and be open to opportunities for joint work as we go forward."

The negotiations are most likely to raise political hackles at a time when many in Mr. Blair's Labor Party and in the opposition Conservatives are pressing for Britain to distance itself from the United States after their close and sometimes unpopular alliance in Iraq.

The Conservatives said the government had given no information about its discussions with the United States. "If there is a request to base part of the U.S. National Missile Defense system in the U.K., we would need to see the exact nature of that request before taking a decision," said Liam Fox, the Conservative spokesman on defense. The government, he said, needs "to be more honest with the opposition" to secure bipartisan support for the proposed missile deployment.

Mr. Fox also took issue with the plan to deploy more troops to Afghanistan, saying other European countries, including Germany, France, Italy and Spain, should commit troops in the hazardous Helmand Province of southern Afghanistan, where many British soldiers are based.

"It is clear that the government has failed to get our NATO allies to carry their share of the burden in Afghanistan," he said, complaining that, with deployments in Iraq and Afghanistan, "it is clear now that our army is so overstretched we can't carry two conflicts."

Apart from Iraq and Afghanistan, British troops are deployed in the Balkans and in Northern Ireland.

The political hazards of Mr. Blair's military ventures were underlined by the protest on Whitehall, the broad boulevard running by the gated and closely guarded entrance to Downing Street, where Mr. Blair has his office and residence.

Rose Gentle, whose 19-year-old son Gordon was killed in Basra, Iraq, in 2004, led a small group of protesters who pitched camp and submitted a letter addressed to Mr. Blair calling for a meeting with him.

"This is our sixth such visit, and each time you have not seen fit to give us a few minutes of your time," the letter said. "We have a number of questions that we need answered about the deaths of our sons in Iraq, and we insist that you meet us."

"Please believe us, Mr. Blair, that neither we nor these questions will go away," the letter said.

UK Wants US Missile Defence Sites (FT)

By Stephen Fidler, Christopher Adams, Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, February 24, 2007

Britain has pressed Washington to site important elements of the US missile defence system in the UK, British officials said on Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0136946

The US, which says the system is designed to shoot down missiles from problem states such as Iran and North Korea, is building a multi-layered missile defence system aimed at protecting the US.

Part of the programme is aimed at building a system to shoot down missiles during the middle of their trajectory.

An elementary version of this "mid-course system" has already been set up in the Pacific to protect the US west coast, and the US is now holding talks with Poland and the Czech Republic with a view to protecting the east coast.

Washington is discussing siting missile interceptors in Poland, near the Baltic Sea, and a high definition X-band radar in the Czech Republic.

UK officials say Tony Blair has pressed Washington to place at least some of those interceptors on British soil. The UK prime minister is said to share US concerns about the threat posed by missiles from states of concern.

"In the face of rogue states, this is something that can assist in Britain's defence," a UK official said on Friday. The official added: "The fact that the Poles and Czechs were involved prior to us does not diminish our wish for discussions to continue. The prime minister is keen discussions continue to see if we can be part of the outcome. "The UK position was first reported on Friday by The Economist magazine.

The discussions with Warsaw and Prague have brought protests from Russia, which claims to feel threatened by US expansionism. The US insists that the system is not directed against Moscow, and could not handle in any case the number and sophistication of Russia's many intercontinental ballistic missiles.

The possibility that the interceptors could be on UK soil will raise questions about whether it will make Britain safer. Some US scientists argue the early warning radar could not pick up Iranian missiles fired at Poland and the Czech Republic, because their trajectory would be hidden by the curvature of the earth.

Philip Coyle, a senior adviser to the US-based Center for Defense Information, said that the missile interceptors were close to the size of an inter-continental ballistic missile and their deployment at short notice could make the Russians nervous. "When they first take off, you can't be quite sure where they are headed if you're a Russian."

Mr Coyle and others also say that, contrary to US official claims, the system has not been shown to work under realistic conditions.

Ian Davis, director of the British American Security Information Council, described the system as a "Maginot Line in the sky". He said the system "has very low probability of functioning effectively, even lower relevance to contemporary security risks, and a danger of provoking long-term missile escalation with Russia and China".

Britain agreed in 2003 to an upgrading of the early-warning radar facility at Fylingdales in Yorkshire, which US officials say should be complete later this year. Any UK-based interceptors would not be located near the early warning radar.

In a January 23 letter to Washington's US Nato allies outlining US intentions for missile defence, Victoria Nuland, US ambassador to Nato, mentions UK offers of assistance for the programme. It also refers to Denmark, which is responsible for a radar facility on Greenland that may be upgraded, and says other nations may be approached for assistance.

Misguided Missiles (NYT)

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

Fifteen years after the cold war's end, it would seem that everyone involved should know better. But the Bush administration's tone-deaf plan to station parts of a missile defense system in Eastern Europe and Moscow's snarling response show that all sides could use a refresher course in diplomatic sense and civility.

American officials insist that the 10 interceptors it is planning to place in Poland and the early warning radar for the Czech Republic are supposed to defend Europe from Iran's missiles — not Russia's. And there is no doubt they're telling the truth. The untested system could be easily overwhelmed by Russia's huge nuclear arsenal.

It is unlikely, however, that more military posturing against Iran is going to persuade Tehran to give up its nuclear ambitions. Russia's furious reaction to the stationing of even weak missile defenses near its borders (and on the territory of its former satellites), while wildly out of proportion, was also utterly predictable. A top Russian general — who sounded as if he'd slept through the last 15 years — warned the Poles and the Czechs that if they went along with America's plans, Russia's missiles "will be capable of targeting the facilities."

DOJ_NMG_0136947

The mixture of crocodile tears and threats from Russian officials seems overly dramatic — and very much in character for President Vladimir Putin, who is hoping to divert attention from his own thuggery at home, not to mention his desire to reassert power in Russia's old neighborhood.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who cut her teeth on Kremlinology, should have expected Moscow's reaction. And Ms. Rice, who's been counting on Russia to help keep up the pressure against Iran's nuclear efforts, should have known that provoking Moscow this way could be especially counterproductive. Add to that the fact that the move has annoyed "old European" allies, like Germany, which are central to efforts to contain Iran, and it seems like another example of diplomatic negligence.

In any case, this is a fight that should be quickly reined in. Washington has wisely chosen to respond calmly to Russia's vitriol, and Russia's foreign minister, Sergey Lavrov, has taken some welcome steps to moderate Moscow's stance.

A few interceptors in Europe may or may not work against "rogue states," but they are counterproductive if all they do is to provoke Russia and irk NATO allies.

Fear Of Return Of Berlusconi Reunites Left Behind Prodi (NYT)

By Ian Fisher

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

ROME, Feb. 23 — It wasn't love or even any real faith that they could stick together long. Rather, it seems, a singular frightening thought pushed nine bickering parties to agree late on Thursday to come together again: that Silvio Berlusconi might soon lead Italy again.

"They have seen what can happen, and they are very frightened," said Renato Mannheimer, one of Italy's top pollsters. "They are afraid of Berlusconi."

On Friday, two days after the center-left government of Romano Prodi fell, Mr. Mannheimer released a poll making that threat clear. It showed that Mr. Berlusconi's center-right coalition would probably win if elections were called now.

New elections seem unlikely at the moment. President Giorgio Napolitano ended two days of consultations on how to move ahead on Friday, and said he would announce his decision on Saturday morning.

But the real worry that the center-left could again lose power, only nine months after wresting it from Mr. Berlusconi, seemed to concentrate minds overnight Thursday as the fractured parties in Mr. Prodi's coalition came together behind his demands: 12 nonnegotiable points for leading a new government.

Those points essentially rein in the coalition's far left, which had come into increasing conflict with more centrist forces in the government. On Wednesday, two far-left senators abstained from a crucial vote on the government's foreign policy. When the vote failed, Mr. Prodi submitted his resignation.

On Friday, the far left could not do enough penance. The Refounded Communists expelled one of the senators who voted against the measure for "a breach that could not be healed," and declared themselves strongly behind Mr. Prodi.

"We reaffirm our faith in the prime minister," the party said in a statement, "and confirm a loyal and effective collaboration."

By Friday evening, it was not yet certain that Mr. Prodi would be given the chance to form another government, though the possibility looked more and more likely. By the rules, Mr. Napolitano must ask Mr. Prodi to form a government, following his consultations with the nation's political parties and important institutions.

That government would then face a confidence vote in Parliament. There also remained a possibility that Mr. Prodi could peel off several opposition politicians to enlarge his majority and make governing easier.

The president has other options: asking someone else to try to form a government, for example, or calling for a caretaker government as a transition toward elections. He could also simply call new elections.

That last option dimmed still further after Mr. Berlusconi, who had been quoted in the news media as calling for immediate elections, failed to advocate them in his meeting with Mr. Napolitano on Friday. Political experts note that, despite his standing in the polls, a victory is not certain so soon after his loss last year and, at any rate, his own coalition is also divided.

But he strongly urged that Mr. Prodi not be given a new mandate, advocating instead a temporary government of neutral technocrats and a relatively quick election.

DOJ_NMG_0136948

"We asked the head of state to keep in mind that this government was not, and never will be, capable of governing," Mr. Berlusconi said.

Despite Mr. Berlusconi's hesitancy, the Italian news media reported Friday that Mr. Prodi's supporters successfully leveraged worry about Mr. Berlusconi's return to office to gain support for Mr. Prodi's 12 points. Those points aimed to give Mr. Prodi more autonomy, declaring unanimity on foreign affairs and making his spokesman the public voice for the entire government.

But the points were notable also for what was left out and so, to many experts, underscored that any new Prodi government was likely to remain divided. He did not include one of the most contentious initiatives, a proposal to grant rights to unmarried couples, including homosexuals.

By leaving it out, Mr. Prodi seemed to sidestep another bruising fight in Parliament, given the strong opposition to the measure by the Vatican and an influential conservative minister. But the measure was a central campaign promise, and left-leaning members of Parliament expressed much disappointment that Mr. Prodi had left it unmentioned.

For the moment, though, they preferred to say that was the cost of staying in power, noting that the measure could still be raised in Parliament.

Prodi Aims To Secure Centre-left Vote (FT)

By Tony Barber

Financial Times, February 24, 2007

Italian political leaders continued their search for a new government on Friday as Romano Prodi, the caretaker prime minister, tried to strengthen his centre-left coalition and secure it a second term of office.

Mr Prodi won agreement from the nine parties in the coalition on Thursday to support a 12-point political programme, including public spending cuts, measures to help the south of Italy and liberalisation of professions and the service sector.

Mr Prodi's aim is to ensure that if Giorgio Napolitano, Italy's head of state, asks him to form a new government, he will be able to count on the support of every single centre-left legislator in a subsequent vote of confidence.

It was the centre-left's lack of a majority in the Senate, parliament's upper house, that forced Mr Prodi's resignation on Wednesday when the government unexpectedly lost a vote on foreign policy.

The centre-left is hoping to strengthen its numerical position in parliament by wooing several moderate opposition politicians, including Marco Follini, a former deputy premier, and some of his associates.

However, the Union of Christian Democrats (UDC), the main moderate opposition party, indicated on Friday that it was unlikely to switch sides and join the centre-left, saying it wanted "a government of national responsibility".

"Italy needs a serious and authoritative government. It is necessary to recognise that the [centre-left] majority is not self-sufficient, neither politically nor numerically," said Lorenzo Cesa, the UDC leader.

The 12-point programme agreed by the centre-left has some glaring omissions, compared with the policies pursued by the Prodi government up to last Wednesday.

The new programme contains no commitment to extend the legal rights of unwed couples, including gays. This was a divisive issue for Mr Prodi's coalition, and when the government finally agreed to a modest measure in favour of unwed couples, it came under vociferous attack from Italy's Roman Catholic Church.

The new programme also contains no commitment to electoral reform, a measure that many politicians and commentators regard as essential to giving Italy more stable governments.

The programme promises a "reordering" of Italy's welfare system, but says that any reform of the overburdened state pension system would favour the young and those on low pensions.

Italian President Weighs Prodi's Support (AP)

By Alessandra Rizzo, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 24, 2007

Center-left leaders rallied behind Romano Prodi on Friday, boosting his chances of returning to office just days after he resigned as premier.

DOJ_NMG_0136949

The politicians told the Italian president, who has been holding talks aimed at solving the political crisis, that they were ready to support any bids by Prodi to return to the premiership. Earlier, they all signed up to a new 12-point government program that Prodi said would be "nonnegotiable."

Prodi stepped down Wednesday evening after an embarrassing parliamentary defeat over foreign policy, including the government's plan to keep troops in Afghanistan. He is staying on in a caretaker role.

"We are convinced that this experience served as a lesson to all of us," said Antonio Di Pietro, who serves as infrastructure minister. "This renewed sense of responsibility and political maturity ... can lead us to do our job better."

Among those who also expressed their support were leaders of Communist parties and other radical leftists.

But even with the full backing of his coalition, Prodi's majority at the Senate remains minimal, raising fears that any further rebellion by his often-insubordinate allies might bring him down again.

Seeking to quell these fears, Prodi has been scrambling to widen his support by luring in a handful of moderate senators. He is also trying to ensure the support of at least some of the seven honorary senators appointed for life.

The 12-point plan calls for respecting Italy's international commitments in Afghanistan and elsewhere, and for the construction of a high-speed rail line linking Turin with Lyon, France.

In an apparent nod to Catholic moderate lawmakers, the new government program made no mention of a proposal to grant legal rights to unmarried couples, including gay partners. The proposal has angered the Vatican and drawn the opposition of Catholic politicians.

The plan also gives the premier the final word on any disagreement in the squabbling coalition.

"On this basis, we can start over," Foreign Minister Massimo D'Alema said.

It will now be up to President Giorgio Napolitano to decide what to do next. The president said he will announce his decision on Saturday.

Napolitano might reject Prodi's resignation, asking him to stay on and seek a new vote of confidence in parliament. Or he might ask Prodi or another leader from his coalition to form a new center-left government. Alternatively he might tap an institutional figure above the political fray to form a Cabinet — possibly with broad support from both coalitions — or might call early elections.

Chávez Ends Busy Week Aiding Venezuela's Latin Neighbors (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

CARACAS, Venezuela, Feb. 23 — President Hugo Chávez met here on Friday with President Daniel Ortega of Nicaragua to discuss an array of Venezuelan assistance programs, capping an unusually frenetic week for this country's efforts to enhance its political and economic influence in parts of Latin America.

At the heart of many of the agreements reached this week — with Nicaragua, Ecuador and Argentina — is Venezuela's use of its windfall from historically high oil prices, and sometimes its own reserves and exports of oil, to lift its regional profile.

Mr. Chávez is using Venezuela's oil revenues, valued at more than $50 billion a year, to counter the influence of the United States and multilateral lending organizations like the International Monetary Fund.

The Venezuelan aid for Nicaragua has been a godsend for Mr. Ortega, the former Sandinista guerrilla leader who was elected president last year. Venezuela has already agreed to forgive more than $30 million in Nicaraguan debt, provide more than two dozen generating plants to alleviate an electricity shortage and open an office of Venezuela's development bank in Managua to offer low-interest loans to small businesses.

Venezuela is also considering building an oil refinery in Nicaragua and a pipeline across that country from the Caribbean to the Pacific to transport Venezuelan crude oil to refineries in China and Japan, part of an effort to move away from exporting oil to the United States.

"Nicaragua can forget about fuel problems," Mr. Chávez said during a recent visit to Managua.

DOJ_NMG_0136950

The talks with Nicaragua were preceded in recent days by an offer from Venezuela of $500 million in financial assistance to Ecuador, where the administration of President Rafael Correa has been considering efforts to restructure part of its foreign debt.

On Friday, Rafael Ramírez, Venezuela's energy minister, was in Ecuador for the arrival of a Venezuelan tanker carrying 220,000 barrels of diesel fuel, part of a fuel swapping deal aimed at saving Ecuador millions of dollars in foreign exchange.

This week, Mr. Chávez's government said it would provide $135 million in financing for an Argentine dairy cooperative. Venezuela and Argentina also said they would create a regional development bank and carry out a joint $1.5 billion bond issue.

The bonds are intended to offer Argentina an alternative to the monetary fund and to give investors in Venezuela a way of acquiring dollar-denominated securities at a time when hard currency is increasingly sought after here.

Elsewhere, Venezuela has revealed how it deals with countries with governments that speak critically of Mr. Chávez. Venezuela shut an aluminum plant in Costa Rica with 400 employees last week after Óscar Arias, Costa Rica's president, criticized Mr. Chávez's recently acquired power to govern by decree.

Is Citgo Program For Poor, Or For Chávez? (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum, Steven Mufson

The Washington Post, February 24, 2007

Citgo, the Venezuela-owned oil company, is running television commercials across the United States promoting the discounted heating oil it provides to low-income people -- but some are wondering whether the ads are really promoting the South American country's leader.

The company said the ads, some of which feature former Massachusetts congressman Joseph P. Kennedy II, are designed to persuade families to sign up for the charitable program. Critics of Venezuela, however, see both political and economic motives -- primarily to enhance the image of the country's leftist leader, Hugo Chávez, and thereby improve the company's standing with U.S. consumers.

A new wave of ads shows Americans expressing gratitude for the program.

Citgo said it is giving a 40 percent discount on 100 million gallons of heating oil to up to 1.2 million Americans this winter. Last winter, U.S. households that used heating oil consumed an average of 585 gallons, according to Department of Energy figures.

Citgo spokesman Fernando Garay said the program was part of Citgo's "very strong tradition of giving back to the community." The current effort was particularly motivated, he said, by the recent spate of hurricanes and other weather-related disasters in the United States, which have boosted oil prices.

"It's a good thing to provide concessionary oil to the people in the United States," said Bernard Aronson, former assistant secretary of state for inter-American affairs. "But if the price of that is to rationalize the loss of political liberty for the people in Venezuela, that's not a fair price and it's a betrayal of the people of Venezuela."

An unusual aspect of the program is its widely seen commercials. Garay declined to say how much the company was spending on the ads, but said they are running in 16 markets around the nation where the heating oil is being distributed, including the Washington area. The ads started in mid-November and will continue until mid-March, he said.

Some observers, while praising the program's generosity, believe that more is involved than good deeds. Chávez, who recently won reelection and then said he intends to exert state control over strategic industries, has allied himself with such U.S. enemies as Iran and Cuba. He also has been outspoken in his opposition to the Bush administration's foreign policy.

"It's naive to think that there's not a political motive behind the ads by the Chávez government," said Michael E. Shifter, vice president for policy at the Inter-American Dialogue, a policy forum on Latin America and U.S. relations. "Chávez wants to be seen as the good guy and also to needle and embarrass the Bush administration that the richest country in the world can't take care of its own people."

Otto Reich, a former U.S. special envoy to the Western Hemisphere, said he believes the company hopes to benefit as well: "Citgo is probably concerned that the Chávez image will affect its image."

DOJ_NMG_0136951

In a telephone interview in November, Kennedy, who heads Citizens Energy, a nonprofit group that helps poor people grapple with higher energy costs, said that in 27 years of providing heating oil assistance, he had never received a price break from an OPEC country or major oil company.

"I have tried and written every single member of OPEC and every single major oil company and asked for a little bit of a price break," Kennedy said. "Shouldn't we be encouraging people to be doing this sort of thing? Isn't this the sort of compassionate conservative movement we thought would be taking over the world at this point?"

Kennedy added that there was an element of good business sense about Venezuela's assistance.

"It's not only morally righteous, it's good business," he said, "when you're selling the world's largest market a gigantic percentage of your overall sales in crude oil, to take a little percentage and show that . . . you have concerns about how low-income people are going to keep up with the enormous price of keeping warm."

Tsangfroid (WSJ)

By Mary Kissel

The Wall Street Journal, February 24, 2007

HONG KONG -- Remember June 30, 1997? That afternoon, the city's last colonial governor, Chris Patten, blinked back tears as the British flag was lowered from its flagpole at Government House. At 8:00 that night, red fireworks exploded over Victoria Harbor while Hong Kong's good and great sat down to dine in a grand hall; China's Jiang Zemin arrived later, glowing as Asia's "world city" was returned to its mainland mother. After the stroke of midnight, a 500-strong People's Liberation Army contingent marched over the border, soon followed by 4,000 more -- a brutish touch, a hint of things to come? No one knew.

Nearly 10 years later, Donald Tsang, the current chief executive, knows. He's part of a grand juggling act, protecting Hong Kong's cherished freedoms while integrating the place -- carefully, it's hard work, doing the best that we can, he'll tell you -- into the mainland's booming economy. Nowhere is this more evident than from Mr. Tsang's campaign office, from which the chief executive is steering another bid for high office next month.

Tucked on an upper floor of one of Hong Kong's soaring office towers, the entrance to Mr. Tsang's nerve center boasts no campaign photographs of the bow-tied, impeccably attired Cantonese civil servant; the walls are bare, and not a single policy leaflet graces the shelves. Granted, the office had been opened only two weeks prior to our interview. But the sterility of what should be a raucous debate in a democracy only reinforces the reality: Mr. Tsang is "running" for "re-election" in a rigged campaign where Beijing still picks the winner.

"Here's my card," he says, entering the windowless conference room where I and my colleague from New York, Melanie Kirkpatrick, are seated. A tidy little number, the specially printed campaign business card ("Donald Tsang, Candidate") boasts contact details in English and Chinese, plus a cursive slogan that seems scrawled as an afterthought: "I'll Get the Job Done!" "It will be a collector's item someday," Mr. Tsang jokes, settling into his chair.

The slogan is apt. Mr. Tsang has spent nearly 40 years in the civil service preparing to bridge East and West. Knighted in 1997 (he no longer uses the "Sir"), he was appointed by Beijing in 2005 to serve out the term of the former chief executive, Tung Chee Hwa, whom Beijing's Party elders encouraged to resign when the Hong Kong people marched through the streets for full democracy. Hong Kong can do what it likes, the thinking goes, so long as it doesn't make a fuss. China's leadership has far more pressing problems to worry about -- rioting peasants in the countryside, corruption permeating its ranks, a nuclear North Korea -- than the humming, affluent dot on its southeastern flank.

Mr. Tsang, a former financial secretary, has focused his energies on the economy. And that's a good place, we agree, to start our discussion, given that Hong Kong just rolled up the No. 1 slot -- for the 13th year running -- in the Heritage Foundation/Wall Street Journal's "Index of Economic Freedom." So how has Hong Kong influenced -- maybe even led -- the mainland down the capitalist road since 1997?

Hands clasped, Mr. Tsang thinks for a moment on these "serious and deep" questions. "Opening up is the answer, following the road map charted out by Deng Xiaoping," Mr. Tsang says. "So in the context of Hong Kong, it will be wrong to assume that this little tail is wagging the big dog. It is not." But Hong Kong, he explains, is the most effective "broker, the bridge, the gateway for the nation as a whole."

DOJ_NMG_0136952

Surely last year proved his point. For the first time, the flood of mainland Chinese companies selling stock on Hong Kong's stock exchange pushed volumes above those of New York and London. Hedge funds poured into the city, eager to base themselves in a place with civil law (in more ways than one, when compared to the mainland's corrupted bench) and an English-speaking labor force.

Most important, Hong Kong cemented its place as a testing ground for China's capital account liberalization. The mainland's domestic currency, the renminbi, circulates in a limited way in Hong Kong. Shops accept it; Hong Kongers can open savings accounts in it; and mainland companies can issue renminbi-denominated bonds in the territory.

"All this is taking place! It's the only place outside the mainland of China where these activities are allowed!" the chief executive emphasizes, in a rare moment of emotion. "Right here!" In Hong Kong today, "you see how renminbi, on a limited scale, can move in the free-market environment of Hong Kong."

The chief executive dreams of the day when the floodgates will open up and the cash gushes out of China into Hong Kong's banks, mutual funds and businesses. "This will come, this will come," he affirms.

All this adds to up to a vision for Hong Kong as a nexus for capital not unlike that of London for Europe, or New York for the Americas -- a city in the South China Sea devoted to servicing China's rising middle classes. "We need three [financial centers] . . . because most of us agree that we have to work eight hours a day!" Mr. Tsang quips.

That plan is already being echoed by China's rubber-stamp legislature, the National People's Congress, which included Hong Kong in its five-year plan for the first time last year. Mr. Tsang recites the text verbatim: the leadership, he says, sees Hong Kong as "a center for international finance, trade and shipping/aviation" (the Chinese-language characters for shipping and aviation are, conveniently, the same).

Mr. Tsang's eagerness to bet Hong Kong's future on the mainland is genuine: He is undoubtedly a Chinese patriot. But why should this capitalist city scramble to join the Communist Party's five-year industrial plan? Other actions, too, hint that the Hong Kong government is starting to stray from the free-market policies that made it so rich.

Last year, Mr. Tsang's administration proposed a new consumption tax, started debating a minimum wage, and embarked on rhetoric of leveling societal "inequalities." The chief executive himself publicly disavowed the policy of "positive noninterventionism," the term coined by one of Hong Kong's financial secretaries to describe the territory's famously laissez-faire approach -- an action for which this newspaper, and the late economics Nobel Laureate Milton Friedman -- chastised him.

"You were wrong," Mr. Tsang replied, staring me right in the eye. "It's a slogan." Hong Kong still has the freest economy by a mile -- its public sector takes up 18% of total GDP; total public spending isn't allowed to exceed 20% of GDP. Even if the government tried to impose European-like safety nets on the public, the rise in taxes would never be tolerated; the 5% consumption tax proposal was met with a public outcry.

"We want small government and a big market," Mr. Tsang explains. "We facilitate what the market does." And what does facilitate mean, exactly? "When, for instance, people believe, Mary [emphasis on my name], the mainland should be the next target of action . . . I will lead a delegation into the mainland, making sure that any . . . trade barriers could be removed for them . . . I go in there and try to do things for them."

Why, I wonder, is the same zeal for sealing business deals not applied to the Hong Kong people's wish for universal suffrage? In 2003 and 2004, over a half million of them marched for the full democracy promised to them by the mini-constitution, called the Basic Law, that Mr. Patton and the British left behind. The current setup is far from perfect; it includes a twisted system for electing the legislative branch and the chief executive that effectively gives Beijing veto power over the latter. But regardless of the silent overlord, this year a challenger to Mr. Tsang managed to garner enough official nominations to stand for chief executive -- an event that has given an electric charge to the democracy movement.

How does it feel to have a challenger? "It's allowed for in our electoral arrangements," Mr. Tsang answers dryly. "And it's giving our people a little more fun, a little more fireworks. But it doesn't mean that even if I were the only candidate running that I would not be providing a manifesto." The chief executive is a list man, focused on process; he dismisses opposition candidate Alan Leong as a "single issue man" who "just says universal suffrage, universal suffrage, universal suffrage."

Mr. Tsang seems perplexed by such a stance, noting that his city already enjoys freedoms other democracies have, such as freedom of assembly, freedom of religion, and freedom of the press. "In Hong Kong, we've got all those things." Mr. Tsang declares. "We want democracy for the sake of political participation. So, as a purist form, we should consider it carefully . . . but it must not be achieved at the expense of what they already got."

DOJ_NMG_0136953

Why would universal suffrage threaten freedoms? Wouldn't a degree of public accountability impel the chief executive to follow the "will of the people" (a favorite phrase) more closely?

Mr. Tsang answers immediately: Beijing "supports [democracy] as a principal enshrined in the constitution, but I think they want to be sure they're not doing it at the expense of stability and prosperity." Read: Authoritarian regimes are afraid of placing control in the hands of the people. They could publicly protest, or elect an independently minded chief executive, or -- as Mr. Tsang notes -- they could declare independence, as in the case of Taiwan.

Mr. Tsang has now spent almost a decade working under the Chinese flag, versus 30 under the Union Jack. How is it different? Surprisingly, interactions with the mother ship are "less than before," he confides. "No faxes, no telegrams." He may consult closely on political reform with the local representative office of the central government, but for now, Mr. Tsang's administration operates the territory's economy independently from that of the mainland -- so there's less reason to call for advice.

"The style of operation is very different," Mr. Tsang says. "We are dealing with people in the same nation, but it requires a perquisite of mutual trust and faith. But once we have built up a sense of trust, between ourselves and the mainland, it seems that you can achieve quite a lot -- a lot more than before."

Within limits, that is. As we wait for the elevator next to those empty shelves where election campaign pamphlets might sit, the limits of Mr. Tsang's ability to "get the job done" seem clear.

Ms. Kissel is editorial page editor of The Wall Street Journal Asia.

DOJ_NMG_0136954

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Canadian Court Limits Detention In Terror Cases (NYT) 3
Canada Rules Indefinite Detention Wrong (AP) 4
Jailing Without Trial Rejected In Canada (WP) 5
General Plays Down Value Of Capturing Bin Laden (WP) 6
Co-Defendants Of Padilla Are Seeking To Split Cases (NYT) 6
Judge OKs Lawyer's Request For Evaluation In Terror-plot Case (ROCKRS) 7
Mental Exam Ordered For Alleged Would-be Rockford Mall Bomber (AP) 8

Homeland Response:

Minneapolis / Man Gets 10 Years For Plan To Bomb Court (STPPP) 8
Mayo Researcher Under Investigation By FBI (MINNST) 9
New Airport X-Rays Scan Bodies, Not Just Bags (NYT) 9

War News:

White House Warns Against Iraq Pullout (AP) 11
Congressional Democrats Wrestle Over How To Force Bush To Alter Iraq Policy (NYT) 12
GOP Rejects Iraq Measure (WT) 13
McConnell Threatens To Block Bid To Repeal War Resolution (WP) 14
Defense Secretary Vows Action On Medical Center Conditions (NYT) 15
Review At Walter Reed Is Ordered (WP) 16
Gates Orders Review Of Walter Reed Hospital (LAT) 16
Gates Vows Action On Walter Reed Worries (AP) 17
The Army's Preemptive News Briefing (WP) 18
Benefits Of The Doubt (WP) 19
U.S. Seizes Son Of A Top Shiite, Stirring Uproar (NYT) 19
Iraqi's Arrest Brings Apology From U.S. (LAT) 21
U.S. Detains Shiite Leader's Son (WP) 21
U.S. Detains Top Shi'ite Leader's Son (WT/AP) 22
Baghdad Crackdown 'curbing Violence' (FT) 23
Car Bombings Kill 4 Civilians In Baghdad (AP) 23
Stryker Team Key To Iraq Security Plan (LAT) 24
U.S. Disappointed In Iraq's Progress With Baathists (LAT) 25
Bachmann Backs Down From Iraq Comments (MINNST) 26
Americans Underestimate Iraqi Death Toll (AP) 27
Iraq Rebuilding Short On Qualified Civilians (WP) 28
Army's Iraq War Objector Charged Again (AP) 31
Iraq Objector Faces Another Court-martial (LAT) 31
'Cry God For Harry!' (WSJ) 31
More Troops Headed To Afghanistan (WT/AP) 32
New Al Qaeda Video Claims Attack In Afghanistan (AP) 32
Afghans See Decline Since '05 (WP) 33

DOJ:

Justice Department Fires 8th U.S. Attorney (WP) 33
Eighth U.S. Attorney Dismissed From Post (NYT) 34

Corporate Scandals:

Former KB Officials Face U.S. Backdating Probe (WSJ) 34
DOJ Launches KB Home Stock Options Probe (AP) 35
New Inquiry On Options At KB Home (NYT) 35
SEC Probe Into Citigroup Associates Deal (FT) 36

Criminal Law:

Mrs. Moonda Asks To Remove Death Penalty From Case (PPG) 37
Suspect Sketch Issued (WHEELPI) 37
Russo, Former OB Mayor, Gets 10 Years (MR) 38
Former Orange Beach Mayor Gets 10-year Sentence (BSH) 39
Ex-official Convicted In Bribery Case (MH) 40
Authorities Search For Gunman Who Abducted A Florida Boy (NYT) 41
FBI Agents Pose As Mobsters, Sting Florida Cops (AP) 42
Chief: Probe Of Hollywood Cops Halted Early (MH) 42
Officers Face Life In Prison For Running Diamonds, Drugs For Fake Mafia (FLSUNSEN) 43
Area Man Faces Charges In FBI Sting (PALMBEACHP) 45
Ex-FBI Man Gets 7 Years For Child Sex (FREDFLS) 45

Civil Rights:

Gonzales' Spiel Riles Some Christians (UPI) 46
FBI May Reopen Cold Cases On 1950s And '60s Slayings In The South (AP) 47
FBI Building Database On Victims Slain Amid Civil Rights-era Violence (JCL) 48
Federal Supervision Of Race In Little Rock Schools Ends (NYT) 49
Arkansas' Historic School Case Ends (AP) 50
Rhode Island Official OKs Gay 'Marriage' (WT) 50
Protecting All Students (NYT) 51

Antitrust:

Buyout Firms Seek Utility TXU For $32 Billion (WSJ) 51
At $45 Billion, New Contender For Top Buyout (NYT) 53
TXU Set To Approve Record Private Equity Deal (FT) 54
$45 Billion Deal Near For Texas Power Firm (WP) 55
TXU Sale Could Cost $32 Billion (LAT) 56
TXU May Cut Rates In Buyout Bid (DMN)..... 56
Record Fine Expected For Univision (NYT)..... 58
A Software Maker Goes Up Against Microsoft (NYT) 59
Tuning In To One Company (NYT)..... 61
MP3 Patent Verdict Harmless To Music Fans -- For Now (WP) . 62

Environment:

President Promotes Alternative Energy With A Car Show Of Sorts (NYT)..... 63
Texas: B.P. Settles 2 Lawsuits (NYT/AP)..... 63

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Arellano's Arrest Location Challenged (SDUT)..... 64
Homemade Pipe Bombs Often Lethal, Expert Says (EPT)..... 65

Immigration:

Bush Plan To Allow Mexican Truckers Throughout U.S. Draws Criticism (NYT/AP)..... 65
U.S. To Allow Mexican Trucks (WSJ)..... 66
U.S., Mexico And Canada Discuss Border Issues (NYT)..... 67
Borders Without Fences (NYT)..... 67

Tax:

IRS Urged To Go After EBay Sellers (SFC) 68

Congress-Administration:

Medicaid Cuts Would Cost Public Hospitals, Other Facilities (LAT) 69
Cheney Remark Rankles Pelosi (WP)..... 71
Democrats Offer Up Chairmen For Donors (WP)..... 72
Passenger Bill Of Rights May Cause Some Turbulence (LAT)... 73
The Politics Of JetBlue (WSJ)..... 74
Better Pay For Judges (NYT)..... 75

Other News:

H&R Block, Roper Industries Rise (WSJ)..... 76
Rising Oil Prices, Lenders' Woes Give Dow Worst Week Since Mid-Aug. (WP) 76
Gold Nears The $700 Level, Helped By Crude-Oil Gains (WSJ) 77
Dollar Declines On Rate Worries (WSJ)..... 77
States Set Big Spending Plans As Washington Preaches Austerity (WSJ)..... 78
Voting Machines Found Not At Fault In Fla. Election (WP/AP)... 80
Panel Cites Voter Error, Not Software, In Loss Of Votes (NYT) . 80
Vilsack Drops Out Of Prez Race (DMR)..... 81
Vilsack, First Democrat In, Is Quickly Out (WP) 82
Vilsack Ends Bid For Presidency (NYT) 83
Hirshberg: Vilsack's Exit "A Bit Of A Tragedy" (NHUL) 84
Former Iowa Gov. Vilsack Ending '08 Bid (AP) 85
Vilsack Calls It Quits For '08 (WT) 86
Vilsack Exits Presidential Race, Citing Lack Of Funding (LAT)... 87
Vilsack Drops Out Of '08 Race, Cites Money As Reason (HILL) 88
Vilsack Drops Presidential Bid (DMR) 88
Harkin Aide: 'No Truth' To Retirement Rumor (RC) 89
Rommey Amused As Clinton, Obama Go After Each Other (AP)89
Obama Reels In Austin Crowd (DMN)..... 90
Obama, Rezko Neighborly Relationship Ends (CHIT)..... 91
In Clinton's Backyard, It's Open Season As An Obama Fund-Raiser Lines Up Donors (NYT)..... 91
Clinton Sees Role For Husband (SFC)..... 93
S.C. Democratic Party Chief To Lead Campaign (TSSC)..... 94
Can Governors Regain Spotlight In 2008 Race For The White House? (WSJ) 95
Could Gore's Road To The Oval Office Begin In Hollywood? (CNN)..... 95
Gore Film Odds-On Favorite To Win Oscar (AP)..... 96
Carter Endorses Gore, Says Former Veep Can Win More Than Oscars (ABC)..... 97
Abortion Doubts Dog GOP Top Three (POL) 97
Rudy & Mitt Hem & Haw On Abortion (NYT) 99
McCain Woos Seattle Voters (SEATIMES) 100
McCain Says Iraq Could End His Career (AP) 100
Father Of Slain Teen Urges McCain To Speak Against Gun Violence (NSDY)..... 101
A Cat Without Whiskers (NYT) 101
Nevada Republicans Reject Holding Early Caucus (NHUL) 102
Early Stops On The Sweet-Talk Circuit (NYT) 103
Arnold Defends Hillary, Mulls Senate Run (POL)..... 104
Panel Calls Adult Stem-cell Study Flawed, Wrong (WT/AP)..... 106
Cheney Tackles Beijing On Military Expansion (FT) 106
Cheney: 'All Options' Available For Iran (AP) 107
West Aims To Agree New Iran Sanctions (FT)..... 108
Leaving The Options Open With Iran (NYT)..... 108
Iranian Leaders Decry Critics' 'Bullying' Over Nuke Program (WT/AP) 110
Diplomacy, Not War, With Iran (WP) 110
N. Korea Invites U.N. Inspector (WT/AP) 111
US 'Very Pleased' About North Korean Invitation To UN Watchdog: Rice (AFP)..... 112
N. Korea, U.N. To Develop Plan To Dismantle Nukes (LAT) 112
Report: North Korea's Main Nuclear Envoy To Visit US Within Days (AP)..... 113
Blast That Killed U.S. Diplomat Tied To Qaeda (NYT)..... 114
Pakistan Successfully Tests Nuclear-capable Missile (AFP) 115
Turks Charge Kurd With Inciting Hatred (WP/AP)..... 116
46 Nations Push For Cluster Bomb Ban (WT/AP)..... 116
U.S. In Talks With Britain On Installing Missile Defense System (NYT) 117
UK Wants US Missile Defence Sites (FT) 118
Misguided Missiles (NYT) 119
Fear Of Return Of Berlusconi Reunites Left Behind Prodi (NYT)119
Prodi Aims To Secure Centre-left Vote (FT)..... 120
Italian President Weighs Prodi's Support (AP) 121
Chávez Ends Busy Week Aiding Venezuela's Latin Neighbors (NYT) 121
Is Citgo Program For Poor, Or For Chávez? (WP)..... 122

DOJ_NMG_0136956

Tsangfroid (WSJ) 123

TERRORISM NEWS:

Canadian Court Limits Detention In Terror Cases (NYT)

By Ian Austen

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

OTTAWA, Feb. 23 — Canada's highest court on Friday unanimously struck down a law that allows the Canadian government to detain foreign-born terrorism suspects indefinitely using secret evidence and without charges while their deportations are being reviewed.

The detention measure, the security certificate system, has been described by government lawyers as an important tool for combating international terrorism and maintaining Canada's domestic security. Six men are now under threat of deportation without an open hearing under the certificates.

"The overarching principle of fundamental justice that applies here is this: before the state can detain people for significant periods of time, it must accord them a fair judicial process," Chief Justice Beverley McLachlin wrote in the ruling.

The three men who brought the case are likely to remain jailed or under strict parole because the court suspended its decision for a year to allow Parliament to introduce a law consistent with the ruling.

The decision reflected striking differences from the current legal climate in the United States. In the Military Commissions Act of 2006, Congress stripped the federal courts of authority to hear challenges, through petitions for writs of habeas corpus, to the open-ended confinement of foreign terrorism suspects at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

A federal appeals court in Washington upheld the constitutionality of that law this week, dismissing 13 cases brought on behalf of 63 Guantánamo detainees. Their lawyers said they would file an appeal with the Supreme Court. In two earlier decisions, the justices ruled in favor of Guantánamo detainees on statutory grounds but did not address the deeper constitutional issues that this case appears to present.

At a news conference in Montreal, a defendant, Adil Charkaoui, praised the Canadian court's decision.

"The Supreme Court, by 9 to 0, has said no to Guantánamo North in Canada," said Mr. Charkaoui, who is under tightly controlled, electronically monitored house arrest.

Stockwell Day, the Canadian minister of public safety, said Friday, "It is our intention to follow the Supreme Court ruling."

He added, "We are taking in stride what they did say and we will look at the changes that are necessary."

The decision is also the latest in a series of events that has seen Canada reconsider some national security steps it took after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. Last September, a judicial inquiry rebuked the police for falsely accusing a Syrian-born Canadian, Maher Arar, of terrorist connections. Those accusations, in 2002, led United States officials to fly Mr. Arar to Syria, where he was jailed and tortured. Earlier this year, the Canadian government reached a $9.75 million settlement with Mr. Arar and offered a formal apology. The commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police also resigned for reasons related to the affair.

Canada's Parliament is divided over whether to continue two antiterrorism measures introduced in 2001 that are set to expire on March 1. The opposition Liberal Party, which had brought in the law, does not want to continue its special preventive arrest powers or the secret court hearings it permits, which resemble grand jury hearings in the United States. Two other portions of that law have been struck down by courts in Ontario.

"We've started to see the rollback," said Alex Neve, the secretary general of Amnesty International Canada. "Today the Supreme Court of Canada has said, 'Make sure you put human rights at the center of how you prevent terrorism.' "

The security certificate system was introduced in a 1978 immigration law and has been used 27 times, mostly before September 2001. It allows the government to detain people indefinitely if the minister of public safety and the minister of immigration conclude that they are a threat to national security. The certificates, once signed, are reviewed by a federal judge who can rule to keep any or all of the evidence secret.

While Amnesty International and other groups have long campaigned against the certificates, the issue attracted relatively little attention for many years. Historically the certificates were issued against people who were accused of spying in Canada and who were swiftly deported.

The current cases, however, have become more prominent because they generally involve people who have been jailed for years without charges, using secret evidence and, in many cases, without bail.

DOJ_NMG_0136957

The sparseness of evidence makes it difficult to assess if there is any connection linking the men. The authorities say they have tied five of them in various ways to Al Qaeda. A sixth was arrested in 1995 and has been out on bail since 1998. He is charged with being a fund-raiser for the Tamil Tigers in Sri Lanka.

Hassan Almrei, a Syrian arrested in Mississauga, Ontario, in 2001, is the only one directly involved in this case who remains in jail.

A document from the Canadian Security and Intelligence Service charges that Mr. Almrei, who entered Canada on false papers in 1999, forged documents for the Sept. 11 attacks and is a member of "an international network of extremist groups and individuals who follow and support the Islamic extremist ideals espoused by Osama bin Laden." He was also accused of sending money to Mr. bin Laden's network through a honey and perfume business he ran in Saudi Arabia. The government said that a computer belonging to Mr. Almrei contained images of Mr. bin Laden, guns, a jet cockpit and a security badge.

Like most of the other suspects, Mr. Almrei remains under a certificate because the government's efforts to deport him to Syria conflict with Canadian laws that ban sending people to places where they are likely to be tortured.

Based on the limited information available, other security certificate cases appear to be circumstantial. Mr. Charkaoui, a Moroccan who was arrested in 2002 and released on house arrest in 2005, is accused of having trained in Afghanistan.

"I am innocent," he said Friday. "I was never charged, I was never accused of a crime. If the government has anything to accuse me of, well, there's the criminal code."

Much of the judgment provides a blueprint for Parliament on how to make security certificates fit with Canada's charter of rights and freedoms. As part of that, one of the court's suggestions seems to be adopted from Britain, whose legal system provided the basis of Canada's. After the House of Lords struck down a similar law in 2004, Britain adopted a system that allows security-cleared lawyers to attend the hearings, review the evidence and represent the accused.

A provision of the ruling that is effective immediately requires people held under certificates to receive a bail hearing within 48 hours.

For terrorism suspects in the United States, whose situation is most directly analogous to that of the men in Canada, the legal situation is cloudy at best. In the two years after Sept. 11, 2001, the government detained more than 5,000 foreign citizens.

Most were charged with offenses no more serious than overstaying a tourist visa, and many were held for months, awaiting clearance by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, after they had agreed to leave the country. Not one was convicted of a crime of terrorism.

Judge John Gleeson of Federal District Court in Brooklyn ruled last June on a class-action lawsuit brought by eight detainees. All have left the country and are seeking damages for what they argued was an illegitimate incarceration. Judge Gleeson dismissed that portion of the lawsuit, ruling that the courts should not "encroach on the executive branch in a realm where it has particular expertise" and "legitimate foreign policy considerations."

Even if the plaintiffs could demonstrate that their right to constitutional due process was violated, Judge Gleeson wrote, the officials they sued would be entitled to immunity because any right to "immediate or prompt removal" had not been "clearly established" at the time. The case, Turkmen v. Gonzales, is now on appeal.

Dalia Hashad, the United States program director for Amnesty International, said the Canadian decision should serve as "a wake-up call that reminds us that civilized people follow a simple and basic rule of law, that indefinite detention is under no circumstances acceptable."

Canada Rules Indefinite Detention Wrong (AP)

By Beth Duff-Brown

AP, February 23, 2007

OTTAWA (AP) - One of Canada's most contentious anti-terrorism provisions was struck down Friday by the Supreme Court, which declared it unconstitutional to detain foreign terror suspects indefinitely while the courts review their deportation orders.

The 9-0 ruling was a blow to the government's anti-terrorism regulations. Five Arab Muslim men have been held for years under the "security certificate" program, which the Justice Department had insisted is a key tool in the fight against global terrorism and essential to Canada's security.

The court found that the system violates the Charter of Rights and Freedom, Canada's bill of rights. It suspended the judgment from taking effect for a year, to give Parliament time to rewrite the part of the Immigration and Refugee Protection Act that covers the certificates.

The security certificates were challenged on constitutional grounds by three men from Morocco, Syria and Algeria - all alleged by the Canadian Security Intelligence Service to have ties to al-Qaida and other terrorist networks.

DOJ_NMG_0136958

The law now allows sensitive intelligence to be heard behind closed doors by a federal judge, with only sketchy summaries given to defense attorneys.

The men have spent years in jail while fighting deportation orders. They risk being labeled terrorists and sent back to their native countries, where they face possible torture.

The court called this a fundamental violation of their human rights.

"The overarching principle of fundamental justice that applies here is this: Before the state can detain people for significant periods of time, it must accord them a fair judicial process," Chief Justice Beverley McLachlin wrote in a ruling for all nine justices.

"The secrecy required by the scheme denies the person named in a certificate the opportunity to know the case put against him or her, and hence to challenge the governments case," she said.

The court said the men and their lawyers should have a right to respond to the evidence used against them by intelligence agents and noted that a law in Britain allows special advocates to review sensitive intelligence material.

The Justice Department said it would have no immediate comment.

Two of the men are out on bail and remain under house arrest. Three others are being held in a federal facility in Ontario that has been dubbed the "Guantanamo Bay of the North," a reference to the prison at the U.S. base in Cuba.

Human rights activists and lawyers for the men hailed the ruling as a victory for those who believe fundamental rights and freedoms have been overshadowed by the demands of national security since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on the United States.

"This is a judgment that, quite frankly, I think we should all be very proud of, because our court has not bought into the rhetoric of national security," said John Norris, who represents one of the five. "They have recognized the fundamental importance of preserving the security of all of us, but at the same time has stated, in the clearest possible terms, that that must never be done at the expense of human rights."

Barbara Jackman, who represents another detainee, said the Supreme Court decision in no way compromises national security.

"It only strengthens our democracy," she said. "It's an indication to other countries that to detain people and mistreat them, it's not satisfactory. There are ways to provide fair hearings in the face of national security concerns."

Although the security certificates have been around for decades, their use became more contentious after 9/11, and more suspect since Ottawa used faulty intelligence in a case that led to a $9 million apology to another former terror suspect, Maher Arar.

In that case, the Syrian-born Canadian was seized by U.S. authorities in New York and sent to Syria for questioning about suspected ties to terrorists. He was held in a cell for a year and tortured before being sent back to Canada, where he was cleared by a federal inquiry of any links to Islamic extremists.

Five Arab Muslim men now stand accused of terrorist links under the certificates, and all deny any ties to terrorism. It was not immediately clear if the three men still in detention would be released, or remain jailed until the law is rewritten.

The most notable is Adil Charkaoui, 33, a native of Morocco. The former University of Montreal student and pizzeria operator was arrested in Montreal in 2003 and freed on bail under strict conditions in 2005. He is accused by the Canadian Security Intelligence Service of belonging to the Moroccan Islamic Combatant Group, which has ties to al-Qaida and a history of terrorist attacks in Spain.

CSIS also claims Ahmed Ressam, convicted in 2001 of plotting to blow up Los Angeles International Airport, identified Charkaoui as someone he met at an al-Qaida training camp in Afghanistan - a contention denied by Charkaoui.

The others are Mohamed Harkat, an Algerian native arrested in 2002 and freed on bail last year; Mahmoud Jaballah, an Egyptian who remains in detention; Mohammad Mahjoub, also from Egypt and recently granted bail, although he has yet to be released; and Hassan Almrei, a native of Syria who was arrested in 2001 and is still in custody.

Jailing Without Trial Rejected In Canada (WP)

By Doug Struck, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, February 24, 2007

Court Leaves 6 Security Suspects in Limbo

TORONTO, Feb. 23 -- Canada's Supreme Court on Friday unanimously struck down the use of secret testimony to imprison and deport foreigners as possible terrorist suspects, ruling that the procedures violate Canada's Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

But the court suspended its ruling for a year, leaving the six men who are under a "security certificate" in legal limbo. Two are held in a special prison, three are free on bond and a fourth has been ordered released on bond.

Supporters of the men hailed the ruling as a victory for civil rights but acknowledged that it did not entirely sweep away the procedures for holding suspects without trial that critics here have called "Canada's Guantanamo North."

DOJ_NMG_0136959

The court said Parliament should draft a new law that is more fair to security suspects.

"The court found the way secret evidence was used violated fundamental justice," said Sharry Aiken, a law professor who represented a coalition of groups that argued against the law before the Supreme Court. But "it doesn't mean security certificates are going by the wayside. It does mean that federal court judges are finally willing to scrutinize the procedures of detention to a greater extent than they were in the immediate aftermath of 9/11."

Stockwell Day, the government's minister of public safety, said in Ottawa that "in general, the Supreme Court upheld the security certificates. We will look at the changes the court said are necessary."

The security certificate procedures allow police or intelligence agencies to present secret evidence against noncitizen immigrants or visitors in Canada. If two cabinet ministers agree the person is a security risk, the suspect can be imprisoned and deported without a trial and without seeing the evidence.

About 24 people have been deported since the mid-1970s, including an alleged Russian spy and a German Nazi sympathizer. But six men -- five from Arab countries and a Sri Lankan -- remain in Canada, arguing that they are unfairly accused and would be tortured if they were deported.

Most of those on bail are under strict conditions, including curfew, restrictions on use of computers or telephones, and a requirement to wear a security bracelet that identifies their location.

"I've been harassed for eight years," said Adil Charkaoui, a Moroccan who was imprisoned for 21 months on allegations that he trained in an al-Qaeda camp in Afghanistan. He is free on bond. "I am not a terrorist," he said at a news conference in Ottawa on Friday. "All I am asking for is justice, the chance to defend myself. If you have something against me, charge me" in court.

Egyptian Mahmoud Jaballah and Syrian Hassan Almrei, both accused of ties with al-Qaeda, have been on a hunger strike while in detention under the security certificates. Last week, a federal court ordered Mohamed Zeki Mahjoub, who once ran a farming operation for Osama bin Laden, moved to house arrest.

The Supreme Court ruling put the spotlight on security arrests during a visit to Ottawa by U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. At a news conference following meetings with Canadian, Mexican and U.S. officials on North American security and prosperity issues, Rice defended the U.S. insistence that Syrian-born Canadian Maher Arar remain on an airport "watch list."

Arar, who was whisked to Syria by American agents in a 2002 "rendition" that left him imprisoned in a dungeon for 10 months, was cleared in an exhaustive Canadian inquiry. The government here has apologized and agreed to pay him $9 million in compensation, but the U.S. refusal to acknowledge that his rendition was a mistake has rankled Canadians.

General Plays Down Value Of Capturing Bin Laden (WP)

The Washington Post, February 24, 2007

FORT WORTH, Feb. 23 -- The Army's highest-ranking officer said Friday that he was unsure whether the U.S. military would capture or kill Osama bin Laden, adding, "I don't know that it's all that important, frankly."

"So we get him, and then what?" asked Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the outgoing Army chief of staff, at a Rotary Club of Fort Worth luncheon. "There's a temporary feeling of goodness, but in the long run, we may make him bigger than he is today.

"He's hiding, and he knows we're looking for him. We know he's not particularly effective. I'm not sure there's that great of a return" on capturing or killing bin Laden.

Schoomaker pointed to the capture of Saddam Hussein, the killings of his sons, Uday and Qusay, and the killing of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi as evidence that the capture or death of al-Qaeda's leader would have little effect on threats to the United States.

Days after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, President Bush said he wanted bin Laden "dead or alive," and then-Secretary of State Colin L. Powell said, "It is not enough to get one individual, although we'll start with that one individual."

Bush reaffirmed the goal last September in a prime-time speech, warning bin Laden: "No matter how long it takes, America will find you, and we will bring you to justice."

But Schoomaker's remarks echoed comments last year by Vice President Cheney, who seemed to play down the value of capturing or killing bin Laden days before the Bush speech. "He's not the only source of the problem, obviously. . . . If you killed him tomorrow, you'd still have a problem with al-Qaeda," the vice president said.

Schoomaker, who is due to be replaced as chief of staff in April by Gen. George W. Casey Jr., commanded the U.S. Special Operations Command before becoming chief of staff. Special operations personnel have been leading the hunt for bin Laden along the mountainous border between Afghanistan and Pakistan.

Co-Defendants Of Padilla Are Seeking To Split Cases (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0136960

By Deborah Sontag

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

MIAMI, Feb. 23 — As a competency hearing for Jose Padilla gets under way in federal court here, his co-defendants in a terrorism conspiracy case are seeking separate trials because of what they fear is the taint of his notoriety as the accused "dirty bomber."

Mr. Padilla, a Brooklyn-born American who was declared an enemy combatant by President Bush in 2002, was never charged with the plot to use a radiological dirty bomb that senior administration officials initially accused him of hatching.

But Adham Amin Hassoun and Kifah Wael Jayyousi, Mr. Padilla's co-defendants, say "spill-over prejudice" would be inevitable. They have filed separate motions to sever their cases from Mr. Padilla's, the latest in a series of challenges that are complicating the government's efforts to prosecute the case.

The government's years-long "campaign of public vilification" and its "branding of Padilla as a brazen terrorist" tied to Al Qaeda will make a fair trial impossible for his co-defendants, Jeanne Baker, one of Mr. Hassoun's lawyers, wrote in court papers filed earlier this week. The government has not responded.

Initial jury questionnaires, which were sent to about 3,000 potential jurors in South Florida, indicate Mr. Padilla is the only defendant whose name is familiar and "virtually all of those who are familiar with him have a negative prejudice against him," one of Dr. Jayyousi's lawyers, William W. Swor, wrote.

After being held without charges for three and a half years in a military brig in South Carolina, Mr. Padilla was indicted in late 2005, appended to a case involving Mr. Hassoun, a computer programmer, and Dr. Jayyousi, an engineer, and transferred to a civilian detention center in Miami.

The three men are accused of participating in a "North American support cell" that assisted "global jihad" from 1993 to 2000, sending money and goods to Muslim struggles overseas, particularly in Bosnia, Kosovo and Chechnya.

All three face possible life sentences and have pleaded not guilty. Their trial, which has been delayed twice, is set for April 16. But there is considerable pretrial litigation to be resolved, including the competency hearing for Mr. Padilla, which began Thursday and is set to resume Monday. The government is opposing efforts by Mr. Padilla's lawyers to have him declared unfit.

Dr. Jayyousi, a Jordanian-born American citizen who holds a doctorate in engineering, did not know Mr. Padilla until they met here in federal court, his lawyers say. They argue that Dr. Jayyousi, a former school system administrator in Detroit and Washington, should be tried separately not only from Mr. Padilla but also from Mr. Hassoun, partly because his supposed offenses predate theirs.

The only defendant free on bond, Dr. Jayyousi published a newsletter in the mid-1990s called The Islam Report. The indictment says the newsletter "promoted violent jihad as a religious obligation." Dr. Jayyousi's lawyer, Mr. Swor, said that the publication, which was based in California and distributed at mosques for about 16 months, issued "news about issues relating to Muslims all over the world" and often criticized the United States government.

Mr. Swor said Dr. Jayyousi, who also raised money to buy medicine and solicited contributions of clothing, boots and tents for Muslims in Chechnya, "grew disaffected with the violence in the Islamic world and movements," closed the newsletter in 1997, stopped fund-raising, moved to Detroit and concentrated on completing his engineering studies.

Mr. Hassoun, a Lebanese-born Palestinian who was living in South Florida, helped distribute Dr. Jayyousi's newsletter on the East Coast. The government began eavesdropping on their phone conversations in the early to mid-1990s. Prosecutors say that what they present as a charitable devotion to Muslim causes was really support for violent jihad, which both men deny.

It was Mr. Hassoun, prosecutors say, who lured Mr. Padilla, a member of his mosque in Fort Lauderdale, into the cell. Prosecutors say that Mr. Hassoun recruited Mr. Padilla, a former juvenile offender who had converted to Islam after a road-rage incident landed him in jail as a young adult, to go abroad in 1998 and wage violent jihad.

In asking for a separate trial, Mr. Hassoun's lawyers say that their defense of Mr. Hassoun could prove antagonistic to Mr. Padilla's interests.

Specifically, they want to introduce the evidence that it was a Qaeda operative in Saudi Arabia, and not Mr. Hassoun, who recruited Mr. Padilla — a chain of events laid out publicly by a former deputy attorney general, James B. Comey, in 2004.

In order for a jury to believe Mr. Hassoun, "they must necessarily disbelieve Padilla's presumed defense that he was never recruited into Al Qaeda at all," Ms. Baker wrote to the court.

Judge OKs Lawyer's Request For Evaluation In Terror-plot Case (ROCKRS)

By Mike Wiser, ROCKFORD REGISTER STAR

Rockford Register Star, February 24, 2007

CHICAGO — A 22-year-old Genoa man whom authorities accuse of plotting to kill holiday shoppers with hand grenades will have to undergo psychological evaluation before the case against him proceeds.

DOJ_NMG_0136961

U.S. District Judge David H. Coar ordered the evaluation of Derrick Shareef during a court hearing Friday in the Dirksen federal courthouse.

Shareef's attorney, Michael Mann of Maywood, requested the evaluation on behalf of his client, and Coar agreed.

The Justice Department says the man, who also goes by the name Talib Salam Ibn Shareef, had plotted to attack the patrons of CherryVale Mall in December by placing hand grenades in garbage cans in order to wage jihad.

Authorities said Shareef revealed his plans to an informant who was working with the Federal Bureau of Investigation's Joint-Terrorism Task Force.

The informant arrested Shareef after he allegedly exchanged stereo speakers for four nonfunctioning grenades and a pistol.

Coar also said that any legal motions regarding the results of the evaluation must be filed by April 6.

But before then, lawyers for both sides will have to meet in front of Coar again because Shareef has complained about the conditions under which he has been held.

Shareef has been in federal custody since his December arrest. He is currently in the Metropolitan Correctional Center in Chicago and has complained to Mann about sanitation problems, among other things.

Coar set a March 6 date to hear if the problems have been addressed.

Shareef faces five to 40 years on a charge of attempting to damage or destroy a building by fire or explosion and a possible life sentence on a charge of attempting to use a weapon of mass destruction.

Staff writer Mike Wiser can be reached at 815-987-1377 or mwiser@rrstar.com.

Mental Exam Ordered For Alleged Would-be Rockford Mall Bomber (AP)

By Mike Robinson

AP, February 24, 2007

CHICAGO - A federal judge on Friday ordered a psychological examination for an alleged terrorist wannabe who offered to trade his stereo speakers for grenades to set off in a Rockford mall at Christmas time.

Derrick Shareef, 22, of Rockford, is to be examined by a qualified psychiatrist or psychologist designated by the government under the order issued by U.S. District Judge David H. Coar.

Prosecutors say the 22-year-old Muslim convert plotted with an FBI undercover informant to commit acts of "violent jihad," or holy war, including blowing off hand grenades in garbage cans at the Rockford mall.

The idea was to blow the cans apart and spray the 130-store CherryVale Mall with deadly shrapnel at the height of the Christmas shopping rush, authorities said.

Federal officials said that Shareef had been under investigation long before his Dec. 6 arrest after he offered to trade the speakers for a pistol and four hand grenades. They said there had never been any danger.

Coar issued his order after defense attorney Michael B. Mann said there was a question of whether Shareef was competent to stand trial. Assistant U.S. Attorney Jake Ryan did not object to the examination.

Coar said the competency examination should be performed within 30 days and set April 6 for a hearing on the results.

Meanwhile, he set another hearing for March 6 after Shareef complained that he is unreasonably being held in "the hole" and that sanitation problems exist on the 11th floor of the Metropolitan Correctional Center.

Ryan said that technically the area where Shareef is being held is not "the hole," or solitary confinement, but it is reserved for special inmates.

Shareef, clad in an orange prison jumpsuit with his head shaven and a full beard, said he gets only three showers a week, is denied access to the law library and is handcuffed when he moves about the center.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Minneapolis / Man Gets 10 Years For Plan To Bomb Court (STPPP)

By Emily Gurnon

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press, February 24, 2007

A Kenyon, Minn., man who threatened to blow up the Rice County Courthouse was sentenced in federal court in Minneapolis on Thursday to 10 years in prison.

Allan Talmage Weatherford, 45, pleaded guilty in September to possession of a destructive device.

DOJ_NMG_0136962

When officials searched Weatherford's 160-acre farm in 2005 and 2006, they found nearly 50 firearms, including a .50-caliber military sniping rifle, as well as an explosive device and two propane tanks filled with a mixture of fertilizer and petroleum — the same combination used in the Oklahoma City bombing.

Subsequent lab analysis determined the mixture was not of sufficient quality to produce an explosive, but Weatherford admitted his intention to manufacture a fertilizer bomb, federal officials said.

Weatherford initially was the target of a drug investigation but got greater attention from police after he threatened to blow up a Rice County judge, a prosecutor and a deputy sheriff.

He planned to target the courthouse and the county law enforcement center, officials said.

Mayo Researcher Under Investigation By FBI (MINNST)

By Dan Browning

Minneapolis Star Tribune, February 24, 2007

He is accused of buying potassium cyanide to use as a weapon in a domestic dispute. He is also charged with making terroristic threats.

A research scientist and associate professor of medicine at the Mayo Clinic in Rochester is under investigation by the FBI for purchasing potassium cyanide for use as "a chemical weapon" in connection with a domestic dispute, according to a federal search warrant unsealed this week in St. Paul.

According to a sworn affidavit filed by the FBI, the matter came to light when Rochester police arrested Sreekumar Raghavakaimal, 46, on domestic assault charges Feb. 4.

He was charged the next day in Olmsted County with felony terroristic threats, felony false imprisonment, gross misdemeanor interference with a 911 emergency call, and misdemeanor domestic assault, according to Julie Germann, the prosecutor in the case.

According to the FBI affidavit, here's what prompted the charges: Raghavakaimal's estranged wife said they had argued over a ring he wanted returned, and he got a knife from the kitchen and bolted the door when she tried to leave.

She said that he broke her cell phone in two when she tried to call 911, and that he threatened to cut the throat of their 11-year-old son if she screamed for help.

Raghavakaimal wanted to get back together, and made comments that led his wife and son to believe he was suicidal, the affidavit says. When she managed to leave, she took a vial with her that she believed contained pain pills. When police investigated her complaint that day, Raghavakaimal told them he was not suicidal, the FBI said.

But he offered that he did buy some potassium cyanide on the Internet after he and his wife had separated in December 2005.

Tests on the vial taken by Raghavakaimal's wife show that it contained nearly pure olive oil. According to an FBI expert cited in the search warrant affidavit, "The combination of olive oil and cyanide is specifically mentioned in The Mujahideen Poisons Handbook (authored by Abdel-Aziz)" as a way to increase the toxicity of cyanide when applied to the skin.

The FBI says it discovered that Raghavakaimal had actually ordered the potassium cyanide through the Mayo Clinic, although it was not used at the labs he supervised there.

Raghavakaimal could not be reached for comment Thursday or Friday. He has a doctorate in chemistry and was the Director of Human Genomics and Proteomics Core at the Mayo Clinic College of Medicine's General Clinical Research Center before it was reorganized, said Adam Brase, a spokesman for the Clinic.

Brase said Raghavakaimal's main appointment is as a research scientist in endocrinology, and he also carries a title of director of the Microarray Core Facility.

Brase declined to comment further on Raghavakaimal's employment status. He said the Mayo Clinic would cooperate in the investigation.

The FBI obtained a search warrant for Raghavakaimal's house on Feb. 14, saying there was probable cause that other toxic chemicals would be found there. Agents seized a variety of computer equipment, documents, two point-and-shoot cameras and three rolls of film, records show.

New Airport X-Rays Scan Bodies, Not Just Bags (NYT)

By Paul Giblin, Eric Lipton

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

PHOENIX, Feb. 23 — X-ray vision has come to the airport checkpoint here, courtesy of federal aviation security officials who have installed a new device that peeks underneath passengers' clothing to search for guns, bombs or liquid explosives.

DOJ_NMG_0136963

The new body scanning machine, which went into use on Friday at Phoenix Sky Harbor International Airport and will be tested later at airports in Los Angeles and New York, will screen only volunteers, at least initially. Transportation Security Administration officials want to make sure the machine is reliable and fast enough to replace the traditional pat-down — and that it does not provoke too many protests.

Security officials examining the head-to-toe images work in a closed booth, hidden from public view, agency officials said. Special "privacy" software intentionally blurs the image, creating an outline of a body that is clear enough to see a collarbone, bellybutton or weapon, but flattens details of revealing contours.

Kenneth Johnson, 64, of Mesa, was the first passenger screened on Friday in Phoenix. He said he had titanium implants in both shoulders and one knee that set off alarms at checkpoint metal detectors.

"I've been all over the world; I've been strip-searched," Mr. Johnson, who was traveling to Florida, told an Associated Press reporter. "This was very easy."

Others found the scans objectionable.

"I think that is a violation of people's personal rights," said Kara Neal, 36, a mental health counselor on her way to Philadelphia. She was not asked to undergo the screening, but said she would have refused. "I would rather take a pat-down than go through this," she said.

Lawyers for the American Civil Liberties Union have raised similar objections, calling the X-ray scan a "virtual strip-search," and have urged Congress to prohibit its use for routine screening.

The vending-machine-size device, which costs about $110,000, will be used only when passengers are pulled aside for a more thorough check, known as secondary screening, after passing through a metal detector. Other scanning machines will be installed this year at Los Angeles International Airport and at John F. Kennedy International Airport in New York.

While security agency officials say the machines, known as SmartCheck, pose no health hazards, some experts disagree. The machine, manufactured by American Science and Engineering Inc. of Billerica, Mass., generates about as much radiation as a passenger would get flying for about two minutes at about 30,000 feet, or in technical terms, fewer than 10 microRem per scan, according to security agency and company officials. The machine is already being used in some prisons, by United States customs and at Heathrow Airport in London.

Dr. Albert J. Fornace Jr., an expert in molecular oncology at Georgetown University Medical Center, said such a low dose was inconsequential, even for pregnant women.

"Obviously, no radiation is even better than even a very low level," Dr. Fornace said. "But this is trivial."

But David J. Brenner, a professor of radiation oncology at Columbia University, said that even though the risk for any individual was extremely low, he would still avoid it.

"The question is, Do you want to add to your already existing risk?" Professor Brenner said, recommending that pregnant women and young children, in particular, avoid the device. "There are other technologies around that can probably do the job just as well without the extra radiation."

The machine beams a low-energy X-ray at the passenger, which after it bounces off the surface of the skin is processed by computer software that highlights metals or elements like nitrogen that are found in explosives or weapons.

The X-ray is not strong enough to penetrate much beyond the skin, so it cannot find weapons that may be hidden in body cavities.

"A lot of people aren't really comfortable with a pat-down," said Ellen Howe, a security agency spokeswoman, "so they may find this to be an alternative they may appreciate." She added that the X-ray images would be destroyed immediately.

Aviation security officials are rushing to bring new screening devices to airports because of the London-based plot last summer to use liquid explosives to blow up airliners headed to the United States.

The devices now used at the nation's airports, the X-ray machine for carry-on bags and the metal detector for passengers, rely on 1950s-era technology that cannot reliably detect liquid or plastic explosives.

Earlier efforts by the federal security agency to introduce more advanced checkpoint technologies have stumbled, including the so-called puffer machines, which blow air on passengers to search for minute traces of explosives.

After installing 94 of the machines at 37 airports, officials suspended the program last year, saying the devices broke down too often. More puffer machines may be bought if the problems can be resolved.

Officials intend to try other alternatives, like a so-called millimeter wave machine that uses harmless radio waves, instead of X-rays, to do a full body scan.

Ms. Howe said that until the tests on the SmartCheck were complete, it was unclear how widely used the machines would be. "We are committed to testing it," she said. "But we are not committed to deploying it widely until we learn more."

DOJ_NMG_0136964

WAR NEWS:

White House Warns Against Iraq Pullout (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON — Brushing aside criticism from the White House, Senate Democrats said Friday their next challenge to President Bush's Iraq war policy would require the gradual withdrawal of U.S. combat troops beginning within 120 days.

The draft legislation also declares the war "requires principally a political solution" rather than a military one.

The provisions are included in a measure that would repeal the authority that lawmakers gave Bush in 2002, months before the invasion of Iraq, and replace it with a far more limited mission.

Democrats have said they are likely to seek a vote on the proposal within two weeks. The odds against it ever becoming law are high, and the White House and Senate Republicans were quick to denounce it.

White House spokesman Tony Fratto said the administration "of course" would oppose an attempt to alter the existing authorization, and he warned that a pullout of U.S. troops could bring chaos to Iraq. "We're operating under a mandate," he said.

Senate Republican leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky dismissed the proposal as an attempt by Democrats to produce "what could best be described as a Goldilocks resolution: one that is hot enough for the radical left wing, but cool enough for party leaders to claim that they are for the troops.

A spokesman for Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid said the White House is not only confused, but in denial.

"They can spin all they want, but the fact is that President Bush is ignoring a bipartisan majority of Congress, his own military commanders, and the American public in escalating the war," said Jim Manley. "The American people have demanded a change of course in Iraq and Democrats are committed to holding President Bush accountable."

As currently drafted, the Democratic legislation says the military "shall commence phased redeployment of U.S. forces from Iraq not later than 120 days" after the bill's enactment. The goal is to complete the withdrawal by March 31, 2008.

In the interim, the military would be required to transition to a new mission involving "targeted anti-terrorism operations," as well as providing training and logistical support for the Iraqis and helping them protect their own borders.

The measure also pledges that Congress will "continue to support and protect" the armed forces, renewing a commitment that was included in an earlier non-binding measure that also criticized Bush's plans to deploy an additional 21,500 troops.

Republicans blocked action on the measure last week, demanding that Democrats allow a vote on an alternative that would rule out cutting off funds for the troops.

At the White House, Fratto said that changes in the existing authority for use of military force were unnecessary even though it dates from the days when Saddam Hussein was in power and there was an assumption — later proved false — that Iraq possessed weapons of mass destruction. The White House said that Democrats were in a state of confusion about Iraq but left room for compromise.

"There's a lot of ... shifting sands in the Democrats' position right now," Fratto said. "We'll see what Democrats decide to do."

He said the president would judge anything that comes out of Congress by whether it gives him "the flexibility and resources" necessary to proceed with Bush's decision to send 21,500 additional combat troops to Iraq to secure Baghdad and Anbar Province.

"It's clear that if there are efforts to remove troops out of Baghdad, there are consequences for Baghdad," Fratto said. "The only credible analysis that we've seen — the (National Intelligence Estimate) report and others — are pretty clear on this, that it would bring chaos to Baghdad."

Senate Republicans recently thwarted two Democratic attempts to pass a non-binding measure critical of Bush's troop-increase plan. Asked if Bush would oppose any effort to revoke his war authorization, Fratto said, "Of course we would."

In the House, a non-binding anti-war measure was approved last week. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi has said she expects the next challenge to Bush's war policies to be a requirement that the Pentagon adhere to strict training and readiness standards for troops heading for the war zone.

Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., the leading advocate of that approach, has said it would effectively deny Bush the ability to proceed with the troop buildup.

But Bush's Republican allies on Capitol Hill have fought that as denying reinforcements to troops already in the war zone, leading to the alternative approach in the Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0136965

The measure Bush won from Congress in 2002 authorized the president to use the armed forces "as he determines to be necessary and appropriate ... to defend the national security of the United States against the continuing threat posed by Iraq" and to enforce relevant United Nations Security Council resolutions.

At the time, the world body had passed resolutions regarding Iraq's presumed effort to develop weapons of mass destruction.

Congressional Democrats Wrestle Over How To Force Bush To Alter Iraq Policy (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg, John M. Broder

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 23 — Congressional Democrats, divided over how to press President Bush to alter his policy in Iraq, are wrestling over whether to use the power of the purse to wind down the war, and they seem headed for a confrontation among themselves, possibly as early as next week, over a proposal to revoke the 2002 resolution authorizing the war.

Some Democrats acknowledge that they are in a sticky situation as they try to map out a strategy that will appease the antiwar left, which is pushing for conditions on war financing, without alienating moderate Democrats and Republicans who fear being painted as unsupportive of the troops.

"We're going to come back, regroup, find a consensus position," a senior House Democratic aide said Friday, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the continuing negotiations. "People are unhappy with the war. We have to conduct oversight. We have to push the president in a new direction. We have to find a way to do that that makes the caucus comfortable, and I think we can."

In the House, moderate Democrats are uneasy with a plan put forth by Representative John P. Murtha, Democrat of Pennsylvania, to attach stringent conditions to financing for the war. One skeptical Democrat, Representative Jim Cooper of Tennessee, said Friday that the Murtha plan was "as risky as catching a falling knife."

Representative Joe Sestak, a Pennsylvania Democrat and retired three-star admiral, also expressed criticism of the Murtha plan, saying that Congress should not meddle in tactical matters but should concentrate on setting a date for withdrawal of all forces from Iraq.

In the Senate, where at least four Democrats are running for president, each with an Iraq plan, Democratic leaders are pursuing a plan to repeal the war authorization and replace it with language narrowing the military mission. Democrats concede that the plan to revise the authorization, backed by Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., Democrat of Delaware and one of the presidential candidates, is unlikely to garner enough votes to pass, but they hope to pick up enough Republican votes to embarrass Mr. Bush.

Democrats say they are united in their desire to keep the pressure on the president, even as the House and Senate pursue different tactics. Senator Jim Webb, the freshman Democrat from Virginia who was elected on a strong antiwar platform, said Friday in an interview that Democrats agreed that Congress must reassert its authority, even if they had not yet figured out precisely how to do so.

"The true issue here is the federal system," Mr. Webb said, "the notion of accountability of the executive branch to Congress for not having conducted itself properly in the diplomatic arena."

As they search for consensus, Democrats must also worry about a wild card in the debate: Senator Joseph I. Lieberman, the Connecticut Democrat elected as an independent, a strong supporter of the war who has hinted that he might become a Republican if Democrats go too far in trying to rein in Mr. Bush.

With Democrats holding a razor-thin majority in the Senate, a Lieberman defection could put the chamber in Republican hands. That is one reason the Senate Democratic leadership is cool to the Murtha plan, and why Democrats must be careful about pursuing language changing the authorization for the war.

Republicans, sensing an opening, spent Friday trying to exploit Democratic divisions. The Republican Senate leader, Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, convened a conference call with reporters to taunt Democrats for failing to agree on a means for winding down the war.

At the same time, Vice President Dick Cheney kept the heat on the speaker of the House, Nancy Pelosi, one day after they engaged in a war of words over Iraq. "She accused me of questioning her patriotism," he told ABC News, reiterating a charge leveled by Ms. Pelosi on Thursday. "I didn't question her patriotism. I questioned her judgment."

Mr. Cheney went on: "The point I made and I'll make it again is that Al Qaeda functions on the basis that they think they can break our will. That's their fundamental underlying strategy, that if they can kill enough Americans or cause enough havoc, create enough chaos in Iraq, then we'll quit and go home. And my statement was that if we adopt the Pelosi policy, that then we will validate the strategy of Al Qaeda. I said it, and I meant it."

DOJ_NMG_0136966

After an election that was widely viewed as a repudiation of Mr. Bush's policies in Iraq, coupled with the president's announcement that he was sending more troops there rather than moving to bring them home, Democrats have struggled with how to proceed. Last week, in a public rebuke to Mr. Bush, the House passed a resolution disapproving of the troop buildup plan.

But that vote was only a prelude to the coming debate over Mr. Bush's request for $99.6 billion in emergency financing for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan.

In the House, where the emergency spending bill is not scheduled to come to the floor for several weeks, lawmakers are awaiting details of Mr. Murtha's plan. Mr. Cooper, the Tennessee representative, said he opposed any attempt to add conditions to the supplemental appropriations measure, for policy and political reasons. "We should do what we've done with past supplementals: pass it," he said.

In the Senate, the Democratic leader, Harry Reid of Nevada, is said to be cool to Mr. Murtha's plan. Instead, Mr. Reid has thrown his weight behind Mr. Biden's idea of rewriting the war authorization. Democrats are expected to review it Tuesday at their policy luncheon, their first formal gathering after returning from recess.

During his conference call, Senator McConnell suggested that Republicans might counter with their own plan to force Democrats to vote for or against cutting off financing for the troops entirely. "We have only one option, and that is to decide whether or not to fund the mission," Mr. McConnell said.

But Democrats say they intend to make the debate about the military mission, not the money.

"McConnell presents a false choice," said Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York. "The overwhelming majority disagree with the mission that this fighting has devolved into, which is policing a civil war, and what we're looking at is far more in consonance with what the American people want."

GOP Rejects Iraq Measure (WT)

By Jon Ward, Stephen Dinan, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 24, 2007

Republicans yesterday rejected the Democrats' plan to withdraw Congress' 2002 vote to invade Iraq, while Vice President Dick Cheney said House Speaker Nancy Pelosi was not unpatriotic but plain wrong to oppose President Bush's troop-reinforcement plan.

"There's only one way to end the war, if that's what our Democratic friends want to do. That is to cut off funds for the war," said Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican. "That's our constitutional role, and we shouldn't drag this into the morass of Democratic presidential primary politics."

Key Senate Democrats are writing a bill to rescind the broad authorization to go to war in Iraq that Congress passed in 2002 and replace it with a narrow mission that would take all combat troops out of Iraq by March 2008.

Drafted by two top committee chairmen, Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware and Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, the proposal would keep some troops in Iraq to assist with training, border security and counterterrorism but, Democrats hope, would keep U.S. troops out of what they say has become a civil war.

"The 2002 authorization is no longer relevant to the situation in Iraq," Mr. Biden said in a speech last week. The 2008 presidential candidate argued that the measure was predicated on the presence of Saddam Hussein as dictator and weapons of mass destruction in Iraq.

But the White House said the 2002 resolution, which passed the Senate 77-23, is still effective because it gave the president authority to enforce U.N. resolutions, which call for stability in Iraq.

"The resolutions that we have seen since then certainly authorize a threat to the region that's posed by instability in Iraq, and it envisions the United States forces staying there and bringing stability to Iraq and the region," spokesman Tony Fratto said.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, is considering attaching the Biden-Levin plan to legislation next week on recommendations from the September 11 commission, which has already passed the House.

"It's obvious that the authorization is outdated and needs to be reformed. But no final decisions have been made," said Jim Manley, a spokesman for Mr. Reid.

Mr. McConnell, though, said Republicans have enough votes to block Democrats' new plan from passing, leaving the new majority few alternatives other that withholding funding for the troops.

House Democrats are pursuing just that strategy, with Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat and chairman of the defense appropriations subcommittee, proposing to limit funding unless the Defense Department can meet strict conditions even Mr. Murtha says are unlikely to be achieved.

Mr. Murtha's plan to hamstring the president's use of war funds through the appropriations process, starting with the $93 billion supplemental bill next month, was considered a political compromise between the Democrats' increasingly liberal base and its more moderate wing.

DOJ_NMG_0136967

Some Democrats, such as Sen. Russ Feingold, Wisconsin Democrat and Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich, Ohio Democrat and 2008 presidential candidate, favor cutting off all war funding.

But Mrs. Pelosi and other Democratic leaders have said they would not cut off funds for troops in the field, and were pursuing the Murtha strategy.

The House has already passed a nonbinding resolution disapproving of the troop reinforcements, which would send 4,000 Marines to Anbar province to target al Qaeda, and about 17,500 soldiers to Baghdad to combat Sunni-Shi'ite violence.

But Republicans used a procedural maneuver to block a similar resolution in the Senate.

Democrats have complained that the Bush administration is attacking them unfairly.

After Mr. Cheney said Democrats favored a defeatist policy that would "validate" al Qaeda's strategy, Mrs. Pelosi called the White House to try to complain to Mr. Bush, who was not there.

"You cannot say as the president of the United States, 'I welcome disagreement in a time of war,' and then have the vice president of the United States go out of the country and mischaracterize a position of the speaker of the House and in a manner that says that person in that position of authority is acting against the national security of our country," Mrs. Pelosi said.

Yesterday Mr. Cheney defended his characterization.

"I'm not sure what part of it is that Nancy disagreed with," he told ABC News. "She accused me of questioning her patriotism. I didn't question her patriotism. I questioned her judgment."

Some military analysts have said the troop surge is the administration's last chance in Iraq, but Mr. Cheney said that's not the case.

"We keep trying until we get it right. I don't think we can afford to lose in Iraq," he said.

McConnell Threatens To Block Bid To Repeal War Resolution (WP)

By Shailagh Murray, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 24, 2007

Republican Wants to Force Vote on Guaranteeing Funding for Troops

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) warned yesterday that a new Democratic effort to repeal the 2002 Iraq war resolution would meet the same fate as two previous efforts to limit President Bush's authority: blocked by procedural obstacles, unless Democrats relent to GOP terms.

Speaking to reporters by conference call from his Louisville home, McConnell compared the latest Democratic move to "trying to unring a bell." He warned that Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, the U.S. military commander in Iraq, would "have to surround himself with lawyers" to comply with the new resolution that senior Democrats are drafting.

McConnell predicted he could muster Republican support to block the measure, unless Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) allows a vote on a nonbinding GOP measure to guarantee troop funding.

A showdown over both measures could come as early as next week. Reid has signaled that Iraq-related amendments may be offered to an upcoming homeland security bill. "It's a bit of a cat-and-mouse game," a senior Democratic Senate aide said.

Democratic leaders will present the repeal plan to their colleagues next week. The measure would replace the broad authority that Congress granted Bush in October 2002 with a narrower mandate establishing a March 31, 2008, goal for withdrawing combat troops. It also would restrict longer-term engagement in Iraq to a handful of high-priority realms, including counterterrorism, training for Iraqi troops and border security.

The Bush administration weighed in on the plan yesterday afternoon. "It's simply not necessary," said deputy press secretary Tony Fratto.

The 2002 resolution authorizes Bush to use military force "as he determines to be necessary and appropriate in order to defend the national security of the United States against the continuing threat posed by Iraq" and "enforce all relevant United Nations Security Council resolutions regarding Iraq."

Democratic architects of the new initiative, including Reid, Senate Foreign Relations Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr. (Del.) and Armed Services Chairman Carl M. Levin (Mich.), have argued that the 2002 authorization is no longer valid, because the intent was to destroy weapons of mass destruction -- which were never found -- and if necessary to depose Saddam Hussein, who has since been captured, tried and executed.

The second part of the authorization, Fratto said, "is still important and envisioned the changing nature there." Even Bush has acknowledged the shift, he said: "The president said this isn't the fight we entered in Iraq but it's the fight we're in."

Fratto said the United States went in as a multinational force under United Nations authorization to take military action against Iraq and was there as an occupying force. "And now we're there at the invitation of the sovereign elected government of Iraq, he said, adding that "U.N. Security Council resolutions that came subsequent to the war authorization, you know, envisioned those kinds of changes."

DOJ_NMG_0136968

Biden responded in a CNN interview that while the Constitution allows Bush to conduct war, it does so "only if the Congress gave him the authority in the first place."

"We are repealing the initial authority," Biden said. "And by the way, the United States Constitution cannot be trumped by the United Nations. It cannot be trumped by it. The implementation act of the United Nations treaty, when we passed it, said, it depends upon the Congress's authority."

McConnell noted that 29 Democrats voted for the 2002 resolution, including three Democratic presidential candidates: Biden, along with Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) and Christopher J. Dodd (Conn.).

"If the Senate doesn't support the mission in Iraq, it has only one option, and that's to decide whether or not to fund that mission," McConnell said. "That's our constitutional role, and we shouldn't drag this into the morass of Democratic presidential primary politics."

Defense Secretary Vows Action On Medical Center Conditions (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 23 — Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates said Friday that he would move swiftly to improve conditions for wounded soldiers being treated as outpatients at Walter Reed Army Medical Center and warned that senior officials would be held accountable for the poor conditions.

Mr. Gates, speaking to reporters after touring the facilities and speaking to several patients, said he was upset by recent reports in The Washington Post describing wounded soldiers living in dilapidated buildings near the Walter Reed campus and portraying the huge paperwork and other bureaucratic hurdles they had to overcome during treatment.

Mr. Gates announced the creation of an eight-member commission that would examine conditions at Walter Reed, on the outskirts of Washington, and other military hospitals, and then make recommendations for improvements within 45 days.

“After the facts are established, those responsible for having allowed this unacceptable situation to develop will indeed be held responsible,” Mr. Gates said.

As the number of service members wounded in Iraq and Afghanistan has climbed in recent years, Defense Department officials have long held up Walter Reed as a facility offering unmatched care. But the large number of patients there, currently about 650, has forced officials to rely on overflow facilities nearby more than they have in the past and has caused long waits for some treatments, officials acknowledged.

Pentagon officials have emphasized that the quality of care at Walter Reed and other Army facilities is generally high. They have said that the poor conditions, which included moldy walls, cockroaches, mouse droppings and stained carpets, were confined to a 54-room Army-owned facility across the street from the main Walter Reed campus where nearly 70 recovering service members are being housed.

But the Post reports prompted several days of damage control by Army and Pentagon officials that have veered between acknowledging the situation and playing it down. The Army’s top medical officer, Lt. Gen. Kevin C. Kiley, described the newspaper’s account as a “one-sided representation” at a news conference Thursday, emphasizing that he was objecting to the tone of the stories, not the facts.

Only a day before, Gen. Richard Cody, the Army vice chief of staff, said, “We were absolutely disappointed in the status of the rooms and found the delays and lack of attention to detail to the building’s repairs inexcusable.”

The outpatients at Walter Reed have received initial treatment but require further care or rehabilitation before retiring from the armed forces or returning to active duty.

Of the accounts in The Post, Mr. Gates said, “I have not seen anything or heard anything” that led “me to believe that those articles were in any substantial way wrong.”

Mr. Gates said that no hospital officials had offered to resign but that several lower-level employees overseeing outpatient care had been relieved. He said he met with President Bush earlier Friday to discuss the situation.

Hospital officials in recent days have moved to clean up the most visible problems at the facility. Mr. Gates said the commission, to include retired officials from the Pentagon, Congress and the armed services, would also look at conditions at the National Naval Medical Center nearby in Bethesda, Md., and any other military medical facilities they chose to examine.

The members are Togo West, former secretary of veterans affairs and secretary of the Army under President Bill Clinton; Jack Marsh, former secretary of the Army under President Ronald Reagan; Dr. Joe Schwarz, a former Republican congressman from Michigan; Jim Bacchus, a former Democratic congressman from Florida; and four retired military officers, Gen. John Jumper, former Air Force chief of staff; Lt. Gen. Chip Roadman, former Air Force surgeon general; Rear Adm. Kathy Martin, former Navy deputy surgeon general; and Command Sgt. Maj. Larry Holland.

DOJ_NMG_0136969

Review At Walter Reed Is Ordered (WP)

By Steve Vogel, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 24, 2007

Defense Secretary Vows Accountability

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates named an independent review panel yesterday to investigate what he called an "unacceptable" situation in outpatient care at Walter Reed Army Medical Center, and he said that some soldiers "most directly involved" in the problems have been removed from their positions.

Speaking to reporters during a visit to the Army hospital in Northwest Washington, Gates also warned that senior military leaders could be disciplined based on the findings of the review group.

"We empower commanders with responsibility, authority and resources necessary to carry out their missions," Gates said. "With responsibility comes accountability. Accordingly, after the facts are established, those responsible for having allowed this unacceptable situation to develop will indeed be held accountable."

The Senate Armed Services Committee has tentatively scheduled hearings on the facility for March 6, said a spokeswoman for the panel's chairman, Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.). Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), the ranking minority member of the committee, toured the facility yesterday.

The actions came after stories in The Washington Post on Sunday and Monday revealed that wounded soldiers recuperating at Walter Reed often become mired in red tape as they seek further treatment or decisions on whether they will stay in the military. The articles also disclosed poor living conditions -- including mold, filth and leaks -- in Building 18, an Army facility that houses recovering troops.

"I'm grateful to reporters for bringing this to our attention but thoroughly disappointed we did not identify it ourselves," Gates said in his first public remarks addressing the situation.

The eight-member review group appointed by Gates has been charged with taking a broad look at all rehabilitative care and administrative procedures both at Walter Reed and the National Naval Medical Center in Bethesda. Panel members "will be given free and unrestricted access" to visit medical facilities and interview personnel, Gates said.

The group will be co-chaired by Togo West, who was secretary of veterans affairs and secretary of the Army during the Clinton administration, and by John O. Marsh Jr., who was secretary of the Army under President Ronald Reagan and a former member of Congress from Virginia. Other members include two former members of Congress, three retired senior military officers and a retired command sergeant major. Their report is due within 45 days and will be made public, Gates said.

Gates said he had no information suggesting that there are problems at Bethesda similar to those at Walter Reed, but he said the naval facility is being included because "we need to know the scope of this problem."

There is rare unanimity in Washington on the need to treat wounded soldiers well, Gates said, "and so we're determined to fix it, and fix it fast." He described the medical care itself at the hospital as "unsurpassable" and said the shortcomings were confined to "the outpatient aspect of this."

During his visit, Gates met a group of five soldiers being treated at the facility who spoke of a frustrating administrative bureaucracy at the hospital. "They battled our foreign enemies; they should not have to battle an American bureaucracy," Gates said.

Gates said caseworkers are "overwhelmed" by the numbers of patients they are assigned, and he indicated that more workers would be soon assigned to the hospital.

"There's just too much work for the number of people that are available," he said. "So that's one thing that can be addressed pretty quickly." Gates added that troops who had been wounded in service "should not have to recuperate in substandard housing."

The Army declined to identify publicly the personnel who have been moved to different positions at the hospital. Speaking on background, an Army official said they included several soldiers involved in supervising facilities at Walter Reed, including Building 18.

Gates met with President Bush yesterday morning to brief him on the actions underway. "He is, understandably, concerned and emphatic in wanting the best possible care for our wounded soldiers and for their families," Gates said.

Gates Orders Review Of Walter Reed Hospital (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, February 24, 2007

WASHINGTON — Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates announced plans Friday to form an independent review group to examine Walter Reed Army Medical Center and other military hospitals.

DOJ_NMG_0136970

The move comes after news reports indicated that seriously injured soldiers had been caught in a bureaucratic morass and given substandard outpatient housing at Walter Reed. The review ordered by Gates will focus on rehabilitative care and administrative procedures at Walter Reed and the National Naval Medical Center in Bethesda, Md.

"The men and women recovering at Walter Reed and at other military hospitals have put their lives on the line and paid a considerable price for defending our country," Gates said. "They battled our foreign enemies. They should not have to battle an American bureaucracy."

Defense officials have said that there are no allegations of systemic problems at Bethesda or other military hospitals, but Gates said the commission would be able to examine all military hospitals. Articles in the Washington Post this week detailed shortcomings of the military health system, especially its outpatient facilities.

Gates said he was grateful to the reporters who brought the problems to light, and said he was disappointed that the Defense Department had not found the problems earlier. He promised that he would hold accountable the people who allowed the problems in outpatient care at Walter Reed to occur.

The Defense secretary's tone was in sharp contrast to comments Thursday by Lt. Gen. Kevin Kiley, the Army surgeon general, who challenged the Post report as a "one-sided representation." Kiley, who used to command Walter Reed and oversees the hospital as head of the Army Medical Command, said there was no "failure of leadership."

Gates did not criticize Kiley, but he said he was upset by the original articles and had not learned anything from Army officials that caused him to believe the articles were wrong.

The review panel is to report its results within 45 days. It will be lead by Togo West Jr. — who served as Army secretary and secretary of Veterans Affairs in the Clinton administration — and John O. Marsh Jr., who was Army secretary under President Reagan.

The Defense Department already has begun making repairs at Walter Reed and taking other steps to address the problems, officials said.

Gates said some of those directly involved with problems identified at Walter Reed had been "relieved" of their assignments. Army officials said later that no officers had been removed from command positions, but that there had been administrative reassignments of some midlevel officials at the hospital.

The review panel will deliver its report to Congress, Gates said.

Lawmakers have already begun drafting their own recommendations for an overhaul.

A new bill drafted by Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), a presidential candidate, and Sen. Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.), a freshman member of the Armed Services Committee, seeks to simplify the paperwork for injured soldiers, force the Army to add more caseworkers, and increase the oversight of Walter Reed. A Democratic congressional staffer said the senators planned to introduce the bill next week.

Gates Vows Action On Walter Reed Worries (AP)

AP, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) — Defense Secretary Robert Gates said Friday that those found to have been responsible for allowing substandard living conditions for soldier outpatients at Walter Reed Army Medical Center will be "held accountable."

However, no one in the Army chain of command has so far offered to resign.

Gates spoke to reporters after visiting the medical compound, whose reputation as a premier caregiver for soldiers wounded in Iraq and Afghanistan has taken a hit following a Washington Post series of reports last weekend that documented problems in soldiers' housing and in the medical bureaucracy at Walter Reed.

"A bedrock principle of our military system is that we empower commanders with the responsibility, authority and resources necessary to carry out their mission," Gates said. "With responsibility comes accountability."

His comment suggested that senior officials in the Army chain of command would not be immune from disciplinary action.

Gates announced that two former Army secretaries, Togo West and Jack Marsh, would head an independent panel to review treatment and administrative processes at Walter Reed and the National Naval Medical Center at Bethesda, Md. Gates said the group has been asked to report its findings publicly within 45 days.

"After the facts are established, those responsible for having allowed this unacceptable situation to develop will indeed be held accountable," Gates said, adding that so far no one involved has offered to resign.

"We are not going to wait 45 days to begin addressing these problems," he said. "And so there have been some people who are most directly involved who have been relieved. But we will be looking and evaluating the rest of the chain of command as we get more information."

DOJ_NMG_0136971

Asked about Gates' statement that some have already been relieved of duty, Army officials said they were unsure that any such actions had been taken. One Army official, speaking on condition of anonymity because the Army is conducting its own review of what happened at Walter Reed, said officials are considering personnel changes.

The Army's Preemptive News Briefing (WP)

By Howard Kurtz, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 24, 2007

To the Army's public affairs chief, it was simply an effort to "get the facts out from our perspective."

To Dana Priest, who covers national security for The Washington Post, it was a case of Army officials "shooting themselves in the foot, because reporters are not going to trust them."

The Post last week gave the Army six days to respond to the paper's investigation into decaying, cockroach-infested facilities and an overwhelmed patient-care bureaucracy at Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Northwest Washington. The Army's public affairs office used the time to summon journalists from other news organizations to a briefing at which Walter Reed's commander responded to the findings -- in an article that had not yet been published.

"It made us feel very uncomfortable that we were being set up to be the Army's public affairs arm," said Los Angeles Times correspondent Peter Spiegel, who attended the Pentagon session. "They were trying to brief us on a story when we didn't know what the story was about." Journalists from the Boston Globe, USA Today, the Associated Press and Fox News also attended the invitation-only briefing.

When journalists seek a response from a government agency on a pending story, there is generally an understanding that the information will not be shared with rival news outlets before publication. Such unspoken agreements, however, are hardly iron-clad. Treasury Department officials last year gave the Wall Street Journal declassified information about a secret program to track the banking records of terror suspects after failing to persuade the New York Times to kill a planned story on the subject.

Col. Dan Baggio, the Army's chief of media relations, said Walter Reed's commander had already been thinking of briefing reporters on conditions at the medical center. But Baggio acknowledged that the timing was dictated by the upcoming Post stories, which ran Sunday and Monday and detailed inadequate care for wounded veterans.

Priest, who reported the two-part series with Anne Hull, says she told an Army public affairs officer this week: "How do you think this is going to affect our relationship? Do you think I'm going to be willing next time to give you that much time to respond, if you're going to turn around and tell my competitors?"

But Maj. Gen. George Weightman, Walter Reed's commander, viewed the matter differently, Baggio said. "Because we had a long holiday weekend coming up and we knew the story was coming out about Walter Reed, he felt an obligation to make sure to get the facts out from our perspective," Baggio said. "We have a responsibility to communicate with the public about things going on at our command, regardless of who says they had the right of discovery."

Priest first contacted the Army on Monday, Feb. 12, and provided a list of 30 questions about conditions at Walter Reed. She said that Weightman was responsive during a two-hour interview Thursday, Feb. 15, but that she initially thought he was joking when he said that he would be briefing other news organizations on Walter Reed's problems the following day.

At the Friday briefing, reporters were told that Weightman's remarks were embargoed until late Saturday afternoon, around the time that The Post's story was expected to be posted online. That, said Baggio, was done as a "courtesy."

After an internal debate, said Spiegel of the Los Angeles Times, "it seemed to us pointless to try to cobble something together" without The Post's findings.

But the Army succeeded in putting its stamp on some stories. An AP report Saturday evening began: "The commander of the Army's leading medical facility acknowledges problems in outpatient treatment but said the hospital is working to address the concerns of patients and their families." Spiegel's Times piece Sunday said Weightman "has acknowledged that the staff responsible for tracking patients after they receive treatment was overwhelmed by the number of wounded when violence spiked in Iraq two years ago." Both reports said Weightman spoke in advance of The Post's stories.

Army officials are now questioning the paper's handling of the probe. In a letter to Walter Reed's staff this week, Weightman said that "information for this article was covertly obtained over more than two years by reporters who did not wish to bring their findings to the leadership for action."

Priest, saying that the inquiry lasted four months, not two years, declined to explain how she and Hull repeatedly signed into Walter Reed without the knowledge of the Army brass. Every patient or family member quoted by name, she said, had agreed to be on the record.

"We never lied to anyone about who we were," Priest said. "We just tried not to be in a position to identify ourselves to anyone who would report us to public affairs and have us kicked off the base."

DOJ_NMG_0136972

As for Weightman's complaint that the paper should have notified the Army of its conclusions earlier in the process, Priest called that "ridiculous," saying: "You find wrongdoing and you don't report it to the public first? You report it to them first? That's not our role."

Benefits Of The Doubt (WP)

The Washington Post, February 24, 2007

Badly wounded veterans should have an easier time getting disability compensation.

AFTER A WEEK of terrible publicity, the Defense Department seems to be responding quickly to many of the problems The Post found in a four-month investigation at Walter Reed Army Medical Center. But so far, the most disturbing problem uncovered in The Post's series is getting the least public acknowledgment from generals and journalists alike.

Over the past week, follow-up reports, news releases and news conferences have focused on Army and Navy efforts to improve the physical conditions at Walter Reed and other military facilities serving outpatients. Generals and their press attaches assure reporters that moldy walls will be replaced, holes patched and snow shoveled. The quick pace of repairs, while late, is encouraging. But it is only a start.

The upsetting state of Walter Reed's Building 18 is only part of a larger administrative problem. Post reporters found that confusing bureaucratic rigmarole and interminable waits caused by misplaced paperwork and poor advising were endemic. Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates named an independent review panel yesterday and reassuringly promised that it will examine administrative procedures as well as the physical state of outpatient facilities. "They battled our foreign enemies; they should not have to battle American bureaucracy," Mr. Gates said.

However, Post reporters found that the stresses on outpatients at Walter Reed included not only their physical recovery, dank rooms or long waits but also the difficulty they have in getting fair disability compensation. Army review boards searched for reasons to deny maimed soldiers disability funds, often blaming "preexisting conditions," not wartime service, for physical and mental disorders. In one instance, a review board claimed that a middle-aged soldier's poorly healed broken foot was the result of "late-life atrophy," not a severe car wreck in Iraq. There's no excuse for the Army to try so hard to deny disability compensation to wounded soldiers. After sacrificing their health, they should get the benefit of the doubt in such decisions. After all, improperly denying compensation can bankrupt soldiers and their families for years.

After we asked, a Defense Department spokesman told us in an e-mail that the Disability Evaluation System will be improved "across the board" and that the Pentagon will ensure that it is a "full and fair due process with regard to disability evaluation and compensation." Even if the Defense Department weren't so committed, it might soon have little choice in the matter. Sens. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) and Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.) plan to introduce legislation next week that would require the secretary of defense to review the Disability Evaluation System as well as address some of the other problems The Post uncovered. Either way, veterans too seriously wounded to return to active duty should get the benefits they deserve without having to beg for them.

U.S. Seizes Son Of A Top Shiite, Stirring Uproar (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 23 — American troops seized and then released the eldest son of Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, perhaps the most powerful Shiite political leader in Iraq, after he crossed the border from Iran into Iraq on Friday morning.

The detention heightened tensions with one of Iraq's most formidable political movements just as the planned American troop buildup was beginning in Baghdad to try to rescue the capital from the grip of Shiite militias and Sunni insurgents.

Allies of the Hakim family denounced the detention as a serious insult, and a senior adviser to the family asserted that American forces also had assaulted several guards. The Hakims control the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, the backbone of the Shiite political alliance that has dominated politics during the occupation.

State-run television said Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, a Shiite who depends on Mr. Hakim's support, intervened to help release the son, Amar Abdul Aziz al-Hakim.

In an interview after he was released from an American military base in Kut, Amar al-Hakim said that American forces had treated him roughly and that their justification for seizing him — that he crossed the border with an invalid passport — was untrue.

An official with the Iraqi force that guards the border said American troops had been lying in wait to apprehend the Hakim convoy as it drove into Iraq. But a spokesman for the American Embassy in Baghdad, Lou Fintor, said that the Americans followed standard procedures and that there had been no effort to "single out" Mr. Hakim.

DOJ_NMG_0136973

The American ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, said he was "sorry" for the detention. The son is himself a senior official in Mr. Hakim's political movement and has often taken a leading role in building support for his father's political efforts throughout Shiite-dominated southern Iraq. A Hakim aide suggested that the son was being groomed to take control of the family's political dynasty.

The detention worsened relations with the Hakims — who spent years in exile in Iran and remain close to Tehran — two months after American forces raided the Hakims' elaborate Baghdad compound near the Green Zone and detained two Iranians whom they accused of running guns and planning sectarian attacks.

That raid came just a few weeks after the elder Mr. Hakim met with President Bush in Washington. Mr. Hakim has generally been an ally of the United States presence, but he has criticized the Americans for what he said was favoring the interests of Sunnis over Shiites.

The incident comes at a delicate moment in the relationship between the United States and Iran, which American officials have accused of fomenting violence in Iraq and supplying Shiite militias with the deadliest munitions employed against the American military's armored vehicles, armor-piercing explosives known as explosively formed penetrators, or E.F.P.'s.

One of Amar al-Hakim's most prominent public roles of late has been canvassing the Shiite provinces of southern Iraq to build support for his father's controversial plan to cleave nine Shiite provinces into an autonomous region that would have wide authority over its security and natural resources.

Sunni political groups as well as some Shiite parties have objected to the plan, saying it would drive Iraq toward a three-way partition, with a Kurdish state in the northeast, a Sunni state in the west and northwest, and a Shiite state in the south.

One Shiite coalition that objects to the plan is the bloc allied with Moktada al-Sadr, the anti-American Shiite cleric who controls the Mahdi Army militia and whose political movement is the only one within the Shiite alliance whose power rivals that of Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, or Sciri.

A senior adviser to the Hakim family, Haitham al-Husseini, described the son as being in his mid-30s and said he was considered an heir to his father's political movement. Mr. Hakim also has a younger son, Moshin, who serves as a political adviser, and two daughters.

Amar al-Hakim was in Iran no longer than five days, said Mr. Husseini, who added that he was probably visiting relatives or other people the family knew from their years in exile during the rule of Saddam Hussein. He said the Americans had held Amar al-Hakim a good part of the day. The convoy was stopped "without any justification," Mr. Husseini said. "Some of the guards were beaten by the U.S. forces."

He also said that United States military officers whom he would not identify had contacted aides to Mr. Hakim and apologized for the detention. Mr. Khalilzad, the American ambassador, was quoted by news agencies as saying that he regretted the episode and that "we do not mean any disrespect" to the Hakim family.

Mr. Fintor, the spokesman for the American Embassy in Baghdad, declined comment about whether an apology had been issued. But he said that American forces were investigating the episode.

"We're trying to determine the facts," Mr. Fintor said. "What I can tell you is that at this point we understand that Mr. Hakim was arrested by soldiers who were doing their duty. He was not singled out, and we understand the soldiers were following standard procedure."

The detention led to a large demonstration in front of the offices of Mr. Hakim's party in Basra by a crowd protesting the son's treatment. A senior Sciri party official in Najaf, Sadr al-Din al-Qubanchi, called for a demonstration there.

"This will shake the stability, and it's an insult to the Iraqi Shiite alliance and its leadership," he said.

An American military official declined to comment on the allegation that Mr. Hakim's guards had been beaten but said he had been detained because he possessed an expired passport and was traveling with men who had a large number of guns.

But after his release at the provincial governor's office in Kut, Mr. Hakim said his passport was valid and the Americans detained him a few miles from the Iranian border on Friday morning.

"They arrested me and my guards in an unsuitable way, and they bound my hands and blindfolded me," he said. "They took our phones, bags, money, documents and the guards' weapons, and sent us to an American base."

An Iraqi correspondent for The New York Times said Mr. Hakim showed a passport that had an expiration date of Sept. 17, 2007, and quoted him saying, "They claim the reason for the arrest was because my passport had expired, but as you can see my passport expires on the 17th of September."

Two news agencies also quoted Mr. Hakim as saying that the Americans had dealt with him harshly, but neither news agency reported that Mr. Hakim had shown them an unexpired passport. Whether Mr. Hakim had a valid passport could not be confirmed by late Friday.

Mr. Husseini, the Hakim aide, said some of Amar al-Hakim's guards were Iraqi Army soldiers and Iraqi policemen. The arrest was "very insulting to the Iraqi government and the sovereignty of the Iraqi government," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0136974

He said American military officers had apologized. “Until now, we have only heard the usual answer, that it was a mistake and that they didn’t know who he was,” he said.

Amar al-Hakim was educated mostly in Iran, according to Mr. Husseini, and is now secretary general of a major Shiite Islamic foundation, in addition to his position within Sciri.

Iraqi's Arrest Brings Apology From U.S. (LAT)

By Christian Berthelsen

The Los Angeles Times, February 24, 2007

BAGHDAD — The U.S. military detained the son of one of America's closest political allies in Iraq for several hours Friday, angering Shiite Muslim officials and straining delicate relations with the Iraqi leadership. The American ambassador here quickly apologized for the incident.

Meanwhile, the U.S. military announced that three soldiers attached to American-led forces were killed in combat in the Sunni-dominated Al Anbar province Thursday, but released few details pending notification of relatives. At least 3,154 American troops have died in Iraq since the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003, according to icasualties.org, a website that tracks casualties in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Soldiers arrested Ammar Hakim and at least three of his bodyguards around noon as they crossed into Iraq from Iran about 80 miles southeast of Baghdad. His father, Abdelaziz Hakim, heads the largest Shiite voting bloc in the Iraqi parliament. The elder Hakim met with President Bush in December in Washington and pledged to help end bloodshed in Iraq.

In a telephone interview with The Times, Ammar Hakim said troops arrested him because his passport was nearing expiration and they thought his identification picture did not match his appearance. He complained of being treated roughly at the hands of the soldiers, including being blindfolded as he was transported to a military base and having his underwear searched once he arrived there.

"We supported the new Baghdad [security] plan, and we hoped that it would succeed, but at the same time people's dignity should respected," he said, adding that the Iraqi government would seek answers from the U.S. about how the incident was handled.

Hakim was released after about seven hours, and U.S. officials rapidly began damage control. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad appeared on Iraqi government television, saying that the U.S. was "sorry about the arrest" and meant no disrespect.

Hakim's father leads the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, or SCIRI. The elder Hakim was an opponent of Saddam Hussein and spent much of the 1980s in exile in Iran as a commander of the Badr Brigade, the militia affiliated with SCIRI. The Badr Brigade has been criticized for close ties with Iran and has been accused of operating death squads targeting Sunni Muslims, but it is also viewed as among the more moderate Shiite forces in Iraq.

Ammar Hakim heads the Shahid al-Mihrab Foundation, a charity affiliated with SCIRI. News of Hakim's arrest drew widespread attention Friday, a day of relative calm in Iraq. Police patrols discovered the bodies of five men shot to death around the capital, a daily toll far lower than usual.

Meanwhile, religious leaders focused on allegations this week that Iraqi security forces had raped two Sunni women in the course of enforcing the new security crackdown. Sunni preachers condemned the alleged acts as evidence that the new effort was a failure.

"We thought that the security plan would stop the killing and the bloodshed," Sheik Jamaledin Ighidee said during a sermon at the Shawaf Mosque in west Baghdad. "But this week we heard about two of the most terrible crimes. These crimes deserve that the whole nation would die instead."

At least one Shiite prayer leader said the charges were false.

Sadruddin Qubanchi told worshipers at the Fatimiya Mosque in Najaf that the accusations were designed by "the enemies of Iraq … to use the rape of women to bring down the security plan."

U.S. Detains Shiite Leader's Son (WP)

By Ernesto Londono, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 24, 2007

Amar al-Hakim Held Several Hours Returning to Iraq From Iran

BAGHDAD, Feb. 23 -- U.S. forces detained the son of one of Iraq's most prominent Shiite politicians for several hours Friday, a spokesman for the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq said.

The convoy of Amar al-Hakim, one of the sons of party leader Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, was stopped as Amar was returning from a trip to Iran, Haitham al-Husseini said.

DOJ_NMG_0136975

The senior Hakim, whose party controls the largest number of seats in the Iraqi parliament and who met with President Bush during a visit to Washington in December, spent many years in exile in Iran and has close ties to that country. U.S. officials have said Iran has supplied weapons to militias targeting American forces in Iraq.

U.S. Embassy spokesman Lou Fintor said the younger Hakim was detained during a routine security operation.

"We understand Mr. Hakim was arrested by soldiers who were executing their duty at a checkpoint," Fintor said. "He wasn't singled out, but rather we understand the soldiers were following standard procedure," reflecting stepped-up enforcement along Iraq's border with Iran. "Once the facts of the situation were determined, Mr. Hakim was released."

Husseini, the party spokesman, said some of Hakim's bodyguards were asked to lie on the ground while the convoy was searched. "The guards were treated very badly by the U.S. force," he said, adding that some of the guards were members of the Iraqi police and army. "We believe this sends a very wrong message to the whole security process we are trying to assist."

Husseini said the detention appeared to have been a case of mistaken identity, but he said Hakim should not have been kept in custody for several hours.

"He identified himself and had his passport and Iraqi ID," Husseini said. "He's a very well-known figure in Iraq."

U.S. military officials raided the senior Hakim's compound in Baghdad in December and detained two Iranian men, one of whom was described by American officials as a high-ranking officer in an elite Iranian military unit known as the Quds Force. The men were released after appeals by the Iraqi government.

Also on Friday, the U.S. military said in a statement that three American soldiers had been killed Thursday in Anbar province in western Iraq. Their names were not released.

Correspondent Joshua Partlow and special correspondent Naseer Mehdawi contributed to this report.

U.S. Detains Top Shi'ite Leader's Son (WT/AP)

By Brian Murphy, Associated Press

The Washington Times, February 24, 2007

BAGHDAD -- U.S. troops detained the eldest son of Iraq's most influential Shi'ite politician for nearly 12 hours yesterday as he crossed back from Iran, sparking protests from Shi'ite politicians.

Even though the U.S. ambassador issued a rapid apology, the decision to hold Amar al-Hakim risks touching off a backlash from Shi'ite leaders at a time when their cooperation is needed most to keep a major security sweep through Baghdad from unraveling.

Shi'ite reaction to the detention was quick and sharp, with some officials suggesting it was a veiled warning about the limits of ties to Iran.

"What happened is unacceptable," Shi'ite lawmaker Hamid Majid Moussa told Al-Forat television. "The Iraqi government and the American forces must put an end to such transgressions."

The station is just one part of the multilayered clout of the al-Hakim family.

Mr. al-Hakim's father, Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, is the leader of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq (SCIRI), the country's largest political force. Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim met with President Bush at the White House in December.

The bloc carries the strongest voice in the 275-seat parliament and holds critical sway over the fate of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. It also maintains very close ties to Iran, which hosted Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim and other SCIRI officials before the fall of Saddam Hussein in 2003.

In December, American forces seized two Iranian security agents at Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim's compound in Baghdad. Six other Iranians were arrested Jan. 11 at an Iranian liaison office in northern Iraq. The U.S. military said they were members of Iran's elite Revolutionary Guard. Tehran denies the charges.

Washington has repeatedly accused Iran of funneling weapons to militants, including lethal roadside bombs that have targeted U.S. troops.

But the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, tried to defuse any showdowns with Shi'ites that could upset a 10-day-old offensive seeking to reclaim Baghdad's streets from militants and sectarian death squads.

"I am sorry about the arrest," Mr. Khalilzad said. "We don't know the circumstances of the arrest, and we are investigating and we don't mean any disrespect to al-Sayed Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim or his family."

A U.S. Embassy spokesman in Baghdad, Lou Fintor, said Amar al-Hakim "was not singled out" and "soldiers were following standard procedure" since the border crossing was closed at the time.

Amar al-Hakim, 35, was taken into custody at the Zirbatyah crossing point southeast of Baghdad along with his security guards, said his father's secretary, Jamal al-Sagheer. Amar al-Hakim was freed about 12 hours later, but his bodyguards remained in custody, Mr. al-Sagheer said.

DOJ_NMG_0136976

Amar al-Hakim heads a charity dedicated to the memory of his uncle, Grand Ayatollah Mohammed Baqir al-Hakim, who was killed along with scores of others in a car bombing in Najaf in August 2003. His father took over SCIRI after the killings, and Amar al-Hakim is apparently being groomed to take his place someday.

The U.S. military, meanwhile, said three U.S. troops were killed Thursday in combat in volatile Anbar province, but did not give specific locations or circumstances for the deaths.

In Basra, police said they arrested a suspected Sunni insurgent with links to al Qaeda. Issa Abdul-Razzaq Ahmed, 22, was on the Iraqi Interior Ministry's most-wanted list, accused of financing and recruiting fighters, said provincial police commander Gen. Mohammed al-Moussawi.

Baghdad Crackdown 'curbing Violence' (FT)

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, February 24, 2007

A week after the beginning of the security crackdown in Baghdad, US officials claim their forces are slowly expanding their presence in the capital and curbing the sectarian violence that left tens of thousands dead last year.

Many Iraqis, however, say that fighting has continued unabated, while a high-profile rape case linked to the crackdown has heightened tensions between the Sunni and Shia communities.

Nouri al-Maliki, the prime minister, announced the beginning of Operation En-forc-ing the Law on February 14, although US forces had already begun to filter into the city earlier this month to conduct large-scale sweeps of districts.

The plan hinges on the joint security stations – permanent outposts manned by US and Iraqi troops inside the capital. The military says it has learnt from previous operations where insurgents fled a sudden influx of US forces, only to come back when the troops had moved on.

US officers hope that a permanent presence will undermine the ability of armed groups to intimidate civilians, leading to an increase in tip-offs, which would allow them to track fugitives and discover weapons caches. Major General William Caldwell, US military spokesman, says four such stations were opened last week, bringing the total to 14.

Iraqi officials claim the sectarian death toll has already fallen as a result of the increased troop presence, which may indicate that militias are conducting fewer raids on districts aimed at driving out or abducting civilians from rival sects.

Maj Gen Caldwell and other commanders, however, have cautioned that it is too early to call the operation a success, and that the true impact will not be seen for months.

Some Iraqis living in mixed districts say that the level of day-to-day violence has not changed. One resident of Hayy al-Amal, a district of southern Baghdad, says insurgent snipers continue to fire from Sunni mosques at civilians, disappearing whenever the mosque is searched.

US troops admit that they are hard pressed to deal with such hit-and-run attacks unless they receive a steady supply of useful information.

Another resident of the same neighbourhood says some senior insurgent commanders and guerrilla leaders have fled, but that "carjackings" have increased as teenage fighters take over the guerrilla networks.

A resident of the Shia suburb of Sadr City across the capital complains that the security sweep has created a vacuum and that criminal gang activity surged after the Mahdi Army militiamen – an unofficial police force in the slum – went to ground to avoid US troops.

Some Shia also say the disappearance of the militias has made their districts more vulnerable to attack by Sunni car bombers.

The political climate has been further poisoned by the alleged rape of a Sunni by Iraqi police following a raid on a house in Hayy al-Amal on February 8. The police said the woman had been providing food for insurgents. Sunni leaders, who had already accused the Shia-dominated government of singling out their neighbourhoods, have urged it to punish the rapists.

Mr Maliki, however, has accused the woman of making up the charges.

Car Bombings Kill 4 Civilians In Baghdad (AP)

AP, February 24, 2007

Car bomb blasts hit parts of Baghdad on Saturday in attacks apparently targeting security forces involved in an ongoing campaign to restore order in the capital. At least four civilians were killed and nearly 10 injured, police said.

In a separate blast, a bomb stashed on a minibus killed at least one passenger and injured five in central Baghdad.

A car rigged with explosives blew apart near a joint Iraqi-U.S. patrol in a mostly Sunni area in western Baghdad, damaging at least one Humvee, police said. Two civilians were killed, but there were no immediate reports of casualties among security forces.

DOJ_NMG_0136977

In a commercial district in central Baghdad, a car bomb exploded near a police patrol, but missed the vehicles. At least two civilians were killed and five injured, police said.

Stryker Team Key To Iraq Security Plan (LAT)

By Tina Susman

The Los Angeles Times, February 24, 2007

BAGHDAD — In any other city, the sight of an old man standing next to a can on the side of a crowded street would go unnoticed. In Baghdad, it was enough to make U.S. Army Spc. Aurelio Cazares slow down his armored Stryker for a closer look and alert his gunner.

The vehicle's gunner fixed his viewfinder on the man and the object and zoomed in, just as a sedan stopped in front of them, blocking the view and adding further suspense to the moment. Then, the car pulled away, the old man crossed the road, and the Stryker's high-tech remote weapons system, which can detect heat in an object and determine the presence of explosives, confirmed that the can was harmless.

The Stryker moved on, and Cazares relaxed.

There aren't many things that worry him as he steers the 22-ton troop carrier, which resembles an oversized and massively overloaded camper van, through Baghdad's streets. Its steel-and-ceramic armor is far stronger than a Humvee's, making it the safest troop transporter by far on roads littered with explosives and snipers.

Nothing, though, can guarantee protection from some of the armor-piercing explosives plaguing U.S. forces in Iraq. Since August, three men from Cazares' 3rd Stryker Brigade Combat Team, from the Army's 2nd Infantry Division, have died in such attacks.

"We haven't been hit, thank God," Cazares said this week after another day of patrolling.

Since U.S. and Iraqi forces put a new Baghdad security plan into high gear last week, the Stryker team has been at the forefront of sweeps and patrols, some lasting 20 hours at a stretch.

For the soldiers of the brigade, it has meant little sleep and the majority of their waking hours inside the dark, cramped interiors of the Strykers, whose bulk, speed and armor have made them the vehicle of choice in Baghdad's riskiest operations.

"We're kind of like groundhogs," said 1st Lt. Yeng Lacanlale of Seattle after a patrol that began at 4:30 a.m. and lasted 16 hours. "We get back, shower, eat, try to get a little sleep, and go back out."

Each Stryker can carry 14 people, making it easy to flood an area with troops, who pour out of the vehicle through a hatch in the back. The Strykers reach a speed of 65 mph and are relatively quiet as they trundle through the streets, giving them a stealth quality other troop carriers lack.

In addition to their armor, they are surrounded by a cage-like shield designed to repel rocket-propelled grenades. They lumber about on eight tires but can keep moving on fewer in the event of blowouts.

Cazares isn't sure why he was chosen to drive a Stryker. It wasn't his driving record back home in Weslaco, Texas, which the 28-year-old admits is less than stellar. He just knows that one day, someone higher up told him he was on his way to school to learn to handle a Stryker.

Cazares and the gunner view the outside world through periscopes, popping their heads out of the overhead hatches as little as possible to avoid snipers. As he moves through the streets, he eyes each trash pile, each rock and anything else that could hide a danger.

While he navigates, the rest of the unit shares the cigar-shaped back compartment, sitting kneecap-to-kneecap, shoulder-to-shoulder, on narrow benches in full battle gear, their M-4 rifles balanced between their legs. Two stand sentry, their heads poked out of overhead hatches.

Some talk about their families. Spc. Rany Grizz, on the same mission as Lacanlale last week, reminisced about his honeymoon in San Francisco a little over a year ago, and about his daughter, Evelyn, who shares his birthday: Aug. 29.

Some talk politics. Lacanlale speculated about the future of Iraq if Democrats opposed to the war hold sway in Washington. "It's pretty much a civil war between the two sects, and if we leave, they're just going to duke it out," he said as the Stryker streaked down a dark and deserted road.

Grizz chimed in, expressing doubts that the Iraqi security forces would be able to hold things together without the Americans to back them up. "They're good soldiers, but nobody takes care of them. They need more supplies, more support," he said.

Some just talk, like Pfc. Nathan Bratager, who wouldn't be in a Stryker if it weren't for a snowstorm in South Dakota.

A year ago, he was mopping floors and cleaning toilets on the graveyard shift at a truck stop there. The night of the storm, he spent all of his time shoveling snow. The floors and toilets went untended. The next morning, Bratager was fired.

DOJ_NMG_0136978

Aimless, he wandered into a mall one day, walked through the door of the Army recruiting station that happened to be there, and signed up. Now he eagerly shows off the red blotch on his neck, the result of a sniper's bullet that grazed him in September as he stood sentry. "I even have a video of it," Bratager said.

Insurgents had filmed the attack and show it on their 24-hour satellite TV channel, which replays video of car bombs, mortar blasts and other attacks on U.S.-led forces.

Bratager, of Belle Fourche, S.D., said he had been considering enlisting since the Sept. 11 attacks. Now, he says, he has a job he loves, but a pessimistic view of Iraq's future.

"In about 20 years, I doubt we're going to be out of here. There will still be Americans in Iraq," Bratager said, accusing U.S. and Iraqi politicians of not doing enough to end the sectarian divisions.

He spoke as his patrol came to an early end. The mission had been changed, and the men had only to escort another patrol to the site of abandoned rocket launchers on Baghdad's far northeastern reaches. They were back at base by 1 p.m., cherishing a rare afternoon off but knowing there would be new orders the next day.

U.S. Disappointed In Iraq's Progress With Baathists (LAT)

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, February 24, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Serious new divisions have emerged between the Bush administration and its Iraqi allies over the Baghdad government's refusal to enact a reform that the White House considers crucial to its new strategy for bringing the country's violence under control.

In spite of a commitment by Iraq's prime minister to its passage, legislation that would ease rules barring former members of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party from government service has been blocked by the country's Shiite-dominated parliament.

U.S. officials have repeatedly expressed confidence that Nouri al-Maliki, the prime minister, would work for passage of "de-Baathification" reform. However, they now have begun to express disappointment at the Iraqi stalemate, saying that the reform remains a top political priority and is essential to convince the country's Sunni minority that it can receive fair treatment in the new system.One U.S. official said the reform, far from advancing, as promised, was now "moving backward" and is "almost dead in the water."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and State Department official David Satterfield, her top Iraq adviser, paid an unannounced visit to Baghdad last weekend for consultations with top Iraqi officials. Aides said they came away discouraged on this issue.

Administration officials also have expressed disappointment in the work of a special Iraqi panel on de-Baathification headed by Ahmad Chalabi, the American-trained financier who became controversial as an advocate for the Iraq war.

The dimming prospects for reform hold troubling implications for the administration's new strategy on Iraq, which relies heavily on political reconciliation between Sunnis Arabs and Shiites as a way to stem the sectarian violence which has gripped the country for the past year.

President Bush ordered 21,500 additional combat troops to Iraq last month as part of a new U.S. strategy to establish order in Baghdad. But the objective of establishing order is to allow the government to achieve political progress and ethnic reconciliation, Bush and his aides have said.

The administration considers de-Baathification reform, along with legislation dividing up the country's oil wealth, to be the two most important political steps the country can take to reconcile its warring factions. But while U.S. military officials have been buoyed by early results of the security push, the reconciliation legislation has yet to advance.

The new conflict between the U.S. officials and their Iraqi counterparts underscores the difficulty of reaching reconciliation and the fragility of the American partnership with the Iraqi government.

After months of frustration last year trying to convince al-Maliki to take steps toward political reconciliation, U.S. officials late last year convinced him to commit to a series of "benchmarks." One of them was the de-Baathification reform, which al-Maliki committed to implementing by early this year.

How to handle former Baath party members has been an issue since 2003, when U.S. officials and their Iraqi allies began an aggressive effort to bar some 30,000 former members from government service. The drive affected some of the country's top talent, ranging from senior civilian and military officials to low-level government functionaries and even schoolteachers.

By 2004, U.S. officials came to the view that they had gone too far. They decided the rules had been too harsh, considering that the government is the country's biggest employer. The administration also began to fear that they were feeding the insurgency and convincing Sunnis that the Shiite majority in the new Iraq was vengeful.

Now, even Army Gen. David H. Petraeus, the new senior U.S. commander in Iraq, favors easing the rules so that mid-level military officers can rejoin the military, giving it the benefit of their experience.

DOJ_NMG_0136979

Nevertheless, a large majority of Iraqi Shiites and Kurds oppose efforts to relax the rules. After decades of persecution by Saddam's government, many fear the Baath party still exists in the Iraqi underground, and some contend that many Baath party members, though low-level government workers, acted as enforcers and spies for Saddam's government, and should be excluded now.

Michael Rubin, a former official with the U.S.-led Coalition Provisional Authority, which ran the country from 2003 until 2004, said that "among more than 80 percent of the Iraqi population, the policy is quite popular."

"Putting it bluntly, if de-Baathification were left to Iraqi democracy, it would remain as the policy of Iraq," Rubin said.

The reforms need the approval of the Iraqi Council of Representatives. But the proposal has been opposed by key leaders of the two large Shiite parties, Dawa and the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq.

U.S. officials believe that a committee that drafted the reforms was not generous enough toward the thousands of Iraqis who are still excluded by the de-Baathification law. They have urged that only the two highest levels of Baath Party members be excluded, and that others who have been denied jobs should be reinstated.

Heading the commission overseeing the de-Baathification program is Chalabi, once a close ally of the Pentagon during Donald H. Rumsfeld's tenure as Defense secretary.

Satterfield, Rice's top adviser on Iraq, told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee last month that he was then optimistic that the reforms would be approved. But he said that the proposal from Chalabi's de-Baathification panel was insufficient, and did not live up to Maliki's "expansive" vision of the needed reform.

A senior administration official, speaking on condition of anonymity when discussing internal administration assessments, said in an interview that the issue was one that top U.S. officials "have been watching pretty closely."

"We've been talking to the Iraqis consistently," the senior official said. "This is critical to ensuring you have a basis to believe that that this really is a government for all Iraqis."

But at this point, the official said, "There's real concern that it's stalled."

The impasse comes only one month after Chalabi, a secular Shiite who pushed hard in 2003 to remove the Baathists, announced in a news conference in Baghdad that his panel would try to be more lenient with former party members.

Officially, the government has reversed course on the policy of purging Baath party members from the public sector. But little change has been made on the ground. Shiite political parties have only deepened their hold on the civil service and the security forces.

The government has already set about dismantling statues and renaming public spaces that celebrate Baathist causes and anniversaries. Many Sunnis see such moves as a humiliating denigration of their experiences.

In daily life, anti-Sunni remarks by well-connected Shiite prayer leaders and politicians are common. Some, such as lawmaker Sheik Jalaldin Sagheer, regularly equate Baathists with terrorists.

"We think the main problem with security is the Baathists, and we should eliminate them," Sheik Sadraldin Qabanchi, an influential Shiite cleric, told worshippers in a televised sermon from Najaf last month.

Bachmann Backs Down From Iraq Comments (MINNST)

By Eric Black

Minneapolis Star Tribune, February 24, 2007

U.S. Rep. Michele Bachmann claimed two weeks ago to know of an Iranian plan for the partition of Iraq in which Iran would control half the country and set it up as "a terrorist safe haven zone" and a staging area for attacks around the Middle East and on the United States.

The existence of such a plan has not been suggested publicly by the Bush administration or other officials.

But on Friday, after her claim was highlighted on the Star Tribune's Big Question weblog, Bachmann issued a new statement asserting her earlier comments had been "misconstrued." The second statement in effect retracted the first in several important respects.

In her original statement, made at the end of a wide-ranging Feb. 9 interview with Larry Schumacher of the St. Cloud Times, the freshman representative from Minnesota's 6th District said, "Half of Iraq, the western, northern portion of Iraq, is going to be called ... the Iraq State of Islam, something like that. And I'm sorry, I don't have the official name, but it's meant to be the training ground for the terrorists. There's already an agreement made."

The Times did not publish a story about it, but the audio of the full interview was posted on the paper's website.

Bachmann declined interviews Thursday and Friday but her statement Friday afternoon said that Iran's intentions are "difficult to ascertain" and that she was not aware of a done deal to divide Iraq and create a haven for terrorists. Rather, she said, she is concerned about the possibility that partitioning Iraq could lead to such an outcome.

Top secret, or thoughts as fact?

DOJ_NMG_0136980

University of Minnesota political scientist Kathryn Pearson, who specializes in Congress, said Bachmann's original statement was "extremely irresponsible."Members of Congress are privy to intelligence that the rest of the public isn't. So when a member of Congress says something of such significance, the first assumption is that she knows something that the public doesn't. So on that basis, people are going to take it seriously.

"Either this is top secret information that she's leaking, which is a problem. Or she's presenting her thoughts on a very serious topic as if they were established fact, and that's a problem for other reasons," Pearson said.

Washington University Prof. Steve Smith, another Congress watcher who lives in the Sixth District, said Bachmann's first statement "was a pretty strong claim to make. If she can't back it up she should be held accountable."

Smith speculated the original statement was drawn from some ideas circulating in "the neoconservative network in which she circulates."

The idea of partitioning Iraq into separate enclaves for the Shiites in the south, the Kurds in the north, and the Sunni Arabs in the middle is a policy option that has been gaining adherents recently, notably Democratic presidential candidate Sen. Joseph Biden.

The neoconservatives who have been the strongest backers of the Iraq war policy have always opposed the idea of partition, in part because they fear it will create a Shiite Iraqi state heavily influenced by Iran.

Bachmann, who has also been a strong supporter of the war policy, may have picked up a version of these worries that included the idea that Iran had already worked out a plan to capitalize on any partition.

"But it's the kind of claim she couldn't possibly get from official sources," Smith said. "So it has to be unofficial sources, but if this is the basis for her public position on the war, then she's under some obligation to name her sources."

Americans Underestimate Iraqi Death Toll (AP)

By Nancy Benac,

AP, February 24, 2007

Americans are keenly aware of how many U.S. forces have lost their lives in Iraq, according to a new AP-Ipsos poll. But they woefully underestimate the number of Iraqi civilians who have been killed.

When the poll was conducted earlier this month, a little more than 3,100 U.S. troops had been killed. The midpoint estimate among those polled was right on target, at about 3,000.

Far from a vague statistic, the death toll is painfully real for many Americans. Seventeen percent in the poll know someone who has been killed or wounded in Iraq. And among adults under 35, those closest to the ages of those deployed, 27 percent know someone who has been killed or wounded.

For Daniel Herman, a lawyer in New Castle, Pa., a co-worker's nephew is the human face of the dead.

"This is a fairly rural area," he said. "When somebody dies, ... you hear about it. It makes it very concrete to you."

The number of Iraqis killed, however, is much harder to pin down, and that uncertainty is perhaps reflected in Americans' tendency to lowball the Iraqi death toll by tens of thousands.

Iraqi civilian deaths are estimated at more than 54,000 and could be much higher; some unofficial estimates range into the hundreds of thousands. The U.N. Assistance Mission for Iraq reports more than 34,000 deaths in 2006 alone.

Among those polled for the AP survey, however, the median estimate of Iraqi deaths was 9,890. The median is the point at which half the estimates were higher and half lower.

Christopher Gelpi, a Duke University political scientist who tracks public opinion on war casualties, said a better understanding of the Iraqi death toll probably wouldn't change already negative public attitudes toward the war much. People in democracies generally don't shy away from inflicting civilian casualties, he said, and they may be even more tolerant of them in situations such as Iraq, where many of the civilian deaths are caused by other Iraqis.

"You have to look at who's doing the killing," said Neal Crawford, a restaurant manager in Suttons Bay, Mich., who guessed that about 10,000 Iraqis had been killed. "If these people are dying because a roadside bomb goes off or if there's an insurgent attack in a marketplace, it's an unfortunate circumstance of war — people die."

Gelpi said that while Americans may not view Iraqi deaths through the same prism as American losses, they may use the Iraqi death toll to gauge progress, or lack thereof, on the U.S. effort to promote a stable, secure democracy in Iraq.

To many, he said, "the fact that so many are being killed is an indication that we're not succeeding."

Whatever their understanding of the respective death tolls, three-quarters of those polled said the numbers of both Americans and Iraqis who have been killed are "unacceptable." Two-thirds said they tend to feel upset when a soldier dies, while the rest say such deaths are unfortunate but part of what war is about.

Sometimes it's hard for people to sort out their conflicting emotions.

DOJ_NMG_0136981

"I don't know if I'm numb to it or not," said 86-year-old Robert Lipold of Las Vegas. "It's something you see in the paper every day there. And how do you feel when in the back of your mind it's unnecessary?"

Given a range of possible words to describe their feelings about the overall situation in Iraq, people were most likely to identify with "worried," selected by 81 percent of those surveyed.

Other descriptive words selected by respondents:

_Compassionate: 74 percent.

_Angry: 62 percent.

_Tired: 61 percent.

_Hopeful: 51 percent.

_Proud: 38 percent.

_Numb: 27 percent.

Women were more likely than men to feel worried, compassionate, angry and tired; men were more likely than women to feel proud, a finding consistent with traditional differences in attitudes toward war between the sexes.

For women, said Gelpi, "there is an emotional response to casualties that men don't show. ... It could be some sort of socialization that men get about the military or combat as being honorable that women don't get."

Charlotte Pirch, a lawyer from Fountain Valley, Calif., said she's "always appalled and just very upset at hearing about more casualties, whether it's U.S. troops or troops from another country."

Pirch said two of her nieces are married to men who served in Iraq and she doesn't live far from Camp Pendleton, which has sent many U.S. troops to Iraq. But she added, "Whether I knew someone personally or not, I would still feel it as a citizen of our country."

Perhaps surprisingly, the poll found little difference in attitudes toward the war between those who did and did not know someone who had been killed or wounded. There was a difference, however, in their opinions on whether opponents are right to criticize the war.

About half of those who know someone who has been killed or wounded felt it is right to criticize the war, compared with two-thirds of those who don't have a personal connection.

The AP-Ipsos poll of 1,002 adults, conducted Feb. 12-15, had a 3 percentage point margin of error.

___

AP writers Natasha Metzler and Ann Sanner and AP News Survey Specialist Dennis Junius contributed to this story.

Iraq Rebuilding Short On Qualified Civilians (WP)

By Rajiv Chandrasekaran, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 24, 2007

In Diyala, the vast province northeast of Baghdad where Sunnis and Shiites are battling for primacy with mortars and nighttime abductions, the U.S. government has contracted the job of promoting democracy to a Pakistani citizen who has never lived or worked in a democracy.

The management of reconstruction projects in the province has been assigned to a Border Patrol commander with no reconstruction experience. The task of communicating with the embassy in Baghdad has been handed off to a man with no background in drafting diplomatic cables. The post of agriculture adviser has gone unfilled because the U.S. Department of Agriculture has provided just one of the six farming experts the State Department asked for a year ago.

"The people our government has sent to Iraq are all dedicated, well-meaning people, but are they really the right people -- the best people -- for the job?" asked Kiki Skagen Munshi, a retired U.S. Foreign Service officer who, until last month, headed the team in Diyala that included the Pakistani democracy educator and the Border Patrol commander. "If you can't get experts, it's really hard to do an expert job."

Almost four years after the United States set about trying to rebuild Iraq, the job remains overwhelmingly unfinished. The provincial reconstruction teams like those in Diyala are often understaffed and underqualified -- and almost unable to work outside the military outposts where they are hunkered down for security reasons. Today, there are just 10 of the 30-person teams operating in all of Iraq.

President Bush proposed last month to double the number of teams, saying such civilians are central to American efforts to "pursue reconciliation, strengthen the moderates and speed the transition to Iraqi self-reliance." But the new plan is running into what Munshi and several officials familiar with their work described as the problems that have plagued the U.S. government effort from the start: Turf wars between federal agencies. Outright refusal to fill certain vital posts by some departments. A State Department in charge of the teams that just doesn't have any agronomists, engineers, police officers or technicians of its own to send to Iraq. "No foreign service in the world has those people," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice complained.

DOJ_NMG_0136982

After Bush's new plan was announced, Rice asked the Pentagon for help filling 140 slots on the teams until State is able to hire private contractors to do the work, which could take up to a year. Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates said he was "troubled" by State's request, then grudgingly agreed. The teams are supposed to be up and running by next month.

It's time to "step up," a frustrated Bush lectured his Cabinet.

As State and the Pentagon were sparring over who would staff the reconstruction teams, Bush used his State of the Union address to call for the formation of a civilian reserve corps -- three years after the State Department first proposed it and several influential senators backed it. "It would give people across America who do not wear the uniform a chance to serve in the defining struggle of our time," the president said.

But the corps won't be built anytime soon: The administration's 2008 budget, which was sent to Congress earlier this month, includes no money for it. A senior administration official said the White House plans to wait another year before asking Congress for funding.Ambitious Plans Meet a Tight Purse

"There has been real inertia and myopia," said Sen. Richard G. Lugar (R-Ind.). "We have not really approached this in the right way."

By the fall of 2003, Lugar had grown worried about the U.S. reconstruction effort in Iraq. L. Paul Bremer, who was running the occupation government in Baghdad, had been pleading for more staffers with skills in post-conflict rebuilding -- people who could repair the electricity infrastructure, rehabilitate hospitals, retrain the police. Bremer urged Cabinet secretaries to send experts in their departments to Iraq. Some did; others blew him off. Pentagon officials, meanwhile, were recruiting young Republican Party loyalists for tours in Iraq. Many of them lacked reconstruction experience, but they were willing to work in Baghdad.

At the time, Lugar was thinking beyond Iraq. "We need to be ready for the next crisis," he told his aides.

They summoned experts in postwar rebuilding, among them James Dobbins, a Rand Corp. expert in post-conflict stabilization, and John J. Hamre, a former deputy secretary of defense. Most participants embraced the civilian reserve corps idea.

Lugar did, too, and in February 2004 he introduced a bill with Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) to create the Response Readiness Corps, its mission to stand prepared "to be called upon at a moment's notice to respond to emerging international crises."

State didn't bother waiting for the legislation to pass. Four months later, then-Secretary of State Colin L. Powell announced the formation of the State Department Office of Reconstruction and Stabilization (SCRS).

The job of running the SCRS was given to Carlos Pascual, a former ambassador to Ukraine. Pascual wanted to create a 200-person active-duty response corps, half of whom would be drawn from State and the rest from other parts of the federal government. They would serve in the corps for two years and then become reservists. In just four years, Pascual noted, the government would have 200 active reconstruction personnel and 400 reservists.

In addition, Pascual sought to create a 3,000-person contingent of people drawn from state and local governments and the private sector. That group was to include police officers, civil engineers and economists. And there would be a fund to hire and deploy private contractors to help with reconstruction within weeks of a crisis instead of waiting months for a special budget request, which is what State is now being forced to do.

The problem was the price tag: $350 million for the first year, Pascual and his staff figured.

The White House budget office balked. Pascual's request was whittled down to $100 million.

Congressional appropriators were even more skeptical. Republicans questioned whether the initiative was a priority for the White House. Democrats expressed concern that the reserve corps might encourage the administration to invade another country.

The appropriators chopped so much that in the end the SCRS got just $7 million in 2005. The message from Congress was clear: If State wanted to fund the corps, it would have to find the money elsewhere in its budget.

"The bureaucratic antibodies were immediately activated," said MichÃ¨le Flournoy, president of the Center for a New American Security. "The rest of the State Department tried to kill SCRS because it was a competitor for funds. It never had a chance to succeed."Broad Support but Little Traction

In 2006, Pascual tried again. This time, he first hit resistance in his own department.

"There was this perverse cycle that began," he recalled. "The legislative staff at State would say, 'The Hill doesn't like this, therefore we shouldn't ask for much because we're not going to get it.' Then you had the Hill saying, 'The administration hasn't made this a priority so we're not going to fund it.' "

The Pentagon was in favor of the idea. "If you don't fund this, put more money in the defense budget for ammunition -- because I'm going to need it," one Marine general warned at the time.

DOJ_NMG_0136983

Eventually, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Marine Gen. Peter Pace, persuaded Congress to allow the Pentagon to transfer up to $100 million to State for post-conflict civilian deployments. But Defense and State couldn't agree where to spend the money. Defense wanted much of it spent on stabilization operations in Haiti. State wanted to use it to help in the aftermath of last summer's war in Lebanon, officials on both sides recalled.

And then there was a round of fighting in State over which office should spend the money. Not everyone thought it belonged to the SCRS.

But the money had come with a condition: Spend it before the Pentagon could find other uses for it. By the time it was all sorted out some nine months later, the $100 million had dwindled to $10 million.

Some current and former SCRS staffers, as well as people familiar with the office, contend that Pascual should have focused his operation on helping with State's two biggest priorities: rebuilding Iraq and Afghanistan. Instead, he and Powell decided in 2004 to use the SCRS to prepare for future crises and to help with smaller-scale stabilization missions.

Pascual said the SCRS would have been "overwhelmed" if it had assumed responsibility for rebuilding Iraq or Afghanistan. "It would not have been able to have done either well," he said. "The intent was to learn from both of those missions."

But some current and former SCRS personnel believe the office should have sought to work on part of the Iraqi reconstruction -- perhaps assuming responsibility for a few provinces -- as a way to make itself more relevant. "If we had been working on Iraq instead of Haiti and Sudan, we would have had a better chance at getting the money we wanted," a State Department official said.

Had that occurred, the official said, "SCRS could have been producing many of the civilians we need in Iraq today."Little Eagerness to Work in Iraq

When Kiki Munshi started the Diyala reconstruction team last April, she expected she would have an agriculture specialist working for her. The Department of Agriculture had promised to send six farming experts to Iraq, including one to her team.

Since fruit and vegetable farming is the principal occupation in Diyala, Munshi figured she could generate support for the American presence in the restive province by helping growers increase their yields. "Knowledge is something the Iraqi farmers really need," she said.

Winning over the local population through small-scale projects was the logic behind the provincial reconstruction teams. While Washington was squabbling over whether to fund Pascual's proposed civilian reserve corps, the teams were established in Iraq last year by U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, who had pioneered the concept in Afghanistan. Before that, the U.S. government had essentially no civilian presence in Iraq beyond the Baghdad Green Zone and a handful of regional embassy outposts in four major cities. In theory, the teams would significantly increase the number of American civilians in places where they could actually help Iraqis on the ground.

But as Munshi found, that was often just a theory. Her agriculture specialist never even arrived.

The USDA had trouble finding six people who wanted to work in Iraq among its more than 100,000 employees. Although a USDA official said the department encouraged its workers to apply, officials at State believe USDA did not move with alacrity because the two agencies had not agreed on a mechanism to reimburse the USDA for the services it would provide in Iraq. Eventually, USDA and State agreed that USDA would provide just two of the six. The other four would be private contractors hired by State.

The first USDA specialist, Randy Frescoln, a rural credit specialist from Iowa, landed in Iraq in December and was sent to the reconstruction team in Tikrit. Although he was supposed to stay in Iraq for a year, he said he plans to leave next month because he received a promotion while he was away. The second specialist has not yet arrived.

Even if USDA and State were to get an agriculture expert to Diyala now, Munshi believes, it is too late. Security conditions have deteriorated so significantly in the province that reconstruction personnel are lucky to make one or two trips a week off the military base where they live and work.

"At this point, nobody can do much in Diyala because of the violence," said Munshi, who returned to her North Carolina home in January for medical reasons. "The window is closed. I wish it weren't. I hope it opens. But it is."

Maj. Gen. Eric T. Olson, who is in charge of the provincial reconstruction teams in Iraq, called Diyala a "very, very tough place to work." He added that many of the staffing problems Munshi identified are "Diyala specific."

Reconstruction teams in Iraq, he said, "are, in general, doing good things under tough circumstances."Another Effort to Build a Corps

Today, the SCRS corps that Pascual envisioned as a rapid-response force with 200 federal employees ready to deploy has just 11 people on active duty.

Lugar and Biden reintroduced their bill this week. It mandates the formation of a 250-person active-duty response unit drawn from the federal government and the creation of a 2,000-strong civilian reserve corps. It also authorizes $145 million to fund the operation.

DOJ_NMG_0136984

"Hopefully," Lugar said, "we've come to a point where we finally realize we need to do this."

Staff writer Thomas E. Ricks contributed to this report.

Army's Iraq War Objector Charged Again (AP)

By Gene Johnson,

AP, February 24, 2007

The Army refiled charges Friday against a lieutenant who refused to serve in Iraq, about two weeks after his first court-martial was declared a mistrial.

First Lt. Ehren Watada, 28, who refused to deploy with his unit last June, faces the same allegations he initially faced — missing movement and conduct unbecoming an officer — and could be sentenced to a dishonorable discharge and six years in prison if convicted. The Army has not set a date for a second court-martial.

"We're back to square one," Fort Lewis spokeswoman Leslie Kaye said.

Watada's first trial began early this month but ended abruptly when the judge, Lt. Col. John Head, said he did not believe the soldier fully understood a pretrial agreement he signed admitting elements of the charges. As part of that agreement, the Army dropped two of the charges against him, lowering his potential sentence to four years.

Watada's attorney, Eric Seitz, said he would seek to have the charges dismissed as a violation of the Constitution's protection against double jeopardy.

"When it's not going well for you, you can't just call a mistrial and start over again," Seitz said. "No matter how much lip service they give to wanting to protect my client's rights, that just doesn't exist in the military courts."

Fort Lewis spokesman Joseph Piek said double jeopardy did not apply in this case because the first trial was never completed.

Watada faces one charge of missing movement and another of conduct unbecoming of an officer. The latter charge accuses him in four instances of making public statements criticizing the war or President Bush.

Watada freely admitted missing the deployment and making the statements in the pretrial agreement. Before the mistrial was declared, he had planned to take the witness stand to argue that his motives were to avoid committing war crimes by participating in an illegal war.

Iraq Objector Faces Another Court-martial (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 24, 2007

The Army refiled charges at Ft. Lewis against a lieutenant who refused to serve in Iraq. His first court-martial was declared a mistrial.

First Lt. Ehren Watada, 28, who refused to deploy with his unit in June, faces the same allegations he initially faced — missing movement and conduct unbecoming an officer — and could be sentenced to a dishonorable discharge and six years in prison if convicted. The Army has not set a date for the second court-martial.

Watada's first trial began early this month but ended abruptly when the judge, Lt. Col. John Head, said he did not believe that Watada fully understood an agreement he had signed admitting elements of the charges.

'Cry God For Harry!' (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 24, 2007

An English prince, still in his 20s, whose youth was famously spent in bad company and who sometimes goes by the name of Harry, takes his soldiers to war and finds his place in history and legend after an improbable victory over a foreign foe. No, Cornet Harry Wales is probably not a latter-day King Henry V. But it's hard not to be struck by the sight of a European royal who wants something more from life than to appear regularly in the pages of Hello!

The news is that Prince Charles's younger son, Harry, a junior officer in the Household Cavalry, will later this year deploy to southern Iraq even as the British government begins withdrawing some of its troops. "There's no way I'm going to put myself through Sandhurst [military academy], and then sit on my arse back home while my boys are out fighting for their country," he told one interviewer. The Prince's decision is all the more courageous given that he will surely become a prime target for jihadists seeking a trophy kill.

No less admirable is the Prince bucking the antiwar tide of British public opinion. A cartoon in the Guardian newspaper has him sitting backward in the saddle, his sword raised under the caption "Into the Valley of Death." That may typify the views of London's fashionable Islington set. But we suspect that most Britons, even those who oppose the war, will find reason to admire a young man who grasps that the essence of monarchy -- and its best justification -- lies not in its titles and luxuries but in its sense of duty, loyalty and honor.

DOJ_NMG_0136985

More Troops Headed To Afghanistan (WT/AP)

By Courtney French, Associated Press

The Washington Times, February 24, 2007

LONDON -- Britain said yesterday it would send additional troops to southern Afghanistan in response to NATO's call to bolster forces in the region, days after the country said it plans to withdraw 1,600 troops from Iraq in coming months.

Defense Minister Des Browne confirmed the deployment in a statement late yesterday.

"We have decided that it is right for the UK to provide some additional forces for the southern region," Mr. Browne said, adding he would announce full details in Parliament on Monday.

The Defense Ministry refused to confirm reports in the British press that an additional 1,000 troops were to be sent.

Mr. Brown said the government made the decision after a NATO defense ministers meeting last week in Seville, Spain, where the alliance asked countries to send more troops.

"NATO must respond to this request, or we will put at risk everything we have achieved across Afghanistan in the last five years," he said.

"We have been trying hard to get other nations to live up to the joint commitment NATO made to Afghanistan and provide more forces, forces which are authorized to fight. We will continue to press. But we must be realistic," he said.

On Wednesday, Prime Minister Tony Blair told lawmakers that Britain will be withdrawing 1,600 of its troops from Iraq in the next few months and hopes to make other cuts to its 7,100-strong contingent by late summer.

Britain has more than 5,000 troops in Afghanistan, concentrated in the southern part of the country -- a former Taliban stronghold where the government wields little power. In all, NATO has about 35,000 troops in and around Afghanistan.

NATO issued a statement earlier this week that the Taliban is planning to increase suicide and roadside bomb attacks in the south and west.

A senior Taliban commander told a news agency yesterday that new weapons have strengthened the militia.

"This year will prove to be the bloodiest for the foreign troops. It is not just a threat, we will prove it," Mullah Dadullah said by satellite phone. "The Taliban's war preparations are going on in caves and in mountains. Our 6,000 fighters are ready for attacks on foreign troops after the change in weather and as it becomes warmer."

Mullah Dadullah said the extra weapons the Taliban were being supplied -- he did not say from where -- included the ability to bring down the NATO and U.S. helicopters crucial to their operations in this rugged, mountainous country.

Several European nations have resisted pressure to send more units to Afghanistan, especially to the south and east. In particular, the reluctance of France, Spain, Italy, Germany and Turkey to provide more combat troops has caused frustration among nations on the front lines. The United States, Britain, Canada and the Netherlands have provided most of the troops in the south.

New Al Qaeda Video Claims Attack In Afghanistan (AP)

AP, February 23, 2007

CAIRO, Egypt (AP) -- Al Qaeda posted a 56-second video Friday of rockets being fired at what it claimed was a U.S. military base in Afghanistan.

The tape appeared to be the latest in a series of videos that the terror network has released to convey that its insurgents are faring well in the Afghan war.

The base was not visible in the video, which showed several rockets being launched from a forested hillside in the Balwara area of Afghanistan in November, according to a subtitle.

The video, which opened with old footage of U.S. vehicles exploding as they were hit, surfaced on an Internet site where al Qaeda and other militant groups are known to post messages. Its authenticity could not be independently confirmed.

The pictures were accompanied by a song whose lyrics included the line: "Burn the Christians, fight the devious Christians who worship crosses."

The tape shows four missiles streaking into the sky from a single-tube launcher that is held down by sandbags and rocks. Two bearded young fighters squat next to the launcher, operating it in a perfectly relaxed way. One wears a dark-blue woolen hat, the other is bareheaded.

A third man, with a light brown scarf loosely wrapped around his head, stands and points across a valley, presumably at the target. A long aerial protrudes from his off-camera side as if he is holding a walkie-talkie.

Shouts of "Allahu Akbar," God is great in Arabic, are heard as the rockets are fired.

There is no sign of the four missiles hitting anything. The tape does not show them land.

DOJ_NMG_0136986

The tape is titled "Holocaust of the Americans in the land of Khorasan, the Islamic emirate." Khorasan, a name from the Persian empire, is the militant word for Afghanistan. The subtitle says: "Launching, BM missiles on an American base in Balwara."

The tape bears the logo of As-Sahab, al Qaeda's media production wing.

A U.S. company that tracks militant statements, IntelCenter, said the video was the eighth that al Qaeda has released so far this month, making February 2007 the second busiest month for video issued by the terror network. In June 2006 al Qaeda released 11 videos, IntelCenter said.

On February 16 al Qaeda posted a video, also titled "Holocaust of the Americans in the land of Khorasan, the Islamic emirate," which purported to show a successful attack on a military position held by U.S. and Afghan forces.

However, the video did not show the insurgents capturing the position and a NATO spokeswoman in Kabul called it "pure propaganda."

Afghans See Decline Since '05 (WP)

By Griff Witte, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, February 24, 2007

Violence, Corruption, U.S. Role Add to Unease, Report Says

Conditions in Afghanistan have deteriorated markedly since 2005, with rising violence, government corruption and misguided U.S. efforts contributing to growing unease among the population, according to a report released yesterday based in part on 1,000 interviews with ordinary Afghans.

Although there were bright spots -- a better overall economy and more rights for women -- the report's authors found diminishing security as the Taliban steps up its attacks, a discredited justice system and a severe lack of basic services such as electricity. The report, produced by the nonpartisan Center for Strategic and International Studies and funded in part by a grant from the U.S. Agency for International Development, also found that Afghans tend to be more negative in their outlook than official statistics or media accounts would suggest.

"Public fear and frustration are on the rise in Afghanistan. As a result, Afghans are beginning to disengage from national governing processes and lose confidence in their leadership," according to the report. "Dramatic changes are required in the coming weeks, or 2007 will become the breaking point."

That statement echoed remarks made earlier this month by the departing U.S. commander in Afghanistan, Lt. Gen. Karl W. Eikenberry, who told a congressional panel that "a point could be reached at which the government of Afghanistan becomes irrelevant to its people, and the goal of establishing a democratic, moderate, self-sustaining state could be lost forever."

A year ago, U.S. officials were speaking much more optimistically about Afghanistan. But an especially violent summer, fed by an increasingly aggressive insurgency, has convinced many policymakers that Afghanistan is at a precarious moment more than five years after a U.S.-led military campaign knocked the Taliban from power. Last week, President Bush pledged $11.8 billion in aid for Afghanistan over the next two years and said U.S. forces would be increased by 3,200 to 27,000, the highest level of the war.

Among the report's recommendations are to shift the focus away from eradicating poppy fields and toward interdiction, to give local communities more control over aid money, and to abandon major military sweeps that inflict damage on civilians in favor of rapid-response forces that can protect Afghans in emergencies. "NATO and the United States' 'big army' military operations and emphasis on foot soldier 'kills' are doing more damage than good," the report said.

Lt. Col. Todd Vician, a Pentagon spokesman, said he could not comment on the report's recommendations because he had not seen them, but he said part of the reason the United States is committing more troops to Afghanistan is to improve response times. Britain said yesterday it would also be sending additional troops.

DOJ:

Justice Department Fires 8th U.S. Attorney (WP)

By Dan Eggen, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 24, 2007

Dispute Over Death Penalty Cited

An eighth U.S. attorney announced her resignation yesterday, the latest in a wave of forced departures of federal prosecutors who have clashed with the Justice Department over the death penalty and other issues.

DOJ_NMG_0136987

Margaret Chiara, the 63-year-old U.S. attorney in Grand Rapids, Mich., told her staff that she was leaving her post after more than five years, officials said. Sources familiar with the case confirmed that she was among a larger group of prosecutors who were first asked to resign Dec. 7.

Chiara is the second female U.S. attorney to be dismissed. The other is Carol Lam of San Diego. Before the firings, 15 of 93 U.S. attorneys were women, department records show.

The firings have been criticized by lawmakers in both parties and have prompted proposals in Congress to restrict the ability of Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to appoint interim prosecutors indefinitely.

Chiara declined to comment on her departure, which is effective March 16. She will be replaced on an interim basis by Russell C. Stoddard, who recently joined the Grand Rapids office, officials said.

U.S. District Judge Robert Holmes Bell, the chief judge in Michigan's Western District, said in an interview yesterday that Chiara has an excellent reputation in Grand Rapids.

"This is a very classy, distinguished, highly regarded public servant," said Bell, who was appointed to the bench during the Reagan administration. "She's one of the best United States attorneys we've had in this district, and all of my colleagues agree. . . . To have her suddenly disappear without warning catches us all flat-footed."

Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty told senators earlier this month that all but one of the prosecutors were fired for "performance-related" reasons. McNulty said that former U.S. attorney Bud Cummins of Little Rock was removed so the job could be given to a former aide to presidential adviser Karl Rove.

Nearly all of the dismissed prosecutors had positive job reviews, but many had run into political trouble with Washington over immigration, capital punishment or other issues, according to prosecutors and others. At least four also were presiding over high-profile public corruption investigations when they were dismissed.

Chiara -- who had once studied to be a nun -- is personally opposed to capital punishment, but in 2002 she presided over the first death penalty case in Michigan in more than 60 years. A year later, then-Attorney General John D. Ashcroft rejected a plea agreement proposed by Chiara's office in a separate murder case, according to news reports.

Another of the fired U.S. attorneys, Paul K. Charlton of Phoenix, also clashed with Washington over the death penalty.

Justice officials have been evasive about the number of fired prosecutors. McNulty told the Senate Judiciary Committee that fewer than 10 had been dismissed, but he declined to elaborate.

Staff researcher Julie Tate contributed to this report.

Eighth U.S. Attorney Dismissed From Post (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 23 — A United States attorney in Grand Rapids, Mich., is leaving her job, the eighth federal prosecutor to be removed in a Justice Department shake-up of prosecutors, government officials said Friday.

The prosecutor, Margaret M. Chiara, told her staff that she would leave office on March 16, making her the latest casualty of Justice Department dismissals that Democrats in Congress have criticized as politically motivated.

Like the other ousted prosecutors, Ms. Chiara is a Republican. She took office in 2001 after twice being elected a county prosecutor. She had also served as policy director of the Michigan Supreme Court. Her office has said that she has emphasized reducing gun violence and improving law enforcement programs for American Indians.

Justice Department officials declined to comment on Ms. Chiara's removal, which was first reported on Friday by The Grand Rapids Press. A telephone call to her office was not returned, but other officials confirmed that she had been asked to leave.

Senator Charles E. Schumer, a New York Democrat who has criticized the removals, said he would seek a fuller explanation of the administration's actions in a public hearing and at private briefings.

Some Justice Department officials have said that most of the dismissals were intended to correct performance problems. But most of the ousted prosecutors have said they received highly favorable performance evaluations and were given no reason for their removal.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former KB Officials Face U.S. Backdating Probe (WSJ)

By Charles Forelle And Michael Corkery

The Wall Street Journal, February 24, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0136988

Federal prosecutors in Los Angeles are scrutinizing stock-options backdating at home builder KB Home, according to people familiar with the matter. These people say prosecutors appear interested in the conduct of former Chief Executive Officer Bruce Karatz and former human-resources chief Gary Ray.

A lawyer for Mr. Ray, Mark Beck, says he is "attempting to persuade [the prosecutor] that Gary Ray did not engage in any wrongdoing and certainly no conscious wrongdoing." A spokesman for Mr. Karatz declined to comment.

MORE ON OPTIONS

· Options Scorecard: Companies under scrutiny1

· Perfect Payday: Complete coverage2

It isn't clear precisely what the prosecutors are examining. Last year the Los Angeles-based company said an internal investigation found that Mr. Karatz had backdated his own option grants to increase his pay. He agreed to leave the company and forfeit about $13 million in gains from the backdating, becoming one of the highest-profile and best-paid CEOs to be forced out in the options scandal. Mr. Ray, whom KB Home has said participated in the backdating with Mr. Karatz, also left.

Company spokeswoman Caroline Shaw said the Department of Justice is looking into past stock-option grant practices at KB Home, but has told the company itself that it is "not a target of this investigation." She added, "KB Home has and intends to fully cooperate with any government agency looking into this matter."

KB Home, one of several dozen companies being examined by prosecutors in districts across the country, disclosed earlier this year that it was the subject of a formal investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission, a type of probe in which the agency's staff has the authority to issue subpoenas.

Federal authorities are examining whether stock options at roughly 140 companies were backdated -- a practice that increases the potential profit a recipient makes from the options. Backdating can lead to accounting errors, tax problems and, in serious cases, criminal fraud charges. Seven former executives of four companies so far have been charged with crimes related to backdating.

Earlier this month, KB Home restated seven years of financials, reducing its profit by $41.1 million over the period to account for the backdated options and related taxes.

A spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office in Los Angeles declined to comment.

Write to Charles Forelle at charles.forelle@wsj.com3 and Michael Corkery at michael.corkery@wsj.com4

DOJ Launches KB Home Stock Options Probe (AP)

AP, February 24, 2007

Justice Department Launches Probe Into the Handling of Stock Options at KB Home

LOS ANGELES (AP) -- The Department of Justice has launched a probe into the handling of stock options at KB Home, one of the nation's largest homebuilders, although it is not targeting the company directly, KB Home said Friday. As part of its inquiry, the Justice Department is interviewing current and former executives of KB Home, a company spokesman said.

The company last month acknowledged that the Securities and Exchange Commission had launched a formal investigation into its options practices.

Justice also is "looking into these practices but has informed KB Home that it is not a target of this investigation," according to a company release. "KB Home has and intends to fully cooperate with any government agency looking into this matter."

KB Home is one of at least 200 companies to disclose SEC, DOJ or internal investigations, according to an Associated Press review.

KB Home's former chief executive Bruce Karatz, along with its executive vice president and chief legal officer, were forced to step down late last year after it was disclosed that Karatz benefited from favorably dated option awards. He agreed to repay $13 million stemming from incorrect measurement dates for financial reporting of annual option grants between 1998 and 2005.

The company also has said it expects to record additional expenses of no more than $50 million and was investigating whether it needed to restate earnings for prior periods.

Shares of KB Home added 20 cents to $51.80 in aftermarket activity after slipping 96 cents to end at $51.60 on the New York Stock Exchange.

New Inquiry On Options At KB Home (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

The United States attorney's office in Los Angeles is looking into stock-option backdating at KB Home, the national home builder, but the company said yesterday that it was not the target of the investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0136989

The inquiry appears to be in the early stages, and it may take months before prosecutors decide what, if any, charges they will bring in the case.

Still, news of interest by federal prosecutors raises the stakes for a man who was once one of the highest-profile and best-paid executives in corporate America, Bruce E. Karatz.

In November, KB's board forced out Mr. Karatz, who was the chairman and chief executive of the company, and Gary A. Ray, the top human resources officer, after an internal investigation concluded that eight stock-option grants since 1998 had been incorrectly dated.

Mr. Karatz's lawyer, John W. Keker, declined to comment yesterday on the case.

A lawyer representing Mr. Ray, Mark E. Beck, confirmed that he and his client have met with prosecutors but declined to discuss the facts of the case, aside from saying that "several million documents" would lead officials to "conclude that he did not engage in any wrongdoing."

KB Home said in a filing this month that the evidence it had collected suggested that after the company's board approved stock option grants, Mr. Karatz and Mr. Ray used "hindsight" to pick dates when KB's stock closed at or near a monthly low for seven of the eight grants.

KB estimates that the dates chosen understated the company's stock options expense by $36.3 million from 1999 through 2005 and lowered its tax bill by $4.8 million.

The choice of dates for stock options is significant because it sets the base price at which executives and employees are allowed to buy shares of their companies at some point in the future. A low price makes it more likely that option holders will make a profit, potentially a very large one for top executives, when they sell the stock.

Though the practice of backdating stock options is not illegal, it can pose complex tax, accounting and disclosure problems for companies and executives. More than 100 companies, including giants like Apple Inc. and UnitedHealth Group, have been ensnarled in stock-option backdating cases.

So far, most have drawn only civil investigations by the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Internal Revenue Service. Federal prosecutors have become involved in only a handful of cases, because to prove criminal charges in options backdating, they must show that executives intended to enrich themselves illegally at the expense of other shareholders. That often involves showing a pattern of egregious behavior that can include the destruction or forging of documents and lying to directors.

Shares of KB Home fell 96 cents, or 1.8 percent, to $51.60 yesterday.

In 2005, a year when KB's stock rose 39.2 percent, Mr. Karatz reaped gains of $118 million in stock options and $37 million in salary and bonus, much of which was also awarded in stock. As part of an agreement he reached with the company when he resigned in November, Mr. Karatz agreed to return $13 million in profits from backdated options.

KB and Mr. Karatz, however, have not resolved several important terms of his departure from the company, including whether he will receive retirement benefits and a severance package. In addition, the two sides have not decided if Mr. Karatz will be allowed to keep unexercised stock options and past restricted-stock grants.

SEC Probe Into Citigroup Associates Deal (FT)

By David Wighton In New York

Financial Times, February 24, 2007

Citigroup is under investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission over its accounting for Associates First Capital, the finance business it bought for $31.1bn in 2000.

The chief US regulator is looking into the treatment of tax reserves and releases during the four years to 2004, Citigroup disclosed in a filing on Friday night.

The SEC has subpoenaed witness testimony and accounting and internal controls-related information, the company said.

The SEC is also continuing its long-running probe into Citigroup's treatment of potential Argentina-related losses in the fourth quarter of 2001.

The disclosure of the accouting investigation in Associates underlines the task faced by Chuck Prince, chief executive, in escaping the legacy of Citigroup's acitivities during the bull market.

Mr Prince, who succeeded Sandy Weill as chief executive in October 2003, has spent much of his time dealing with legal and regulatory problems dating back to the late 1990s.

Friday's disclosure comes as Mr Prince's leadership is under renewed fire following his sacking of Todd Thomson as head of Citigroup's wealth managment arm.

People close to Mr Prince said Mr Thomson was sacked partly due to his mishandling of his friendship with Maria Bartiromo, the CNBC business reporter.

DOJ_NMG_0136990

Mr Thomson, who became chief financial officer shortly before the Associates deal in 2000, held the post until 2004. He was seen as a potential successor to Mr Prince with whom he had repeatedly clashed. His removal prompted criticism of the lack of a perceived lack of management depth within the group and in particular the lack of potential successors to Mr Prince.

A number of senior executives have left the group since Mr Prince became chief executive amid criticism of his management style. Mr Prince has also been under intense pressure to boost Citigroup's sluggish stock price and stem rising costs.

The accounting investigation into Associates is the latest blow dealt by the acquisition of the controversial business which was one of the US's largest "subprime" lenders.

At the time, Mr Weill said that Associates had "an incredible growth rate" which justified the 50 per cent acquisition premium. But in his recent autobiography, Mr Weill described the deal as "one of the worst acquisitions of my career".

The business came under fire from consumers and regulators and in 2002, Citigroup agreed to pay $215m to settle Federal Trade Commission allegaitons of deceptive and abusive lending practices.

Citigroup also suffered serious headaches in Japan where the business ran into trouble quickly after the acquisition when the government cut the maximum interest rate on consumer loans from 40 per cent to 29.2 per cent. This year the government cut the rate again to 20 per cent prompting Citigroup to announce a drastic scaling back of the business at a cost of $415m.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Mrs. Moonda Asks To Remove Death Penalty From Case (PPG)

By Milan Simonich, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, February 24, 2007

Lawyers for murder suspect Donna Moonda today asked a judge to prohibit the federal government from pursuing the death penalty against her.

Her attorneys said capital punishment is "cruel and unusual in all cases" and should not be an option for jurors when Mrs. Moonda goes on trial in June.

Today was the deadline for pretrial motions to be filed, and Mrs. Moonda's three court-appointed lawyers peppered U.S. District Judge David Dowd with three separate filings aimed at eliminating the death penalty from the case.

Federal prosecutors have until March 15 to respond. Judge Dowd would then issue his ruling.

Prosecutors recommended that Mrs. Moonda, 47, of Mercer County, Pa., stand trial for her life because they say she coldly plotted the murder of her husband, Dr. Gulam Moonda.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales made the final decision in authorizing a capital case against Mrs. Moonda.

Damian Bradford, who was having an affair with Mrs. Moonda, has admitted that he shot and killed Dr. Gulam Moonda on the Ohio Turnpike in May 2005. He said he killed the doctor at Donna Moonda's behest.

Mr. Bradford, 25, said she promised him half of her inheritance, which she estimated at $3 million to $6 million. Dr. Moonda, 69, was a wealthy urologist.

At trial in Akron, Ohio, Mr. Bradford is to be the prosecution's chief witness against Mrs. Moonda. In return for his cooperation, the government has recommended that he serve 17 years in prison. With good time, he could go free before he turns 40.

Mrs. Moonda, though, faces life in prison or death if she is convicted. With today's motions, her lawyers hoped to emphasize that the man who pulled the trigger could get out of prison someday, but the woman accused of arranging the crime could be put to death.

The U.S. government has not executed a female convict since 1953. State governments, mostly in the South, have executed 11 women since 1984.

Suspect Sketch Issued (WHEELPI)

By Gabe Wells

Wheeling (WV) Post-Intelligencer, February 24, 2007

Artist's rendering of the suspect in the rape/abduction investigation.

WHEELING — A rendering of the man accused in the recent rape and abduction of a city girl has been released as the Federal Bureau of Investigation intensifies its efforts in the case.

FBI Supervisory Senior Resident Agent Mark Wheeler on Friday said a command post has been established in the basement of the City-County Building to accommodate the 50 city, county and federal law enforcement officers investigating the

DOJ_NMG_0136991

Tuesday rape and abduction of a North Wheeling girl. In addition to the release of the suspect's sketch, an updated description of the suspect's vehicle also has been released.

Wheeling police Lt. Gary Gaus said a number of registered sex offenders in the area already have been ruled out as suspects, but he would not comment on whether DNA evidence has been collected in the case. Gaus said progress is being made.

"We are learning new things every day," he said.

The victim, who turned 12 years old the day after the abduction, was taken at about 8:40 p.m. Tuesday in the 400 block of Kenney Street between Main and Market streets by an abductor who was not wearing clothes.

The girl was grabbed from behind and forced into a pickup truck.

The victim was walking with a friend, and that friend ran home and told her mother what had happened. That friend's mother called police. The abductor released the girl in Bridgeport near the the Kirkwood Presbyterian Church on Bennett Street.

Police now believe the suspect was also involved in an abduction attempt around 9 p.m. Sunday on Hughes Avenue in the south end of Martins Ferry.

Those with information in the case are asked to call 800-CALL-FBI (800-225-5324) or they can visit the Internet Web site at www.FBI.gov.

Russo, Former OB Mayor, Gets 10 Years (MR)

By Brendan Kirby, Staff Reporter

Mobile Press-Register (AL), February 24, 2007

Decrying the corrosive effect of public corruption, a federal judge in Mobile on Friday sentenced former Orange Beach Mayor Steve Russo to 10 years in prison for a wide-ranging conspiracy to enrich himself by influencing development projects.

U.S. District Judge Kristi DuBose also gave former Orange Beach City Attorney Larry Sutley, 58, two years and three months for his role in the conspiracy but allowed him to remain free while he appeals the case.

DuBose allowed Russo to remain free until the U.S. Bureau of Prisons determines in which facility he will serve his sentence.

Butler said that generally takes about two or three months. At that point, the 45-year-old Birmingham native will have to turn himself in.

Prior to their sentencings both men addressed DuBose.

Russo indicated that he regretted not testifying during his trial and said he spent the time since then searching fruitlessly for "magic words" that would show the judge who Russo is beyond the allegations he faced in her

courtroom.

"For eight years I did my dead-level best to make decisions for thousands of people in my community of Orange Beach," Russo said. "No matter what happens here today, your honor, I'll walk out of here knowing that I did the very best for the city of Orange Beach."

Sutley said he rehearsed his speech each night when he woke in the wee hours. He maintained that he never "knowingly or willingly participated in any criminal activity."

"I have gotten an education in this. It's been very expensive, but an education it has been," Sutley told DuBose. "Whatever your sentence is, I'll have to live with it."

Less than minimum in guidelines

Both sentences were less than the minimum called for under advisory sentencing guidelines and far less than the recommendation by prosecutors, who sought maximum penalties under those guidelines.

Russo, who was up first in the 3½-hour hearing, stared stoically as DuBose announced his sentence. Her words prompted audible crying from Russo's mother and some other supporters.

Russo also received support from his wife, Crystal Russo, who had received special permission to attend the hearing despite the home confinement sentence she is serving in connection with the case.

In imposing Steve Russo's punishment, which also included three years of supervised release following his prison term and a $75,000 fine, DuBose rejected the ex-mayor's insistence that the allegations against him do not reflect his true character.

"The conduct for which you've been convicted may not define you. But nevertheless it has been sufficiently proven," DuBose said. "It is part of your history. It is now part of who you are."

Assistant U.S. Attorney Steven Butler, who served as lead prosecutor, described the stakes of DuBose's sentencing decision in sweeping terms.

DOJ_NMG_0136992

"Can you imagine if every public official in the country did what this defendant did? Our republic would go the way of the Roman Empire," Butler said. "It would implode in the blink of an eye."

Sentencing guideline range

The guideline range determined by DuBose started at 12 years and seven months and ended at 15 years and eight months.

It was so high, in part, because of DuBose's finding that Russo's illegal take from various land deals and kickbacks orchestrated by developer Jim Brown amounted to more than $657,000.

Although DuBose said she felt that a prison term within the guidelines was excessive, she also expressed her desire to deter other political leaders.

"Public corruption of this type has to be addressed or it would mean the demise of our democracy," she said.

Although less than the guideline minimum, Russo's 10-year sentence is among the longest in decades for a public corruption case in southern Alabama. Several officials in the 1970s and 1980s got longer sentences, but that was before the federal government abolished parole, and those defendants served less time.

Like other federal prisoners, Russo will be eligible for a 15 percent reduction in his sentence for good behavior. Barring a successful appeal, though, he will not qualify for early release.

Butler said the longer sentence for Russo is due in part to stiffer sentencing guidelines, which have been made more severe since 2004, when former Mobile County Commissioner Freeman Jockisch was sentenced to two years and nine months for lying on tax returns and ethics forms.

Lawyers for Russo and Sutley both indicated they would appeal their clients' convictions to the Atlanta-based 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. Butler objected to the sentences on "reasonableness" grounds since they were shorter than punishment prescribed by the advisory guidelines, but he declined to say whether his office also would appeal.

The U.S. Attorney's Office has appealed the year-and-a-day sentence that another of Russo's co-defendants, Ken Wall, received.

Butler urged DuBose to send a message with a stiff sentence and a $175,000 fine for Sutley, whom he accused of using his position with the city of Orange Beach to hide the illicit relationship between Russo and Brown.

"He did the worst thing any attorney can do," Butler said. "He thumbed his nose at the oath he took when he became a lawyer."

He called Sutley and Russo "tightly wound political cronies and confidants."

But DuBose questioned whether Butler's theory of the case fit the facts and also said she believes Sutley's actions represented "extremely aberrant behavior" given his long years of exemplary service in south Baldwin County.

But she said she was particularly troubled by Sutley's attempts to hide assets that the government targeted for forfeiture after he was named in the original indictment.

Brown cut deal, then testified

Before the trial in the summer, prosecutors cut a deal with Brown, who pleaded guilty to corruption charges and then testified that for years he provided favors for Russo that included free work on Russo's house in exchange for the mayor's help getting controversial development projects approved by the City Council.

A jury in September convicted Russo and Sutley of forming a secret partnership with Brown to buy a Gulf Shores beach house, with Brown putting up all of the money. At another point, Brown testified, he helped Russo buy a property off of Wolf Bay using none of the mayor's own money and then sell it for a $400,000 profit later the same day. At the time, Brown and business partner Wall were trying to get approval for a condo and retail project in the city.

The jury also found that Russo misused campaign contributions for personal expenses, accepted a $10,000 kickback in exchange for a contract related to hurricane debris removal and benefited from Brown's maneuvering to get a potential rival of Russo to move out of the city rather than challenge the mayor for re-election.

Russo, Sutley and Brown face an April 2 trial date in Baldwin County Circuit Court on similar state charges. Assistant Attorney General H. Clay Barnett III said the federal sentences will not impact that case.

"The only thing that will have an impact on a trial is a guilty plea at the state level," he said.

(Staff Reporter Ryan Dezember contributed to this report.)

Former Orange Beach Mayor Gets 10-year Sentence (BSH)

By Garry Mitchell

Biloxi Sun Herald, February 24, 2007

MOBILE, Ala. - A federal judge Friday sentenced former Orange Beach Mayor Steve Russo to 10 years in prison for a corruption scheme involving land deals in the beach resort.

U.S. District Judge Kristi DuBose also sentenced former Orange Beach City Attorney Larry Sutley to two years and three months in prison and a $50,000 fine for his part in the scheme. But DuBose said she expects Sutley's conviction may be reversed on appeal.

Russo was convicted in September of conspiracy, mail and wire fraud charges. He could have been sentenced to more than 15 years. Sutley was facing a maximum 10 years under the government's sentencing guidelines.

DuBose said the sentence she imposed on Russo "has to be an example to other elected officials" about corruption in public office. Russo also was fined $75,000.

Russo showed no remorse during the three-hour hearing.

"I can walk out of here knowing I did the very best job for the people of Orange Beach I could do," he told the judge.

He also said he has "regained my knowledge of what's important in life."

After hearing Russo's comments to the judge, Assistant U.S. Attorney Steven Butler said Russo did do some good things while in office.

"That's what he was elected to do," Butler said.

But he said he also used his "official power to get rich."

Developer Tim James of Greenville, whose firm built the toll bridge into Orange Beach, testified at the sentencing hearing on behalf of Russo and Sutley, saying he had never heard anyone say either of them was "on the take."

"It's a shame what's happened here today," said James, the son of former Gov. Fob James.

He said the two had worked for the benefit of Orange Beach, but he did not know them personally.

Russo was first elected to the City Council in 1996 and then mayor in a special election in 1998. He served eight years as mayor before being forced to resign because of his conviction.

He maintained his innocence and did not testify at his trial.

Federal prosecutors accused Russo of scheming with two beach developers - Jim Brown and Ken Wall.

Butler described it as a "myriad kickback" scheme that included "corrupt land deals."

In determining the sentence, the judge estimated the amount of potential gain at $657,915, but said it was hard to put a value on it because it involved future property sales.

Brown pleaded guilty in June to bribing Russo in order to curry favor at City Hall. Wall was charged for his role in separate schemes to enrich the mayor.

DuBose allowed Sutley to be released on appeal bond and told attorneys that his case involved a "close question' that could lead to a reversal of his conviction.

"There was no evidence he received any bribe or paid any bribe," the judge said. She said Sutley, however, did obstruct justice.

"He failed when he should have given notice of conflict of interest," DuBose said. She said Sutley was not an "equal" to Russo in the scheme.

Sutley told the judge he had never "knowingly violated the trust of a client," including the city of Orange Beach.

Fairhope accountant Doug Montgomery testified for Sutley, telling the judge that his lifelong friend is "all law" and wouldn't be part of criminal activity.

The judge received about 58 letters on Sutley's behalf, noting that he's lived "an exemplary life."

Russo will allowed to report to prison on his own, but that reporting date was not set Friday.

Earlier this week, Russo was given two years probation after pleading guilty in Baldwin County to a state marijuana possession charge. The state drug charges will be dropped if he stays out of trouble for two years.

Ex-official Convicted In Bribery Case (MH)

By Cammy Clark

The Miami Herald, February 24, 2007

KEY WEST - James Hendrick, one of the brightest and most influential attorneys in Monroe County, was convicted Friday in federal court of obstructing justice and witness tampering in a wide-ranging, years-long Keys corruption case that might not be over.

Hendrick stood still after the 12-member jury convicted him on all four federal charges stemming from his role in an attempted coverup of a bribery scheme involving a Marathon hotel project.

His conviction came without the testimony of his one-time friend, former county Mayor Jack London, who died before trial. He had admitted that Hendrick helped steer a bribe to him with the help of lobbyist Randall Hilliard, known as ``the Prince of Darkness."

In the background of the three-week trial was an even more colorful character: Pritam Singh, a one-time hippie who became a Sikh and then a major developer. Never charged with a crime, Singh was mentioned in closing arguments by prosecutor Brenda Morris, who referred to him as Hendrick's ``cash cow."

Hendrick, 59, faces a maximum of five years' imprisonment for conspiracy to obstruct justice and 10 years for two counts of witness tampering and one count of obstruction of justice. Sentencing is set for May 4 in Miami by U.S. District Judge Shelby Highsmith.

Hendrick will appeal, said his wife, Vera Vasek.

"Jim still believes he's innocent and will continue on with every step along the way to prove his innocence," Vasek said.

The case stems from a lengthy FBI investigation that uncovered a $29,000 bribe paid in 1997 to London, Monroe County's mayor at the time. In return for the bribe, London used his influence to win zoning approval for a stalled 79-room hotel project called Hall's Resort. Hendrick received no money in the deal.

By the time the FBI had evidence of the bribe, the five-year federal statute of limitations for bribery had expired.

CONSULTANT'S ROLE

But the feds pursued what they could and won the cooperation of political consultant Randall Hilliard, who paid the bribe after collecting $82,500 in fees from developer Marvin Rappaport, and testified with immunity that the bribe was orchestrated by London and Hendrick, a partner at the time in a high-powered law firm with U.S. Magistrate Judge Hugh Morgan.

While cooperating with the federal government, Hilliard recorded phone conservations and in-person meetings with Hendrick, including at Singh's 50th birthday party in Vermont.

In one of his most self-incriminating statements, Hendrick told Hilliard: ``I'm sure no one would counsel me to sit here and talk with you because it would be considered witness tampering."

Hilliard also testified that Hendrick helped concoct untrue "legitimate business" explanations for the $29,000 that London used to pay a house lien in Ireland. London pleaded guilty to tax evasion for not reporting the $29,000. But he was given immunity for three counts of lying to prosecutors in exchange for his testimony against Hendrick -- his former best friend for nearly three decades.

London died suddenly in November. That left Hilliard as a key witness.

The defense, led by Miami-based lawyer Ed Shohat, hammered at the credibility of Hilliard, also a former good friend of Hendrick's.

But London's wife of 24 years, Elaine London, gave damaging, voluntary testimony as well. She said Hendrick persuaded her husband to take a trip to Ireland to be ``out of sight, out of mind."

Hendrick, who took the stand in his own defense, explained that he told London to do so for health reasons -- not to avoid a grand jury subpoena.

Elaine London, who worked for 18 months for Singh before being fired, testified that her late husband trusted Hendrick until a conversation after London's arrest in March 2004.

"Jack was very angry at Jimmy," Elaine London testified. ``He said Jimmy had told him to basically plead guilty. That a couple of years at a country club prison wouldn't be bad. . . . Jimmy had been a good friend to me all these years, but I won't take the blame for this."

Shohat portrayed Hendrick, a partner at the Key West law firm Morgan & Hendrick, as simply trying to help his friends, who both had been clients.

Shohat said there was no evidence on the recordings that Hendrick ever told Hilliard or London to lie.

"Jim's life is destroyed with any guilty verdict," Shohat told the jury in closing arguments. 'This is not a case of sending a message to anyone. . . . This is not to solve corruption in Monroe County. The facts in this case scream out for `not guilty.' Put an end to Jim's nightmare of the last four years."

A `REAL TRAGEDY'

For Shirley Freeman, who was county mayor when Hendrick was hired as county attorney in 1995, the case was a "real tragedy," but an all-too-familiar one in a county where there's a major corruption scandal almost every decade.

"Jimmy is absolutely brilliant and highly, highly skilled. Unfortunately, though, sometimes power does corrupt," she said. ``At least he won't be around for awhile, pushing bad development."

Authorities Search For Gunman Who Abducted A Florida Boy (NYT)

By Lynn Waddell

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

PARRISH, Fla., Feb. 23 — A 13-year-old boy was abducted at gunpoint at a school bus stop on Friday morning and was found hours later in a wooded area where he had been left bound by his captor.

Sheriff Charles B. Wells of Manatee County said the gunman drove the boy, Clay Moore, to a large cattle ranch about 20 miles away from his neighborhood in the quiet Kingsfield Lakes subdivision on the outskirts of Parrish, near Tampa. His abductor eventually left. About two hours later, Clay, who had been tied up, was able to escape and walk until he came across a farm worker who let him use a cellphone to call his mother.

"It's miraculous, to tell the truth," Mr. Wells said. "Many people that have been bound similar to him have not been able to get free."

The gunman, who was driving an old red pickup, remained at large.

Clay was riding a skateboard about 9 a.m. while waiting for his school bus with four other youths when the truck pulled up, and the dark-haired young man driving it ordered him inside, said one of the four, Rabah Jaffal, 14.

"Clay kept saying 'What, sir? I don't know you. Leave me alone,' " Rabah said. The abductor "started getting angry, and that's when he pulled out the gun."

Three of the students ran home and called the police, who immediately began a manhunt involving the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the state police and surrounding counties' law enforcement.

"We all said earlier if there was any way out of the situation, Clay would find it," said Greg Moore, Clay's uncle.

FBI Agents Pose As Mobsters, Sting Florida Cops (AP)

AP, February 24, 2007

FORT LAUDERDALE, Florida (AP) -- Four veteran police officers were accused in federal court of taking thousands of dollars to protect what they thought were mob shipments of drugs, stolen art and jewelry.

Three of the officers made initial court appearances Friday and were ordered released on bond. The fourth was in the process of turning himself in and would likely appear next week, federal prosecutors said.

All serve in Hollywood, just south of Fort Lauderdale.

An FBI affidavit filed in federal court accused the four of taking thousands of dollars to protect a group they thought was a criminal organization based out of New York. The "mobsters" were undercover FBI agents during a two-year corruption sting.

Federal prosecutors said the operations included escorting a load of heroin from Miami Beach, providing security for an illegal poker game aboard a yacht and delivering $1 million worth of supposedly stolen diamonds to New Jersey.

Other deals involved purportedly stolen bearer bonds, watches, paintings and a tractor-trailer load of cigarettes, prosecutors said.

The four officers were charged with conspiracy. They have not entered pleas, and the case will go before a grand jury. All have been placed on leave without pay.

Lawyers for the three who appeared in court -- Detective Kevin Companion, 41; Sgt. Jeffrey Courtney, 51; and Officer Stephen Harrison, 46 -- declined comment on the charges but described their clients as devoted police officers and family men.

The fourth accused officer is Detective Thomas Simcox, 50.

Each would face up to life imprisonment if convicted of drug trafficking conspiracy and up to 20 years in prison if convicted of conspiracy.

Chief: Probe Of Hollywood Cops Halted Early (MH)

By Dan Christensen And Todd Wright

The Miami Herald, February 24, 2007

A two-year federal undercover probe that led to corruption charges against four Hollywood police officers was shut down prematurely after two of those officers learned they were under investigation, according to Hollywood Police Chief James Scarberry.

More officers are under suspicion, Scarberry said Friday.

The chief said he found out the investigation was blown Thursday -- hours before the FBI swooped in and arrested Officers Kevin Companion, Jeffry Courtney and Stephen Harrison. Officer Thomas Simcox, who is cooperating, was picked up a month ago, Scarberry said.

"We called the FBI immediately yesterday after we found out that Companion and Courtney were at the pension office. They both called in sick all week and were putting in their letters of resignation," Scarberry said.

Harrison was unaware of the investigation when he was arrested, Scarberry said.

Federal corruption charges against the officers include a range of criminal activity that includes extortion, bribe-taking, dealing in stolen property, protecting a crooked, high-stakes card game, cargo theft and transporting a multi-kilo load of heroin.

One officer allegedly used his marked police motorcycle to provide a security escort for what he thought was a shipment of $400,000 in proceeds from the sale of stolen diamonds, authorities said.

DOJ_NMG_0136996

The officers face maximum sentences of life in prison and fines up to $4 million if convicted on the drug trafficking charges. In addition, they face up to 20 years for each alleged use of their police positions for extortion.

During the two-year probe by the U.S. attorney and the FBI -- dubbed "Tarnished Badge" -- undercover agents convinced the officers that they were members of a New York crime family.

LEADER OF THE GROUP

According to agents, Companion, 41 -- a sworn Hollywood officer for more than two decades -- was the leader of the group of crooked cops and recruited the others for illegal capers.

Many of the meetings between Companion and the agents were audiotaped and videotaped, revealing a veteran officer eager to use his badge for illegal profit.

In March 2005, Companion was videotaped meeting with agents at the Borgata Hotel in Atlantic City.

At that time, agents said they needed more officers and an unmarked police car to protect a large amount of cash collected from the sale of stolen diamonds.

Companion was interested and told them he knew of some "old-school" guys whom he could approach for assistance.

In exchange for cash, Companion and others protected the collection of illegal gambling debts and the fencing of stolen watches; they personally delivered $400,000 in bearer bonds and a tractor-trailer full of cigarettes; and they protected a rigged, high-stakes poker game on a yacht.

But the crimes they are accused of did not appear that lucrative, compared to the hefty pensions and retirement benefits that were at risk if the cops were caught.

At a press conference on Friday, U.S. attorney Alexander Acosta indicated that during the investigation, Companion received $42,000; Courtney, 51, received $22,000; Simcox, 50, received $16,000; and Harrison, 46, received $12,000.

"There is some indication from the FBI that other names were brought up in the investigation," Scarberry said. "They were officers they never met but were supposedly also available [to join the criminal scheme] if needed," he said.

TO REVIEW TAPES

Scarberry plans to review FBI video and audio tapes that might shed light on which other officers might have been involved, he said.

And an FBI press release confirmed the agency would continue to investigate, ``targeting ongoing corruption within the Hollywood Police Department."

But that will be harder now that the investigation has been made public.

Scarberry said he knows how Courtney and Companion learned of the investigation, but he declined to discuss it.

"That's part of the FBI's investigation," he said.

A ranking federal law enforcement source said Scarberry and his assistant were the only outsiders taken into their confidence. They were told "in no uncertain terms" that they must not reveal what they knew, the source said.

But Scarberry immediately told City Manager Cameron Benson about the probe and revealed it to Hollywood Mayor Mara Giulianti a few days later.

"I think it is appropriate when something this big is happening I know about it," Benson said. ``The chief has got to inform me because I am the boss and the mayor is my boss, and I have to let my bosses know."

UNAWARE OF ORDERS

Benson said he was unaware that Scarberry had been told by the FBI to keep quiet.

Federal agents decided to tell Scarberry about the investigation about a month ago as part of an attempt to get Simcox to flip and cooperate, the federal source said.

Simcox, accompanied by the chief, went to FBI headquarters on a ruse. It wasn't long before Simcox began implicating other officers, the source said.

When the FBI learned Thursday that the targets of their investigation had learned about it, agents moved in quickly.

But Giulianti said the FBI is to blame if there was a leak that limited the agency's chance of snaring more crooked cops.

``To pick up the guy and not follow through . . . is their fault. They put their trust in a criminal."

Courtney, Harrison and Companion appeared in federal court Friday morning and pleaded not guilty. An arraignment is scheduled for March 15.

Officers Face Life In Prison For Running Diamonds, Drugs For Fake Mafia (FLSUNSEN)

By Brian Haas And Vanessa Blum, South Florida Sun-Sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, February 24, 2007

It started with one Hollywood police officer interested in doing the bidding of a New York crime family for cash, authorities said. As the stakes grew, they say he enlisted what he called some "old school" cops he knew would want in.

Federal authorities on Friday released detailed charges against four Hollywood officers in an investigation dubbed "Operation Tarnished Badge," accusing the four of protecting and transporting stolen diamonds, artwork, bonds and heroin for undercover FBI agents pretending to be involved in organized crime.

LocalLinks

The officers face up to life in prison for accepting sums of money authorities concede instead could have easily and legally been made with overtime. But the officers kept taking on riskier off-duty jobs for larger payouts, according to the federal complaint against them. Authorities said the four joked about being in the Mafia, promised to use their clout as police officers if they ran into trouble, and used police equipment and techniques to help the agents they thought were mobsters.

Identified as the ringleader was Detective Kevin Companion, 41, who met with undercover FBI agents in late 2004. He recruited Sgt. Jeffry Courtney, 51; Officer Stephen Harrison, 46; and Detective Thomas Simcox, 50. All are charged with extortion by using their public positions, and conspiracy and attempted possession of a controlled substance with the intent to distribute.

In total, the complaint says, Companion was paid $42,000; Courtney $22,000; Simcox $16,000; and Harrison $12,000. They each make between $66,000 and $89,000 a year in their police jobs.

Companion, Courtney and Harrison appeared before U.S. Magistrate Lurana Snow in federal count in Fort Lauderdale on Friday morning. All three looked dejected. Companion, hands cuffed, dabbed at tears with his sleeves. Snow set bond at $350,000 for Companion; $375,000 for Courtney; and $300,000 for Harrison. None of them had posted bail early Friday night, detention officials said. Simcox has not yet been arrested.

Companion's attorney René Sotorrío called the charges "a horrible tragedy" for his client's family, which has a tradition in law enforcement, but he declined to comment on the charges. Courtney's and Harrison's attorneys could not be reached for comment later Friday.

Simcox may turn himself in to federal authorities as soon as Monday, said his attorney, Bruce Udolf. Udolf declined to comment on the charges or say whether Simcox is cooperating with authorities.

The FBI received "information based on reliable sources" about illegal activity at the department about 21/2 years ago, U.S. Attorney Alex Acosta said at a news conference in Fort Lauderdale. Authorities declined to describe the information, but said Companion first met with an undercover agent in December 2004. The jobs were small at first: collection of an illegal gambling debt, protecting the sale of stolen watches.

To pull off more lucrative deals, agents told Companion he needed more muscle, according to the federal complaint. Companion replied he knew some "old school guys" willing to do the jobs, the complaint says.

Companion recruited Courtney, according to authorities, and Courtney helped in April 2005 to escort $400,000 in stolen money through Broward County with his Hollywood Police Department-issued motorcycle. Two months later, authorities said, Companion and Courtney drove $400,000 in stolen bonds to New York City. On the way, the duo passed a car with a license plate that read "mafia guy." The two later joked to agents that the officers "should have been riding in that vehicle," authorities said.

Companion brought in Simcox and Harrison in November 2005 and in the following months the officers protected an illegal, high-stakes gambling operation, delivered $1 million in stolen diamonds and artwork to Atlantic City, N.J., and helped steal a truckload of cigarettes, authorities said.

On Nov. 29, 2006, the officers agreed to escort several kilos of heroin from Miami Beach through Broward , the complaint says. Authorities said that at a meeting with an agent at a Miami Beach hotel, Simcox would only discuss the deal on the balcony. One officer, who was not named, wanted them to use the codeword "jewelry" for drugs.

The deal took place without a hitch the next day, authorities said.

Authorities said they had video and audio recordings of nearly every meeting and job the officers did. Acosta said no one was hurt during the sting.

Hollywood police officers openly wept when they heard of news of the arrests Thursday, said Police Chief Jim Scarberry. Three of the four officers have faced departmental scrutiny before.

"They're as sickened about this as I was when I first heard about it," Scarberry said. Scarberry, who was named chief in 1999, said later, "We know there have been some problems, but we've worked hard to change the culture here, and there is a big difference."

Companion was named in a federal sexual harassment lawsuit filed in 1994, which the city settled with a woman for $205,000. Courtney's hiring came under fire after a 1995 department-wide investigation revealed he had been arrested twice. He also accidentally shot a sergeant in 1991 while working as a Pembroke Pines officer.

DOJ_NMG_0136998

Simcox was convicted of battery in 1996 for grabbing and slapping a 9-year-old boy who mocked him at a Boynton Beach daycare center while the officer was off duty. The incident led to a one-month suspension from the department without pay and he was kicked off a countywide organized crime taskforce.

Douglas K. Haas, a former Fort Lauderdale lieutenant and Broward Sheriff's Office lieutenant colonel, ran the now-disbanded Metropolitan Organized Crime Intelligence Unit and said Simcox was on the taskforce for less than a year.

"He wasn't in a position at MIU where he could have hurt us," Haas said. "But it's still disconcerting."

Staff Writers Paula McMahon and John Holland contributed to this report.

Area Man Faces Charges In FBI Sting (PALMBEACHP)

By Michael LaForgia, Palm Beach Post Staff Writer

Palm Beach Post (FL), February 24, 2007

A suburban Boynton Beach man is among four Hollywood police officers accused of taking money to run errands for FBI agents posing as mobsters.

During a two-year sting operation, the undercover agents paid Detective Thomas Joseph Simcox and three others to provide security for an illegal, high-stakes poker game, transport stolen diamonds and art to Atlantic City, N.J., and protect the theft of a tractor-trailer load of cigarettes, according to an FBI affidavit filed in federal court. All four officers also agreed to protect a multi-kilo heroin shipment, court records show.

Simcox, who bought a house in suburban Boynton Beach with his wife in 1989, is making arrangements to turn himself in to federal authorities next week, his attorney said Friday.

"I believe that he should be surrendering Monday," said Bruce Udolf, the Fort Lauderdale attorney representing Simcox.

Simcox, a detective assigned to the family services unit, joined the Hollywood Police Department in 1982, the affidavit said.

The other three detectives facing charges - Detective Kevin Companion, 41; Sgt. Jeffry Courtney, 51; and Officer Stephen Harrison, 46 - made initial court appearances Friday and were ordered released on bond.

The affidavit filed in federal court accused the four of taking thousands of dollars to protect a group they thought was a criminal organization based out of New York. The "criminal organization" was made up of undercover FBI agents conducting a two-year corruption sting.

The four officers face conspiracy charges. They have not entered pleas, and the case will go before a grand jury.

Lawyers for the three who appeared in court Friday declined comment on the charges but described their clients as devoted police officers and family men.

Ex-FBI Man Gets 7 Years For Child Sex (FREDFLS)

By Bill Freehling

Fredericksburg Free Lance-Star, February 24, 2007

Former FBI analyst sentenced in child sex case

A 17-year veteran of the FBI will serve seven years in prison for having sexual relations with a young girl in Spotsylvania County, a judge ruled yesterday.

Anthony John Lesko, 44, entered an Alford plea yesterday in Spotsylvania Circuit Court to nine counts of felony indecent liberties upon a child.

Lesko, who later moved to Jacksonville, Fla., worked as an intelligence analyst at the FBI for 17 years, according to his attorney, James A. Carter II. He is a major in the U.S. Army Reserves and has received numerous military awards.

An Alford plea means Lesko doesn't admit guilt but believes there is enough evidence for a conviction. Under the terms of the plea, he was sentenced to seven years in prison with another 15 years suspended.

Lesko engaged in a sex act with a girl, 9 and 10 at the time, at least nine times in 2003-2004, according to evidence put forth by Spotsylvania Commonwealth's Attorney William Neely.

The girl told a member of the Spotsylvania Department of Social Services about the activity in February 2004, according to the evidence. Lesko at first denied the allegations, but later spoke with a U.S. Navy counselor about them.

Lesko told the counselor that he was the victim of the sexual assault; he said the girl initiated the contact, according to the plea. Lesko entered the plea partly to spare the girl the pain of a trial, his attorney said.

Lesko is married with two sons. His wife asked Circuit Judge Ann Hunter Simpson to allow Lesko to delay reporting to prison until June 1 so he could sell their Florida house.

Simpson denied the request, and Lesko went to jail after yesterday's hearing.

In addition to serving the prison time, Lesko will have to pay up to $10,000 in restitution to the girl's parents to cover the cost of her mental-health counseling.

Bill Freehling: 540/374-5424

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Gonzales' Spiel Riles Some Christians (UPI)

UPI, February 23, 2007

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' Feb. 20 announcement to Southern Baptist Convention leaders about a new Justice Department focus on religious freedom garnered some praise — and significant criticism — from other Christian leaders. Gonzales announced the launch of the department's "First Freedom Project" in a speech during a regularly scheduled SBC Executive Committee meeting.

"Religious freedom is a fundamental part of our nation's history and one of its core principles," Gonzales said. The effort will include educational efforts to inform government officials, employers and everyday Americans about their religious-liberty rights under law, Associated Baptist Press reported Thursday.

The department simultaneously released a 43-page report touting its record, under President Bush, in defending religious freedom. Gonzales and the report implied that the Bush Justice Department's record on prosecuting religious-discrimination cases was significantly stronger than that under former President Bill Clinton.

But several in the religious-liberty community said Bush's record on the issue has been mixed, at best. Brent Walker, executive director of the Washington-based Baptist Joint Committee for Religious Liberty, said he appreciates the administration focusing on the First Amendment — but that the amendment covers two aspects of religious freedom that are inextricably linked to each other.

"The First Amendment has two protections for religious freedom — prohibition on religious establishments and protection for free exercise of religion," Walker said in a statement provided to Associated Baptist Press. "The administration has often ignored the importance of the no-establishment principle by supporting attempts of governments to endorse a religious message, using tax dollars to fund pervasively religious organizations, allowing religious discrimination in hiring for federally funded projects, and going to the Supreme Court to cut back on the rights of citizens to challenge such practices."

Walker also noted that Bush's record on free-exercise protections is "not perfect." He pointed to a Supreme Court case last year in which the administration attempted to limit a small religious sect's ability to use hallucinogenic tea for sacramental purposes. A unanimous Supreme Court rejected the administration's position.

Americans United for Separation of Church and State went further, releasing a statement Feb. 22 saying Gonzales' announcement "reeks of hypocrisy." It called attention to actions detailed in the report that the Justice Department touts as religious-freedom successes — but that are actually quite controversial in the religious-liberty community.

For instance, the report features cases in which the department argued for employees who had been discriminated against on the basis of religion. But, in a different section, the report also touted the Justice Department's advocacy on behalf of the Salvation Army, which was sued for using government social-service funds but continuing to take religion into account in its hiring decisions.

"Thanks to the Justice Department, the Salvation Army could literally place newspaper ads reading, 'Help Wanted for Government-Funded Jobs: No Jews, Buddhists, Muslims, Liberal Christians, Atheists Or Gays Need Apply' and this would be perfectly acceptable to Gonzales," said Barry Lynn, the executive director of Americans United. "This is a perverse way of supposedly defending our religious-freedom rights."

On the other side of the coin, a conservative Christian group praised Gonzales' announcement.

"We applaud Attorney General Gonzales for recognizing the ongoing threat to religious freedom and for taking firm steps to defend our 'first freedom,'" wrote Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council, in his Feb. 21 e-mail newsletter. And the head of the SBC's public-affairs agency praised the actions of the Bush Justice Department.

"The attorney general's desire to address a major meeting of SBC leaders to announce this initiative shows both the importance of the issue and the commitment of the Justice Department at the highest levels to defend every individual American's religious freedom rights, particularly their free-exercise rights, which are too often infringed," Baptist Press quoted Richard Land, president of the SBC Ethics and Religious Liberty Commission, as saying. "This initiative is needed and should make a real difference."

But others questioned Gonzales' choice of settings for the announcement. He said he sought out SBC leaders for the opportunity because of their historic support of religious liberty.

The head of the National Council of Churches said he wished the attorney general had chosen a more representative body to hear his announcement. SBC leaders have been among Bush's strongest and most consistent supporters.

NCC General Secretary Bob Edgar, in a statement prepared in response to an ABP reporter's request for comment, said his organization thinks it is "unsettling that only a single denomination, representing a fraction of the rich diversity of religious life of America, was selected to receive the attorney general's personal presentation. It would seem more appropriate had he made such an appearance before an ecumenical or interfaith gathering, symbolically underlining the vision of a nation in which the law plays no favorites but sees all faiths as equal before the Constitution."

After his speech, in response to a question, Gonzales told reporters he chose an audience of Southern Baptists to announce the government's new effort because "this is a group very interested in the protection of religious freedom." He noted the "timing worked out where this was a good venue to speak to a receptive audience."

Baptists in America were early champions of religious liberty and influenced the development of the Constitution's First Amendment, which guarantees religious liberty and other freedoms.

Gonzales also granted an interview on the topic to The 700 Club, the television program hosted by Christian Coalition founder Pat Robertson.

The NCC's statement said Edgar had invited Gonzales to appear at the NCC Committee on Religious Liberty meeting, slated for March 12 in Washington, to "extend to this very diverse group of interfaith advocates for religious freedom the same courtesy of a face-to-face visit that he has already extended to the Southern Baptist Convention."

The NCC also encouraged Gonzales to make similar appearances before leaders of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, the National Association of Evangelicals and "Jewish and Muslim faith groups who together make up the complex tapestry of religious life in our nation."

One religious-liberty expert faulted Gonzales' implicit swipes at the Justice Department under Clinton. Wake Forest Divinity School professor James Dunn said that, while the Clinton administration may have pursued fewer legal cases against alleged religious discrimination than Bush, the former president and his appointees defended religious freedom in other significant ways.

Dunn, who was executive director of the Baptist Joint Committee during the Clinton years, noted that the former president pushed strongly to improve religious freedom. Besides pushing legislation like the Religious Freedom Restoration Act and the bill that established the United States Commission on International Religious Freedom, Clinton officials also produced a document that has had a concrete impact on religion in public schools, Dunn said.

"Perhaps ... the most extensive and statistically significant action for religious freedom in recent history was [Clinton's] aggressive promotion for the guidelines for religion in public education and making clear that the public school was not a religion-free zone," Dunn said.

"Not only did the White House give leadership in that regard, but the Justice Department ... and the Education Department developed guidelines that literally transformed the attitudes of public educators about the free expression of religion in public schools and the necessity for maintaining the separation of church and state at the same time," he continued.

Officials from the Justice Department did not immediately return an ABP reporter's request for comment for this story Thursday.

FBI May Reopen Cold Cases On 1950s And '60s Slayings In The South (AP)

AP, February 24, 2007

JACKSON, Miss. (AP) — The FBI is considering reopening dozens of cold cases involving slayings suspected of being racially motivated in the South during the 1950s and '60s.

An announcement could come as early as Tuesday, according to a law enforcement official who spoke with the Associated Press on condition of anonymity because the plans have not yet been finalized.

In addition to the FBI's own investigations, the Southern Poverty Law Center submitted its own list last week of 74 potential unsolved slayings that involved white-on-black violence.

Thirty-two of the deaths happened in Mississippi. The others were in Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Tennessee, Louisiana, North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida, Kentucky and New York.

Mark Potok, director of the Intelligence Project for the Alabama-based Southern Poverty Law Center, said each case was researched in the late 1980s when the group was putting together a civil rights memorial. But it is unclear if each could be considered a civil rights case, he said.

"The truth is we don't know," said Potok, whose group investigates hate crimes. "In each case there was some evidence to suggest that these were racial murders, but it absolutely was not proven. Had we been able to nail them down, their names would've been literally chiseled into the civil rights memorial that sits outside our building here."

U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton in Jackson reviewed the list of Mississippi killings for the Associated Press on Friday and said based on the limited amount of information available that none would qualify for federal prosecution under civil rights statutes. But he said many could still be prosecuted on a local or state level as murders.

DOJ_NMG_0137001

The deaths outlined by the center happened in a variety of ways, from police-involved shootings to trysts with white women broken up by gunfire.

In most cases, the statute of limitations under federal civil rights laws will have run out, Lampton said. In others, charges could not be brought because the accused already have faced charges and been cleared by a jury.

Last month, FBI Director Robert Mueller said the bureau was aggressively seeking to solve cold civil rights cases, vowing to "pursue justice to the end, and we will, no matter how long it takes, until every living suspect is called to answer for their crimes."

Most recently federal prosecutors brought kidnapping and conspiracy charges against James Ford Seale, 71, who allegedly participated in the 1964 kidnappings and murders of Charles Eddie Moore and Henry Hezekiah Dee in southwest Mississippi.

Seale was arrested Jan. 24 after the U.S. Justice Department reopened its investigation and learned that he was still alive. He has pleaded not guilty and is due for trial in April. The case qualified for federal prosecution because the captors allegedly took Moore and Dee across the state line into Louisiana while they were still alive.

In 1994, Mississippi won the conviction of Byron de la Beckwith for the 1963 sniper killing of NAACP leader Medgar Evers.

In Alabama, Bobby Frank Cherry was convicted in 2002 of killing four black girls in the bombing of a Birmingham church in 1963. In 2001, Thomas Blanton was convicted.

Edgar Ray Killen, an 80-year-old former Ku Klux Klansman, was convicted last June of manslaughter in the killings of three civil rights workers in Mississippi in 1964.

Lara Jakes Jordan in Washington, D.C., contributed to this report.

FBI Building Database On Victims Slain Amid Civil Rights-era Violence (JCL)

By Jerry Mitchell

Jackson Clairon-Ledger, February 24, 2007

The list of "forgotten killings" from the nation's civil rights era continues to grow for the Justice Department.

The FBI's field offices already have compiled a list of 51 victims slain during that era. The Montgomery-based Southern Poverty Law Center has since turned over information on 74 victims to the FBI. Altogether, the center has collected the names of 127 victims of racial violence between 1954 and 1968 - 40 of them listed on a monument outside the center.

"We ask that the FBI use its considerable investigatory resources to uncover more information about these cases," Richard Cohen, president for the center, wrote the Civil Rights Unit of the Criminal Investigative Division of the FBI. "Those responsible for these forgotten deaths - those who may still be alive today, like James Ford Seale, who was recently arrested for the murders of Henry Hezekiah Dee and Charles Eddie Moore - have gone unpunished too long."

U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton said last week: "As we've shown in the past, we'll investigate any case that comes to light."

Since 2005, he has worked closely with the FBI to piece together a case against Seale, who has pleaded not guilty to federal kidnapping and conspiracy charges in connection with the May 2, 1964, killings of Dee and Moore, who were hitchhiking when Klansmen reportedly picked them up, beat them, weighted them down and tossed them into the Mississippi River, where they drowned.

Seale's arrest marked the 28th in the nation since 1989 involving unpunished killings from the civil-rights era. The most recent of the 22 convictions came in 2005 when a Neshoba County jury convicted Edgar Ray Killen of Union of orchestrating the 1964 killings of Andrew Goodman, Michael Schwerner and James Chaney.

Congress now is debating the Emmett Till Unsolved Civil Rights Crime Act, which would create a cold-case unit for the Justice Department to re-examine these murders. The House version of the bill has 67 co-sponsors, led by U.S. Reps. John Lewis, D-Ga., and Kenny Hulshof, R-Mo.

Creating such a unit is important, Cohen said. "For too long, people thought that nothing could be done about those who had literally gotten away with murder during the civil-rights era. But as we've seen in recent years with the successful prosecutions of murderers like Edgar Ray Killen, Dr. King was right when he said that the moral arc of the universe bends toward justice."

One of the forgotten killings Cohen pointed out to the FBI is that of Clinton Melton, an African-American service station attendant shot to death Dec. 3, 1955, in Glendora. Elmer Otis Kimbell, a white man, was tried and acquitted of killing Melton.

Melton's son, Kenneth, was 5 months old when his father was slain. Two months later, his mother was found drowned - a death his family questioned.

"We live it every day," said Kenneth Melton, now 51 and living in Memphis. "You see people with their mothers and fathers. All that was taken away."

DOJ_NMG_0137002

Growing up in the Delta, "I wanted to find the person who killed my dad - not to do anything, but to ask him, 'Why?' " he said. "That was something always on my mind."

He never got the chance, he said, because he heard Kimbell died in 1976 in Tennessee.

Kimbell happened to be the best friend of J.W. Milam, one of the killers of Till, a 14-year-old from Chicago who was murdered after he reportedly wolf-whistled at a white woman. In fact, the car Kimbell reportedly was driving when he shot Clinton Melton belonged to Milam.

At trial, Kimbell insisted he shot Clinton Melton in self-defense after being fired on first, but Melton's white employer, Lee McGarrh, testified at Kimbell's trial that Melton had no weapon.

McGarrh said an argument began after Kimbell, who had been drinking, asked Melton to fill the car with gas, only to change his mind and say he'd only pay $2.

A black employee, John Henry Wilson, testified Kimbell had said he was "going to kill that n-." Wilson said he tried to dissuade the man, only to be told, "Get back, or I'll kill you, too."

McGarrh testified Kimbell returned with a weapon and killed Melton without provocation.

The local Lions' Club denounced the killing, but that didn't stop an all-white jury from doing the same thing for Kimbell that it did for Milam and Roy Bryant - letting them walk free from the Tallahatchie County Courthouse.

David Halberstam covered the trial as a 21-year-old freelancer, one of the few journalists to cover the trial.

In his April 19, 1956, article for The Reporter, Halberstam wrote, "There's open season on the Negroes now. They've got no protection, and any peckerwood who wants can go out and shoot himself one, and we'll free him." (The entire article can be read at clarionledger.com.)

The trial taught "you didn't have to be a civil rights activist" to wind up dead, Halberstam said in an interview last week. "If someone was ill-tempered, it was a free-fire zone."

He talked of the "cowardice" of those who killed Melton. "It wasn't just Kimbell," he said. "It was all the people who were complicit - the jury and the ones who defended him."

Federal Supervision Of Race In Little Rock Schools Ends (NYT)

By Steve Barnes

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

LITTLE ROCK, Ark., Feb. 23 — The Little Rock School District was released on Friday from federal court supervision of its desegregation efforts, almost 50 years after President Dwight D. Eisenhower dispatched federal troops to enforce an integration order that the Arkansas governor defied.

In a written order, Judge William R. Wilson Jr. of Federal District Court declared the district “unitary.” That meant it had met its obligations under court-ordered remedies to address lingering questions about its commitment to equal opportunity in education.

Judge Wilson said the school board could “now operate the district as it sees fit, answerable to no one” save its students, patrons and voters.

Superintendent Roy G. Brooks, who is black, told The Associated Press, “I think that this is a clear indication that 1957 is not 2007.”

But John W. Walker, a civil rights lawyer here who is counsel to the Joshua Intervenors, a group of black children and parents who were a party in the long-running case, disagreed.

“In 2007, we have people in neckties living in big houses celebrating the return to 1957, a return to the concept of white supremacy,” Mr. Walker said in an interview.

In 1957, Gov. Orval E. Faubus, a conservative Democrat, resisted the federal court order to desegregate Central High School by surrounding it with National Guardsmen who blocked the entry of nine black students. Eisenhower responded by federalizing the Guard troops and sending paratroopers from the 101st Airborne Division.

The black pupils were admitted to classes, with the military providing security on campus for the duration of the school year.

The confrontation was a seminal part of the civil rights movement. It was followed by decades of litigation that devoured millions of dollars in legal fees and went through several judges, dozens of school board members and more than one superintendent.

Judge Wilson granted the district —the largest in Arkansas, with 27,000 pupils — conditional release from supervision several months ago, but retained jurisdiction until it could demonstrate a resolve to monitor progress in reducing racial disparity in student achievement.

The order on Friday said the district “has gone the extra mile” in doing so.

DOJ_NMG_0137003

Mr. Walker said he had not decided whether to appeal the order.

Arkansas' Historic School Case Ends (AP)

By Andrew Demillo, Associated Press

AP, February 24, 2007

LITTLE ROCK, Ark. -- A judge in one of the nation's longest-running school desegregation cases released the Little Rock district from federal supervision yesterday, nearly 50 years after President Dwight D. Eisenhower sent in troops to escort nine black students into all-white Central High.

U.S. District Judge William R. Wilson Jr. said the district is substantially complying with a 1998 desegregation plan worked out in the 27,000-student district.

With blacks gaining a majority on the school board last September, the judge said he felt comfortable that the district would keep working to improve academic achievements among its 19,000 black students.

In 1957, despite a U.S. Supreme Court order, Gov. Orval Faubus tried to prevent black students from enrolling at Central High, setting off one of the biggest crises of the civil rights era. The president sent in the 101st Airborne to enforce the order.

"The district has been given back to the people of this community, and my pledge to them is to continue to work hard and recognize that we're all going to have to work hard," said Superintendent Roy Brooks, who is black. "I think that this is a clear indication that 1957 is not 2007."

The 1998 desegregation plan was negotiated among the district, federal monitors and a group called the Joshua Intervenors, which represented black students. Judge Wilson noted that another nine years had passed before its conditions were satisfied.

"LRSD's board can now operate the district as it sees fit; answerable to no one except LRSD's students and patrons and the voters who elected [the board] to office," he wrote. "I want to express my heartfelt best wishes as LRSD continues to operate, as our Founders intended, under control of the citizens of the City of Little Rock."

A final sticking point among the parties had been whether the district adequately assessed black achievement in its academic programs.

"I am optimistic that the board will continue to ensure that the comprehensive program assessment progress remains a permanent part of [the school district's] curriculum for as long as it takes to improve the academic achievement of African-American students," Judge Wilson wrote.

Under previous orders from Judge Wilson, the Little Rock district was to evaluate its academic programs annually to determine whether test scores among black students were rising. The judge said yesterday he was now satisfied with the response, which included the board's December resolution that it would continue evaluations even if Judge Wilson released it from monitoring.

The Little Rock district is now 70 percent black; Central High School is 53 percent black.

John Walker, a lawyer for the Joshua Intervenors, said black students would not be served by the ruling.

"We're certainly disappointed in view of the lack of progress this district has made in addressing the needs of African-American students," he said. "The standard was not high for the district to meet, but they certainly have not met it. We will have to pursue other means."

In Little Rock, as is the case nationwide, black students on average score below their white classmates on standardized tests. The gap in Little Rock is as large as 40 points on both state and national standardized tests. Little Rock has seen some improvement.

Board member Michael Daugherty said the district must spend its money to close the achievement gap among students.

"I would have liked to have seen us a little bit farther along right now than where we are," said Mr. Daugherty, who is black. "I think the district needs to be further along in the allocation of resources in the district."

School board member Baker Kurrus, who is white, called Judge Wilson's decision "a well-deserved endorsement."

"We have to prove that we're capable of managing our district and make sure that the mistakes of the past are never repeated," Mr. Kurrus said. "We simply must reach all students in our district."

Rhode Island Official OKs Gay 'Marriage' (WT)

By Cheryl Wetzstein, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 24, 2007

Rhode Island Attorney General Patrick Lynch says research persuaded him to decide that Rhode Island can recognize same-sex "marriages" from Massachusetts -- not his sister's recent same-sex union in Massachusetts.

DOJ_NMG_0137004

"No disrespect to my sister, who I love very much, but it has zero impact on it," Mr. Lynch told the Providence (R.I.) Journal last week, saying his nonbinding legal opinion made on Wednesday was well researched and based on a 1904 Rhode Island State Supreme Court ruling on interstate marriage.

On Feb. 15, Mr. Lynch attended the "marriage" ceremony in Attleboro, Mass., of his older sister, Pawtucket, R.I., City Solicitor Margaret Lynch, and her longtime partner, Patricia Gadaleta. The women have twin daughters.

On Wednesday, Mr. Lynch issued a six-page opinion to the Rhode Island Board of Governors for Higher Education that said their homosexual employees who have "married" in Massachusetts should be treated as spouses.

"Rhode Island has not enacted any legislation prohibiting same-sex marriages or stating a public policy against same-sex marriage, even though they have been validly performed in neighboring Massachusetts for approximately three years," Mr. Lynch wrote.

Mr. Lynch later said his opinion was "essentially guidance" and nonbinding. However, Steven Maurano, a spokesman for the Board of Governors, which oversees higher education in Rhode Island, said the board intends to follow Mr. Lynch's advice.

Bishop Thomas Tobin of the Catholic Diocese of Providence criticized Mr. Lynch's opinion as being overly influenced by a "relentless gay agenda."

Raymond T. McKay, president of the Rhode Island Republican Assembly, said Mr. Lynch should have deferred to lawmakers or federal law, specifically, the 1996 Defense of Marriage Act, which says states do not have to recognize same-sex unions from other states. "This is a great miscarriage of justice and law by the individual who is charged with the responsibility of enforcing Rhode Island law and protecting our state constitution," Mr. McKay said.

Meanwhile, in other states:

·Wyoming House Speaker Roy Cohee, a Republican, on Thursday cast the committee vote that killed a constitutional amendment defining marriage as the union of one man and one woman. The measure had passed the Senate last month.

·Illinois state Rep. Greg Harris, a Democrat who is openly homosexual, introduced a bill on Thursday to legalize marriage between "two persons," rather than a man and a woman, in that state.

·In Maryland, hearings are scheduled for early March on constitutional marriage amendments offered in the Senate and House. Both bills define marriage as the union of one man and one woman but do not outlaw civil unions. The House bill also bars public schools from teaching about same-sex relationships.

Protecting All Students (NYT)

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

Like all too many school districts, Toms River, N.J., has done a poor job of protecting gay students from bullying. According to the New Jersey Supreme Court, the district punished students for being one minute late for class, but made harassing another child for being gay punishable only after a third offense.

In a landmark ruling this week, the court unanimously held that public school districts like Toms River's are liable for damages if they fail to take reasonable steps to stop prolonged anti-gay harassment of a student by another student. It correctly found that students had a right to be protected against this sort of abuse.

The decision changes the legal landscape in New Jersey, and we hope it will be the start of a new national approach to the problem.

A study by the National Mental Health Association a few years ago found that more than three-quarters of teenagers reported that students who were gay or thought to be gay were teased and bullied in their schools and communities.

The anonymous student who brought the suit against Toms River schools clearly deserved better. He complained of being taunted almost daily from fourth grade on. In high school, he was physically attacked twice, and he said he eventually had to change schools. School administrators disciplined the worst offenders, but failed to address the overall school climate by taking such basic steps as talking to parents and holding student assemblies to make it clear that harassment would not be tolerated.

The court's ruling provides much-needed support to some of the nation's most vulnerable young people, and it sets a worthy standard for courts and educators nationwide.

ANTITRUST:

Buyout Firms Seek Utility TXU For $32 Billion (WSJ)

By Henny Sender, Dennis K. Berman And Rebecca Smith

The Wall Street Journal, February 24, 2007

KKR, TPG Pursue Texas Power Company, A Target of Criticism

DOJ_NMG_0137005

Private-equity firms Texas Pacific Group and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. were close to a deal Friday night to acquire Texas utilities powerhouse TXU Corp. for about $32 billion, said people familiar with the matter, a massive buyout that would give them control of one of the nation's most successful and controversial power companies.

One person close to the matter said the firms would pay about $70 a share for the big utility, about $10 a share over Friday's 4 p.m. price of $60.02 on the New York Stock Exchange. The company also had $12.38 billion in debt as of September 30.

A deal could be finalized over the next few days, this person said, though it was possible it could fall apart at a late moment.

The transaction, first reported by CNBC, would be the latest massive deal engineered by private-equity firms. Enjoying record profits and a flood of cash from investors seeking ever-greater returns, the large investment firms have accounted for the majority of the biggest mergers and acquisitions in the last year. Among recent deals, Blackstone Group paid $23 billion for Equity Office Properties and assumed $16 billion of debt, while Bain Capital, KKR and Merrill Lynch & Co. paid $21 billion and assumed $11.7 billion in debt to acquire hospital operator HCA Inc. in 2006.

KKR, once known as the original barbarian at the gate for the $25 billion buyout of RJR Nabisco in 1988, is now the industry doyen, flush with cash and on a world-wide hunt for prey. "I have never seen a time like this when money is so available and so global," Henry Kravis, its co-founder, said in a recent interview.

For its part, Texas Pacific Group has a less venerable history and a policy of preferring to not be in the limelight its peers seek. It recently raised a $15 billion fund, which puts it in second place in asset size behind Blackstone's $20 billion fund -- at least for the moment.

Dallas-based TXU has emerged in recent years as one of the nation's dominant utilities by asserting itself aggressively over the deregulated electricity market in Texas. That state has what is considered the most advanced deregulation plan in the nation, having recently lifted most limits on what companies can charge the general public for electricity.

TXU owns both Texas's largest power-generation company and its biggest electricity retailer, giving it a powerful grip on one of the nation's largest markets. Its assets include the largest fleet of power plants in Texas and interests in a single nuclear plant. It also owns a transmission and distribution system and strip-coal mines with substantial reserves.

That powerhouse combination of assets has produced big profits and strong returns for investors. In the third quarter of 2006, TXU earned net income of just more than $1 billion on revenue of $3.51 billion. The company's stock has made huge gains under Chief Executive C. John Wilder, with its shares increasing sixfold since he arrived three years ago.

But TXU also has stoked controversy in Texas over the rates it charges and an ambitious plan to build new power plants. That may require the buyers to make concessions in order to overcome regulatory hurdles.

Additionally, the company has been planning to expand by building 11 big coal-fired power plants in the state in coming years. That project has drawn harsh criticism from environmental interests, which accuse TXU of adding to its bulk with plants that release substantial amounts of carbon dioxide, a heat-trapping gas many scientists blame for global warming.

The company also has drawn criticism for its dealings with customers. During its ramp-up to a deregulated market, TXU raised rates repeatedly, and now charges some of the highest power rates in the nation. Critics say it also is quick to disconnect late-paying customers, while offering perks to those who pay on time.

Those factors have made TXU a flashpoint for criticism, especially in Texas. This past week, Mr. Wilder faced uncomfortable questioning before a Texas senate committee concerning whether his firm had amassed too much "market power," the ability to influence power prices. Legislators have been considering setting firmer limits on TXU's might, responding to market analyses suggesting that at times it possesses the ability to influence prices on the Texas wholesale electricity market.

Steve Wolens, a former legislator who is one of the authors of the Texas deregulation law, said he was disappointed by the buyout news. One goal of deregulation, he said, was to "discourage the need for in-state utilities to sell to out-of-state" interests.

The suitors may plan to address concerns in part by removing TXU from public ownership, said one person familiar with the matter. They also plan to scale back some of TXU's plans to build new generating plants and consider a rate rollback, the person said.

A person familiar with the proposed deal said the buyers plan to retain current management. TXU has been in exclusive negotiations with KKR and TPG in recent weeks, this person said. Such exclusivity makes a rival bid more difficult.

Private-equity firms have attracted scrutiny from shareholders and government regulators who claim the firms may be extracting too much value from publicly traded firms, leaving stockholders and customers in the lurch. A buyout plan will have to quell criticism while steering clear of legislators eager to politicize the issues.

Approval of a deal could take months and serve as a critical test for the suitability of private investors plunging ever deeper into highly regulated industries. Both state and federal officials would have to sign off, with state utility regulators finding that the sale was in the public interest.

DOJ_NMG_0137006

Any deal appears likely to deliver a windfall to Mr. Wilder, who negotiated a lucrative contract when he joined TXU in February 2004 from neighboring utility Entergy Corp. Under the terms of that agreement, he could be eligible for a change in control payment.

The Texas market is especially appealing to investors because it is geographically constrained, with almost no electrical connections to other states. This makes the entire state a sort of captive market, unable to import cheaper electricity from outside. Because prices mostly are set by expensive gas-fired generators, this gives lower-cost generators like TXU the ability to reap extraordinary profits from its power-generation business.

Write to Henny Sender at henny.sender@wsj.com3, Dennis K. Berman at dennis.berman@wsj.com4 and Rebecca Smith at rebecca.smith@wsj.com5

At $45 Billion, New Contender For Top Buyout (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin And Clifford Krauss

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

The biggest leveraged buyout ever is about to be surpassed. Again.

A group led by the private equity giants Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company and the Texas Pacific Group is near a deal to acquire the TXU Corporation, a Texas utility, for about $45 billion, according to people involved in the talks.

The amount of private money that is being offered is a huge financial endorsement of the company's energy strategy. TXU has irritated environmental advocates by proposing to build 11 coal-fired power plants in Texas. Despite calls for regulating greenhouse gases, TXU has been the most aggressive in the power industry in pushing coal as the answer to growing electricity demands. Nationwide, power companies are planning to build about 150 coal plants over the next several years.

The deal itself, if approved at a TXU board meeting tomorrow, would be a landmark. It would exceed the Blackstone Group's recent $39 billion acquisition of the office landlord Equity Office Properties, the largest buyout ever. And that would mean that Henry R. Kravis, a co-founder of Kohlberg Kravis Roberts, has managed to upstage, at least for the time being, his longtime rival in deals, Stephen A. Schwarzman, a co-founder of Blackstone.

Energy has been fairly recent territory for private equity. While energy deals accounted for 16 percent of all mergers last year, only 9 percent of those deals involved buyout firms, according to Thomson Financial. The first big foray came last year, when Kinder Morgan, the Texas pipeline giant that was created from some assets of the former Enron, was sold to a group that included Goldman Sachs, the American International Group, the Carlyle Group and Riverstone Holdings for $27.5 billion.

Awash in hundreds of billions of dollars, private equity firms, which raise money from pension funds and wealthy individuals, have taken on new targets in a buying spree. In 2006, private equity firms raised more than $174 billion for 205 funds, according to Thomson Financial.

Having just finished raising new supersize funds — K.K.R. and Blackstone are about to complete funds each worth more than $20 billion — and with banks and hedge funds willing to lend them money in record amounts with few restrictions or covenants, private equity has now begun to aim at even bigger prey. A deal the size of TXU will probably require that the private equity firms raise more than $30 billion in debt.

People involved in the talks cautioned that the deal still faced approval by TXU's board and several negotiating points remained, so the talks could collapse.

TXU did not respond to telephone requests for comment.

"It's a pretty dramatic development because TXU's position in electricity in Texas is controversial and uncertain," said Amy Myers Jaffe, an energy expert at the James A. Baker III Institute for Public Policy at Rice University in Houston.

TXU, based in Dallas, has 2.4 million customers in the state. It also owns and operates one of the largest lignite coal surface mining operations, producing 23 million tons a year. With its large, low-cost nuclear and coal-fired group of plants, it has been able to raise electricity prices to match the rise in natural gas prices the last three years.

Like other utility companies in recent years, TXU has sought to reinvent itself. A new management came in three years ago and sold natural gas assets after the price of natural gas soared, got out of speculative marketing, cleaned up its books and went back to its core business of electricity generation and transmission. The company's shares have been a favorite of Wall Street, rising from a low of $5.44 in 2002 to $60.02 yesterday.

But after being on the rise, the company has now hit strong headwinds. TXU's plans to build 11 coal-fired plants have faced increasing political opposition from environmental organizations, civic groups and prominent politicians like the mayor of Dallas, Laura Miller.

Rallies, hearings and informational meetings have been attracting crowds of critics around the state who view the plants as a symbol in the struggle to reduce global warming. Environmentalists believe if they can stop at least some of the plants in a conservative state like Texas, it will be a boon to activists around the country who oppose coal and favor renewable energy like solar and wind.

DOJ_NMG_0137007

TXU has said that the growing population and economy in Texas need more energy and has claimed that the plants will be cleaner than many older coal-fired plants in the state. They have also argued that coal gasification technologies, which environmentalists say would produce cleaner energy, are not yet ready for the marketplace. The 11 plants would have a capacity of more than 9,000 megawatts, about 3.5 percent of the nation's current coal-fired power and would cost an estimated $10 billion.

Recently, in response to criticism, TXU promised that the new plants would leave vacant space for future deployment of equipment designed to capture carbon dioxide so the climate-warming gas does not enter the atmosphere. Moreover, the company says it is conducting research on oxygen firing, chilled ammonia and other technologies to capture carbon.

TXU's plan was dealt a sharp blow, at least for the short term, by State District Judge Stephen Yelenosky, who on Tuesday ruled against a 2005 executive order by Gov. Rick Perry to put the plants' permit process on a regulatory fast-track. The judge issued a temporary injunction stating that the Texas governor, whose powers are limited compared with most state governors, did not have the authority to decide how much time regulatory agencies should take before issuing decisions.

The Texas Commission on Environmental Quality will make the ultimate decision on the permits, but not before administrative law hearings that promise to be rancorous.

Still, despite the uproar over the coal plants, TXU has many attractions for a potential buyer, analysts said. It is a strong company in a profitable business made all the more valuable because it operates in Texas, which has a growing economy and population base.

"Utilities right now have a lot of value because they have guaranteed cash flows and guaranteed rates of return which gives them guaranteed income," said Barbara Shook, an analyst with the Energy Intelligence Group, a publications and research firm. "And they have hard assets. In the post-Enron world, hard assets carry a lot of value."

"TXU is going to grow no matter what, because the state of Texas is growing and that translates into higher demand for electricity," she added.

The Texas energy scene is evolving. Still the center of the nation's oil business, it is also now the state with the most wind power production. Austin and other cities have become centers for renewable energy companies. But unlike California, Texas has been slow to develop conservation policies and has no goals for cutting carbon emissions.

Under the terms of the deal being discussed, the investors would pay about $70 a share for TXU, these people said. TXU's market value is about $27.5 billion. The company has more than $12 billion in debt.

Other private equity firms may join the group, these people said. A spokeswoman for K.K.R. declined to comment as did a spokesman for Texas Pacific.

TXU Set To Approve Record Private Equity Deal (FT)

By James Politi And Peter Smith

Financial Times, February 24, 2007

The board of TXU, one of America's largest utilities, was meeting on Sunday to approve a $44.5bn (€33.8bn, £22.7bn) takeover by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts and Texas Pacific Group, in what would rank as the largest private equity deal on record.

People familiar with the matter said that in the absence of any last-minute glitches in the negotiations, the deal, which would trump Blackstone's recent $38.9bn acquisition of Equity Office Properties in terms of size, could be announced as early as Sunday evening.

The two private equity buyers are expected to pay about $32bn in cash, or just under $70 a share, for TXU. This represents a 17 per cent premium over the company's market value on Friday. KKR and TPG will also agree to take on a $12bn chunk of TXU's outstanding debt.

A private equity takeover of TXU would extend a flurry of dealmaking by the world's largest buy-out groups, which have emerged as leading forces in high finance and business in recent years as they snapped up some of the biggest companies in a wide range of industries.

Based in Dallas, TXU is the top provider of electricity to the state of Texas, and has recently locked horns with environmentalists over plans to build 11 coal-fired power plants.

In advance of clinching a deal, KKR and TPG gained the backing of several environmental groups by agreeing to scrap plans to construct 8 of the 11 controversial plants.

The private equity buyers also pledged to support a reduction in carbon dioxide emissions to 1990 levels by 2020.

However, a private equity takeover of TXU could still face resistance if it is viewed as jeopardising the reliability of the electricity grid in Texas – or if it results in higher rates for consumer.

DOJ_NMG_0137008

In Europe, an intense political debate has erupted over whether private equity takeovers harm or benefit the economy, with union leaders and some politicians lining up the world's largest buy-out titans.

That tension is expected to intensify on Tuesday, when union protestors gather outside the Super Return conference in Frankfurt at which both TPG's David Bonderman and Blackstone's Steve Schwarzman are due to speak.

The structure of the TXU takeover is typical of the ways in which large leveraged buy-outs are being assembled on Wall Street. A number of large investment banks, including Goldman Sachs, are financing the deal through a massive package of bonds. The two buyers will be putting in $2.5bn of equity each into the deal, with Goldman adding a further $1.5bn of its own money and Lehman Brothers contributing $1bn of equity, one person involved in the talks said.

It remained unclear whether John Wilder, the TXU chief executive who will reap a large pay-out in the deal, will remain at the helm after the takeover. One person involved in the talks suggested TPG and KKR planned to bring in a number of high-profile business figures to help manage the process of gaining regulatory approval.

Some recent private equity deals have faced criticism for not securing a high enough price for shareholders. The merger agreement with TPG and KKR will allow TXU to shop itself to alternative bidders for 50 days, thanks to a "go-shop" clause that has become fairly standard in US public-to-private transactions.

$45 Billion Deal Near For Texas Power Firm (WP)

By David Cho And Steven Mufson, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, February 24, 2007

TXU Purchase Would Set Leveraged Buyout Mark

A consortium led by private-equity firms Kohlberg Kravis Roberts and Texas Pacific Group is nearing a deal worth close to $45 billion for a Texas energy giant in what would be the largest leveraged buyout ever, according to a source with knowledge of the negotiations.

News of an offer for TXU Corp., the largest power company in Texas, came a mere two weeks after the buyout record was set by the Blackstone Group's $39 billion purchase of Equity Office Properties Trust.

TXU's board could vote on the offer as soon as tomorrow.

Shares of TXU closed at $60.02 Friday, up $2.38. In after-hours trading the stock soared to $71 a share, up more than 18 percent.

A spokesman for Kohlberg Kravis Roberts and Texas Pacific Group declined to comment on the matter.

TXU has 2.4 million electricity customers in Texas and a network of generating stations, including two nuclear-powered and nine coal-fired plants. Deregulation recently took effect in the state, and the company has divided itself into three parts -- a regulated utility, a power wholesaler and a power generation unit with 18,300 megawatts of capacity.

But the company's claim to fame recently has been a controversy over its plan to build 11 conventional coal plants. That would more than double the company's emissions of carbon dioxide, the most prevalent of greenhouse gases, at a time when Congress is looking at ways to cap greenhouse gas-emissions.

It is not clear how a buyout would affect those plans. Part of the attraction of TXU is its location in a fast-growing state. The new plants could take advantage of its rapidly growing energy demand. But leveraged buyout firms usually trim costs and rarely expand a company's operations. And many executives in the industry have said they never expected the company to build all those plants anyway.

The private-equity firms are expected to propose around $70 per share for TXU and assume about $12 billion of its debt, putting the total value of the transaction at $44 billion to $45 billion.

If a buyout goes through, TXU would become a private company and no longer have to reveal its financial statements publicly or comply with federal regulations such as the Sarbanes-Oxley Act. But it probably would still have to disclose some information to state and federal power regulators.

That change is likely to draw scrutiny from members of Congress, especially those now devising ways to cap and reduce greenhouse gases. Some lawmakers have alleged that TXU might be expanding now so that the new plants would be included in its baseline emission levels. That would be important if Congress adopted a cap-and-trade system similar to Europe's, with allocations distributed to companies based on their past emissions.

Jeff Bingaman (D-N.M.), chairman of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, and Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.), chairwoman of the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee, last month wrote an op-ed article in the Dallas Morning News warning TXU and its investors that such a strategy wouldn't work.

"In fact, companies that appear to be inflating their emissions right before legislation is passed are likely to find themselves in a position of having to make even larger emissions reductions than companies that do not attempt this strategy," they wrote.

TXU says its expansion plans reflect the needs for more electricity in Texas.

DOJ_NMG_0137009

"Because our state is seeing such phenomenal economic growth, we're expected to add the population of Tennessee over the next decade in Texas," said Kimberly Morgan, a TXU spokeswoman. "Combine that with no new baseload generation being built. That presents a prime setup for generation in the state." (Morgan gave the interview before the proposed buyout became known.)

The TXU deal would exceed the infamous $31.3 billion leveraged buyout Kohlberg Kravis Roberts made for RJR Nabisco in 1989, memorialized in the book "Barbarians at the Gate."

In 2004, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts and Texas Pacific Group were part of a consortium that paid $3.7 billion for what was then the second-biggest power generating company in the state, Texas Genco. The investing group sold that utility for about $5.8 billion last year.

TXU Sale Could Cost $32 Billion (LAT)

By Janet Wilson, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 24, 2007

Sources say a deal for the utilities giant is expected to be the largest leveraged buyout ever.

Private investment companies Texas Pacific Group and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. are close to a deal to buy Texas utilities giant TXU Corp. in what is expected to be the largest leveraged buyout ever, according to people familiar with the negotiations.

The sale, slated to be announced Sunday, will include "not only the acquisition, but some very major announcements related to global warming," one person told The Times.

The Wall Street Journal, citing unidentified sources, said on its website that the buyout firms were expected to pay about $32 billion, or about $70 a share.

Dallas-based TXU has been moving aggressively to build an additional 11 coal-fired power plants upwind of Dallas and elsewhere in the state.

Environmental Defense and numerous other environmental groups and civic leaders have sued or otherwise protested the plants, saying they would add 78 million tons of greenhouse gases to the atmosphere annually. Texas already leads the nation in greenhouse gas emissions, widely believed to cause global warming. Smog, mercury emissions and other harmful pollutants also would be emitted.

Many private equity firms are jumping into solar, wind and other "alternative energy" investments, as dozens of states have adopted "renewable portfolio standards" requiring diversified energy, including so-called clean sources. Several members of Congress, including Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), have introduced or are preparing legislation that could cap greenhouse gases from coal plants and other electricity providers.

Fort Worth-based TXU lost a key legal round in building its new coal plants Tuesday when an administrative law judge threw out an executive order by Texas Gov. Rick Perry that fast-tracked environmental scrutiny of such plants. The next day, a state office about to begin air permit hearings on six of the proposed power plants instead postponed the hearings for four months.

Spokesmen for Texas Pacific and New York-based KKR declined comment. Calls to TXU were not returned.

Shares of TXU surged as high as $71 in after-hours trading, valuing the company at about $32 billion. The company has about $16 billion in debt, signaling the transaction may be valued at more than $48 billion.

Blackstone Group's purchase this month of Equity Office Properties Trust for $39 billion, including debt, was the largest previous buyout.

The possible TXU sale was first reported by CNBC.

TXU May Cut Rates In Buyout Bid (DMN)

By Elizabeth Souder And Katherine Yung, The Dallas Morning News Esouder@dallasnews.com And Kyung@dallasnews.com

The Dallas Morning News, February 24, 2007

Equity firms to bid up to $45 billion to take utility private

Two private equity firms are about to offer $40 billion to $45 billion for TXU Corp. in what would be the biggest buyout ever.

Texas Pacific Group and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. planned to announce their offer for the Dallas power company on Monday, said people with knowledge of the deal. The purchase would take TXU private.

TXU is facing public and political backlash over a plan to build 11 more coal-fired power plants and over high electricity prices.

DOJ_NMG_0137010

The offer set off speculation that new owners of Texas' largest power company may trim the plant building program and drop electricity rates to please regulators.

TXU officials didn't return phone calls Friday afternoon.

"It's staggering," said one Wall Street professional who preferred to remain anonymous. He said TXU is probably attractive to the buyout companies because the shares haven't risen in value as much as the shares of rival power companies.

"They'd be buying it because it's outrageously cheap," he added.

As for why TXU would sell, some experts said going private could allow the company to innovate without worrying about putting the share price on a roller coaster and facing the ire of Wall Street.

TXU shares rose 4 percent Friday afternoon, to close at $60.02, after news of the offer began to leak out. In after-hours trading, shares rose as high as $70.

The share price has dropped from all-time highs during the past few months as concern mounts about possible state and federal legislation that could limit the size of the company or the amount of pollution it would be allowed to emit.

If approved, the deal would be the largest acquisition ever, reflecting the current buyout binge sweeping the country. The previous record – the $39 billion purchase of Equity Office Properties Trust by the Blackstone Group – closed earlier this month.

The buyers, KKR and Fort Worth-based Texas Pacific, have teamed up before to make millions in the Texas energy sector. They were among a group of buyout firms that earned a more than sixfold return in little more than a year by buying and then quickly selling Texas Genco, a Houston wholesale power generation company, to NRG Energy Inc.

Utilities hold appeal for private equity firms because of their steady cash flows, which can be used to pay off the high debt levels usually loaded onto companies taken private.

But getting state regulatory approval for such deals has proven an obstacle for both firms. KKR and Texas Pacific failed to win approval for two separate buyouts involving utility companies in Oregon and Arizona.

Timing questioned

"This changes the entire landscape for everybody," said Dallas Mayor Laura Miller, who has spent the past six months trying to block permits for TXU's proposed coal plants.

"The timing is rather unsettling because it appears that this rush for the coal plants may have been to help build up the value of the company, because they would have had a nice corner on the electricity market with low-cost production units," she said.

Still, the mayor, who formed a coalition of cities that is taking part in TXU permit hearings, said she worries that a new owner might move TXU's headquarters out of Dallas.

The company's plan to build 11 plants ran into opposition from environmentalists, politicians, business leaders, rivals, and even Southern Baptists. The plan prompted the biggest environmental debate that Texas have ever seen, encompassing concern about pollution that can cause asthma and heart problems, as well as Texas' contribution to global warming.

This week, the administrative law judges handling TXU's permit hearing case delayed the hearing schedule by four months. The hearing officers bowed to a ruling from a state district court that an order from Gov. Rick Perry to speed up power plant permit hearings is probably unconstitutional. The decision was a setback for TXU's building program. Rather than getting a decision on permits this spring, the company will probably have to wait until the autumn.

And key Republican legislators have lashed out at the company for increasing retail electricity prices last year. The current session has brought a slew of legislation that could force TXU to break apart, cut its market share or drop prices.

Some lawmakers were briefed on the deal this week.

If TXU were private, executives wouldn't have to worry about the share price being affected by political shifts and public outrage.

Going private may also allow TXU to revolutionize the model of what it thinks a utility can be at a faster rate and with less hassle than if it remained a public company, said Ren Plastina, director of CIT Energy, which is part of the CIT Group, a New York-based commercial finance company.

"Utilities over the years have been relatively conservatively run," he said. "They haven't been particularly innovative. There's a lot that can be done with respect to new technologies."

Innovations

TXU executives have made it clear they wish to innovate. They will add technology to the TXU grid to support Internet service, and their strategy to design one, standard coal plant and replicate it across the country is novel.

Still, TXU has limited its risk in its coal plant program. While it has already ordered equipment for the proposed coal plants, at least one of the contracts could offer some flexibility for the new owners to build fewer plants.

DOJ_NMG_0137011

Tim Curran, president of Alstom U.S., said in an interview last week that TXU has ordered eight sets of emission control equipment from Alstom for the new plants. But Alstom is only working on three of the sets; he said work on five sets is suspended until he gets a green light to begin.

Both of the buyers, KKR and Texas Pacific Group, are flush with cash, after attracting more than $15 billion from investors for each of their latest funds.

Buyout firms are enjoying unprecedented boom times, thanks to a flood of cheap debt that has allowed them to team up with each other to make giant acquisitions. With so much money floating around, they are moving into nontraditional areas like casinos and high tech.

Texas Pacific has ownership stakes in two major local companies, the Neiman Marcus Group of Dallas and Southlake's Sabre Holdings Corp.

ABOUT TXU CORP.

Headquarters: Dallas

CEO: John Wilder

Revenue: $10 billion in 2005

Employees: 7,615

Retail customers: 2.4 million

Generating capacity: 18,300 megawatts

HISTORY

1882: Company is founded.

1917: It becomes Dallas Power & Light.

1945: DP&L joins two other utilities under the Texas Utilities holding company.

1984: The three utilities merge to become TU Electric.

1999: The TXU name is adopted.

Record Fine Expected For Univision (NYT)

By Stephen Labaton

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 23 — When Univision began broadcasting a show three years ago about the misadventures of 11-year-old identical twin girls who swapped identities after discovering they had been separated at birth, it characterized the episodes as educational programming for children.

That decision is expected to cost Univision, the nation's largest Hispanic network, $24 million in what would be the largest fine the Federal Communications Commission has ever imposed against any company. The penalty is also expected to send a strong signal to broadcasters that they will be expected to meet their required quota of shows that educate and inform children, after years of permissive oversight in this area.

The commission has decided to impose the heavy fine — disclosed by Kevin J. Martin, the chairman of the commission, in an interview — as a tough rebuke to Univision for claiming to meet its obligations to broadcast educational children's programs by showing the Latino soap opera "Complices al Rescate" ("Friends to the Rescue") and other so-called telenovelas.

The penalty, part of a settlement that will allow the company to proceed with a buyout deal, is nearly three times the previous record fine of $9 million, imposed against Qwest Communications for violating telephone interconnection rules in 2004, and significantly more than the largest indecency penalty, $3.5 million, levied against Viacom that same year for remarks by Howard Stern and other so-called shock jocks on the radio.

It also represents an unusually aggressive enforcement of the 1996 regulations that interpreted the Children's Television Act. Those regulations, adopted after some broadcasters characterized cartoons like "The Flintstones" and "The Jetsons" to be educational programs, imposed more substantive requirements on the networks as they comply with the mandate to broadcast at least three hours a week of programs of intellectual value to young people.

Although some television critics say it is common for stations not to comply, only a handful of complaints have been filed. An even smaller number have resulted in modest penalties of several thousand dollars for stations found to have violated the rules.

Reflecting the views of many policy leaders in Washington who were appointed by President Bush, Mr. Martin said that he was committed to deregulation "and an environment where companies can be investing and competing and driving innovation." But he also said that he was not driven simply by ideology, and that there remain important areas where thorough regulation plays a valuable social role.

DOJ_NMG_0137012

"I generally think consumers are better served by less regulation, not more," he said in an interview. "But I also think the commission has a key role to play in some areas, such as children's television, and I take those obligations seriously."

The agency under Mr. Martin adopted new rules last year to make the children's television programming requirements apply to new digital television stations.

The $24 million fine, along with a plan to show more programming that would comply with the rules, are part of a consent decree that Univision has tentatively agreed to that would resolve complaints by viewers. It covers violations at 24 Univision stations over a 116-week period from 2004 to early last year.

Mr. Martin has already signed onto the decree. Once the full commission approves it, as expected, Univision will be able to complete its $12 billion sale to a consortium of private equity firms. Those investors include Providence Equity Partners, where a senior executive is Michael K. Powell, the former F.C.C. chairman, and Haim Saban, a wealthy investor who built a major business on the Mighty Morphin Power Rangers action figures.

Lawyers representing Univision before the commission declined to comment about the case.

The fine was applauded by some Democrats in Congress who have long been dissatisfied with the agency for failing to press broadcasters to provide higher- quality programming for children.

"As the prime House author of the Children's Television Act, I am pleased the commission is pursuing serious and vigorous enforcement of violations," said Representative Edward J. Markey, the Massachusetts Democrat who heads the House subcommittee on telecommunications and the Internet. "This is a particularly egregious case and the level of the proposed fine reflects it. Rather than giving kids programming that is educationally nourishing, Univision elected to give them the Spanish-language equivalent of a soap opera.."

The case dates to the summer of 2005, when the United Church of Christ raised concerns about Univision's programming lineup, complaining that it was failing to provide adequate children's programs. The network claimed it was meeting its obligation by repeatedly rebroadcasting the same episodes of the telenovela. The commission's staff found that 24 stations had violated the programming guidelines over a two-year period.

Angela J. Campbell, a telecommunications expert at Georgetown University Law Center who represents the church, appeared stunned by the decision.

"Assuming it's true, I'm pleased to see the commission finally taking action and I hope they will take action soon on other petitions we have filed in this area," Professor Campbell said. "Broadcasters need to know that they have to take these obligations to children seriously."

Univision had maintained that it satisfied its programming obligations for children by broadcasting several telenovelas, including "Complices al Rescate"

"A significant purpose and key educational objective of this program is to illustrate how friendship, love and kindness can help overcome life's adversities," the network's lawyers said in their brief before the commission. " 'Complices al Rescate' follows the lives of two 11-year-old girls, Silvana and Mariana, who have both experienced sadness, loss and injustice in their lives. Throughout the shows, the girls learn to appreciate that happiness is not found in popularity and money, but in true friendship, good will towards others and love."

But Mr. Martin said the commission found little merit to that argument, and critics said the show, with complex subplots and occasional adult themes, had little value for young children.

In an affidavit accompanying the United Church's complaint, Federico Subervi, a media consultant to such shows as "Dora the Explorer" and "The Misadventures of Maya and Miguel" said that "Complices" contained many adult plots and complex themes that were hardly suitable for young children.

As further evidence that the program did not comply with the rules, Mr. Subervi noted that 80 percent of the advertising during the show was geared toward adults.

A Software Maker Goes Up Against Microsoft (NYT)

By Steve Lohr

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

VMware, a young Silicon Valley company, is the early leader in a fast-growing market for what is called virtual-machine software. And that puts it on a collision course with Microsoft, the industry's Goliath.

A virtual machine essentially mimics a computer so that several copies of an operating system — say, Windows or Linux or both — can run on one physical machine. It allows computing chores to be done on fewer computers, using less electricity and taking up less space, promising a way to control costs at corporate data centers straining to keep up with the ever-increasing demands of the Internet age.

DOJ_NMG_0137013

It is also a product that occupies strategic ground in computing, as a layer of code that resides between a computer's hardware and the operating system, usurping some tasks, and potentially undermining the importance of the operating system.

In a meeting with corporate customers in New York last month, Steven A. Ballmer, Microsoft's chief executive, said, "Everybody in the operating system business wants to be the guy on the bottom," the software that controls the hardware. And he vowed that Microsoft, whose Windows operating systems are the main source of its corporate wealth and market power, would "compete very aggressively with VMware."

When quizzed on Microsoft's plans, Mr. Ballmer replied, "Our view is that virtualization is something that should be built into the operating system."

Bundling new technology into Windows has long been the Microsoft game plan. The most storied case came a decade ago when Microsoft overcame the challenge posed by another Silicon Valley highflier, Netscape, offering another crucial layer of software, the Internet browser. Microsoft feared a competitor's Web browser, running on top of the operating system, could reduce the power of Windows.

"There are certainly some analogies here to what Microsoft did with Netscape," said Mendel Rosenblum, a founder of VMware and its chief scientist.

The tactics Microsoft used in the browser battle, of course, led to a host of antitrust troubles for the big software maker in the United States and Europe.

This time, in the market for virtual-machine software, Microsoft is more restrained. Bowing to customer requests, Microsoft began more than a year ago to change its software licenses so its products could run in virtual machines like VMware offerings.

But in recent months, according to VMware, Microsoft has introduced new restrictions on how Microsoft products can be used in virtual machines in new ways, beyond simply dividing a single physical computer into several virtual ones.

This next wave of virtual technology, analysts say, includes software that lets virtual machines move freely across many physical machines, juggling computing chores, so that applications do not crash and Web response times are faster. Another promising new ability is running desktop personal computers as virtual-machine software, hosted and managed securely from a data center.

VMware, however, points to license changes on Microsoft software that it says limit the ability to move virtual-machine software around data centers to automate the management of computing work. A white paper detailing VMware's concerns will be posted Monday on its Web site (www.vmware.com), the company said.

"Microsoft is looking for any way it can to gain the upper hand," said Diane Greene, the president of VMware.

Yet VMware is making no antitrust claims against Microsoft, and legal experts question whether the friction between the companies is anything more than two rivals taking different paths to an emerging market.

"This seems to be a far more subtle, informed and polished form of competitive aggression than we've seen from Microsoft in the past," said Andrew I. Gavil, a law professor at Howard University. "And Microsoft has no obligation to facilitate a competitor."

In the past, said Mike Neil, general manager of virtualization strategy at Microsoft, customers paid a license fee when Windows was installed on a physical machine. But he said virtual-machine software breaks the tight link between the operating system and the hardware, raising the possibility that customers could be using Windows more but not paying for it. So now, he said, the license fee is based on when a copy of Windows is used, whether in a virtual or physical machine.

The license changes, Mr. Neil added, were not designed as a competitive tool. And he sees no evidence of any anticompetitive impact. "Look at VMware's financial success and you have to ask, How disadvantaged are they really?" he observed.

VMware is certainly thriving these days. Its sales reached $709 million in 2006, nearly double the previous year's figure. In the fourth quarter, revenue was $232 million, growing 100 percent from the year-earlier quarter.

VMware was founded in 1998 by Mr. Rosenblum, an operating-systems expert and an associate professor at Stanford University; Ms. Greene, a veteran of Silicon Graphics, Tandem, Sybase and a couple of start-ups, who is also Mr. Rosenblum's wife; and three other computer scientists, Scott Devine, Edouard Bugnion and Edward Wang.

Virtual-machine software dates to the 1960s, when I.B.M. used the technology to coax greater performance from costly mainframes. The achievement of Mr. Rosenblum and his team of Stanford-trained researchers was to develop virtual-machine software that worked, fast and reliably, on today's lower-cost machines powered by microchips made by Intel and Advanced Micro Devices.

By late 2003, VMware was profitable and growing strongly, and its payroll was approaching 400 people. Its future would depend on keeping its talented team of computer scientists in place, and Google and others were dangling offers. So VMware agreed to sell itself for $635 million in cash to EMC, a leader in data storage systems that was expanding into software. VMware had talked to other companies including I.B.M. and Microsoft. But EMC, not being a major software company, offered VMware more independence.

DOJ_NMG_0137014

This month, EMC said it would give VMware an added measure of independence with a separate stock listing and its own shares to help retain its current work force of more than 2,500, and lure new talent. EMC will sell 10 percent of VMware in an initial public offering in the summer that analysts say is likely to value the company at 10 times what EMC paid for it just three years ago.

VMware's growth is explained by the experience of customers like the International Truck and Engine Corporation, a producer of diesel engines, trucks and school buses. A few years ago, Barry Naber, a technology manager at International Truck, the operating company of Navistar International, began looking for ways to curb the growth of server computers in its data center.

Mr. Naber opted for VMware virtual-machine software, and today the company runs 230 applications, including expense, accounting, training and Web programs on 18 computers in its computer center in suburban Chicago. He estimates the savings for each virtual machine at $7,500 in hardware and maintenance costs avoided, or about $1.7 million.

Mr. Naber also looked at Microsoft's virtualization offering, but in tests found it was far slower and less reliable than VMware. "We're entrenched with VMware for now," he said.

One thing that Microsoft has lacked is a hypervisor, the lowest level of software that rests on the hardware and partitions the computer so it can cleanly and efficiently run several virtual machines. Microsoft is developing a Windows hypervisor code-named Viridian. It will be tailored for the next version of the Windows server operating system, called Longhorn, scheduled to ship by the end of 2007. Viridian will be ready shortly after that. "Virtualization, frankly, is a feature," Mr. Neil, the Microsoft manager, said. "It's a great operating system feature."

Microsoft has built up its virtual-machine team in the last few years with internal hiring and a couple of small acquisitions. And having identified virtual software technology as a core ingredient to its operating system, Microsoft promises to become a daunting competitor eventually.

Yet today, VMware holds an estimated 80 percent of the market for virtual-machine software that runs on computers powered by industry-standard Intel and A.M.D. microprocessors. "The market could change depending on what Microsoft does down the road, but VMware is the 800-pound gorilla of virtualization," said John Humphreys, an analyst at IDC, a research firm.

In the long term, VMware will also face competition from start-ups in the virtual-machine software market like Virtual Iron and XenSource. The start-ups note that only 5 to 7 percent of computers in data centers use virtual software. They see a market that is just beginning to take off with plenty of opportunity, if they can match VMware's technology and charge less.

Virtual Iron and XenSource take opposing views on Microsoft's recent moves. "Microsoft sees VMware coming between them and their customers," said John Thibault, president of Virtual Iron. "So Microsoft is manipulating its license terms to see if it can freeze the market and slow down the trend."

For its part, XenSource signed a deal last year with Microsoft to collaborate so that XenSource's software will work well with the virtualization technology Microsoft is developing for the Windows Longhorn server. "We set out to partner with Microsoft," said Peter Levine, president of XenSource, "and VMware chose to compete with Microsoft."

VMware, according to Microsoft, should see the wisdom of the path XenSource chose. In his meeting with corporate customers recently, Mr. Ballmer sketched out a future in which Microsoft would put fundamental virtual-machine software in its operating systems, and "VMware builds on top."

VMware is leery of such an accommodation, fearing it would prove to be a one-sided bargain. "We will not sign agreements that give Microsoft control of this layer," Ms. Greene said.

Tuning In To One Company (NYT)

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

Vigorous competition in the private sector has served the United States economy and consumers extremely well, providing a greater array of choices, more innovation and lower prices. The two — and only — satellite radio companies are now eager to merge and are arguing that together, they will prove to be the exception to the rule.

The industry is important and still young. We urge regulators to take a hard look at the companies' proposal before leaving the field in the hands of a single player.

Sirius and XM provide subscription radio services for some 14 million customers, with each company beaming more than 100 channels of music and talk radio, much of it without commercials. The services — both less than six years old — have generated considerable excitement with things like high-profile and high-price deals, including the $725 million in cash and stock that the shock-jock Howard Stern is reported to have signed for.

DOJ_NMG_0137015

Together the two services have also managed to accumulate $6 billion in losses since receiving their licenses a decade ago.

The companies' managers argue that the $13 billion merger could finally make them profitable by letting them cut costs and redundant programs, while giving consumers more programming options for their bucks. As for the fear of creating a monopoly, they argue that competition will still come from terrestrial radio (commonly known as AM and FM), iPods and other next-generation technologies.

It is important to remember that these are not widget makers. Radios carry important discourse and debate — they are vital to the free exchange of ideas protected by the First Amendment. Recent experience shows that media consolidation usually leads to more homogeneous content, politically as well as artistically, and it rarely benefits the consumer or the country.

There is also the question of what precedent would be set if regulators accepted the broadest possible definition of audio competition, and whether that could lead to even more mergers in radio. No less troubling are reports that the companies believe that they have an incentive to merge before the Bush administration and its overly friendly-to-business regulators leave office.

The companies should, of course, be allowed to argue their case. And consumers should voice their opinions as well. Unless they want to pay for both services, subscribers are currently missing out on exclusive shows: Mr. Stern can be heard only on Sirius, and the nation's empathizer in chief, Oprah Winfrey, only on XM. Sports fans who want football and baseball have to pay for both services.

Consumers should also recognize that XM and Sirius compete vigorously for customers, talent and corporate partners. Both even charge the same rate, $12.95 a month, a price that might well rise if there was no competition.

When XM's and Sirius's licenses were granted, the Federal Communications Commission stipulated that "one licensee will not be permitted to acquire control of the other." The chairman of the F.C.C., Kevin Martin, reiterated that point this week but left the door open to a possible merger, saying, "The companies would need to demonstrate that consumers would clearly be better off with both more choice and affordable prices." We are skeptical about the chances of that happening.

MP3 Patent Verdict Harmless To Music Fans -- For Now (WP)

By Alan Sipress And Mike Musgrove, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, February 24, 2007

Don't worry. The authorities aren't coming to confiscate your MP3 player because of a patent infringement ruling this week that involves the technology behind digital music.

The verdict, if upheld, could cost Microsoft $1.52 billion or more in damages. And that could end up costing you, as manufacturers pass on the expense of paying royalties to Alcatel-Lucent, which a federal jury in San Diego found to be the rightful owner of the technology.

But those costs aren't likely to come for some time, if at all, industry analysts and patent lawyers said yesterday.

The technology industry was abuzz over Thursday's unexpected verdict, which included what lawyers said was the largest patent award in history, and its significance for the MP3 format that is at the heart of the booming market for digital music.

Though the verdict could affect hundreds of companies that use the technology in various devices, experts said consumers would not suddenly be unable to obtain or play MP3 files. Even in the long run, there may be no effect on consumers if the verdict is overturned on appeal. Microsoft's lawyers have said they will appeal both the jury's finding that the company infringed on the patents and the amount of its award to Alcatel-Lucent.

Paul Saffo, a Silicon Valley technology forecaster who teaches at Stanford University, said he thought there was a good chance that the verdict would be overturned. "I don't think there's a credible worst-case scenario," he said.

But Roger L. Kay, a technology industry analyst, said small companies working on low margins to manufacture MP3 players could be vulnerable if the verdict results in licensing fees beyond what they can afford.

"For some of those guys, something like this could be catastrophic," Kay said. While larger companies such as Apple and AOL may be able to pay Alcatel-Lucent's fees, "there will be others that are marginal to begin with, and something like this could put them out of business."

The legal dispute turns on two patents for technology developed at Bell Laboratories, which later became part of Lucent Technologies. Alcatel bought Lucent last year and inherited the patents.

Both patents relate to how music is converted into small digital files. One of the patents is for a method of analyzing sound to gauge whether it is more like music or noise, then representing it in digital form based on that determination. The other patent pertains to the process for determining whether the sound is audible to the human ear and then converting only that audible part into digital form.

Hundreds of companies that thought they had properly licensed the MP3 format from Germany's Fraunhofer Institute, which was also involved in developing the MP3 technology, could be financially liable for infringing on Alcatel-Lucent's patents.

DOJ_NMG_0137016

"Because of the uncertainty created by the verdict, you are going to see Alcatel-Lucent out there trying to use the verdict as a lever to get companies playing in the MP3 area to get licenses now," said Martin M. Zoltick, a Washington patent attorney.

He predicted that some companies will wait for the outcome of the appeal before paying Alcatel-Lucent, while others will want to obtain licenses sooner to end the uncertainty. If the verdict is upheld in U.S. circuit court, more companies would give in while a few would hang on to see whether the case is accepted by the Supreme Court for consideration, Zoltick said.

Alcatel-Lucent sued Microsoft over audio-file technology that the software giant first included in its Windows operating system in 1998 and later built into its Windows Media Player.

But the MP3 format is now so widely used that the jury's verdict could affect manufacturers of products well beyond desktop computers. MP3 technology is also used in mobile phones, digital-music players, handheld computers, video games and car audio systems.

About 400 companies, including some of the world's largest technology companies, have licensed MP3 technology from Thomson Technology, a San Diego firm that identifies itself as a representative of the Fraunhofer Institute.

In a prepared statement, Thomson said yesterday that it does not license the two patents at issue in the court case. Thomson said it had the rights to 20 other families of patents that cover some of the standards for compressed audio files and are essential to implementing MP3 technology.

"MP3 is the world's most popular compressed audio technology, and we look forward to its continued popularity," the company said.

But some experts suggested that the fear of litigation and increased royalties could force companies to adopt other formats for audio files, including open-source technology. Apple, maker of the popular iPod music payer, uses a format called AAC for its iTunes music store.

ENVIRONMENT:

President Promotes Alternative Energy With A Car Show Of Sorts (NYT)

By Matthew L. Wald

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 23 — President Bush turned to alternative fuels, and alternative companies, to argue Friday that his goal for reining in gasoline consumption in the coming decade was realistic.

On the South Lawn of the White House, Mr. Bush inspected a version of the Toyota Prius, the popular Japanese gas-electric hybrid, that had been rigged with a Canadian-built battery pack to allow it to operate more of each day on electricity, along with a South Korean sport utility truck modified by a small California company to run entirely on batteries.

Neither is now a mass-market product, but each, the president said, is evidence that entrepreneurs will rush in to solve the nation's oil addiction. He called on Congress to approve financing that he has requested for research.

The administration has set a goal of reducing gasoline consumption within 10 years by 20 percent from current forecasts. The question is, Which technologies will prove viable?

The modified Prius shown Friday carried an extra battery pack in the space intended for the spare tire and had undergone software modification, so that it used more battery power than a standard Prius, reaching higher speeds before starting up the gasoline engine.

Ric Fulop, vice president of A123 Systems of Watertown, Mass., which modified the car, said a battery that would power it for about 40 miles between overnight chargings cost $10,000 and would last through 7,000 cycles of charging and discharging — "more than the life of the vehicle."

The electric truck can go 130 miles between chargings, said Bryon Bliss, vice president at Phoenix Motorcars of Ontario, Calif. The company has orders for 75, at $45,000 each, and hopes to sell 500 this year and 6,000 next year, Mr. Bliss said.

To a repeated question as to whether he would consider one of the vehicles for his ranch in Texas, Mr. Bush simply wished the assembled reporters a good weekend and returned to the Oval Office.

Texas: B.P. Settles 2 Lawsuits (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

The energy giant BP has settled two more lawsuits stemming from a 2005 explosion at its Texas City oil refinery that killed 15 people and injured more than 170, the company and a lawyer for two injured contract workers said. Terms of the deal were not released. Jury selection had been set for next week over lawsuits filed by the workers, E. J. Godeaux and Clarence Kinard.

DOJ_NMG_0137017

Theirs would have been the first cases connected to the blast to go to court. Mr. Godeaux, 61, a painter and sandblaster from Texas City, had neck and back injuries, and his right eardrum was blown out. Mr. Kinard, 67, a boilermaker from Cleveland, Tex., injured his back and experienced hearing loss.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Arellano's Arrest Location Challenged (SDUT)

By Kelly Thornton, Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, February 24, 2007

Captain questioned on yacht's position

DOWNTOWN SAN DIEGO – The captain of the yacht on which suspected drug kingpin Francisco Javier Arellano Félix was arrested last summer has become the center of a fascinating legal debate with international political implications.

Capt. Edgar Omar Osorio took the witness stand yesterday during an unusual pretrial hearing, and questions by Arellano's lawyers seemed to lead in one direction: Did the arrest take place in international waters, as prosecutors maintain, or did U.S. officials apprehend him outside their jurisdiction, in Mexican waters?

Perhaps the more important question is, does it matter where the Aug. 14 arrest occurred?

Prosecutors say the questioning is an irrelevant sideshow with no impact on the facts of the case. But if the incident happened in Mexico, defense attorneys could seek dismissal of the case because Arellano was illegally arrested. Failing that, they could ask that evidence seized on the boat be thrown out because it was the result of an unlawful seizure.

It could also affect the U.S. government's ability to seek the death penalty.

Traditionally, Mexico has refused to send anyone to the United States who would face the death penalty, which is barred in Mexico. There could be political ramifications if the U.S. government violated international law and breached the sovereignty of Mexico to apprehend Arellano.

But cooperation on extradition matters between the two countries has improved significantly in recent months. Some legal observers wonder how motivated Mexican officials would be to intervene on behalf of an Arellano, and perhaps disrupt the dismantling of its most feared drug cartel.

Since Mexican President Felipe Calderón was sworn into office in December, he has cleared the way for the extradition of 15 reputed drug lords, including four who were indicted in San Diego years ago. The action was called “unprecedented in scope and importance” by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

Even if Arellano was taken in Mexican waters, the U.S. Supreme Court has already ruled in a case with similar allegations that the U.S. government violated Mexico's sovereignty and the extradition treaty between the two nations.

In 1992 the court upheld the kidnapping in Mexico of Humberto Alvarez Machain by operatives paid by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration. The operatives brought Machain to the United States to face charges in the torture and murder of drug agent Enrique Camarena.

Although a U.S. district judge later acquitted the Mexican doctor, his abduction in Mexico was viewed as a violation of sovereignty – but the high court did not dismiss the case.

Security was tight at yesterday's hearing attended by Arellano and a co-defendant, Manuel Arturo Villarreal Heredia. Bomb-sniffing dogs swept the courtroom before anyone was allowed inside.

Arellano and Villarreal are charged, along with Arellano brothers Benjamín and Eduardo and seven others, with overseeing the shipment of tons of cocaine into the United States on fishing boats, private planes, trucks and commercial airliners.

The organization also is accused of the murders of at least 14 people in Mexico and six in Southern California. The family-operated cartel began building a power base in 1989 and has been linked to hundreds of murders in Baja California, including high-ranking police officials and others caught in the crossfire.

Defense attorneys said Javier Arellano was arrested off Cabo San Lucas, Baja California, aboard the 42-foot yacht Dock Holiday. Prosecutors have said signals from a secretly installed global positioning device indicated the arrest took place 1.1 miles into international waters.

Osorio, a longtime boat captain, initially refused to talk to prosecutors or testify before a grand jury. But recently, after almost six months in custody, he approached the government and agreed to talk, saying his wife had died in Mexico while he was jailed, and his children need him. The government said Osorio has no information that is germane to the prosecution's case and no longer opposes his release.

U.S. District Judge Larry Burns rejected a request by Arellano's lawyers yesterday to continue to hold Osorio. They had argued that they may need him to testify on behalf of Arellano at trial.

Burns said Osorio's videotaped deposition would suffice, and the captain will be released and returned to Mexico after his deposition, which is expected to conclude Monday. Osorio was held only as a witness and was never charged with a crime.

At the hearing, defense attorney Mark Adams said he and co-counsel David Bartick urged the judge to grant a request that the government provide more "pings" – the signals transmitted by the global positioning device on the boat to a satellite, which showed the position of the yacht.

The government has already turned over to the defense two such pings, one before the arrest, and one after, which they say indicates the arrests occurred in international waters.

The defense claims the pings they have are inconclusive and they want all signals from the weekend before the arrest to better track the boat.

The defense attorneys said they had previously questioned Osorio outside court and feel "he is not being truthful in regard to . . . the geographic location of the Dock Holiday during that weekend."

Kelly Thornton: (619) 542-4571; kelly.thornton@uniontrib.com

Homemade Pipe Bombs Often Lethal, Expert Says (EPT)

By Tammy Fonce-Olivas

El Paso Times, February 24, 2007

Each of the homemade explosives two Lower Valley men allegedly attempted to sell to undercover federal agents earlier this week had the destructive power to seriously injure or kill a person, a federal official said Friday.

"It could have caused a lot of damage," said Tom Crowley, spokesman with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

The bombs Alfredo Rubio, 23, of San Elizario, and Juan Ortiz, 22, of Socorro, allegedly tried to sell to an undercover ATF agent on Wednesday were explosive devices, each made of about 12 inches of PVC pipe that contained smokeless powder, steel BBs and a carbon dioxide cartridge.

Crowley said pipe bombs are so dangerous because they contain shrapnel -- usually nails, glass or other dangerous objects -- that become projectiles when the bomb explodes.

The size of the pipe bomb, which can range from 2 inches long to much larger, determines whether the detonation created by the explosive causes serious injury or even death, said El Paso police Sgt. Peter Pacillas, a supervisor on the department's bomb squad.

Advertisement

"It's an improvised explosive device, so it depends on who's making them and how they're making them," Pacillas said. "If they don't kill you, you're going to be seriously maimed."

The El Paso Police Department, one of several agencies involved in the case, was in charge of transporting and detonating the suspected pipe bombs as the only regional bomb squad in the area.

Rubio and Ortiz were arrested Wednesday. Each is charged with conspiracy to make at least 15 pipe bombs.

An affidavit attached to the criminal complaint against the men alleges that the men were "fully aware of the pipe bombs' capabilities as a destructive device" during their interaction with the undercover agents.

Tammy Fonce-Olivas may be reached at tfonce@elpasotimes.com; 546-6362.

El Paso Times reporter Darren Meritz contributed to this story.

IMMIGRATION:

Bush Plan To Allow Mexican Truckers Throughout U.S. Draws Criticism (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 23 (AP) — A Bush administration plan to allow 100 Mexican trucking companies to haul freight deeper into the United States than previously allowed drew an angry reaction Friday from labor leaders, safety advocates and members of Congress.

The administration plan, announced Thursday, would have United States inspectors oversee Mexican trucking companies that carry cargo across the border. The pilot project will let Mexican truck companies travel throughout the United States. No hazardous material shipments will be permitted.

Currently, trucks from each country are allowed only 20 miles into the other to deliver their cargo.

DOJ_NMG_0137019

Offering details on Friday, Transportation Secretary Mary E. Peters said, “This program will make trade with Mexico easier and keep our roads safe at the same time.”

But opponents said Mexico had substandard trucks and low-paid drivers that would threaten national security, cost thousands of jobs and endanger motorists.

James P. Hoffa, president of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, said, “They are playing a game of Russian roulette on America’s highways.”

According to the Transportation Department, inspectors will examine every truck and interview drivers to ensure they can read and speak English. They will examine trucks and check the licenses, insurance and driving records of the Mexican drivers, and they will verify that their employers are insured by companies licensed in the United States.

The first Mexican trucks are expected to drive beyond the border area in about 60 days, the Transportation Department said.

Under the 1993 North American Free Trade Agreement, access to all United States highways was promised by 2000, as was access through Mexico for American carriers. That aspect of Nafta was stalled by lawsuits and disagreements.

Deborah Hersman, a member of the National Transportation Safety Board, questioned how the United States could spare sending inspectors to Mexico when only a tiny percentage of American truck companies were inspected every year.

Mexican carriers insist their equipment meets United States standards. According to the Transportation Department, 240 federal and 300 state government employees deal with Mexican truck issues.

Senator Patty Murray, the Washington Democrat who leads the Appropriations Subcommittee on Transportation, announced a March 8 hearing to determine whether the plan met safety requirements.

U.S. To Allow Mexican Trucks (WSJ)

By Robert Guy Matthews

The Wall Street Journal, February 24, 2007

Pilot Program Resolves Nafta Issue but Upsets Teamsters, Lawmakers

WASHINGTON -- Following a decade of dispute, the U.S. will open its highways to Mexican cargo trucks, in a move that could alter the economics of the domestic trucking industry and is already uniting some American lawmakers, unions and trucking companies to oppose the change.

The Transportation Department on Friday said it is starting a pilot program that could begin as soon as April that will allow 100 Mexican trucking companies unfettered access to U.S. roads. Under the program, both drivers and trucks must first pass certain safety checks designed and overseen by U.S. officials in Mexico. The program could eventually be expanded to include additional Mexican trucking firms.

If the trial succeeds, the U.S. trucking industry could change drastically. Mexican drivers are paid one-third to 40% less than their U.S. counterparts, who make an average of about $40,000 a year. An influx of Mexican truckers would be a boon for U.S. businesses with production lines in Mexico, by decreasing costs and delays from the current need to shift U.S.-bound goods at the border to American trucks from Mexican ones. According to the Census Bureau, the U.S. imported $198 billion of goods from Mexico in 2006.

Some trucking companies in the U.S. vowed to block the move, which they say will hurt them. The opposition comes against a backdrop of rising protectionist sentiments that helped propel Democrats to take back Congress in November and increasingly is coloring trade-policy debates in Washington.

The issue of whether to allow Mexican freight trucks on U.S. roads has been controversial for more than a decade. Under the North American Free Trade Agreement, ratified by Congress in 1993, the U.S. and Mexico were supposed to open their roads to each other's trucks, at least partially, as part of a broader push to strengthen bilateral economic and trade ties. But the trucking agreement was put on hold in 1995 after U.S. trucker unions and other opponents lobbied lawmakers to block such a move. They argued that Mexican trucks were unsafe, caused pollution and would facilitate illegal immigration.

Implementation of the agreement ran up against other barriers, including Congress's imposition in 2001 of a set of safety requirements that had to be met before the U.S. could open the border to Mexican trucks. In June 2004, the Supreme Court ruled that the president had the power to decide whether Mexican trucks could enter the country, but it took three years for the U.S. and Mexico to reach an agreement, signed Thursday, that will allow U.S. officials to conduct safety inspections in Mexico. It will also allow U.S. trucks in Mexico, though that isn't usually cost-effective.

Andrew J. Gillespie, director of transportation for Ansell Healthcare Products LLC in New Jersey, said the new open-roads policy means his business won't lose time and money when transporting work-glove materials from Mexico to New Jersey for final assembly. "We have been waiting years and years for this change."

DOJ_NMG_0137020

Currently, businesses shipping goods to the U.S. from Mexico must use three drivers and three tractors to move freight. Under the pilot program, Mexican trucks will be able to go directly to their destinations in the U.S.

The American Trucking Associations, the country's largest trucking-industry group and a representative of some U.S. trucking companies that operate out of Mexico, voiced support for the pilot program. It said the program would improve efficiency and reduce pollution from idled trucks.

But some past opponents of opening up vowed to continue to fight the move. "We are on this thing, and we are going to be contacting members of Congress, because we are very concerned about highway safety," said Jim Hoffa, president of the Teamsters union, which represents many truckers. "There is such political pressure to do things to save money for big corporations."

Todd Spencer, executive vice president of the Owner-Operator Independent Drivers Association, which represents mostly small-business truckers in the U.S., said his group would also fight the policy, which he expects will cause companies with divisions in Mexico to use more Mexican trucks to lower labor costs. "We are going to raise this as a safety issue, because this is a problem for us," he said.

Sen. Patty Murray (D., Wash.), head of the Senate Appropriations Committee's transportation subcommittee, said she will hold a hearing on March 8 to make sure safety regulations will be met.

Rep. James Oberstar (D., Minn.), chairman of the House Transportation Committee, has opposed allowing Mexican trucks into the U.S. on the grounds that they aren't as safe as U.S. vehicles. He questioned whether the Transportation Department had the necessary systems in place to safeguard Americans on the road.

"The U.S. is obligated to live up to its commitments under the North American Free Trade Agreement, but not at the expense of the safety of our citizens," he said. "We cannot afford to pursue policies that represent a step backward in terms of safety."

U.S., Mexico And Canada Discuss Border Issues (NYT)

By Christopher Mason

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

OTTAWA, Feb. 23 — American, Mexican and Canadian cabinet ministers met here on Friday to set the agenda for a meeting later this year by the leaders of the three countries, with the discussions taking an increased focus on protecting cross-border trade in the face of increasing border security measures.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez met their Canadian and Mexican counterparts amid concerns that new United States border restrictions — particularly the requirement of passports, beginning in January 2008, for land and sea crossings — would hamper the $880 billion in annual trade among the countries.

No firm agenda emerged for a planned meeting later this year of President Bush, President Felipe Calderón of Mexico and Prime Minister Stephen Harper of Canada. But officials here were optimistic that the countries could continue to increase trade despite concerns by Canada over the passport requirement and by Mexico about United States plans to erect a security wall along their border.

“This is a broad agenda that is going to make life better for people, and it is the only way that we can achieve security and prosperity,” Ms. Rice said.

The passport requirement has been controversial in Canada, but its leaders have said they will adjust to, and not protest, the changes.

“We recognize that that will have an effect on life in general,” Public Safety Minister Stockwell Day said. “That is why we pursue the areas of seeing our countries being as competitive as possible.”

Borders Without Fences (NYT)

By Ted Kerasote

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

IN the debate over how to prevent illegal immigration from Mexico into the United States — armed patrols, electronic surveillance, prison time for first offenders and a 700-mile-long 15-foot-high fence — few politicians have voiced concern over the last option’s profound effects on wildlife.

Authorized by the Secure Fence Act of 2006, this barrier (83 miles of which have already been built) will bisect a border region that has some of the most ecologically diverse landscapes in the hemisphere. It is here — in a land of deserts, mountains, conifers and cactus — that bird species from North and Central America share territories and cross paths during migrations. It is here that endangered wildlife, like the jaguar and gray wolf, have an opportunity to reoccupy lands from which they were extirpated during the last century.

DOJ_NMG_0137021

The list of other beautiful common or rarely seen animals that live along the border is long. A small sampling would include cougars, desert bighorn sheep, ocelots, pronghorn antelope, road runners, white-tailed deer and hundreds of species of birds and insects. The fence would physically prevent both large and small mammals as well as reptiles from traveling across the border, and the lights atop the fence would attract insects, making them easier prey for birds that feed on them. Some of these insects pollinate the plants of the region, including cactus.

Since the secretary of homeland security will have authority to waive laws that stand in the way of building the fence — like the Endangered Species Act — wildlife and habitats could be destroyed on a scale not seen since the 1960s, when the nation's first wilderness and environmental laws were passed. Of course, many argue that the fence is an issue of national security and the safety of the American people trumps that of American wildlife. But that reasoning is flawed. The economic health of many people is increasingly reliant on the health of their natural surroundings.

In fact, studies done at the Universities of Montana and Colorado show that intact natural landscapes attract not only tourists to a region but also new residents and businesses that pump dollars into local economies. It isn't just plentiful sunshine that has made the Southwest one of the fastest-growing regions in the nation, it's also the region's diverse natural attractions, one of which is wildlife.

The fence, however, will reduce wildlife-viewing opportunities in the many national parks, monuments, refuges, wilderness areas and forests that garland the United States-Mexico border. And its effects will be felt far to the north and south, along the mountainous backbone of the continent, where conservationists have spent decades mapping and preserving migration corridors that allow the free movement of wildlife between the two nations.

Such ecological damage has already been seen around the world, where a variety of high, long fences have been constructed. In Botswana, for instance, the government erected fences, starting in the 1950s, to separate wildlife and livestock. As a result, at least 250,000 wildebeest, unable to reach water, perished from 1970 to 1984 and tens of thousands of antelope have died. In Asia, the migration of gazelles has been curtailed by the fence that the Chinese government built along the border with Mongolia in the 1990s. And in Australia, a 3,300-mile-long fence built in the 1950s to keep dingoes out of the southeastern part of the continent deprived kangaroos of their natural predator. Thus, the kangaroo population flourished, reducing the number of sheep the land could sustain, a result that the backers of the fence — sheep ranchers — neither foresaw nor intended.

Unfortunately, since the fence along the United States-Mexico border is designed to keep people out, it can't be outfitted with features that allow wildlife to migrate over and under livestock fences and highways. Let's hope that when it comes time to appropriate the money to build the entire fence, cooler Congressional heads will prevail. There are better ways to protect our borders than building a wall that people will inevitably find ways around but wildlife won't.

TAX:

IRS Urged To Go After EBay Sellers (SFC)

By Verne Kopytoff, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, February 24, 2007

Tax experts say online auctions should report users' profits

When it comes to paying income taxes, eBay's legions of small-time entrepreneurs are on an honor system in which they are supposed to declare their profits to the Internal Revenue Service. Many users, however, ignore the law or are unaware of their obligation.

Now a growing chorus of tax experts is hoping to crack down on the cheating by requiring eBay -- and other online auctions, such as those on Yahoo, Ubid.com and Amazon -- to track users and report their gross sales to the federal government. Armed with such information, the IRS could better seek any taxes owed, potentially reaping millions of dollars in extra revenue for the U.S. Treasury.

But requiring eBay to out its sellers to tax collectors could send a shockwave across its vast online bazaar, where users trade everything from Ferraris to Ugg boots to pepper spray. Paying Uncle Sam could significantly reduce their profits or even make their businesses money-losers.

The latest call for more aggressive tax collection was heard last week at a congressional committee hearing focused on closing the tax gap, the hundreds of billions of dollars in taxes that go unpaid each year. Nina Olson, the national taxpayer advocate for the IRS, spoke of the heavy burden put on the nation by the shortfall and then cited undeclared online sales -- particularly on eBay, given its size -- as part of the problem.

DOJ_NMG_0137022

"The IRS must have the tools needed to address under-reporting of this income," said Olson, whose job is to voice taxpayer concerns to the federal government.

EBay, based in San Jose, has 97 million U.S. users, who, in 2006 sold $25.2 billion in merchandise, exceeding the gross national product of many countries. More than 720,000 Americans make their primary or secondary income from the Web site, according to a 2005 study.

How many eBay users pay the taxes they owe on their online earnings is unknown. But experts suspect the percentage is low.

Virtually all tax filers -- 96 percent -- pay what's owed on income that is reported to the IRS by a third party, such as when a bank reports interest earned on a savings account, according to the IRS. However, when a third party doesn't tip off the government, compliance drops dramatically, to below 50 percent.

The remedy, according to many federal officials, is to expand reporting requirements. The question is, which businesses and what kind of income should fall under the rules?

As part of his proposed federal budget for 2008, President Bush made what many believe is the first step to more vigorously collect taxes on online sales. Although vaguely worded, the proposal would require "brokers," or middlemen, to collect taxpayer identification numbers from clients and report their sales of personal property to the IRS on a 1099 form if sales surpass 100 transactions or more than $5,000 annually.

Under current law, eBay and other auction sites aren't considered brokers. But definitions can be changed.

In November, a citizen advisory group for the IRS recommended as much. Expanding the definition to include online auctions, the group said, would open the door to reporting and increased tax compliance.

Paul Heller, chairman of the citizen advisory group, made up of accountants and tax preparers, applauded the president's proposal, but called it so nebulous that it's unclear what kind of businesses he's targeting. Heller, a vice president for JPMorgan Chase, suspects that the provisions are at least partly aimed at Internet sales.

"I have no idea who it would be referring to," Heller said of the proposal, "if not online auctions."

Jennifer Zuccarelli, a spokeswoman for the Treasury Department, declined to name any companies the Bush proposal applies to. All she would say is that the provisions would affect both online and offline commerce, without discrimination as to the medium.

Other than Internet sales, tax experts said that art galleries and consignment stores could be potential targets of the Bush proposal.

Hani Durzy, a spokesman for eBay, insisted that his company would be unaffected if Bush's ideas are enacted as written. EBay doesn't meet the definition of a broker, he said, because it never takes possession of the merchandise its users sell.

In any case, Durzy said eBay doesn't even know whether any given transaction is completed and therefore can't report authoritatively about a user's sales to the IRS.

Simply reporting to the government, he added, would be a financial burden for his company.

David Yaskulka, marketing chairman for the Professional eBay Sellers Alliance, an industry group of more than 500 big eBay sellers, said it wouldn't bother him if eBay reported sales information about its users to the IRS. In his experience, big sellers already pay their fair share.

"Every professional seller I've ever talked to pays their taxes and has no problem with anyone finding out about the level of business they're doing," Yaskulka said.

His concern is that legislation will unfairly target eBay. All sales venues, online or off, should be treated the same, he said.

The next step for the proposed legislation, along with a number of other of Bush budget ideas, is to go through Congress, starting with the House Ways and Means Committee. Members are likely to address the issue during an upcoming hearing on closing the tax gap, tentatively scheduled for mid-March.

Matthew Beck, a spokesman for the committee's Democratic majority, declined comment, other than to say of the Bush proposal, "We certainly take that as a starting point, and we certainly look forward to addressing the tax gap."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Medicaid Cuts Would Cost Public Hospitals, Other Facilities (LAT)

By Ricardo Alonso-Zaldivar

The Los Angeles Times, February 24, 2007

WASHINGTON — At a time when states are striving to expand healthcare coverage, the Bush administration is pressing ahead with plans to cut nearly $4 billion in aid for public hospitals and other providers of last resort for the uninsured.

DOJ_NMG_0137023

The cuts would affect hospital funding provided by Washington as part of Medicaid, the federal-state program known in California as Medi-Cal. It serves more than 55 million low-income people, including the working poor, elderly nursing home residents with few financial resources, and many children of low-income parents. In addition, it has provided funds for hospitals and other healthcare institutions that serve large numbers of uninsured patients.

Public hospital officials said California institutions could lose $500 million a year under the reductions, with the Los Angeles County public health system taking an estimated annual cut of $200 million.

"It's equivalent to shutting down all the outpatient clinics we own and operate, as well as those we contract with in the community," said county health chief Dr. Bruce Chernof.

The cuts are prompting sharp protests from governors and dozens of lawmakers, partly because they represent an end run around congressional defenders of the aid program. After failing to get Congress to approve the reductions last year, the administration is now trying to impose them through a regulation that does not require action on Capitol Hill.

"The administration is moving forward with these proposed changes without any input from Congress or governors," the National Governors Assn. complained Friday in a letter to congressional leaders. In an unusually direct challenge to the administration, the governors asked Congress to pass legislation that would block the rule from going into effect.

Separately, some independent experts have questioned whether the administration has the legal authority to make unilateral cuts. The confrontation recalls other recent cases in which the administration has tried to impress its will on Congress. For example: White House "signing statements" attached to anti-terrorism laws that assert the president's right to carry out the legislation according to his judgment.

Defending their actions, administration officials said the new rule was aimed at preventing some states from gaming the system. States have sometimes used the hospital funding for the uninsured to leverage more federal funding, officials said. The rule would limit the kinds of institutions eligible for such funding, as well as the rates the federal government would pay.

The goal is straightforward, said one federal official. "It's a simple concept: You can't get paid more under Medicaid than it costs to serve patients who are eligible for Medicaid," said the official, who asked not to be identified because of the politically sensitive nature of the issue.

Hospitals use the federal funding to offset the cost of caring for the uninsured, who are often members of working families that make too much to qualify for Medicaid and too little to afford their own coverage. Trauma centers, neonatal intensive care units, emergency departments and burn units could be among those jeopardized by the cuts, hospital officials said.

Other proposed healthcare cuts are included in the regulation, bringing the total nationwide to about $5 billion.

Officials in Sacramento said that Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger had expressed concerns to Washington about the cuts, but that the state had been assured that California would be exempt. The issue remains unresolved, and Schwarzenegger intends to pursue it when he visits Washington this weekend, said Michael Bowman, a spokesman for the state Department of Health Services.

Medicaid funding is governed by complex agreements between the states and the federal government, and federal officials say a deal negotiated by California last year already complies with the proposed regulation.

"We do not believe this rule would adversely affect" California's arrangement, said Mary Kahn, a spokeswoman for the federal Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services. "It is in compliance with the rule."

But California hospital officials say the language of the regulation says nothing about an exemption for the state. They say their own lawyers analyzed the new rules and have concluded the state would be affected.

"We don't understand how the [federal government's] statements square with the actual language of the proposed rule," said Melissa Stafford Jones, president and chief executive of the California Assn. of Public Hospitals and Health Systems. "If [Washington] had stated in the rule itself that the proposed provisions would not apply to California, then perhaps we would come to a different conclusion."

Regardless of how California's case is resolved, opposition to the cuts is unlikely to melt away. The federal regulation — published last month with little fanfare — would become final this summer and take effect Sept. 1. President Bush's budget assumes the cuts will go through. But the timing doesn't leave much opportunity for states to come up with funding alternatives.

"The proposed rule [is] a significant cost shift to states that governors strongly oppose," said the governors association letter.

Ultimately, the controversy could wind up in federal court. Some independent experts said the administration's own actions suggested a recognition that it might be on shaky legal ground.

"Why did they think they needed legislation last year, and this year they can do it by regulation?" asked Diane Rowland, executive vice president of the Kaiser Family Foundation and an expert on the healthcare safety net.

"Usually, an administration tries to use its regulatory authority first before going to Congress, so this is an interesting flip."

DOJ_NMG_0137024

In Congress, lawmakers of both parties say they will try to pass legislation that would block the cuts from going into effect. Forty-three senators and 226 House members have signed letters indicating their opposition.

Cheney Remark Rankles Pelosi (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 24, 2007

Vice President Says He's Not Questioning Her Patriotism

Vice President Cheney refused to back down yesterday from his assertion that the Democratic approach to Iraq would "validate the al-Qaeda strategy," as he continued a transpacific war of words with House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.).

Speaking with ABC News during a visit to Australia, the vice president addressed the criticism of Pelosi, who earlier this week said that Cheney's remarks were "beneath the dignity of the debate we're engaged in." She also spoke with White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten to register her complaint.

"She accused me of questioning her patriotism," Cheney said. "I didn't question her patriotism. I questioned her judgment."

"Al-Qaeda functions on the basis that they think they can break our will. That's their fundamental underlying strategy: that if they can kill enough Americans or cause enough havoc, create enough chaos in Iraq, then we'll quit and go home," Cheney added. "And my statement was that if we adopt the Pelosi policy, that then we will validate the strategy of al-Qaeda. I said it, and I meant it."

Cheney has previously described Pelosi's strategy as wanting to "get out" of Iraq. Pelosi has spoken in favor of a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops, starting in four to six months, and shifting the primary U.S. role to training.

Brendan Daly, Pelosi's spokesman, said the speaker is "moving on" but said Cheney "would rather launch partisan political attacks than focus on the fact that the administration has failed to support our troops in the field with the equipment and training they need."

The Cheney comments were another example of how the vice president's posture regarding Iraq has been more aggressive than President Bush's in recent weeks. While Bush has acknowledged that his previous policy had been headed toward failure and has offered conciliatory words to Congress, Cheney has emphasized "significant progress" in Iraq and warned that the war cannot be run by committee.

The remarks also reflected Cheney's frequent suggestion that al-Qaeda is the United States' principal adversary in Iraq, a stance disputed by many experts inside and outside the government. A recent National Intelligence Estimate concluded that factors in Iraqi violence include "extensive Shia-on-Shia violence, al-Qa'ida and Sunni insurgent attacks on Coalition forces, and widespread criminally motivated violence."

Asked by ABC reporter Jonathan Karl whether he was "out of touch" with the grim reality in Iraq, Cheney indicated optimism. "I think the key to the issue right now is the security situation in Baghdad," the vice president said. "I think the Maliki government is off to a pretty good start. Only time will tell. I'm fairly optimistic that going forward with this strategy will, in fact, work."

Former president Jimmy Carter, in a separate interview with ABC, came to Pelosi's defense. "If you go back and see what Vice President Cheney has said for the last three or four years concerning Iraq, his batting average is abysmally low," Carter said in an interview to be aired tomorrow on "This Week." "He hasn't been right on hardly anything in his prediction of what was going to happen."

Cheney is on a week-long trip, with the main stops coming in Tokyo and Sydney, where he met today with Australian Prime Minister John Howard, a staunch U.S. ally. Howard told reporters that he raised concerns with Cheney about David Hicks, an Australian who has been imprisoned at Guantanamo Bay since 2002.

In the ABC interview, Cheney was also asked about a deal with North Korea in which the state agreed to shutter its main nuclear reactor in return for economic assistance from the United States. He contrasted that with a 1994 accord that has fallen apart, noting that the recent deal includes China, Japan, South Korea and Russia. "If you're going to be able to squeeze North Korea effectively to get them to change policy, China is in the best position to do it. And China is a part of this agreement," Cheney said.

The North Koreans carried out one of the initial steps in the agreement yesterday by inviting the top U.N. nuclear inspector to Pyongyang to begin talks. Mohamed ElBaradei, the director of the International Atomic Energy Agency, announced yesterday at a news conference in Vienna that, six years after his inspectors were thrown out, he would go to North Korea in mid-March to discuss "the shutdown and eventual abandonment" of North Korea's Yongbyon facility.

"I see this as a step toward the denuclearization of the North Korean Peninsula," he said.

Staff writer Dafna Linzer contributed to this report.

DOJ_NMG_0137025

Democrats Offer Up Chairmen For Donors (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum, John Solomon, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, February 24, 2007

Party's Campaigns Had Faulted GOP For 'Selling Access'

Eager to shore up their fragile House and Senate majorities, congressional Democrats have enlisted their committee chairmen in an early blitz to bring millions of dollars into the party's coffers, culminating in a late-March event featuring House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and 10 of the powerful panel chairs.

In the next 10 days alone, Democratic fundraisers will feature the chairmen of the House's financial services panel and the House and Senate tax-writing committees. Senate Democrats also plan a fundraising reception during a major gathering of Native Americans in the capital Tuesday evening, an event hosted by lobbyists and the political action committee for tribal casinos, including those Jack Abramoff was paid to represent.

Critics deride the aggressive fundraising push as the kind of business as usual that voters rejected at the ballot box last November -- particularly the practice of giving interest groups access to committee chairmen in exchange for sizable donations -- but Democrats are unapologetic.

"Financial services companies are inclined to give to me because I'm chairman of the committee important to their interests," said Financial Services Committee Chairman Barney Frank, who will headline a breakfast Wednesday at a D.C. hotel, for which donations range from $1,000 to $15,000 for the Democratic National Committee. "I'm fundraising to give to others so I can help stay in the majority and do the public policy things I want."

Asked whether banking interests feel obligated to give to Democrats when he asks them for contributions, Frank answered: "Obligated? No. Incentivized? Yes." Frank said, however, that those donating "understand, and others do, too, that there are no guarantees of my doing what they want, or even my being pleasant."

"I'm getting a lot of fundraising invitations," said Robert E. Juliano, a Democratic lobbyist. "It's no different than any other year."

The invitation to Frank's DNC event, which notes in bold letters that the Massachusetts Democrat is chairman of the financial services panel, was sent to financial-industry lobbyists and financial companies, among others.

Earlier this month, Frank traveled to Charlotte, home to two of America's largest bank companies, for a similar fundraising breakfast, for a fellow Financial Services Committee member, Rep. Brad Miller (D-N.C.). Donors got to hear firsthand about Frank's plans for upcoming banking legislation. He assured attendees that more federal regulation of banking is on the way and that it will help banks to prosper.

Financial interests will have several opportunities in the coming weeks to make contributions and attend events that will put them close to lawmakers important to their industries.

The leaders of the two tax-writing committees -- House Ways and Means Chairman Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.) and Senate Finance Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.) -- are planning a rare and expensive joint fundraising reception in New York on March 4. The event, which costs between $1,500 and $9,200 a person, is to be held at the Upper East Side home of public relations executive Howard J. Rubenstein.

The Democrats' push will culminate late next month when Pelosi and 10 of her chairmen huddle with donors at the Northern Virginia home of shopping-center developer Albert J. Dwoskin for an event to benefit the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

The asking price for the March 21 dinner is $28,500 per couple, making it one of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee's highest-dollar fundraisers since new campaign finance limits were enacted in 2002.

In addition to Pelosi and Frank, other senior House Democrats slated to attend include John D. Dingell (Mich.) of the Energy and Commerce Committee, David R. Obey (Wis.) of the Appropriations Committee, Ike Skelton (Mo.) of the Armed Services Committee, John Conyers Jr. (Mich.) of the Judiciary Committee, George Miller (Calif.) of the Education and Labor Committee, and James L. Oberstar (Minn.) of the Transportation and Infrastructure Committee.

House Democrats hope to raise between $650,000 and $1 million for each of the party's most endangered Democrats in hopes of keeping the party in control of Congress.

The tactics are hardly new. Republicans aggressively used their committee chairmen -- and the promise of access to them -- to raise money from interest groups and lobbyists during the party's 12 years of congressional control. They tracked donations closely and pressed lobbying firms to hire GOP lobbyists through the "K Street Project," promising "intimate" issue briefings with the chairmen in return for big donations.

DOJ_NMG_0137026

And the GOP is hardly sitting on the sidelines this year. Republicans are also using their top lawmakers on committees to haul in donations. Rep. John L. Mica (Fla.), the ranking Republican on Transportation and Infrastructure, is scheduled to headline a "transportation luncheon" fundraiser in coming days for fellow House Republican Jerry Moran (Kan.).

The event was originally scheduled to be held at a Capitol Hill townhouse owned by the American Trucking Association but has since been moved to a restaurant. Donors are being asked to contribute between $1,000 and $2,500.

Likewise, Rep. Peter T. King (N.Y.), the senior Republican on the Homeland Security Committee, is advertised as the featured guest at a "homeland security dinner" at the French-style Les Halles restaurant on Pennsylvania Avenue NW to help raise money for sophomore Rep. Michael McCaul (R-Tex.).

But it was in part a Republican lobbying scandal -- GOP lobbyist Abramoff's defrauding of Indian tribal clients and the subsequent investigation into his efforts to influence lawmakers with lavish gifts -- that gave Democrats their opening to regain control of Congress. Democrats took over in January after a campaign that accused Republicans of fostering a "culture of corruption" in Washington and "selling access" to lawmakers. Abramoff has been convicted of fraud, tax evasion and conspiracy and is in federal prison.

Now, with the tables turned, Democrats are courting Abramoff's most famous clientele -- Indian tribes.

The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee's upcoming fundraiser was planned to coincide with a meeting in Washington of the National Congress of American Indians. It is being hosted by a law firm that lobbies for tribal casinos and the National Indian Gaming Association's political action committee.

The association represents more than 100 tribes with casinos or gambling operations, including those Abramoff was paid to represent. Last year, former Abramoff clients such as the Saginaw Chippewa, Agua Caliente and Mississippi Choctaw gave money to fund the PAC.

Organizers with the gaming association said they had no confirmation as of yesterday whether any of the Abramoff clients would be attending the event, but Democratic fundraisers said they were still trying to organize a second donor event that could involve a few of the tribes that were entangled with Abramoff.

Democrats reject any parallels to the Abramoff saga. "Abramoff was involved in a pervasive culture of corruption," said Matthew Miller, spokesman for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee. "Native Americans have every right to participate in the political process just like Americans across the country do."

Government-watchdog groups are chagrined but not surprised by the rush of high-level Democratic fundraising. "Coming so close on the heels of winning last year's election based on changing the so-called culture of corruption in Washington, it's unseemly, but it's completely predictable," said Melanie Sloan, executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington. "Democrats, like the Republicans before them, need the cash to maintain their majority status, and when you are in the majority it is much easier to collect the money."

House Democrats' principal fundraiser, Rep. Chris Van Hollen (Md.), wrote a memo last month indicating that he wanted House members in difficult-to-defend seats to have $650,000 to $1 million in the bank by June 30 -- 16 months before Election Day -- in order to deter Republican challengers. Veteran fundraisers say that goal would be ambitious for the end of an election cycle, let alone the beginning.

Democratic spokesmen sought to portray the upcoming fundraisers as commonplace. "The senior Democrats on the committees and the leadership have always been very supportive of DCCC efforts," said Jennifer Crider, spokeswoman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

Passenger Bill Of Rights May Cause Some Turbulence (LAT)

By Martin Zimmerman

The Los Angeles Times, February 24, 2007

Do airline passengers really need a bill of rights?

Recent incidents in which travelers were left stranded for hours on parked airplanes have led to proposals in Congress for time limits on ground delays. But skeptics say the proposals could result in even longer waits and more canceled flights.

"Be careful what you wish for," said David Stempler, president of the Air Travelers Association, a Washington-area lobbying group. "After three hours, they'll bring the plane back to the terminal, but then the flight might be canceled and you can't get to your destination."

And that prospect concerns travelers such as Lorna Davie, who sat on a parked JetBlue Airways jet for five hours during that airline's recent operational meltdown.

"It's a tough call," said Davie, who lives in Stamford, Conn. "People should be given the choice to get off the plane, but then you have to taxi back and let them get off, and those who want to continue on with the flight are further inconvenienced."

Calls for a federal law that would prevent airlines from keeping passengers on grounded planes indefinitely grew louder after a Valentine's Day ice storm shut JetBlue's New York hub. That resulted in some planes loaded with passengers sitting on taxiways and tarmacs for as long as 10 hours.

Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., introduced a bill, dubbed the airline passenger bill of rights, that would give passengers the option to return to the airport terminal after three hours. Rep. Mike Thompson, D-Calif., plans to introduce a similar bill next week.

Backers say legislation is needed to prevent a repeat of the JetBlue debacle, as well as a similar incident Dec. 29 when dozens of American Airlines flights were stranded on the ground for hours in various cities after thunderstorms shut down the Dallas-Fort Worth airport.

But some believe that setting a three-hour deadline could set off a ripple of unforeseen consequences.

Lengthy ground delays typically occur during severe weather, which can ground dozens of airplanes at a single airport. Planes have to wait in line for takeoff once the weather clears, and any plane that returns to the terminal loses its place and must, in effect, start over at the back of the queue.

The hours that commercial pilots can spend in the cockpit are strictly regulated. If time spent taxiing back to the gate or idling at the end of the takeoff line pushes a crew past its allotted duty hours, a new flight crew has to be brought in or the flight will be canceled.

"Once you get out of line, you've got to go to the end of the line," said Vivian Lee, an airline analyst with Alliance Capital Management in New York. "Should all of the passengers on the plane be at the mercy of the person with the least amount of patience?"

Of the 121 American Airlines flights that were diverted Dec. 29, 47 planes that were on the ground for three hours or more eventually made it to Dallas-Fort Worth that night. Had the three-hour time limit been in effect, many of those flights probably would have spent the night at other airports.

For these reasons, the airline industry is pushing a proposal that would allow airplanes that have to return to the terminal after three hours to resume their original place in the takeoff queue.

Kate Hanni, the Napa, Calif., resident who is spearheading the grass-roots campaign for a passenger protection bill, fears that the industry is trying to derail meaningful consumer regulation in the same way it did in 1999, after the stranding of a Northwest Airlines flight on the ground in Detroit for several hours sparked a similar furor.

"Somehow, we have to keep the consumer at the forefront of the issue," said Hanni, who sat on an American Airlines flight in Austin, Texas, for eight hours Dec. 29.

Hanni's group, the Coalition for an Airline Passengers' Bill of Rights, has collected more than 13,000 signatures on its online petition, and she is hopeful that Congress will adopt a law that goes beyond the three-hour time limit to include such measures as a committee to investigate customer complaints.

To ease concerns about safety and ensure a measure of pilot flexibility, the bill co-sponsored by Boxer and Sen. Olympia J. Snowe, R-Maine, would allow exceptions to the three-hour time limit if safety or security were an issue or if the pilot determined that the flight would be allowed to take off within 30 minutes.

Thompson said he also was conscious of concerns about a ground-delay deadline.

"We certainly don't want to cause flights to be unnecessarily canceled," the congressman said Friday. "However, it's important that passenger are not held on planes for hours on end."

The Politics Of JetBlue (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 24, 2007

Right on cue, politicians are making a fuss about a "passenger bill of rights" and demanding Congressional intervention after last week's JetBlue airline debacle. The irony is that the marketplace is already moving to address the problem, and the government could really help by relaxing some of the rules that incentivize airlines to discomfit passengers in the first place.

On February 14, an ice storm obstructed travel throughout the Northeast. At New York's JFK International, JetBlue's central hub, nine aircraft were frozen to the tarmac for more than six hours each, some longer. The reverberations caused thousands of cancellations and delays throughout the JetBlue schedule.

Clearly JetBlue would have done better to offload the stranded passengers as the waits grew longer, and by its own admission the company's communications and contingency planning were lousy. But moving to regulate now, through the introduction of a legally binding "passenger bill of rights," would amount to closing the hangar door after the plane has pushed back. The market is already punishing JetBlue with damage to its image and bottom line. In atonement, CEO David Neeleman has introduced a new, retroactive "bill of rights" of his own that will offer refunds and free flights to tardy JetBlue fliers, depending on the severity of their delays.

DOJ_NMG_0137028

Nevertheless, Congress senses an opportunity to pander. Barbara Boxer (D., Calif.) recently introduced a bill in the Senate to let passengers deplane if they have been held too long before takeoff. Mike Thompson (D., Calif.) intends to introduce a similar provision next week in the House, as well as mandates for minimum standards of comfort and service. Members are at least holding off on punitive compliance measures, but in Washington a consensus for some sort of action seems to be building.

The benefits of any such rules are speculative, but higher costs are certain. The airlines would face more paperwork, bureaucracy and cost -- and just wait until the trial bar piles on. These costs would be passed on to consumers whether they wanted these new "rights" or not.

Two years ago, the European Union handed down a suite of "transport directives," including one mandating compensation for delays or cancellations, so far without a marked improvement in either problem. European airlines, meanwhile, note that they have been saddled with billions in extra outlays. In the case of discount airlines, the minimum compensation for delays is often many times larger than the price of the original ticket.

Such regulation is both expensive and unnecessary. In 2006, according to the Department of Transportation, 75.4% of flights on U.S. carriers arrived within 15 minutes of schedule. Only 36 flights last year -- out of some 10 million flown -- left the gate and then waited more than five hours to take off.

For the record, most delays happen for three reasons, roughly distributed equally: errors on the part of the carrier; a jam-up caused by another plane; or a disruption due to the antiquated air-traffic-control system. When a flight is held up on the runway, FAA rules stipulate, it loses its slot in the takeoff line if it returns to the boarding gate, which is why the JetBlue planes were reluctant to turn back in the face of an indeterminate delay.

In hindsight, it's easy to say JetBlue waited too long, but we wonder how many passengers, offered a choice between the possibility of imminent clearance to take off and the certainty of many more hours in the terminal, would have opted for the departure lounge. A bill of rights mandating deplanings would take these decisions away from those trying, if sometimes futilely, to get their passengers where they're going as quickly as possible.

Ticket buyers who opt for low-fare airlines are generally aware that the choice comes with tradeoffs. JetBlue has supported its low-fare model in part by keeping its planes in the air, which has meant being reluctant to cancel flights. Until last week, that was an asset; it had found that passengers preferred to get to their destinations, even if late. Other airlines offer a different mix of conveniences, priorities and costs. This diversity is all to the good.

The self-styled consumer advocates who think that government action here will prevent a repeat of last week's debacle should be careful what they wish for. Meteorological mishaps can't be outlawed, and rules designed to address one situation will be found inappropriate when the next, no doubt different, crisis arises. Mr. Neeleman's solution of writing his own bill of rights has the virtue that consumers can decide for themselves if it meets their needs. If it doesn't, they'll book with someone else. And that's the most important right of all.

Better Pay For Judges (NYT)

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

Justice Anthony Kennedy of the Supreme Court told the Senate this month that the salaries paid to federal judges are so low that they threaten both the quality and independence of the judiciary. The problem is real, and Congress should quickly pass a bill to fix it.

Justice Kennedy gave some startling examples of judges who had left the bench in search of better-paying employment. In 2005, nine federal judges resigned or retired — the most in any single year. Four went to work for JAMS, a for-profit arbitration and mediation firm where, as Justice Kennedy noted, “they have the potential to earn the equivalent of a district judge’s salary in a matter of months.”

The $165,200 a year earned by a federal district court judge sounds like a lot. But it is not in the upper ranks of the legal world, from which the federal judiciary should be able to recruit new members. A district court judge’s salary is now about half of what a law school dean makes, and roughly what a starting lawyer makes at a top New York law firm. Since 1969, the real pay of federal district court judges fell by about 25 percent, while the real pay of the average American worker rose 18 percent. If judges’ pay had risen at the rate of the average worker, the $165,200 salary would now be $261,000.

One way the Constitution protects the independence of federal judges is by providing that — no matter whom the judges anger or disappoint — their compensation “shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.” But that independence is eroded when inflation erodes salaries and judges must go to Congress with hats in hand.

A bill to raise judges’ salaries would also be an ideal place to impose a much needed ethical reform: a ban on all privately financed “educational” junkets for judges. These trips, which are often paid for by groups that want to persuade judges to take a particular view of the law, inevitably raise worrisome questions about judges’ impartiality.

DOJ_NMG_0137029

Capable, independent and impartial judges are essential to the workings of American democracy. Congress should come up with the money necessary to keep the judiciary strong.

OTHER NEWS:

H&R Block, Roper Industries Rise (WSJ)

By Karen Talley

The Wall Street Journal, February 24, 2007

Lowe's Advances 3.9% On a Bullish Forecast; Microsoft Slides 1.7%

Though stocks pulled back Friday, Lowe's rose on comments on 2007 comparable-store sales, H&R Block advanced on plans to sell an ailing unit and Roper Industries gained on strong product demand.

Microsoft followed the market lower after a $1.5 billion jury decision, BEA Systems sold off on options issues and Circuit City Stores dropped on word of a key executive departure.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average lost 38.54 points, or 0.3%, to 12647.48, its third straight decline. The Nasdaq Composite Index dropped 9.84, or 0.4%, to 2515.10. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index lost 5.19, or 0.4%, to 1451.19.

"There is Iran poking into our mind-set again, higher energy prices and continued housing issues," said Art Hogan, chief market analyst at Jefferies. "But it's healthy that we're seeing the market take a pause. Investors often wait for a pullback to get back in, so this retracement will offer an opportunity for those who have been on the sidelines."

Lowe's rose $1.30, or 3.9%, to $34.93. The home-improvement retailer said fourth-quarter earnings dropped 12% but conditions may be bottoming and comparable-store-sales performance should gradually improve throughout the year. For the week, Lowe's gained 5%.

Lowe's optimism didn't erase general skepticism about the housing industry, and the session saw broad selling in the sector. Home Depot, Lowe's chief rival, lost 22 cents to 40.96. Mortgage lender Countrywide Financial declined 81 cents, or 2%, to 39.33; home builder NVR fell 35.40, or 4.9%, to 687.50; and mortgage-buying giant Fannie Mae dropped 66 cents, or 1.1%, to 59.49.

H&R Block rose 43 cents, or 1.9%, to 22.85. The largest U.S. tax preparer swung to a third-quarter loss on costs tied to its struggling subprime-mortgage operation but said it expects to sell the unit for at least $1.3 billion.

Roper Industries gained 3.72, or 7.2%, to 55.14, a record close. The industrial manufacturer reported a big increase in fourth-quarter orders for its products and voiced optimism for 2007.

Microsoft (Nasdaq) lost 49 cents, or 1.7%, to 28.90, the industrial average's biggest percentage decliner. Alcatel-Lucent's American depositary shares gained 22 cents, or 1.7%, to 13.36. Microsoft was told to pay $1.52 billion to compensate Alcatel-Lucent for patent infringements related to MP3 technology.

BEA Systems dropped 1.25, or 9.5%, to 11.95, among the top Nasdaq percentage decliners. The business-software maker reported fourth-quarter and fiscal-2007 revenue but said it wouldn't give earnings results because of an ongoing internal review of its stock-option grants.

Circuit City dropped 39 cents, or 1.9%, to 20.39 on news that the electronic-product retailer's chief financial officer is leaving.

Nymex Holdings lost 2.17, or 1.5%, to 138.61. The owner of the New York Mercantile Exchange said it is considering a secondary offering of shares of common stock.

KLA-Tencor (Nasdaq) gained 1.91, or 3.7%, to 54.16. The chip-equipment maker plans an accelerated share repurchase program in which it will buyback $750 million of its common stock.

Whole Foods Market (Nasdaq) slipped 1.64, or 3.1%, to 50.47. Shares rose 14% on Thursday when the health-food chain agreed to acquire small-cap Wild Oats Markets in a $565 million.

Rising Oil Prices, Lenders' Woes Give Dow Worst Week Since Mid-Aug. (WP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, February 24, 2007

NEW YORK, Feb. 23 -- Stocks ended a lackluster week with a moderate decline Friday as higher oil prices worried investors and Treasurys rallied over concerns about a meltdown in the subprime mortgage market, in which companies offer loans to those with spotty credit.

It was the worst week for the Dow Jones industrials since mid-August, as the average fell 38.54, to 12,647.48. Broader stock indicators also fell. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 5.19, to 1451.19. The Nasdaq slipped 9.84, to 2515.10.

DOJ_NMG_0137030

For the week, the Dow fell 0.94 percent, the S&P 500 fell 0.35 percent and the Nasdaq composite rose 0.75 percent.

The pullback followed several mixed sessions in which the tech-dominated Nasdaq composite index showed gains but blue chip stocks declined, in part because of inflation concerns. Bond prices rebounded from a sell-off a day earlier, as investors sought quality because of concerns that subprime lenders would be forced to book big write-downs because consumers would not be able to keep up with mortgage payments. The yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note fell to 4.67 percent from 4.73 percent Thursday.

"The defaults that you're seeing in the subprime market are a bit of a wake-up call for investors. I think you're going to see a continued flight to safety," said James Sonneborn, wealth manager at RegentAtlantic Capital.

Oil closed at its highest level of the year, eclipsing a year high set Thursday. Light, sweet crude settled up 19 cents at $61.14 on the New York Mercantile Exchange. For the week, oil prices were up 3 percent.

Gold Nears The $700 Level, Helped By Crude-Oil Gains (WSJ)

By Allen Sykora

The Wall Street Journal, February 24, 2007

Speculative buying sent gold futures inching back toward the psychologically important $700 level on Friday.

The nearby-month February contract added $3.70 to $683.10 an ounce on the Comex division of the New York Mercantile Exchange. Most-active April gold rose $3.70 to settle at $686.70. It peaked at $691.90, its strongest level since July.

At its high, April gold was up $32.90, or 5%, from the low for the week of $659 hit Tuesday.

"There has been some very aggressive fund buying over the last three days," said Bernard Hunter, director of precious metals at Scotia Mocatta. He described the market as "fairly one-way" and "really dominated" by the funds.

The metal was helped by technical chart-based buying and stronger oil, with April crude hitting $61.80 a barrel, its strongest level since Jan. 3. Also, the dollar sagged, which tends to help gold.

Crude backed down from its highs, limiting gold's gains for now. All eyes will be on the psychological $700 level in the coming week, however. Gold shot above here in May for the first time since 1980, before correcting lower over the last several months.

"The speed of gold's recent rally does leave the metal vulnerable to a correction; however, $700 and possibly beyond seem inevitable before this occurs, while our target of $800-plus later in the year remains on course," said a research note from James Moore, precious-metals analyst with TheBullionDesk.com.

In other commodity trading:

CRUDE OIL: Futures settled at a nine-week high as gasoline futures continued advancing and traders focused on plunging U.S. petroleum-product stockpiles and recent refinery and pipeline glitches around the country. April crude oil on the Nymex gained 19 cents to $61.14 a barrel, its highest close since Dec. 22.

NATURAL GAS: Futures ended slightly higher after trading lower most of the day ahead of contract expiration Monday, and as traders awaited more details on the weather. March natural gas on the Nymex settled 2.8 cents higher at $7.755 a million British thermal units, its highest close since Feb. 9.

Dollar Declines On Rate Worries (WSJ)

By Dan Molinski

The Wall Street Journal, February 24, 2007

The dollar exited lower across the board Friday amid concerns that interest rates will rise in Europe but could remain frozen or even decline in the U.S.

Dollar sentiment turned negative as investors, who a day earlier had pared expectations for Federal Reserve rate cuts, began to waffle. Dollar gains earlier in the week, based on slightly higher-than-expected inflation figures, were deemed overdone and investors began selling dollars to book profits.

"There are still some concerns about the structural outlook for the dollar, in terms of interest rates," said Daniel Katzive, foreign-exchange strategist at UBS.

The dollar could retreat further if the market, which is looking for the Fed to cut rates in the fourth quarter of 2007, moves up its expectations to an earlier date, said Mr. Katzive.

Higher oil prices Friday also weighed on the greenback as higher energy costs could place more strain on a U.S. economy that's already dealing with a softening housing market and a weak manufacturing sector. The price of a barrel of crude settled at a 2007 high above $61 in New York.

The rise in oil prices came amid lower U.S. supplies and a row with oil-producing Iran after the United Nations nuclear watchdog agency Thursday said Tehran had failed to comply with a deadline to stop nuclear enrichment.

DOJ_NMG_0137031

Late Friday in New York, the euro stood at $1.3166 from $1.3124 late Thursday, while the dollar was changing hands at 121.09 yen versus 121.58 yen. The euro traded at 159.43 yen versus 159.56 yen late Thursday. The dollar was at 1.2330 Swiss francs versus 1.2384 francs, while sterling was at $1.9635 versus $1.9564 late Thursday.

During London trading Friday, the dollar advanced some against the euro after data showed business confidence in Germany was a bit less than expected. But the greenback quickly reversed itself as analysts digesting the data said it doesn't change consensus view that the European Central Bank in March is likely to lift its key lending rate to 3.75% from the current 3.50%.

Higher local interest rates tend to boost a currency because investors' in those currencies are paid higher returns. The Fed's benchmark rate currently stands at a relatively high 5.25%.

Meanwhile, a report Friday showed the United Kingdom economy expanded above trend in the final quarter of 2006, which gave sterling a boost and provided marginal help to other European currencies as well.

"The [gross domestic product] data out of the U.K. continue to argue for further rate hikes ahead and our house view remains that the Bank of England will hike next at its May meeting" by a quarter point, said analysts at ABN Amro Bank in an email note.

States Set Big Spending Plans As Washington Preaches Austerity (WSJ)

By Christopher Cooper

The Wall Street Journal, February 24, 2007

Washington may currently be focused on fiscal austerity. But a major spending spree is shaping up in the states, as local legislators abandon a half-decade of fiscal conservatism to pursue bigger budgets.

From New York to Montana to California, states are proposing budget increases that outpace inflation and far exceed the 1% rise in domestic outlays -- outside of defense and homeland security -- that President Bush recently proposed in his fiscal 2008 federal budget. In Montana, Gov. Brian Schweitzer is cutting taxes and boosting spending by 26% over two years, including $100 million for new "meth prisons" that blend incarceration with intensive drug rehab for those convicted of methamphetamine crimes. In Vermont, Gov. Jim Douglas wants to borrow $40 million to create "the nation's first e-state," where free wireless broadband is available to all. And in Arizona, the only dispute between a Democratic governor and a Republican legislature over a half-billion-dollar road-repair program is whether to borrow the money or pay cash.

The binge is bipartisan. Last year, the Massachusetts legislature approved a $1.56 billion universal health-care plan under Republican Gov. Mitt Romney, who is now running for president. This year, at least ten states -- most notably Republican Arnold Schwarzenegger's California -- are weighing similar programs.

But that's just one of many areas where state governments are seeking to expand services that were long considered distant dreams by advocates. Universal prekindergarten is being championed by several incoming Democratic governors, such as New York's Eliot Spitzer, Deval Patrick of Massachusetts and Mike Beebe of Arkansas. Democratic leaders in Colorado and Pennsylvania and several other states want to create funds for state "energy independence." Many of these proposals will be topics of conversation at the National Governors Association's annual meeting, which begins in Washington today.

The new state activism is driven in part by the Bush administration's budgetary focus on Iraq, defense and homeland security, which leaves states to grapple with domestic concerns on their own. Higher tax receipts and growth in energy royalties, from higher oil and natural-gas prices, have also left many states flush.

But even states faced with declining revenue are mulling ways to ramp up spending -- not with unpopular tax increases, but by privatizing valuable public assets in return for big slugs of cash. Michigan and Illinois, among others, are looking at selling off their lotteries, while Missouri is considering doing the same with its student-loan portfolio.

The growing popularity of health-care programs and higher teacher salaries raises the risk that states, giddy from surging revenue, may be in danger of expanding beyond their means, using short-term windfalls to create new long-term obligations at a time when tax increases remain unpopular with voters.

It was just a few years ago that states last found themselves in financial dire straits. In the early 2000s, many state governments were hit hard by recession and constitutional requirements to balance budgets. Reluctant to unwind fresh tax rollbacks, states were forced not only to cease creating new services but also to cut back on many basics, such as road repairs and prisons. In 2003, the National Governors Association reported that states collectively were undergoing the worst budget crisis since World War II.

Even after their economies and revenue streams recovered in the middle part of the decade, state governments concentrated on building surpluses and kept spending relatively in check. But now, many states are returning to their old ways: along with spending more, several governors are proposing hefty tax cuts as well.

DOJ_NMG_0137032

Like many governors, Arizona Democratic Gov. Janet Napolitano faced a looming budget shortfall -- $1 billion in her case -- when she took office in 2003. Now, thanks to strong economic growth, surging sales-tax revenue and low unemployment, the state has $650 million in reserves. For fiscal year 2008, Ms. Napolitano has proposed a $10.4 billion budget that calls for a 6.9% increase in spending on top of the 18% increase last year.

The extra money allows Ms. Napolitano to put tens of millions of dollars toward her priorities: pay raises for teachers, 12% more for state universities, and $60 million for projects to train and attract high-tech workers and businesses. "Somewhere out there is the next Microsoft," Ms. Napolitano said. "I'd just as soon that it be in Phoenix or Tucson."

Montana's Mr. Schweitzer, who also faced an austere outlook when he first took office, is now enjoying a $1 billion surplus, largely due to higher tax revenues on capital gains and energy production. As he sees it, states spend nearly all of their money to "educate, medicate and incarcerate." His two-year, $7.7 billion budget boosts spending on all three. Legislative analysts peg the budget increase at 26%; Mr. Schweitzer excludes the rainy-day fund and payments towards pension obligations and says the jump is closer to 13%.

The state's prison system will see one of the largest increases. Mr. Schweitzer says Montana leads the nation in the per-capita number of citizens incarcerated. Because the vast majority of those are for drug-related crimes, he's proposing a program that would marry the state's prison system with its Department of Health.

The resulting "meth prisons," as he calls them, would combine incarceration with intensive rehab programs, which he says would allow for more early releases and, over the long term, would lower the state's cost of maintaining its prisoners. It's an unusual idea, and one he says that the federal government is unlikely to help finance. "The feds aren't really interested in new and novel things," he says.

Mr. Schweitzer's budget also offers about $150 million in tax cuts and a $170 million capital construction program. "The best part is I don't have one dollar of bonding in my program," Mr. Schweitzer said. "We're paying cash."

Another reason states are loosening their purse strings is to compensate for a sustained decline in federal revenue sharing. In the past, the federal government could often be relied on to help finance big projects such as highways and new state initiatives, such as antipoverty programs. But the days of expanding federal revenue sharing have been on the wane for years. And the Bush administration, with its focus on war and antiterror spending, has shown little interest in supporting these efforts.

In fact, governors and others say they expect cutbacks in federal support. "I don't think anyone feels the federal government is going to be a source of revenue increases any time in the near future," says Robin Prunty, a credit analyst, who specializes in state finances for bond-rating firm Standard & Poor's Corp.

In New Mexico, Democratic Gov. Bill Richardson, who is running for president, is proposing a $5.7 billion budget, 11% bigger than last year's. The spending plan not only provides more than $100 million in raises for school employees, but includes some projects he had originally intended to supplement with federal grants, such as the state's commuter-rail system. "We had a commitment from the feds for $65 million but we haven't seen it yet, so I'm putting it in my own budget," Mr. Richardson says. His budget also includes a $77 million proposal to expand health care.

In many states, universal-health-care proposals are potentially the most expensive propositions, and none top the gargantuan plan offered by California's Mr. Schwarzenegger. His $12 billion health-care plan would insure an estimated 6.5 million people by imposing new fees on doctors and hospitals and giving $1 billion in tax breaks to individuals who purchase their own health insurance.

Mr. Schwarzenegger is touting his plan over the objections of many legislators in his own party, who argue that the program will cause budgetary havoc if the state's economy sours.

It wouldn't be the first time an ambitious insurance plan created fiscal problems for a state. Tennessee launched such a plan in 1994 but was forced to painfully unwind the program in 2005, when it had grown into a $7.8 billion behemoth that accounted for nearly a third of all spending and threatened to throw the state into deficit. The biggest contributor to costs: insuring middle-aged citizens, especially those with pre-existing medical conditions. They were the first of the estimated 170,000 Tennesseans to be tossed out of the program.

Scott Pattison, executive director of the National Association of State Budget Officers, says the Tennessee experience is unlikely to be an anomaly. While it's relatively cheap to insure healthy children, "a 52-year-old diabetic is a lot more expensive to cover," he says.

To be sure, some states, fearing a quick reversal of fiscal fortunes, are trying to keep a lid on spending. In Alaska, a state that derives much of its revenue from oil royalties, high energy prices are expected to increase general-fund revenue to $5 billion this year, from $2 billion in 2003. Yet freshman Republican Gov. Sarah Palin vowed to limit budget growth to $3.3 billion, up less than 3% from this year. She points to a recent legislative report that predicts falling energy prices will result in declining revenue for the state as early as next year and a potential $1 billion deficit by fiscal 2010.

DOJ_NMG_0137033

Already, there are indications that the flush times are ending. One early sign: by late 2006, nearly a third of those states participating in an annual survey by the National Conference of State Legislatures -- 14 of them -- were either experiencing or expecting to see a decline in revenue. Moreover, the group says, for the first time in years, projected spending increases this year seems likely to outstrip revenue growth, with outlays expect to rise 7.5%, and receipts, just 3.1%.

The obvious solution to flagging revenue is new taxes. But while many governors seem disposed to spend more, those same politicians remain largely conservative on taxes. Big increases, particularly on broad levies like income and sales taxes, are still considered political suicide. Instead, states from Arizona and Montana to New York, Florida and New Jersey have enacted or are considering tax rollbacks.

Many states are looking at other ways to raise cash. In Massachusetts and New York, Messrs. Patrick and Spitzer are toying with the idea of legalizing gambling to raise money. In New Jersey, which already has legalized gambling, Democratic Gov. Jon S. Corzine is entertaining a wager of another sort: leasing a portion of the state's turnpike to a private company in order to raise cash. Governors in Pennsylvania and Texas are considering similar proposals.

The schemes can be a windfall for states: In Indiana last fall, Republican Gov. Mitch Daniels essentially sold Interstate 85 under a 75-year lease that garnered a $3.8 billion cash payment. Now he is proposing to lease the state's lottery in return for a similar windfall -- as are several other states, including Illinois, Texas and New Jersey.

But lease deals have proven controversial. Critics fret that states won't properly value the assets or will strike deals that somehow hinder future growth. Chief among the critics is the Owner-Operator Independent Drivers Association, a trucker lobby. The lease deals being considered involve sections of some of the nation's busiest roadways. Because the deals almost always include provisions that bar states from building new roadways that might compete with the toll routes being sold, future gridlock is all but assured, the group says.

In some states, there's plenty of cash -- at least for the moment. In Arizona, Ms. Napolitano finds herself allied with the conservative Goldwater Institute as she tries to beat back a proposal by the Republican-dominated legislature to raid the state's rainy-day fund for a $400 million road-improvement program. Like her Republican brethren, Ms. Napolitano wants to fix the roads. But she would rather borrow the money and keep the $650 million rainy-day account for the economic downturn she assumes is all but inevitable.

"When I came in, we had no rainy day fund," says Ms. Napolitano. "I wouldn't wish that on anybody."

Voting Machines Found Not At Fault In Fla. Election (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, February 24, 2007

TALLAHASSEE, Feb. 23 -- An audit of touch-screen voting machines at the center of a dispute in a congressional election found no evidence of malfunction, Florida's secretary of state said Friday.

The audit was conducted after more than 18,000 ballots were cast in Sarasota County without a selection in the District 13 congressional race in November between Republican Vern Buchanan and Democrat Christine Jennings. Buchanan was the certified winner by 369 votes, but Jennings sued, alleging that the machines malfunctioned.

Third-party voter advocate groups, along with Jennings, have been asking to examine the machines' source code or programming chips to find out whether they malfunctioned. The audit report released Friday said an independent study of the source code of the machines used in the election found no evidence of malfunction.

"Governor [Charlie] Crist and I are committed to ensuring that every Floridian's vote is counted, and I am confident that the race in Sarasota County was fair and accurate," Florida Secretary of State Kurt Browning said in a statement about the official audit report.

Buchanan was seated in Congress in January, but Jennings has yet to concede the race.

Jennings spokesman David Kochman said in a statement that the audit was flawed.

Panel Cites Voter Error, Not Software, In Loss Of Votes (NYT)

By Christopher Drew

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

Florida election officials announced yesterday that an examination of voting software did not find any malfunctions that could have caused up to 18,000 votes to be lost in a disputed Congressional race in Sarasota County, and they suggested that voter confusion over a poor ballot design was mainly to blame.

The finding, reached unanimously by a team of computer experts from several universities, could finally settle last fall's closest federal election. The Republican candidate, Vern Buchanan, was declared the winner by 369 votes, but the Democrat, Christine Jennings, formally contested the results, claiming that the touch-screen voting machines must have malfunctioned.

DOJ_NMG_0137034

Legal precedents make it difficult to win a lawsuit over ballot design, but a substantial error in the software might have been grounds for a new election.

The questions about the electronic machines arose because many voters complained that they had had trouble getting their votes to register for Ms. Jennings, and the machines did not have a back-up paper trail that might have provided clues about any problems. The report said some voters might have accidentally touched the screen twice, thus negating their votes, while most of the others probably overlooked the race on the flawed ballot.

Still, the difficulty in resolving these complaints has helped fuel a drive in Congress to ban the paperless machines. Voting experts said the audit of the software code also was the first time any state had gone to such lengths to resolve a close election.

While some voters in Sarasota bristled yesterday at the idea that they had done anything wrong in casting their votes, or that nearly 13 percent of all voters could have failed to spot the race on the ballot, members of the investigative team said that those remained the only plausible theories.

The report acknowledged that the huge undervote — in which voters cast a ballot in other races but not for the Congressional seat — was both "abnormal and unexpected." But it said that all eight members of the investigative team, including some experts who have long been skeptical about the paperless machines, agreed that the basic programming "did not cause or contribute to" the loss of votes.

The study suggested instead that the confusion over the ballot design, which had also drawn complaints from voters, probably accounted for the bulk of the problem, much as the infamous "butterfly ballot" distorted the vote in Palm Beach County, Fla., during the 2000 presidential election.

In the Sarasota race, the names of Mr. Buchanan and Ms. Jennings were sandwiched between larger lists of candidates for the United States Senate and for governor. The House race was also squeezed in at the top of a ballot screen, and it lacked the kind of colorful headings that highlighted the other races.

Ms. Jennings said in an interview yesterday that further investigation should still be done. Hayden Dempsey, a lawyer for Mr. Buchanan, who was seated in the House last month pending the outcome of the challenges, said the state had now "looked at every aspect of the election and found nothing wrong."

Clare Ward-Jenkins, a Sarasota resident who had trouble registering her vote, said she felt insulted by the report's implication that "we're too stupid to know how to vote."

Ms. Ward-Jenkins and more than 100 other voters contacted The Sarasota Herald-Tribune shortly after the election to complain that even though an "X" appeared on the touchscreen when they pressed the box for Ms. Jennings, their votes had disappeared by the time they got to a final screen for reviewing their choices. Ms. Ward-Jenkins and most of the others said they had to go through the process at least one more time to make their votes stick, raising concerns in the Jennings camp that other voters might have failed to notice similar problems that voided their ballots.

The report also left open the possibility that aging hardware could have caused isolated problems. But the investigative team leader, Alec Yasinsac, a computer science professor at Florida State University, and David Wagner, a professor at the University of California, Berkeley, both said in interviews that if there had been any widespread problems, they would have affected other races as well.

"I'm persuaded that this wasn't caused by machine failure," Professor Wagner said.

But other voting experts said that because the machines used in the election have been sequestered by a court, only a portion of them have been examined closely.

The software experts said they also found several security vulnerabilities in the programming for the voting machines, made by Election Systems and Software in Omaha. But the report said there was no evidence that any of them had affected the Sarasota race.

Edward W. Felten, a Princeton University computer scientist, wrote last night that the security weaknesses need to be fixed before this type of machine is used again. He also wrote: "The study claims to have ruled out reliability problems as a cause of the undervotes, but their evidence on this point is weak, and I think the jury is still out on whether voting machine malfunctions could be a significant cause of the undervotes."

David Dill, a Stanford University professor who has been critical of the machines, added that the study "is an admirable, but limited, piece of work" and could not rule out all possible errors.

Vilsack Drops Out Of Prez Race (DMR)

Des Moines Register, February 24, 2007

Former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack withdrew as a candidate for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination today, saying he could not raise enough money to compete with his nationally known rivals.

DOJ_NMG_0137035

"This process has become to a great extent about money, a lot of money," Vilsack said during a late morning news conference at his campaign headquarters in Des Moines.

"And it is clear to me that we would not be able to continue to raise money in the amounts necessary to sustain, not just a campaign in Iowa and New Hampshire, but a campaign across this country," he said. "So it is money and only money that is the reason we are leaving today."

The news ends Vilsack's bid less than four months after he launched a federal campaign organization on Nov. 9.

Polls showed Vilsack trailing three better-known candidates in Iowa, scheduled to host the leadoff presidential nominating caucuses in less than 11 months.

However, Vilsack said in bowing out today that he had developed an Iowa organization that put him in a position to win the caucuses.

With his wife, Christie, and two adult sons at his side, he thanked his staff and key supporters. The campaign had seven field offices throughout the state and had put out a statement this month claiming the campaign had 1,000 activists who had promised to caucus for the former governor.

Former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards has led in early Iowa polls, followed by Illinois Sen. Barack Obama and New York Sen. Hillary Clinton.

Vilsack raised more than $1 million between his campaign launch in November and the end of the year, most of which came in a fund-raiser held in Des Moines during his ceremonial kickoff week.

But Clinton, Obama and others are expected to have raised much more since launching their campaigns last month.

The Iowa polls were also a factor, he said. Vilsack said it had been difficult to tell potential donors "that you're not the prohibitive favorite in the caucus process."

Vilsack declined to say whether he would endorse one of his former rivals. But he advised the still large field of candidates organizing in Iowa to avoid blockbuster campaign events and meet party activists one-on-one.

"Here's my hope and my prayer, that you understand that it isn't just about large crowds. It isn't just about the cameras," he said, speaking to the Democrats who remain in the race. "It's about ordinary folks in living rooms, and kitchens and church basements, who genuinely care about this country who need to be listened to and need to have an opportunity to interact with candidates."

The former Mount Pleasant mayor and state senator, who won an unlikely

victory to governor in 1998, said the outsider campaign he launched on Nov. 9 was his life's first undertaking where hard work was not enough.

He affirmed the two major policy positions he had outlined in recent weeks: One calling on Congress to cut off money to support the Iraq war and the other, a detailed 50-year plan to convert the nation's energy system to renewable sources.

Vilsack said public financing for campaigns would have put him on a more level playing field with his better-financed rivals.

"I think we have to have a real debate about public financing and the ability for the primary and caucus process to be about ideas," he said.

Vilsack, First Democrat In, Is Quickly Out (WP)

By Dan Balz, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 24, 2007

Former Iowa Governor Cites Financial Demands in Ending Bid for Presidency

Former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack, the first Democrat to announce a 2008 candidacy for the White House, abruptly dropped out of the race yesterday, a victim of the prodigious fundraising demands of an early-starting campaign and the star appeal of rivals Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.).

"This process has become to a great extent about money -- a lot of money," Vilsack said at a news conference in Des Moines yesterday. "And it is clear to me that we would not be able to continue to raise money in the amounts necessary to sustain not just a campaign in Iowa and New Hampshire but a campaign across this country. So it is money and only money that is the reason that we are leaving today."

Vilsack, who called for a swift end to the Iraq war and proposed an ambitious plan for reducing dependence on foreign oil, was considered a long shot for the nomination, so his early departure does not fundamentally change the shape of the Democratic contest. But it does change the dynamic in Iowa, the state whose caucuses will kick off the nomination battle early next year.

Rival campaigns immediately began scrambling for endorsements of Iowa elected officials and prominent party activists and to hire Vilsack staff members. Clinton's team was on the phone reconnecting with Iowa activists with whom she and her husband, former president Bill Clinton, have had relationships dating back years. Obama made calls into both Iowa and New Hampshire to speak with Vilsack supporters, encouraging them to join his campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0137036

None of the other candidates had conceded Iowa to Vilsack, as Democratic candidates did in 1992 when Sen. Tom Harkin of Iowa was seeking the Democratic nomination. But Vilsack's presence in the race -- he had vowed to win the caucuses when he launched his campaign -- offered at least a thin rationale for a poor finish by those in the top tier of the Democratic field.

For the leading candidates -- Clinton, Obama and former senator John Edwards of North Carolina -- that excuse is now gone, adding to the pressure on each of them to organize the state as early as possible or risk an embarrassing finish, Democratic strategists said yesterday.

Vilsack's decision underscored the enormous financial challenges facing lesser-known candidates as they compete for contributions against Clinton and Obama. It also highlighted how the intense start to the 2008 campaign has dramatically escalated the cost of running, even in the opening months of competition.

In past years, candidates rarely dropped out until they had spent three to six months trying to raise money. This year, however, candidates have been forced to build larger campaign operations and begin serious organizing earlier than ever.

"This is a nomination process on steroids," said Josh Earnest, Vilsack's press secretary. "It started earlier than anybody expected, and it's requiring more money than ever before."

Jerry Crawford, one of the leading Democratic strategists in Iowa, said everyone knew that Clinton would be a formidable fundraiser, but "when Obama got in the race, it just took all the cash out of the room and all of the fundraisers out the room."

Vilsack formally launched his candidacy Nov. 30 and raised about $1.13 million by year's end. Aides said he was on track to add only about $1.3 million more by the end of the first quarter -- an amount Obama raised at a Hollywood fundraiser on Tuesday -- and already was in debt.

Strategists predicted yesterday that the same problem could befall other second-tier candidates -- particularly later this year, a point when fundraising generally becomes more difficult for most campaigns.

Vilsack served two terms as governor of Iowa and developed a reputation as one of the most thoughtful students of public policy among the nation's governors. He served as chairman of the Democratic Governors Association and was a leading voice in the National Governors Association.

Vilsack Ends Bid For Presidency (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 23 — Former Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa ended his candidacy for the Democratic presidential nomination on Friday, saying the crowded field had made it impossible for him to raise enough money to remain competitive in an accelerated coast-to-coast campaign.

After making his announcement, Mr. Vilsack spent the afternoon taking calls from former rivals. They sent their best wishes, even as they began seeking his endorsement in Iowa, where the caucus early next year will kick off the process of selecting a nominee.

“I’m not thinking about that today,” Mr. Vilsack said in a telephone interview, pausing for a moment after juggling a string of calls from a variety of suitors, including Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton and Barack Obama.

Candidates also issued statements praising his candidacy.

Mr. Vilsack was the first Democratic candidate to enter the 2008 race, opening his campaign on Nov. 30 as the not-from-Washington candidate who pledged to renew a forgotten sense of community across America. He also became one of the most outspoken critics of the Iraq war and called for an immediate withdrawal of American troops.

But Mr. Vilsack, 56, said he struggled to compete financially in a field of nine candidates, particularly as California, Texas, Florida and Illinois are among the states working to move up the dates of their primary elections next year and candidates are expected to campaign earlier in these states. Already in debt, he said he wanted to abandon his bid before his finances worsened.

“So much of this process now is about perception and money,” Mr. Vilsack said, lamenting the end of the days when a long-shot candidate could prosper by courting one voter at a time. “In a setting where you have thousands of people in a convention center, it’s hard to develop a relationship or intimacy.”

Earlier, at a news conference in Des Moines, he said: “I came up against something for the first time in my life that hard work and effort couldn’t overcome. I just couldn’t work harder, couldn’t give it enough.”

The scramble set off by his announcement was not only for Mr. Vilsack’s endorsement, but also for his Iowa advisers and supporters, all of whom are seen as immensely valuable to other candidates. Officials from at least four other campaigns called the Vilsack headquarters on Friday, searching for a staff list.

Monica Fischer, a top Iowa activist and Vilsack loyalist, said: “It is a whole new day in Iowa. It’s a sad day for the people who supported him, but it opens everything up for the caucuses now.”

Ms. Fischer added, “Everybody will be waiting to see who he supports and where his supporters and staff go.”

In the three months of his candidacy, Mr. Vilsack faced a burden unlike that of any other person in the race: persuading voters in his own state to view him as presidential material. The steady parade of high-profile, well-financed rivals in his own backyard complicated his efforts.

Still, Mr. Vilsack’s decision to end his campaign startled many of his admirers in Iowa and across the country. Only two days ago, he appeared alongside his fellow Democratic candidates at a forum in Nevada, and he was scheduled to attend a campaign rally Friday evening in Iowa.

But early Friday morning, he began making calls to party officials and supporters, saying his campaign was spending more money than it was taking in. A few hours later, at his news conference, he criticized the intense focus placed upon fund-raising and urged candidates to continue on-the-ground campaigning in early voting states.

“It is money and only money that is the reason we are leaving today,” Mr. Vilsack said, adding that presidential campaigns should be publicly financed.

While Mr. Vilsack reported raising $1.1 million from Nov. 9 to Dec. 31, according to campaign finance reports, he had spent all but $396,000 by the end of the year. After Mr. Obama, of Illinois, and Mrs. Clinton, of New York, entered the race in late January, Mr. Vilsack’s advisers said, he struggled to raise money.

During his brief campaign, Mr. Vilsack sought to use his life story as an American metaphor: from orphaned infant in Pittsburgh to governor of Iowa, the native state of his college sweetheart-turned-wife, Christie. He served as mayor of Mount Pleasant, Iowa, and as state senator, and in 1998 he was elected governor. He served two terms.

“This has been a great experience,” Mr. Vilsack said Friday. “When you start out life in an orphanage and you run for president of the United States, that’s what this country is supposed to be about.”

Hirshberg: Vilsack's Exit "A Bit Of A Tragedy" (NHUL)

By John DiStaso

New Hampshire Union Leader, February 24, 2007

Stonyfield Farms chief executive Gary Hirshberg says Barack Obama telephoned him asking for support "literally 120 seconds" after word of Tom Vilsack's exit from the Presidential race became public.

Hirshberg, one of only two well-known New Hampshire backers of the Democratic former Iowa governor's short-lived Presidential effort, said yesterday Vilsack called him on Thursday night to say he would be dropping out of the campaign.

State Rep. Jim Ryan, a longtime friend who organized Vilsack's announcement tour in New Hampshire in December, said he heard from Vilsack yesterday morning.

"He said, 'I can't financially compete in 10 front-loaded markets, and being a frugal man, I not going to go into personal debt,'" Ryan said.

Hirshberg called Vilsack's decision "a bit of a tragedy" because it shows that the nominating process has become so front-loaded and money-oriented that lesser-known, less flashy and relatively under-funded candidates quickly realize they no longer have a chance to win their parties' nominations.

State Democratic Party Chairman Kathy Sullivan agreed, blaming Vilsack's exit on the unchecked rush to the front of the nominating calendars by nearly two dozen states, including the populous and expensive California, Florida and New Jersey.

"We still continue to hear nothing from either (national) party's leadership on what will be done to stop the front-loading of the primary calendar so candidates can have a chance to raise the funds they need," Sullivan said. "How many qualified and dynamic leaders do we have to lose in this race before something is done?"

Ryan targeted Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean.

"I'm slightly less and furious at him," Ryan said. "He should know better. He achieved national fame through retail politics, and he initiated this process in the name of diversity. It created a pell-mell rush to the front."

Dean supported opening the primary and caucus calendar through a DNC review that ended with Nevada and South Carolina joining New Hampshire and Iowa's traditional early contests.

"I get the sense it's payback because he lost" the New Hampshire primary in 2004, Ryan said.

Hirshberg said, "We now have an 'American Idol' approach to choosing our President now. It's all about name recognition. That is not consistent with the New Hampshire tradition."

Obama is a chief beneficiary of the current "rock-star" mentality in politics, but Hirshberg said the Illinois senator's call to him "in some respects vindicated the New Hampshire process. He raised $1.3 million in Hollywood the other night, but at the same time, he's picking up the phone and calling a New Hampshire businessman."

DOJ_NMG_0137038

Hirshberg said he has not decided on a future endorsement, but, said he and Obama "had a good talk and we agreed absolutely to meet on his next visit. I'm sure we'll host him here at Stonyfield," a nationally known producer of organic yogurt.

Hirshberg called Vilsack "an absolutely superb candidate, qualified by any measure. He has been successful in a bi-partisan environment, which I consider to be a requirement for our next President."

Hirshberg said the he does not blame the media for identifying front-runners early in the process.

He said the public has "a desperate hunger to find an alternative to what's going on in Washington. People are eager to pick a winner right now. They want an election today."

Hirshberg said Vilsack's exit shows a need for the country to seriously consider public financing of campaigns in order to level the playing field.

Sullivan also praised Vilsack's "wisdom, experience and optimism," and said he and his family "spent a lot of time talking to and meeting people all across New Hampshire, not only embarrassing our grassroots process but thriving in it."

Ryan said he "felt real bad" for Vilsack, just as he did for former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner and Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh, Democrats who also decided against running for financial reasons.

"With Florida, California, New Jersey, Alabama and the rest of the states moving up," Ryan said, "we may well end up with a national primary on February 5 and you're going to have to have millions to be competitive."

Ryan said he also heard from a candidate yesterday, but refused to name the person. He also heard from four campaigns, but told them, "We haven't had the wake so I wasn't about to make those decisions yet."

Former Iowa Gov. Vilsack Ending '08 Bid (AP)

AP, February 23, 2007

DES MOINES, Iowa (AP) -- Democrat Tom Vilsack, the former Iowa governor who built a centrist image, abandoned his bid for the presidency on Friday after struggling against better-known, better-financed rivals.

"It is money and only money that is the reason we are leaving today," Vilsack told reporters at a news conference, later adding, "We have a debt we're going to have to work our way through."

Vilsack, 56, left office in January and traveled to early voting states, but he attracted neither the attention nor the campaign cash of his top-tier rivals -- Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, Sen. Barack Obama and John Edwards. He even faced obstacles in his home state.

In the most recent financial documents, Vilsack reported raising more than $1.1 million in the last seven weeks of 2006 but only had around $396,000 in the bank. Some campaign finance experts contend candidates will need $20 million by June 2007 to remain viable.

"I came up against something for the first time in my life that hard work and effort couldn't overcome," he said, his wife, Christie, and two grown sons at his side. "I just couldn't work any harder, couldn't give it enough."

Vilsack's withdrawal still leaves a crowded field of eight Democrats. He will remain an important figure in the presidential race as former rivals undoubtedly will seek his endorsement and help to win Iowa.

Vilsack, who likely will be considered as a vice presidential nominee, repeatedly declined to endorse another candidate at his news conference.

Other campaigns immediately began to seek out Vilsack's well-respected staff, hoping to pick up talented political operatives with experience in the first nominating state, and his political backers.

Gary Hirshberg, CEO and founder of Stonyfield Farm yogurt, was one of Vilsack's earliest and most prominent New Hampshire supporters. He said two minutes after Vilsack's announcement, Obama called seeking his support. Hirshberg told Obama he wasn't ready to commit to another candidate yet.

"Although we're absolutely undecided, I was very impressed," Hirshberg said. "Though we can wring our hands now about the role of money in these campaigns, it's still really vindicating to me to see, particularly here in New Hampshire, that grass-roots, house-to-house, person-to-person politics is still the order of the day. I think Senator Obama just proved that."

Vilsack was the first Democrat to formally enter the 2008 race when he announced his candidacy in November. His February departure underscores the warp speed of the 2008 race. In previous presidential cycles, candidates didn't announce until the fall, just a few months before the first caucuses and primaries, not more than a year before.

Trying to counter perceptions that as one of the least known of the prospective candidates he was too much of an underdog to succeed, Vilsack said in a campaign video: "I've never started a race that I've been expected to win, and I've never lost."

But the struggle for money proved too difficult, leaving a debt that Hirshberg described in the "hundreds of thousands."

"I told Tom last night that a number of us intend to get to Des Moines after the dust settles and help retire that debt, to do something, even if we have to sell yogurt in the street," Hirshberg said.

DOJ_NMG_0137039

As governor of Iowa, Vilsack had carved out a reputation as a centrist balancing his state's budget and refusing to raise taxes, while emphasizing increased spending on such priorities as education, health care and higher wages. Until recently he chaired the Democratic Leadership Council, the party's signature centrist group.

Vilsack initially made the focus of his long-shot campaign a plan to end U.S dependence on foreign oil by promoting alternative energy sources.

"Energy security will revitalize rural America, re-establish our moral leadership on global warming and climate security, and eliminate our addiction to foreign oil," Vilsack, a prominent proponent of ethanol, biodiesel and wind power, said at the time.

More recently, Vilsack has been among the more aggressive Democratic candidates in his call to bring U.S. troops home from Iraq, calling for Congress to cut off funding.

Beyond his record as governor, Vilsack tried to sell himself as a candidate with a compelling personal story, which he hoped would spark national interest in his candidacy. He was left as an infant at a Catholic orphanage in Pittsburgh and adopted by what he has described as a "troubled but loving family."

His parents were well-to-do and sent him to a private preparatory school, but his mother was an alcoholic who beat him and his father suffered trying financial reversals.

Vilsack managed to transcend his difficult childhood to build a successful career in law and politics, serving as a mayor, state senator and two terms as Iowa governor.

In a sign that Vilsack might abandon the race, he recently accepted a position lecturing at the Drake University Law School in Des Moines and had become a consultant for MidAmerican Energy Co.

Vilsack Calls It Quits For '08 (WT)

By S.A. Miller, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 24, 2007

Tom Vilsack, the first Democrat to officially enter the 2008 presidential race, dropped his bid for the White House yesterday, saying he could not raise enough money to compete and underscoring the power of top-tier candidates Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Barack Obama to crowd out the rest of the field.

"We have everything to win the nomination and general election -- everything except money," he told supporters at his campaign headquarters in Des Moines, Iowa, as he announced his decision.

He will be viewed as a casualty of the new campaign world, in which big states such as California, Florida and New Jersey are considering moving up their primaries and in which $100 million is considered the ante.

Even as a former governor of Iowa, who should have had an edge in that state's early primary season caucuses, Mr. Vilsack had struggled to attract money and attention from Mrs. Clinton, Mr. Obama and former Democratic vice presidential nominee John Edwards.

Mr. Vilsack, 56, said he had expected to win the Iowa caucus and finish near the top in the New Hampshire primary.

But he said that wouldn't be enough to win the race and that mounting debt forced him to call it quits.

"At the end of the day, it is not about good ideas or hard work; it's about money," he said later in a conference call with reporters.

His exit leaves eight confirmed candidates in the Democratic contest, with Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Obama leading the pack, and Mr. Edwards performing well in Iowa polls.

Mrs. Clinton, 59, and Mr. Obama, 45, also likely lead in fundraising for what is shaping up to be the most expensive presidential campaign in history, possibly costing $1 billion.

The campaign ended for Mr. Vilsack a little more than three months after he declared his candidacy Nov. 8 -- the day after midterm elections swept Democrats into control of the U.S. Senate and House of Representatives for the first time in a dozen years.

Mr. Vilsack wasn't the first to bow out, nor was his the shortest-lived run.

Sen. Evan Bayh, Indiana Democrat, threw in the towel in December less than two weeks after setting up his exploratory committee.

Mr. Vilsack, high on the list of vice presidential prospects in 2004, remains an attractive running mate in 2008. However, he said the No. 2 spot was "the furthest thing from my mind today."

Mrs. Clinton said she had "deep admiration" for Mr. Vilsack and his wife, Christie. She said she looked forward to hearing more ideas from the former governor, who had made the Iraq war and energy policy the focus of his campaign.

"We share a passion for protecting America's young people through expanded health care options, early childhood education initiatives and opening the doors to higher education to every American."

DOJ_NMG_0137040

Mr. Obama called him "an outstanding public servant" and said his education, health care and energy policies made Iowa a model state.

"More than that, Tom brings a badly needed sense of honor and decency to our politics," said Mr. Obama, who has tried to stay above the political fray to distinguish himself from the perceived bare-knuckle campaigning by Mrs. Clinton.

Practically every poll shows Mrs. Clinton with a double-digit lead over Mr. Obama, who is double digits ahead of the next closest competitor.

Still, Mrs. Clinton is dogged by her 2002 vote authorizing the Iraq war and speculation on the left that she is unelectable.

Mr. Vilsack has always polled near the bottom, and several Democrats not in the race -- former Vice President Al Gore and retired Gen. Wesley Clark -- have closely trailed Mr. Obama.

Among Democrats in the race, only Mr. Edwards consistently garners about 10 percent in polls.

A Quinnipiac University poll of Democratic voters last week showed Mrs. Clinton with 38 percent, Mr. Obama with 23 percent, Mr. Gore with 11 percent and Mr. Edwards with 6 percent.

The next closest candidates, Mr. Clark and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, each received 2 percent. Mr. Vilsack, Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich of Ohio and Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware and Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut each garnered 1 percent or less.

The remaining Democratic candidate, former Sen. Mike Gravel of Alaska, was not mentioned in the poll.

Vilsack Exits Presidential Race, Citing Lack Of Funding (LAT)

By Mark Z. Barabak

The Los Angeles Times, February 24, 2007

Tom Vilsack's abrupt departure from the presidential race Friday underscores the indispensable role of money in the contest, as well as an attention gap between voters and political insiders.

Less than three months after becoming the first major Democratic candidate to formally announce his bid, Vilsack reluctantly made his exit at a Des Moines news conference.

"It is money and only money that is the reason we are leaving," the former Iowa governor said. He had begun mulling a pullout several days before making his final decision Thursday, in the face of a severe cash crunch.

"I came up against something for the time in my life that hard work and effort couldn't overcome," Vilsack said. "I just couldn't work any harder, couldn't give it enough."

His withdrawal leaves a Democratic field dominated by Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois — and, to a lesser degree, former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina. Several other candidates are fighting, as Vilsack did, to elbow their way into that top tier.

"In a normal year, a successful governor — no less from Iowa, the first voting state — would be an ideal candidate," said Thomas Schaller, a University of Maryland expert on the presidential nominating process. "But this is a cycle where you have these two titans in Obama and Clinton, and they're sucking all the oxygen and the majority of money out of the race before it's even begun."

Vilsack's announcement came on the same day a new national poll showed that about three in 10 Democrats were paying attention to the presidential race, and fewer than half volunteered a candidate they might support. The survey showed Clinton and Obama running far ahead of the party pack.

"Despite the accelerated campaign, it's not something that's really engaging the public to any great extent," said Andrew Kohut, director of the Pew Research Center for the People & the Press, which conducted the poll.

But at this stage of the contest the candidates are playing to a much narrower audience — courting key activists and donors. It was in the latter category in particular that Vilsack was lagging far behind. He reported raising $1.1 million between his November campaign launch and the end of the year — less than Obama raised in a single night this week in Beverly Hills.

In a conference call with reporters after his Friday announcement, Vilsack said he had been contemplating his exit for some time. He pressed on with his candidacy, however, delivering a speech on energy independence in San Francisco, appearing on "The Tonight Show With Jay Leno" and drawing favorable reviews for his performance Wednesday at a candidate's forum in Carson City, Nev. He emerged as an especially vocal critic of the war in Iraq.

But financial realities — and especially the prospect of going deeply into debt — weighed heavily on Vilsack.

"You can spin whether $20 million can compete with $100 million," Vilsack's campaign manager, Craig Varoga, said of the financial disadvantage the ex-governor probably would have faced. "But you cannot spin solvency.

"So we just made a very responsible fiscal decision."

DOJ_NMG_0137041

The departure of Vilsack is not expected to greatly alter the race. He trailed in polls even in his home state, which is scheduled to hold its precinct caucuses Jan. 14. But his absence will free up donors and Iowa activists whose expertise is highly valued; after Vilsack's announcement, his erstwhile rivals wasted no time.

"There's nobody, with the possible exception of John Edwards, who has anything remotely resembling a statewide organization," said Gordon Fischer, a former chairman of the Iowa Democratic Party who received a call Friday from Obama.

"It really opens up the state in a way it wasn't before."

Unhappy with all the attention showered on Iowa — as well as New Hampshire, which hosts the nation's first primary — several states have moved to push up their nominating contests. That may create what amounts to a national primary Feb. 5, probably including California and several other big states. That, in turn, has put a premium on the kind of early, frenzied fundraising that Vilsack lamented Friday.

"This process has become a great deal about money," he said. "A lot of money."

His exit marks the third departure of a serious contender from the Democratic race in the last few months. Sen. Evan Bayh of Indiana — who for years inched toward an all-out run for the White House — decided in December that he could not compete as an underdog in today's campaign environment. Former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner announced in October that he was abandoning his presidential effort, citing family considerations.

Speaking to reporters Friday in a firm if somber tone, Vilsack said it was too early to consider endorsing another candidate and brushed aside a question about whether he would be interested in being considered for vice president, as he was in 2004.

"To be honest with you," Vilsack said, "that's about the furthest thing from my mind today."

Vilsack Drops Out Of '08 Race, Cites Money As Reason (HILL)

By Klaus Marre

The Hill, February 23, 2007

Facing better-known candidates with deeper pockets, former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack (D) declared Friday that he would bow out of the 2008 presidential race. The decision will shift the balance of power in Iowa, which holds the first caucus of the primary season and is an important bellwether for candidates.

Flanked by his family, Vilsack declared he would drop out of the race for the sole reason that he would not be able to financially sustain a national campaign.

"It is money and only money that is the reason that we are leaving today," Vilsack said in Des Moines, Iowa. He lamented that the primary process has become "to a great degree" about raising campaign cash.

As a former two-term governor of Iowa, Vilsack had significant support there and polled in the double digits. But nationally, Vilsack trailed far behind name-brand Democratic candidates like Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) and Barack Obama (Ill.), as well as former vice presidential candidate John Edwards.

These top-tier candidates are now expected to vie for Vilsack's endorsement in the state, or at least to bring his supporters to their camps.

Vilsack, a centrist who ran as a Washington outsider, focused his campaign on ensuring energy security, getting U.S. troops out of Iraq and making healthcare more affordable.

Vilsack Drops Presidential Bid (DMR)

By David Yepsen

Des Moines Register, February 23, 2007

Former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack plans to drop out of the 2008 race for president later this morning because he lost the 2007 money primary.

His move will make the 2008 Iowa Democratic caucuses just a bit more important to the other candidates.

Key insiders cited Vilsackâ€™s inability to raise enough cash to compete against the two financial powerhouses in the race, Hillary Rodham Clinton and Barack Obama.

Vilsackâ€™s departure does little to change the nature of the national race - he was getting less than 1 percent in the polls.Â But it does reconfigure the Iowa caucus fight where he was running in third or fourth place and found support in the 10 percent to 15 percent range.

Many of his Iowa supporters - key organizational Democrats in some counties - will now be in the market for another candidate and the scramble will be on.Â A scramble will also be on for his staffers, many of whom are talented political operatives who know Iowa well.

DOJ_NMG_0137042

Historically, when a candidate drops out of the race, caucus supporters of that candidate go â€œundecidedâ€ for a while as they re-examine the field.Â That can be expected in this case as well because there is no clear heir to Vilsackâ€™s support.Â Clinton, Obama and John Edwards are all in a position to claim a portion of Vilsackâ€™s people.

One immediate effect on the race is to make the Iowa caucuses even more important.Â With no favorite son candidate in the field, Iowa again becomes a level playing field for the others.Â As long as Vilsack was in the race, many in the political community thought contests in Nevada and New Hampshire might prove to be fairer tests of strength for the other candidates.

Vilsack was always considered a long-shot for the nomination, in part because of the financial mountain he had to climb.Â Federal law limited him to raising $2,300 per person and he could not use money from a gubernatorial account to finance his bid. Obama and Clinton could transfer money from their Senate accounts, which means they could raise more per donor than Vilsack could.

Vilsack was also burning through about $500,000 a month in overhead expenses.Â While thatâ€™s a frugal operation by presidential campaign standards, itâ€™s a lot of money to raise, especially for a one percenter.

While Friday is a sad, though not unexpected, day for Vilsack and his supporters, they can take some solace in knowing he comes out of the race in a better political position than he entered.

As a result of his effort, he became better known to the nation's political and media communities.Â He presented himself well during the campaign, made no gaffes and can leave the race with his head up and with an enhanced stature.

Harkin Aide: 'No Truth' To Retirement Rumor (RC)

By Nicole Duran

RollCall.com, February 23, 2007

With former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack's decision today to end his quest for the Democratic presidential nomination, an aide to Sen. Tom Harkin (D-Iowa) shot down speculation that Harkin would not seek re-election and pave the way for Vilsack to run for Senate.

Some Democrats believed that the 67-year-old Senate Agriculture chairman would ultimately forgo a fifth term, but stall long enough to allow Vilsack to switch gears and take his place in the 2008 Senate race.

The theory was that the longer Harkin waited before formally announcing a decision, the less time potential Republican candidates would have to prepare to run for an open seat. Money Vilsack raised for his presidential bid could be transferred to a Senate campaign fund.

But Harkin, through a spokeswoman, again dismissed such talk this afternoon.

After speaking to Harkin, Maureen Knightly, his communications director, said there is "no truth" to the "conspiracy theory."

"He dislikes this lengthy campaign process," she said in explaining why he will not just say that he is running again.

"He's doing everything he can right now to prepare for a run and he's actively raising money," Knightly added.

Harkin's schedule is packed with fundraisers and he is hiring more campaign staff, Democrats in Washington, D.C., and Iowa point out.

He began the year with more than $1.1 million in his war chest, according to his latest campaign finance report.

He raised $363,000 in the last quarter of 2006 and listed five people on his campaign pay roll.

Last month, Harkin told Capitol Hill reporters: "Don't put a lot of stock in that right now," when a comment by Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee Chairman Charles Schumer (N.Y.) about Harkin's reluctance to announce a re-election bid set tongues wagging about Harkin's political future.

Harkin refused to announce his re-election plans because modern campaigns are "too long," he said then.

Rommey Amused As Clinton, Obama Go After Each Other (AP)

By Glen Johnson

AP, February 23, 2007

MERRIMACK – Republican Presidential hopeful Mitt Romney said yesterday he relishes the infighting that has distracted two of his potential Democratic opponents, Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois.

"It's great, isn't it?" Romney said to peals of laughter from crowd of employees at a solar-related equipment plant on the newly declared candidate's first visit to the leadoff Presidential primary state. "I love to see it when it happens on the other side."

The former Massachusetts governor described his leading Republican rivals, Sen. John McCain of Arizona and former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani, as "friends" and "national heroes," before adding, "I respect them. I'm sure we'll disagree on issues from time to time, but I doubt you'll see the rancor that apparently may exist elsewhere."

Earlier this week, Clinton aides called on Obama to repudiate criticism of the former first lady leveled by Hollywood producer David Geffen, a former Clinton backer now supporting Obama. Obama refused, saying Geffen spoke for himself.

DOJ_NMG_0137043

The former Massachusetts governor's main message to workers during the visit was that it doesn't make sense for the country to send its oil dollars to nations that dislike the United States, so he's developing a plan for energy independence in the not-too-distant future.

?Romney: Divest from Iran

Expanding the use of wind, solar, nuclear and improved coal technologies could help the nation create as much energy as it uses within 20 to 30 years, some experts believe, a timeframe Romney cited but would not embrace until he delivers his formal speech on the subject at some future date.

"It doesn't make sense for us not to become increasingly energy independent, and for that to happen, we're going to have to rely on technology, innovation of the same kind that you're seeing right here," Romney told about 100 employees at GT Solar Inc., which makes equipment in turn used to construct solar energy panels.

"It will be the vision of that program to have America to produce as much energy as we use," Romney said.

Romney had been scheduled to visit New Hampshire amid a campaign announcement tour that also took him to early voting Iowa, South Carolina, Florida and Michigan, but he had to postpone his trip after a heavy snowstorm closed schools and highways.

Obama Reels In Austin Crowd (DMN)

By Wayne Slater

The Dallas Morning News, February 24, 2007

Sea of people brushes off rain to hear Democrat's promise of change

AUSTIN – Thousands of people jammed a lakeside venue used for rock concerts to hear Democratic presidential hopeful Barack Obama promise Friday to "galvanize a movement for change" in American politics.

The crowd – extraordinarily large for so early in a presidential campaign – cheered Mr. Obama's call to withdraw U.S. troops from Iraq and his denunciation of the Bush administration.

"The American people are tired of being afraid," the senator said. "They are tired of being pitted against each other."

Standing on a stage surrounded by a sea of supporters waving blue "Obama '08" placards, the Illinois Democrat presented himself as "an agent for change in Washington" who would unite an electorate polarized by fractious politics and an unpopular war.

"Regardless of what divides us, regardless of our differences in race and religion and political party, there is more than binds us together than drives us apart," he said.

The rally was Mr. Obama's first visit to Texas since formally announcing his candidacy for the Democratic nomination two weeks ago. He attended private fundraisers in Houston and Austin before Friday's midafternoon rally. Mr. Obama's campaign estimated that 20,000 people came to Austin's downtown Town Lake to see the candidate.

Many in the crowd were young and had waited hours in intermittent rain to see the political newcomer. Bands served as a warm-up; one rapper punctuated the chorus "Everything I do will be funky," with shouts of "Obama!"

The rally was an unusual burst of campaign activity long before Election Day, reflecting the full-bore contest already under way in both parties. Mr. Obama did not mention Democratic rival Hillary Rodham Clinton by name, but he alluded to her twice in seeking to contrast himself.

He noted his recent fundraising swing through Hollywood, which sparked a war of words between the Clinton camp and a top Obama supporter. And he made the point that he has opposed the war in Iraq since 2002 – a key distinction with Mrs. Clinton, who voted to authorize the invasion.

"I said we should not give open-ended authority to a president because it would lead to an open-ended occupation," he said.

A top Clinton political supporter in Texas, former land commissioner Garry Mauro, acknowledged that Mr. Obama is charismatic but suggested the political newcomer is effectively auditioning for a second spot on the ticket.

"Two years ago, we were not sure a woman could be elected president," he said. "The polls clearly show that's not the case anymore. The same polls don't show that's the case for an African-American.

"What we're seeing at this point is the process of the American people deciding whether they are ready to elect an African-American president or vice president," he said. "It's a fascinating thing to watch."

In his 35-minute speech, Mr. Obama took sharp aim at the Bush administration, at one point ridiculing Vice President Dick Cheney for suggesting the decision by British Prime Minister Tony Blair to withdraw 1,600 troops form Iraq was a positive sign. He noted the U.S. is sending another 22,000 troops in.

DOJ_NMG_0137044

"Now, keep in mind, this is the same guy that said we'd be greeted as liberators, the same guy that said that we're in the last throes. I'm sure he forecast sun today," he said amid the Austin rain. "When Dick Cheney says it's a good thing, you know that you've probably got some big problems."

A spokeswoman for Mr. Cheney said Friday that he had no comment.

In addition to his call for America to set a timetable for withdrawal of troops from Iraq by March 31 next year, Mr. Obama said he supports universal health care and programs to increase access to education.

And he noted that New Orleans "still looks like a war has been fought" and pledged to spend money to rebuild the city ravaged by Hurricane Katrina.

Obama, Rezko Neighborly Relationship Ends (CHIT)

By David Jackson, Ray Gibson

Chicago Tribune, February 24, 2007

A land sale recorded this month ended the neighborly relationship between U.S. Sen. Barack Obama and indicted political insider Antoin "Tony" Rezko, Obama's friend and former fundraiser.

On Dec. 28, 2006, land records show, Rezko's wife, Rita, sold the garden lot she owned next to Obama's home, transferring it to a company that plans to develop housing there. That sale deed became public this month when it was registered with the Cook County recorder of deeds.

On Friday, a spokesman for the Democratic senator and presidential candidate issued a written statement saying Obama hadn't communicated with Rezko about the deal: "The senator knows only that development is planned, but not any of the details. Sen. Obama was informed by his counsel of the plan for development."

Rezko's wife and Obama bought the adjoining South Side lots in 2005 and then engaged in a series of personal financial transactions to re-divide and improve their parcels. After their dealings were disclosed by the Tribune, Obama said he was "bone-headed" to enter the financial arrangements because Rezko was reported to be under grand jury investigation during that period.

In October, Rezko was indicted in a state government kickback scandal and in an alleged business fraud. He has pleaded not guilty to both indictments.

As he campaigns for president, Obama has distanced himself from his longtime friend.

Rezko's wife appears to have netted roughly $54,500 from her dealings with the parcel, although that figure does not include expenses and property taxes. She bought the parcel for $625,000 in June 2005, the same day Obama bought his home for $1.65 million. Both lots had once been part of the same estate, but the owner listed them for sale separately.

In January 2006, Rita Rezko transferred a 1,500-square-foot strip of her land to Obama for $104,500. Her recent sale of the rest was for $575,000.

The vacant lot once owned by Rita Rezko will be developed by a company owned by former Rezko business attorney Michael J. Sreenan. Rezko has no involvement with the new development, Sreenan said. "He's not a silent partner or anything like that," Sreenan said.

Sreenan said he has hired an architect and is discussing plans for the land with the alderman and the city Landmarks Commission.

When they owned the adjoining properties, Obama paid his landscaper to mow Rezko's lawn. Obama hired an attorney and architect to design a wrought iron fence on their property line and secure city permits, but Rezko agreed to pay the $14,000 cost of building that fence.

Since Rezko was indicted, six creditors have filed lawsuits against him in Cook County Circuit Court, including one this month that contends Rezko owes $12.2 million over a real estate deal.

A separate lending firm filed a $3.5 million judgment lien on Rezko's Wilmette home, and the IRS filed another lien saying his Rezko Enterprises LLC food firm owes $95,258 in taxes.

In Clinton's Backyard, It's Open Season As An Obama Fund-Raiser Lines Up Donors (NYT)

By Eric Konigsberg

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

Twenty-eight stories above Sixth Avenue in Manhattan, Jeh Johnson was dialing away.

The race was on for New York's prized political donors, and Mr. Johnson, one of Senator Barack Obama's leading fund-raisers in the city, was trying to poach in the heart of Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton's financial territory.

DOJ_NMG_0137045

Before the day was up, Mr. Johnson got about a dozen people on the phone with the pitch that Mr. Obama represented "a generational shift" away from the partisan chokehold gripping Washington. A few told him they were not ready to give, but more than half said they were willing to sign checks and come to a March 9 fund-raiser at the Grand Hyatt New York.

He called Joyce Johnson, a family friend (she was once his baby sitter) who lives on the Upper West Side and who has run unsuccessfully for State Assembly and the City Council over the past few years. She said she was on board with Mr. Obama's campaign, with some trepidation.

"A lot of the women who supported me are supporting Hillary," Ms. Johnson said. She named a West Side activist who has, in the past, raised money for Gov. Eliot Spitzer and Representative Charles B. Rangel, Democrat of New York.

"Ricki Lieberman is like my godmother," Ms. Johnson said, "And she's going with Hillary and I'm going the other way. Keep talking to me, Jeh. Give me some sea legs. Tell me what to say."

Mr. Johnson, whose name is pronounced jay, leaned back in his chair and said: "Joyce, we had 30 or 40 people here in my office last night for a preliminary meeting on this, and another 30 on the phone. One thing you learn quickly is that when the name Barack Obama is involved, you always have more people show up than you expected."

Mr. Johnson, a lawyer at Paul, Weiss, Rifkin, Wharton & Garrison, is a linchpin in uphill efforts to build a donor base for Mr. Obama in New York, where many potential supporters have at some time in the last 16 years aided the Clintons.

Mr. Obama's ability to raise significant amounts of money depends on the success that people like Mr. Johnson have among New York's all-important Democratic fund-raising circles, which the Clinton camp has moved aggressively to corral by battling any perception that elements of the party are drifting away. And part of Mr. Johnson's pitch must be that by contributing to the Obama campaign, Democrats are not showing disloyalty to the Clintons, a fear that can be heard in his conversations with donors.

"Look, if it doesn't work out, then hopefully the nominee will get over it," he told one donor in discussing the possibility of a Clinton victory and its ramifications for the Obama camp. "She'll need all the help she can get, particularly from the people associated with his campaign."

The Clintons have dominated the fund-raising race for Democratic-party money in New York since long before Mrs. Clinton held office in the state, Mr. Johnson said. "She and her husband have been working New York for 16 years and they know where they are," he added. "But I think we're going to surprise a lot of people with who signs up."

The Obama campaign has already attracted a number of fund-raisers with ties to Mrs. Clinton or her husband, like Orin Kramer, a prominent hedge fund manager from New Jersey, and James S. Rubin, a private equity manager and son of Robert E. Rubin, the former Treasury secretary. The younger Mr. Rubin was also a finance director for New York during President Bill Clinton's 1996 re-election campaign, and held positions at the Federal Communications Commission during the second Clinton administration.

Other former Clintonites who are raising money for Mr. Obama include Joshua L. Steiner, a private equity principal; Michael Froman, a Citigroup executive; and Brian Mathis of Provident Group. All of them are young (in their 40s) and served in senior positions in Mr. Clinton's Treasury Department a decade ago (Mr. Froman and Mr. Mathis were friends with Mr. Obama at Harvard Law School). Another high-profile Obama fund-raiser is Earl G. Graves, the publisher of Black Enterprise magazine, who in 2000 was listed by the White House as an overnight guest of the Clintons.

The Obama campaign hopes to draw from pools that barely existed four years ago, particularly hedge fund and private-equity fund principals who only recently acquired their money and their interest in the political process.

But another strategy holds that in order to keep up with Mrs. Clinton, Mr. Johnson and his cohorts will have to succeed at poaching traditional Clinton donors.

Already, the bulk of New York's traditional Democratic money elite — people on the level of Alan Patricof, Steven Rattner, and Hassan Nemazee — has pledged to support Mrs. Clinton.

But the drift of some New York donors, along with the switch by some former Clinton backers on the West Coast, like David Geffen, has elevated hopes among Mr. Obama's supporters. There is no consensus among his financial supporters as to whether the feud this week over Mr. Geffen's critical comments about the Clintons is helping or hindering their efforts. Still, several of them said privately that they had been enjoying the sparring.

"It's important to demonstrate that Barack's willing to hit back, though I'm not sure this is the opportunity I would've picked," one said.

Mr. Kramer, the hedge fund manager, remains an admirer of Mrs. Clinton, and said he agonized over the move but was swayed partially by the grass-roots approach of the Obama campaign. "Making choices involving people you genuinely care about is harrowing," he said. "I made the decision when I did to bring the pain to an end."

Still, of his new endeavor, Mr. Kramer said, "It's like the Red Sox looking for fans at Yankee Stadium."

DOJ_NMG_0137046

Mr. Johnson, 49, is aware that his taking up with Mr. Obama marks a defection from the Clintons. He was the general counsel to the Air Force for more than two years during President Clinton's second term. Mr. Clinton's trusted adviser, Vernon E. Jordan Jr. — an old family friend of Mr. Johnson —helped him get that job.

Mr. Johnson urged almost every person he reached by phone to look up the speech that Mr. Obama made before the Illinois Senate in October 2002. In the speech, Mr. Obama outlined his opposition to going to war in Iraq, highlighting the sharp contrast to Mrs. Clinton's vote that year to authorize military action against Iraq.

He is working his connections, which include a 300-person master list heavily weighted with fellow lawyers, members of a black professionals fraternity to which he belongs, and veterans of John Kerry's 2004 presidential campaign, for which he served as special counsel.

"Among the attorneys on the Ivy League side, he definitely is appealing," Mr. Johnson said of Mr. Obama. His pitch to one fellow lawyer with whom he had previously traded calls, was this efficient:

"So, Barack." Pause. "Sounds like all your buddies from Harvard Law are involved too." Pause. "Have you met him before?" Pause. "The base level is $1,000."

Although campaign-finance regulations bar individual donors from giving more than $2,300 per election to a campaign, as a "bundler" Mr. Johnson is expected to raise much more on the breadth of his Rolodex and the depth of his persuasive skills. The invitation to the March 9 event lists Mr. Johnson and his wife, along with about a dozen other couples or individuals, as gala "chairs" who have pledged to raise $100,000 — all in increments of $2,300 or less.

Despite Mr. Johnson's considerable experience in the political sphere, participation in one of the Renaissance Weekend retreats made popular by the Clintons, and his volunteer position on the Kerry campaign, he did not until last June become a legitimate fund-raising player. He has since been sought out by candidates.

"I got a call from the Menendez Senate campaign, and they asked me to host a party with Bobbi Brown, who has the cosmetics line," Mr. Johnson recalled (his family and Ms. Brown's live in Montclair, N.J., a state where Robert Menendez is a senator). "Menendez got Barack and Cory Booker to do this event with us. That was when I met Barack. We raised between $300,000 and $500,000 in one day, and my name was associated with that event."

In the months that followed, Mr. Johnson said: "John Edwards, Bill Richardson, Jim Webb, Harold Ford, they all came here. Harold Ford, he has his little entourage. He sat right there in the chair next to the TV."

He had expected to wait for the outcome of the 2008 primaries before signing on with a candidate, but after seeing Mr. Obama hold forth at a fall book-signing on the Upper East Side, Mr. Johnson was won over.

Then, the day before Thanksgiving, Mr. Johnson received a call at home from Mr. Obama.

"He said, 'I'm thinking about running for president. Can you not commit to anybody until I decide?' " Mr. Johnson said. "Now, we really hit it off. I said, 'Barack, I'm with you.' "

Clinton Sees Role For Husband (SFC)

By Carla Marinucci

San Francisco Chronicle, February 24, 2007

Democratic presidential front-runner Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton -- coming off a week of caustic comments from Hollywood mogul David Geffen and a campaign squabble with rival Sen. Barack Obama -- was exactly where she wanted to be Friday: in front of an adoring crowd in the Democratic stronghold of San Francisco, raising boatloads of campaign cash.

And the New York senator used the occasion to defend a man who is potentially a source of controversy: her husband, former Democratic President Bill Clinton.

In response to a question from the audience, she called her husband "the most popular person in the world right now" and said that when she reaches the White House, "I will continue the tradition of using former presidents" as diplomats around the world.

Clinton visited San Francisco at the invitation of major Democratic Party donor Susie Tompkins Buell on the same day the first declared Democratic candidate for president, former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, dropped out of the race. Vilsack said he could not raise enough money to continue the 618-day marathon to the Nov. 4, 2008, election.

But Clinton appeared to have no such problems in San Francisco, where 900 people attended her sold-out, $250-a-head fundraiser at the Palace Hotel, including such political leaders as state Sens. Don Perata of Oakland and Carole Migden of San Francisco, Republican Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's chief of staff Susan Kennedy, and such major party donors as developer Walter Shorenstein, whom the senator helped serenade with a chorus of "Happy Birthday."

At the hourlong "town hall"-style appearance, billed as "Hillary Makes History," Clinton supporters munched on boxed lunches of sushi and salad -- organic and locally produced in accordance with the candidate's wishes, they were told -- and listened as the senator spoke in detail about her views regarding the war in Iraq, contraceptives funding, affordable housing, health care, the environment and climate change.

DOJ_NMG_0137047

"I'm not running as a woman candidate, I'm running because I think I'm the best candidate to hit the ground running," Clinton said.

The senator said her experience as first lady during her husband's eight years in the White House would help shape her presidency. For example, she acknowledged that "the mistakes that I made during the health care debate" showed that "a president is powerful ... but the president has to lead in a collegial way, bring people along."

With the Academy Awards just two days away, Clinton also gave her husband's former vice president -- who still is viewed as a potential rival for the Democratic nomination -- a thumbs-up for his Oscar-nominated film about global warming, "An Inconvenient Truth."

"We're all pulling for Al Gore to get that Oscar," she said. "Nobody has done more to sound the alarm" on hydrocarbons.

The senator's appearance in San Francisco highlighted her strengths as a powerhouse fundraiser and illustrated her ability as a seasoned public figure with the background to discuss details on a wide range of policy matters.

Clinton was briefly interrupted by protesters from CodePink, the anti-war group, who raised six large pink banners with slogans such as "We Want a Peace President" and "Hillary Stop the War Fund." Five members of the group were escorted from the room by security officers and arrested by police, according to Medea Benjamin, who heads the grassroots organization.

Clinton did not directly acknowledge the protesters -- some of whom yelled "Stop the war" as they were led outside -- but said to cheers, "Yes, we do have to end the war in Iraq."

Some Democrats have questioned the senator about her October 2002 vote in favor of giving President Bush the authority to use military action against Iraq. While Clinton has said she wouldn't vote that same way knowing now what she didn't know then, she has been criticized for refusing to simply label the vote a mistake.

In her remarks, Clinton noted "a great deal of unrest and anger and deep, deep, frustration" on Iraq and said it's time "to begin to rein this president in" regarding U.S. involvement in the war. She has introduced legislation calling for a limit on the number of U.S. troops in Iraq.

The issue of Clinton's war position was raised earlier this week at a forum in Nevada where almost all the declared Democratic presidential candidates met for the first time. Former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, who has publicly apologized for his Iraq vote as a mistake, appeared to jab Clinton for not going that far.

Clinton's stance was more harshly criticized this week by Hollywood movie mogul David Geffen, a supporter of Obama, who said Clinton's refusal to apologize for the war vote is an example of the problems that make her unelectable.

Geffen, who once raised millions for the Clintons, also criticized the former president and said both members of the powerful couple lie for political expediency. Hillary Clinton's campaign spokesman immediately criticized Obama for allowing a supporter such as Geffen to engage in "slash and burn" tactics and called on the Illinois senator to repudiate the remarks.

Clinton didn't directly engage the week's political criticisms during Friday's appearance in San Francisco, but a question from the audience gave her a chance to extol her husband's virtues.

Asked if, as president, she would appoint her husband secretary of state, the senator laughed and joked there may be "a law against that" (although there isn't).

She proudly defended her husband, an enormously popular figure among Democratic voters, saying she would rely on his expertise. She pointedly remarked that his approach to foreign policy and international relations while he was in the Oval Office from 1992 to 2000 was "a lot better than what we've recently seen."

Ellen Malcolm, who heads Emily's List, the powerful Democratic pro-choice women's political action committee -- one of the hosts of the event -- said Democrats "need to focus on the big picture, and that's the general election."

"Hillary Clinton has spent 15 years on the world stage," she said. "Hillary Clinton is the front-runner, and everybody is going to come after her. ... She knows how to defend herself."

Other supporters were livid at Geffen's comments.

"(Geffen) sucked up every benefit he could when Bill Clinton was president. He spent the night in the White House, and he had private briefings with the president," said attorney Martha Whetstone, a longtime friend of the Clintons from Arkansas. "The values of loyalty are important, and the Clintons have that in spades ... and to try to go after them on a national scale to settle a personal vendetta is unconscionable."

S.C. Democratic Party Chief To Lead Campaign (TSSC)

The State, February 24, 2007

The executive director of the state Democratic Party is leaving the post to run New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson's presidential campaign in South Carolina.

DOJ_NMG_0137048

Lachlan McIntosh will head the S.C. arm of Richardson's bid to become the nation's first Hispanic president. McIntosh said he will start working for Richardson on March 15.

Can Governors Regain Spotlight In 2008 Race For The White House? (WSJ)

By Christopher Cooper

The Wall Street Journal, February 24, 2007

This week's nasty tit-for-tat between Democratic senators Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama may have raised the appetite among partisans to take a fresh look for somebody -- anybody -- outside the Beltway as their 2008 presidential choice.

What about the folks running the states? As the National Governors Association gathers for its annual meeting in Washington this weekend, it hopes that some of its members will grab the spotlight that has largely eluded them in the nascent rounds of the 2008 presidential campaign. Makes sense: Governors have dominated nearly every presidential field of the past 30 years.

So far, this campaign hasn't been kind to the governor candidates. On Friday, ex-Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack dropped his presidential bid just three months after formally launching it. His tent-folding followed demurrals by former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner and Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh, who had been touting his time as governor more than his time in Washington.

New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson remains as the only state executive in the Democratic field, though he lags far behind Mrs. Clinton, Mr. Obama and former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards. Among Republicans, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney is considered top-tier, though the lower part of it, behind a senator and a former mayor. Ex-Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee toils far behind.

And, yet, the facts are these: Only four U.S. senators have become president since Warren Harding won in 1920, and one of them was Richard Nixon -- who left the Gang of 100 a full 16 years before ascending to the Oval Office.

Historically, conventional wisdom holds that governors have a better shot at making the presidency. They have the grassroots political organization to turn out state delegates and the sophisticated fund-raising machines that can Hoover up astonishing amounts of money. Running a state also parallels the demands of the presidency far more closely than a seat in the Senate does.

As executive officeholders, governors often have the clean record of accomplishment that senators lack. And they don't spark the long trail of compromise that Senate votes often bring. "The campaign trail is no place to be talking about cloture and amendments and getting caught up in 'Senate-speak,' " says Scott Reed, former campaign manager for vanquished presidential candidate and former Sen. Bob Dole.

Mr. Reed said one of his first tasks as manager was to examine the votes Mr. Dole cast during his long tenure in the Senate -- he says there were 17,000 of them.

But, then, even Mr. Romney -- who has begun airing ads touting himself as "the Republican who turned around a Democratic state" -- is having some "Senate-speak" trouble of his own. During a failed run for U.S. Senate in Massachusetts in 1994, the conservative Republican let slip that he favored gay rights. It has come back to haunt him in the early going.

Mr. Romney is a Mormon and, at the beginning, "everybody thought his weakness would be his religion," says Mr. Reed. "Funny that it turns out to be his political philosophy and his flip-flopping."

Could Gore's Road To The Oval Office Begin In Hollywood? (CNN)

By Bill Schneider

CNN.com, February 23, 2007

LOS ANGELES, California (CNN) -- We've seen plenty of political moments at the Oscars before. But on Sunday, we could see the most unusual political moment ever.

Consider this scenario: It's Academy Awards night. Best documentary feature is up. And the Oscar is favored to go to . . . "An Inconvenient Truth," starring former Vice President Al Gore.

Lawrence Bender, producer of "An Inconvenient Truth," and the film's other producers come up to accept the Oscar -- with Gore. (Watch Bender explain while it might be Gore's time)

The audience roars its approval -- this is liberal Hollywood -- and Gore speaks.

"There's even some speculation that he would use his Oscar as the occasion to announce that he's running," Martin Kaplan, director of the University of Southern California's Norman Lear Center, told CNN. "Imagine that: a billion people worldwide! Take that Jay Leno, as an announcement venue!"

Could it happen? Gore's producer thinks a potential Gore speech would be a historic moment, but not the way Kaplan envisions.

DOJ_NMG_0137049

"It's electrifying, not politically, because is Al Gore going to run or not going to run. There's nothing going to happen like that," Bender told CNN. "It's electrifying because the man who is responsible for solidifying the forces around global warming is going to" be acknowldged.

But could an Oscar start the momentum for a draft-Gore movement? USC's Kaplan thinks it could.

"People think that he's paid his dues, he's had more of an impact on issues that people care about than many people who have been in office and there's a feeling that he's finally lost that student council condescension that was fingernails on a blackboard to a lot of supporters," Kaplan said.

Democrats are desperate to win. Doubts have begun to surface about the electability of the party's current front-runners. How's this for an argument? Now is the time for all good men to come to the aid of their party.

"He was right on Iraq. He was right on global warming. He has an issue that is so formidable and has attacked it, tackled it," Bender said. "So I would love to see him run, sure, but I don't see that in the cards."

But once that envelope is opened, there will be a new card to play.

Maybe Mr. Gore will get up and say, "I have new song to sing." After all, the film has been nominated in the best song category, too.

Gore Film Odds-On Favorite To Win Oscar (AP)

By Beth Fouhy

AP, February 24, 2007

NEW YORK (AP) -- Forget about sharing the stage with fellow Democrats on cable TV. Al Gore goes prime time, red carpet Sunday night at the Academy Awards before tens of millions, reviving talk of a possible presidential run.

"An Inconvenient Truth," the documentary about the former vice president's crusade against global warming, is the odds-on favorite to win an Oscar. Gore plans to attend the ceremony as well as the glitzy before and after parties.

If the movie takes top honors, director Davis Guggenheim would accept the golden statuette and Gore would join him onstage. He doesn't plan an endless "thank you" speech, but the liberal-leaning Hollywood audience may have a different idea.

And all the buzz on the West Coast and in Washington on Friday was about another special Gore appearance during the ceremony.

An Oscar would be the latest accolade in a remarkable year for Gore, who became a best-selling author, announced plans for a seven- continent series of concerts to fight global warming and was nominated for a Nobel Peace Prize.

His narrow loss to Republican George W. Bush in the disputed 2000 presidential election is still a sore subject for many Democrats. An Oscar win is certain to spark new questions about Gore's political future.

He has said repeatedly he has no plans to join the field of presidential aspirants dominated by Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Barack Obama. Yet, Gore's unwillingness to rule out a run completely has given some activists hope that he might change his mind.

A group of key supporters, led by his former policy adviser, Elaine Kamarck, even met in Boston earlier this month to mull a possible Gore candidacy.

"I think there are still an awful lot of Democrats who rightly believe Gore won in 2000," said Roger Salazar, a Democratic strategist and former Gore spokesman. "With this movie and the Oscar nomination, people are taking another look at him and feel more warmly about him than they have in some time."

Interviews with Democratic activists attending this week's presidential forum in Nevada produced some optimism and some reservations about another Gore candidacy.

Gary Poirier, a food service worker from Davis, Calif., said he thinks Gore should run. "Obama is new and interesting, but I haven't heard him address the issues. And Hillary Clinton is just a little too political," Poirier said.

But John Emerson, another activist and retired minister from Sparks, Nev., said he was quite satisfied with the current crop of 2008 contenders even though he described himself as a Gore fan.

It's quite unlike 1988, Emerson said, when many Democrats hoped then- New York Gov. Mario Cuomo would parachute into a field disparaged by some as "the seven dwarfs."

"We have a tremendously skilled group this time. No one sees any real weakness in the bunch," Emerson said.

Besides Clinton and Obama, the Democrats running are John Edwards, the 2004 vice presidential nominee; Sens. Chris Dodd of Connecticut and Joe Biden of Delaware; New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson; Ohio Rep. Dennis Kucinich and former Alaska Sen. Mike Gravel.

Other activists expressed frustration with Gore's performance in the tense days following the 2000 election, when Florida's electoral votes _ and the presidency _ hung in the balance. At the time, many observers criticized Gore and his political team for not aggressively challenging the many court rulings that eventually cleared the way for a Bush victory.

DOJ_NMG_0137050

"Gore outright won, and he was cheated. Yet he gave in so easily," said Joyce Yates of San Diego. "He should have fought a lot harder, especially for those of us who fought so hard for him."

Yates said Gore should have sought a rematch against Bush in 2004.

"It's too late now. People have lost faith in him," she said.

Friends say Gore has built a nice life out of the wreckage of 2000. He is worth millions, thanks to his membership on the Apple, Inc., board and a significant stock windfall from his advisory relationship with the Internet search giant Google. He also chairs a private investment company and Current.tv, a cable network aimed at young viewers.

He and his wife, Tipper, own several homes and travel extensively, much of it to raise awareness of global warming. Tickets to a Gore appearance in Toronto this week sold out within minutes, with some being scalped for as much as $500 apiece.

And a man once so fastidious about his appearance that he hired an image consultant is older and heavier, raising questions about whether he's fleet enough for another run.

Gerald McEntee, international president of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees union, said Gore still had broad support in the labor movement. But he saw no evidence that Gore planned to join the race.

"I think he's a happy man," McEntee said.

Carter Endorses Gore, Says Former Veep Can Win More Than Oscars (ABC)

ABCNews.com, February 23, 2007

ABC News' George Stephanopoulos Reports: In an exclusive interview with former President Jimmy Carter set to air on Sunday's "This Week with George Stephanopoulos", Carter lavished praise on "(his) favorite Democrat) former Vice President Al Gore.

Carter told ABC News, "If Al should decide to run -- which I'm afraid he won't -- I would support Al Gore."

The former Democratic President asserted Gore could accomplish much more in the White House than he ever could as a private citizen, saying to Stephanopoulos, "His burning issue now is global warming and preventing it. He can do infinitely more to accomplish that goal as in the incumbent in the White House, than he can making even movies that get -- you know, that get Oscars."

"An Inconvenient Truth", a documentary based on a global warming lecture Gore has delivered around the world, is nominated for an Academy Award and the former Vice President will walk the red carpet at the Oscars this Sunday.

Despite public pressure from Carter and others, the former President does not believe Gore will make a second bid for the White House saying, "I don't think he will. I've put so much pressure on Al to run that he's almost gotten aggravated with me."

Carter told Stephanopoulos that he had not called Gore "lately" adding, "He almost told me, the last time I talked, 'Don't call me anymore.'"

Carter joked that Gore had offered to support him in 2008 and referred to Gore as "my favorite" in the interview, concluding, "I really have not expressed any public approval or endorsement or preference for any of the Democratic candidates except (Gore)."

Tune into 'This Week' on Sunday, February 25, to watch George's full interview with former President Carter.

Abortion Doubts Dog GOP Top Three (POL)

By Jonathan Martin

The Politico, February 23, 2007

An increasingly tense war over abortion has emerged as the early test of conservative bona fides among the leading GOP presidential contenders. To many on the right, the top three candidates are failing it because they're faking it.

"Come off it, guys, this is kind of unseemly," says David Keene, the influential president of the American Conservative Union. "The people you're doing this to aren't stupid. Eventually they'll figure out this is all bull."

Keene's harsh words reflect a harsh reality for the top-tier candidates: Many conservatives consider Arizona Sen. John McCain a less-than-passionate abortion foe, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney a flip-flopper and former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani as downright hostile to the pro-life movement.

"I don't see any consensus on any candidate right now," says Steve Scheffler, president of the Iowa Christian Alliance and an influential voice in his state's caucuses. "All three have got challenges."

The fight to reverse that perception is getting personal. McCain and Romney, through aides and supporters, are hitting each other almost daily over the issue.

DOJ_NMG_0137051

McCain, a consistent opponent of abortion in his more than two decades in Congress who nonetheless is viewed with suspicion by many in the anti-abortion community, pushed the issue to the front by declaring his support for overturning Roe v. Wade Sunday on the campaign trail in the conservative upstate region of South Carolina.

This prompted Romney to go on the attack. "Ask the pro-life movement where his leadership has been in the six years since 2000 that he's been running for president," said Gary Marx, who is charged with handling conservative outreach for Romney, of McCain. "What has he done?"

Romney, though, has even more challenges on pro-life issues. He was, in his words, "effectively pro-choice" until recent years and argued vehemently in both his unsuccessful run for the Senate in 1994 and in his 2002 gubernatorial bid that he would not lift a finger to take away a woman's right to an abortion.

Giuliani has smartly avoided the spat. Unlike Romney, he remains pro-choice. But even Giuliani has sought to lessen the gulf between his views and the GOP conservative base on the issue, saying on Fox News that he "hate[s]" the practice of abortion and telling South Carolinians that he'd appoint conservative judges in the mold of John Roberts and Samuel Alito.

"Giuliani is just starting to tip-toe into the pandering business, but he'll get there," quips Keene.

Some social conservatives, while appreciative of Roberts and Alito, are distraught at how little President Bush has done to put the topic at the forefront and fear even less will be done should any of the top three 2008 contenders be nominated. This only increases the pressure on presidential hopefuls to embrace the pro-life movement.

Michael Franc of The Heritage Foundation says that with the prospect of a Democratic-controlled, or at least closely divided, Congress and a Republican president who lacks ardor for the issue, not "losing any ground" on abortion may be the best that right-to-life activists can hope for.

"The real battle," Franc notes, "is going to be fought in the states and in scaling back judicial activism."

"What a lot of people are looking for," said former presidential candidate and conservative activist Gary Bauer of the GOP's White House hopefuls, "is do they understand the issue and do they understand that Roe v. Wade is the ultimate example of judicial activism?"

And do they?

"The jury is still out," says Bauer. But, he adds, McCain should win praise for speaking out against Roe. Merely offering rhetorical bows to "strict constructionist judges" isn't sufficient, argues Bauer, who is neutral in the race and backed McCain in the 2000 primary. "Strict constructionists think that precedent should stay," says Bauer, and thus their appointment wouldn't lead to Roe being overturned.

For McCain, Scheffler points out, it's just that he's not identified with the right to life movement. "Part of it is a perception problem because of his maverick streak," Scheffler says. Bauer notes that part of the problem is that McCain's ardent support for campaign finance reform angered some in the right to life movement who felt that the McCain-Feingold bill hurt their advocacy ability.

Asked to discuss the issue, McCain's campaign had Marlys Popma, a veteran Iowa social conservative activist now backing the Arizonan, defend the senator's record.

"People are almost better identified by those who oppose them," notes Popma, a former head of Iowa Right to Life. And when she researched McCain's record before signing on, she was pleased with what she saw.

"I went and looked at how Planned Parenthood and NARAL had ranked Sen. McCain. For the last several years -- zeros. That spoke volumes to me."

But doesn't McCain at least have, as Scheffler puts it, "a perception problem?"

"Any campaign's job is to teach people about the candidate," Popma replies, and "if they take the time to look at his record, it speaks for itself."

Romney's campaign, despite their candidate's past protestations that he backed abortion rights, makes a similar argument.

"His record is his record," argues Kevin Madden, Romney's spokesman. When it came to actual governing decisions in his sole four-year term, Romney, Madden boasts, has "the luxury of having a strong pro-life record on this issue."

But, Madden adds, they've not sought to spotlight the issue and have tried to highlight other matters.

"The narrative is being driven by the media's focus on it more than the public's focus on it."

Madden laments that instead of talking about issues like health care, the economy or the threat of "Jihadists," Romney holds press conferences where "60% of the questions are about his Mormon religion and 40% are about abortion."

Giuliani's camp would also rather talk about more advantageous issues like homeland security and defense with the Republican base.

"This election is being viewed in terms of leadership in that Republican primary voters are looking at the bigger picture and want the best candidate to move this country forward," argues Giuliani spokeswoman Maria Comella.

DOJ_NMG_0137052

On abortion, Giuliani has "been consistent on the issue, that's what voters respect about him," Comella says. Giuliani, Comella reiterates, "personally opposes abortion, but he believes it's a woman's rights to choose."

But how can Giuliani reconcile such a construction with past comments where he embraced the language of abortion rights supporters and praised the very groups that Popma, McCain's supporter, used as her litmus test?

Partially, at least, by pointing to what took place in New York while Giuliani was mayor. "He presided over a decline of abortions, promoted adoption as a real alternative and saw adoptions increase and abortions decrease," says Comella.

Rudy & Mitt Hem & Haw On Abortion (NYT)

By Ann Althouse

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

We're seeing some awfully complicated positions on abortion from some of the presidential candidates. It's easy to hoot with derision.

Rudy Giuliani did an elaborate dance the other day. Speaking in South Carolina, he said that "as a lawyer," he liked having "strict constructionists" on the federal courts. But he didn't specify what he wanted those "strict constructionist" judges to do with Roe v. Wade. Instead, he shifted to talking about how it's "part of our freedom" for the legislatures in the various states to make their own decisions about law.

More recently, on Larry King's show, Giuliani said he was pro-choice, though he hates abortion, and retreated again into ideas about the sort of judges he would appoint. King dogged him for blunter answers, and Giuliani must have sounded evasive to most people.

When King assumed that "strict constructionist" judges would overrule Roe v. Wade, Giuliani said, "We don't know that." When King asked, "Would it hurt you if they overturned it?" Giuliani turned the focus away from himself: we need good judges, and then there are always the states.

Meanwhile, Ruth Marcus of The Washington Post is pointing at a contorted pose that Mitt Romney struck, explaining something he said when he ran for governor of Massachusetts: "What I said to people was that I personally did not favor abortion, that I am personally pro-life. However, as governor I would not change the laws of the commonwealth relating to abortion.

"Now I don't try and put a bow around that and say what does that mean you are — does that mean you're pro-life or pro-choice, because that whole package — meaning I'm personally pro-life but I won't change the laws, you could describe that as — well, I don't think you can describe it in one hyphenated word."

If you're already opposed to Giuliani or Romney, I'm sure the ridicule practically writes itself. Something so convoluted has got to be manipulation. Right? Compare them with straight-talking John McCain, who said: "I do not support Roe v. Wade. It should be overturned." That's harder to mock.

But it is the candidate who sets out to deceive us who has the most reason to keep it simple. By contrast, complexity may signal that the candidate is actually trying to tell us something about how he thinks. He may have a sophisticated grasp of the role of the executive in relation to the courts and the legislatures. We might do well to tolerate some complexity.

What should a candidate say about abortion? To represent what the country as a whole thinks, the president ought to take account of the deep beliefs Americans have about both reproductive freedom and the value of unborn life. To deserve the trust embodied in appointment power, the president should have a sound understanding of the judges as independent decision makers who follow an interpretive methodology that operates differently from political choice.

So instead of smirking, we should welcome the kind of complicated statements we're hearing from Romney and Giuliani. Any individual who is offering to wield presidential power should resist assuring us about what his judicial appointees will do. To do otherwise is to tip us off that he means to populate the judiciary with politicos.

If we listen with a decent sympathy, the things Giuliani and Romney say about abortion make sense. When Romney ran for governor, he made a commitment to Massachusetts voters not to attack the law he knew they supported. That was politically expedient, of course, but it also took an admirably limited view of executive power and acknowledged the independence of the legal system.

Similarly, Giuliani respects the distinctive work of judges and the separate role of the state legislatures. If Roe were overruled, those legislatures would decide how to regulate abortion. And decentralized legislation really is fairly called "part of our freedom" because the Constitution's framers saw the balance of power between the national government and the states as a safeguard against tyranny.

So I'd like to see a little more patience with what Romney and Giuliani are saying. But that doesn't mean we should be naïve. The next president will select real individuals to be judges, and no matter how diligent they are, they will bring something of their humanity to their interpretation of the law, a version of humanity that will express something of the president's cast of mind.

DOJ_NMG_0137053

McCain Woos Seattle Voters (SEATIMES)

By Jim Brunner

The Seattle Times, February 24, 2007

Presidential hopeful Sen. John McCain, during a Seattle appearance today, said Congress should give President Bush's planned "surge" of more U.S. troops in Iraq a chance to work.

McCain called the recent Congressional debate on a nonbinding resolution opposing the surge "a charade" and said if members of Congress oppose the war, they should use their budget authority to cut off funding instead. He joked that he skipped that vote to "spend more time in the sunny climes of Iowa."

The Arizona Republican was at Seattle's Westin Hotel to deliver a speech urging greater U.S. trade with China and other Asian nations, but questions from the audience quickly turned to the war in Iraq.

McCain, a decorated Vietnam veteran who spent more than five years as a prisoner of war, said he hopes Americans will be patient and give the new Iraq strategy, led by Gen. David Petraeus, an opportunity to succeed. He said it should be clear within "some months" whether the plan is working.

"I believe that if we fail and leave you will see chaos and genocide. I also believe that unlike the Vietnam War when we lost and they didn't want to follow us home, these people want to follow us home," McCain said.

During his prepared speech, McCain cited the importance of Asian trade to Washington State and the country and said America should "reject the failed policies of isolationism."

Instead, McCain said the U.S. should encourage more trade with China and other Asian countries, while also demanding those nations become more democratic and free. "With every export of wheat or software must travel the values that have always been the chief source of our greatness."

McCain, 70, is officially in an exploratory phase of a possible presidential bid. But he has begun laying the groundwork for a well-organized campaign in Washington. He received an early endorsement today from State Attorney General Rob McKenna.

And following his speech McCain was scheduled to meet at Boeing Field with Christian conservative leaders and anti-abortion activists -- a voting bloc considered key to his chances to win the 2008 Republican nomination.

"He is making the right moves," said Joe Fuiten, pastor of Bothell's Cedar Park church and one of the state's top evangelical leaders. Fuiten said he likes what he's heard from McCain so far, but called the meeting "a coffee date, not a marriage."

McCain Says Iraq Could End His Career (AP)

By Curt Woodward,

AP, February 24, 2007

Republican presidential hopeful John McCain said Friday that British Prime Minister Tony Blair has sacrificed his career to support the Iraq war, and the Arizona senator acknowledged that he could face the same fate.

McCain, a staunch defender of President Bush's new Iraq troop deployment strategy, said he worries that a cutback of British troops in southern Iraq announced by Blair this week could lead to stronger control by "Iranian-backed Shiite" forces. But he said Blair and the British deserve gratitude for their efforts.

"He has literally sacrificed his political career because of Iraq," McCain said during an appearance before the World Affairs Council and the City Club of Seattle. "That is a great testament to his political courage."

Asked later by a reporter if he was in danger of making the same sacrifice, McCain responded, "Sure."

McCain, who lost the Republican nomination to Bush in 2000, is expected to formally announce his second campaign for the White House next month.

His appearance in Seattle initially focused on trade, security and diplomatic policy in Asia, which has strong economic and cultural ties to the Pacific Northwest. Iraq quickly came up, and McCain said Americans should give Gen. David Petraeus, the new commander of U.S. forces in Iraq, a chance to succeed.

"I believe that if we fail in Iraq, you will see chaos and genocide," McCain said.

The state Democratic Party criticized McCain for his support for the war, calling him "worse than Bush" in a statement.

After the speech, McCain was asked by an audience member if he was "sucking up to the religious right." He drew laughs by responding: "What's wrong with sucking up to everybody?"

___

On the Net:

DOJ_NMG_0137054

McCain: http://www.johnmccain.com

Father Of Slain Teen Urges McCain To Speak Against Gun Violence (NSDY)

By Daniel Massey

Newsday, February 24, 2007

Before his daughter was shot to death in an Arizona parking lot last Sunday, Ronald Schiffman never considered himself a political person. Now he says he might be ready for a change.

Less than a week after his daughter, Nicole, 19, and her best friend, Carol Kestenbaum, 20, were killed, Schiffman called on Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) to speak out against gun violence.

"This is his state. John McCain should make a statement about this incident," said Schiffman. "He cries, rightly so, about all the boys who die in Iraq. I'd like to see him talk about gun control. It's a topic I think has disappeared because of all the problems the country is facing."

Schiffman, of Merrick, said replaying his daughter's death in his mind "haunts" him and that he wanted to "prevent this from happening again." Nicole Schiffman and Kestenbaum were shot last Sunday night in Tempe by 22-year-old Joshua Mendel, who had called 911 two weeks earlier asking for help with an alcohol problem.

McCain was, a 2008 GOP presidential candidate, was traveling and unavailable for comment Friday, said Melissa Shuffield, a spokeswoman.

Family and friends of the victims gathered Friday afternoon to sit shiva. Kestenbaum's grandmother said the family did not want to comment, but that people had lined up and down the block Thursday night to pay their respects.

At the Schiffman home in Merrick Friday, unopened fruit baskets sat on a dining room table and a steady stream of mourners came to offer condolences.

Meanwhile, Tempe police were continuing with their investigation into the shooting by Mendel, who also killed himself. Mendel came to Tempe from St. Charles, Ill., and was described by friends as being fascinated by guns. "We have a good idea of what occurred," said Tempe Police Sgt. Mike Horn. "We're just trying to figure out why."

Horn said Alexandra Wake, a student at Arizona State University in Tempe, who had gone to high school with Mendel in St. Charles, Ill., and was his girlfriend until earlier this month, told police she had no inclination that he was violent.

"I don't buy that," said Schiffman. "Obviously he was proud of his guns." Wake did not return calls seeking comment.

Schiffman asked that contributions in his daughter's name be sent to Schneider Children's Hospital of North Shore and said that donations would be directed to help teenagers with psychological problems.

Schiffman said he also wanted to set up a scholarship in his daughter's name at her alma mater -- John. F. Kennedy High School in Bellmore -- for a student interested in journalism. Nicole Schiffman dreamed of becoming a journalist.

A Cat Without Whiskers (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

So some guy stands up after John McCain's luncheon speech here yesterday to a group of business types and asks him a question.

"I've seen in the press where in your run for the presidency, you've been sucking up to the religious right," the man said, adding: "I was just wondering how soon do you predict a Republican candidate for president will start sucking up to the old Rockefeller wing of the Republican Party?"

Mr. McCain listened with his eyes downcast, then looked the man in the eye, smiled and replied: "I'm probably going to get in trouble, but what's wrong with sucking up to everybody?" It was a flash of the old McCain, and the audience laughed.

Certainly, the senator has tried to worm his way into the affections of W. and the religious right: the Discovery Institute, a group that tries to derail Darwinism and promote the teaching of Intelligent Design, helped present the lunch, dismaying liberal bloggers who have tracked Mr. McCain's devolution on evolution.

A reporter asked the senator if his pandering on Roe v. Wade had made him "the darling and candidate of the ultra right wing?" (In South Carolina earlier this week, he tried to get more evangelical street cred by advocating upending Roe v. Wade.) "I dispute that assertion," he replied. "I believe that it was Dr. Dobson recently who said that he prayed that I would not receive the Republican nomination. I was just over at Starbucks this morning. ... I talk everywhere, and I try to reach out to everyone."

But there's one huge group that he's not pandering to: Americans.

Most Americans are sick and tired of watching things go hideously backward in Iraq and Afghanistan, and want someone to show them the way out. Mr. McCain is stuck on the bridge of a sinking policy with W. and Dick Cheney, who showed again this week that there is no bottom to his lunacy. The senator supported a war that didn't need to be fought and is a cheerleader for a surge that won't work.

DOJ_NMG_0137055

It has left Mr. McCain, an Arizona Republican, once the most spontaneous of campaigners, off balance. He's like a cat without its whiskers. When the moderator broached the subject of Iraq after lunch, Mr. McCain grimaced, stuck out his tongue a little and said sarcastically, "Thanks."

Defending his stance, he sounds like a Bill Gates robot prototype, repeating in a monotone: "I believe we've got a new strategy. ... It can succeed. I can't guarantee success. But I do believe firmly that if we get out now we risk chaos and genocide in the region."

He was asked about Britain's decision to withdraw 1,600 troops from Iraq. "Tony Blair, the prime minister, has shown great political courage," Mr. McCain said. "He has literally sacrificed his political career because of Iraq, my friends," because he thought "it was the right thing to do."

He said he worried that Iranian-backed Shiites were taking more and more control of southern Iraq. (That was probably because the Brits kept peace in southern Iraq all along by giving Iranian-backed Shiites more and more control.) And he noted that the British are sending more troops to Afghanistan, "which is very necessary because we're going to have a very hot spring in Afghanistan."

But then he got back to Tony Blair sacrificing his political career, and it was clear that he was also talking about himself. When a reporter later asked him if Iraq might consume his candidacy, he replied evenly: "Sure."

I asked him if he got discouraged when he reads stories like the one in The Wall Street Journal yesterday about Ahmad Chalabi, the man who helped goad and trick the U.S. into war, who got "a position inside the Iraqi government that could help determine whether the Bush administration's new push to secure Baghdad succeeds."

Or the New York Times article yesterday about a couple of Iraqi policemen who joined American forces on searches in Baghdad, but then turned quisling, running ahead to warn residents to hide their weapons and other incriminating evidence.

He nodded. "I think one of the big question marks is how the Maliki government will step up to the plate," he said.

And how, I asked him, can Dick Cheney tell ABC News that British troops getting out is "an affirmation that there are parts of Iraq where things are going pretty well," while he says that Democrats who push to get America out would "validate the Al Qaeda strategy." Isn't that a nutty?

But Senator McCain was back on his robo-loop: "I can only express my gratitude for the enormous help that the British have given us."

Sometimes I miss John McCain, even when I'm with him.

Nevada Republicans Reject Holding Early Caucus (NHUL)

By John DiStaso

New Hampshire Union Leader, February 24, 2007

Nevada Republican leaders have decided not to follow their Democratic counterparts by moving up their Presidential caucus to near the front of the pack of nominating contests.

After considering it, the Nevada Republican Party's executive board decided against a calendar move that would have violated a rule of the Republican National Committee, the party's executive director said yesterday.

"Our executive board has made the decision that we can't move up and we don't want to violate the RNC's bylaws," Zachary Moyle said in a telephone interview.

The Democratic National Committee has handed Nevada a Democratic Presidential caucus set for Jan. 19, 2008. The DNC wants the Nevada caucus to be the second nominating event on the calendar "" four days after the leadoff Iowa caucus and three days before the New Hampshire primary.

The New Hampshire primary date is not guided by the DNC rule, however. It is a state-run election and Secretary of State William Gardner has sole authority under state law to set the primary date. He has indicated he may set it for a date earlier than the one set by the DNC. He is expected to make that decision in the fall.

Still, Democratic Presidential candidates have been flocking to Nevada. Earlier this week, all the candidates except Illinois Sen. Barack Obama participated in a forum that drew nationwide media attention.

Republicans in Nevada had been considering following the state's Democrats to a date near the front of the pack. Former Nevada GOP Chairman Paul Adams told the New Hampshire Union Leader in early January that because a RNC rule forbids a delegate-selecting caucus prior to Feb. 5, 2008, his state party was considering holding a straw poll on the same day as the Democrats hold their caucus.

Yesterday, a Nevada Republican political consultant, Peter Ernaut, was quoted by a Las Vegas newspaper as saying that after seeing the attention the Democrats received from the forum, "I'm absolutely green with jealousy that we Republicans haven't followed suit. But we're working hard at remedying that, and I'm very confident Republicans will have caucuses organized for 2008 as well."

DOJ_NMG_0137056

Moyle said that while Ernaut is a prominent local party activist, he is apparently unaware of the RNC rule.

Moyle said Republican officials in Nevada are considering moving up their caucus from the current date of April 26 to mid-February, but there are no plans to break the national party rule and hold it before Feb. 5.

"There has been zero talk about moving into January," Moyle said. "That has been 100 percent decided. We can't feel compelled to move our thing just because the Democrats have."

Moyle said he does not begrudge the Democrats for having the early event.

"Anytime Nevada gets attention, it's a good thing," he said. "Anytime you bring in the Democrats, we get attention as well. And we've had all the major Republican candidates in the state over the past two years."

Moyle said that officials of his party "have met and said we don't want to move up the caucus. It is possible we could move it up, but we won't have it before February 12."

Early Stops On The Sweet-Talk Circuit (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

KEENE, N.H. — Hillary Rodham Clinton ordered a chai latte. Molly Kelly went with the regular latte.

Then the just-acquainted pair settled in at a cafe table and gabbed for 20 minutes or so about their children, jobs and Senate careers (United States Senate for Hillary; New Hampshire Senate for Molly). It was all very cozy. Just as it was a few weeks ago when Mrs. Clinton called Ms. Kelly out of the blue to say 'hi' and introduce herself, like a new neighbor ready with a casserole.

This is the beginning of the quadrennial groveling season. While the presidential campaigns have turned against one another in the news media in recent days, the candidates are making serious nice to would-be supporters.

Ms. Kelly is a financial adviser, a mother of four and a lawmaker, but her chief attribute — as far as Mrs. Clinton and every other Democratic presidential candidate is concerned — is that she is a local person-of-influence in a state with early voting. Her potential support gives her a disproportionate say in picking the next president and, more to the point, entitles her to disproportionate attention, flattery and testimonials from the procession of Very Ambitious People blowing through town.

"It all seemed very natural," Ms. Kelly said of her chats with her new friend, the New York senator.

It also seemed very natural that Ms. Kelly would catch a ride on Feb. 11 with Mrs. Clinton from Brewbakers Cafe to Keene High School, where Ms. Kelly introduced the former first lady at a campaign rally, and the former first lady thanked the audience "for electing Molly Kelly."

The next day, Senator Barack Obama, Democrat of Illinois, who was visiting New Hampshire for the first time, called Ms. Kelly, and they agreed to get together the next time he was in the area. Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware and Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico attended events during her State Senate campaign last year, as did Senators John Kerry and Evan Bayh before they decided not to run for president.

Ms. Kelly is uncommitted, which ensures that she will be a fixture on the presidential butter-up circuit along with a relatively tiny population of geographically blessed campaigners, party leaders and elected officials. Few outside their communities have ever heard of them, but the presidential candidates most assuredly have.

"We get calls on our birthdays, when someone is born, when someone dies," said Deborah Arnesen, who is known as Arnie, a former Democratic candidate for governor in New Hampshire and a television host in the state. It is all in the spirit of currying favor, or "the care and feeding of the body politic," said Warren B. Rudman, a former Republican senator from New Hampshire.

Some bodies politic require more care and feeding than others. Former Senator Bob Kerrey, Democrat of Nebraska, who ran for president in 1992, once offended a local advocate in New Hampshire by neglecting to offer her a cookie during a visit to a Manchester bakery. Mr. Kerrey managed to apologize and keep her support, but it took some doing.

"I had to take her to breakfast," Mr. Kerrey recalled, declining to name the advocate. "I think I brought her a cookie and we mended fences."

Most recipients of this boot-licking readily acknowledge the reason for it.

"It's not our personal charisma that's getting us all this attention," said Katon Dawson, chairman of the Republican Party in South Carolina and object of affection from new friends Rudy and Mitt, among others. "It's all our position on the calendar. We understand that."

DOJ_NMG_0137057

Some fully exploit that. "I have been entrusted with a very important responsibility," said Lou D'Allesandro, a longtime Democratic state senator in New Hampshire known for his deliberate style of public presidential decision-making. "I'm not going to make a decision until I've gotten to know all the candidates."

This could take months. Before the New Hampshire primary in 2004, Mr. D'Allesandro enjoyed several months of visits, birthday calls, handwritten notes and inquiries about his health, wife and family. He finally settled on John Edwards, the former North Carolina senator.

But Mr. D'Allesandro is a free agent in 2008. He had a half-hour visit with Mrs. Clinton at Pappy's Pizza in Manchester two weekends ago ("impressive woman"); a quick meeting with Mr. Obama in Concord two Mondays ago ("his demeanor was outstanding"); and recently took phone calls from Mr. Biden ("an old friend") and Senator Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut ("also an old friend"). He met with Mr. Richardson at a union event in Concord, and Mr. Richardson later introduced him as "the famous Lou D'Allesandro." And Mr. Edwards's wife, Elizabeth, called last week; no hard feelings over Lou's seeing other people.

Relationships with campaigners tend to be intense and temporary, said Senator Lamar Alexander, Republican of Tennessee who ran for president in 1996 and briefly in 2000. "And then, just like that, it's over," Mr. Alexander said.

He recalled paying at least six private visits to an Iowa state representative who wound up supporting former Senator Bob Dole for president in 1996. What was the gentleman's name?

"I don't recall," Mr. Alexander said.

(In the goodbye-to-all-that department: Mr. Kerrey finished a disappointing third in the New Hampshire primary and posed for a photo while making an obscene gesture next to a "Leaving New Hampshire" sign.)

Early-state players generally harbor few illusions that the attention would persist if they ever up and moved to, say, Indiana, whose primary comes considerably later than New Hampshire's.

For instance, Senator Michael E. Gronstal would probably not be getting "Hey, this is Barack" calls on his cellphone if he were the Democratic leader in the Indiana Senate rather than the Iowa Senate. Mr. Obama (that would be the Barack on the line) was just checking in. The two got together on Wednesday at the capitol in Des Moines.

Locals in Iowa and New Hampshire can be fiercely protective of their states' special status whenever other states threaten to supplant them at the front of the voting calendar, which happens periodically. Campaigners often trumpet how vital the New Hampshire primary and Iowa caucuses are "to the democratic process." True enough, but let's be honest, "it's a great ego trip for a lot of people," Mr. Rudman said.

Tom Rath, a former attorney general in New Hampshire and a longtime Republican campaigner in the state, said: "It's really nice that all these important people want to know what my summer plans are. Karl Rove used to joke that I never have to shovel my own driveway because the candidates would do it for me."

Candidates are also inclined to shovel it on thick to local media muck-a-mucks like the political columnists David Yepsen of The Des Moines Register and John DiStaso of The Union-Leader in Manchester, N.H., among others. "I'm a person that people want to have a relationship with," said Ms. Arnesen, who hosts "Political Chowder," a television show on New Hampshire politics. "When I'm in a room, the candidates know I'm there."

Last month, Ms. Arnesen was attending a cocktail party at the Capitol in Washington after a seminar for talk-show hosts when Mrs. Clinton happened by. " 'Arnie Arnesen, oh my God, what the heck are you doing here?' " Mrs. Clinton said, according to an account in The Telegraph of Nashua, N.H. They chatted for 15 minutes or so, and Mrs. Clinton complimented Ms. Arnesen on her outfit — "a very chic and yet subtle ensemble" is how Ms. Arnesen describes her multilayered skirt, long scarf ("with ribbons cascading off of it") and calf-length coat. "It was sort of a Vogue look that came from the Salvation Army," Ms. Arnesen said.

Whatever, Mrs. Clinton dug the outfit, and Ms. Arnesen said she made a good impression.

Arnold Defends Hillary, Mulls Senate Run (POL)

By Roger Simon

The Politico, February 23, 2007

SACRAMENTO, Calif. — If Arnold Schwarzenegger had been born in Austin instead Austria, he might be president today.

But because that office is denied him by the U.S. Constitution, he is concentrating on other things.

He told me in a 45-minute interview in his office in the state capitol Thursday:

He will not rule out running for future public office including U.S. senator or mayor of Los Angeles when his term as governor expires in January 2011.

He will not endorse a presidential candidate until after the Republican Convention in September 2008, even though he thinks Rudy Giuliani and John McCain are strong candidates and either could win the California primary.

He wants a deadline for getting U.S. troops out of Iraq, even though he recognizes that President Bush does not.

DOJ_NMG_0137058

He thinks Democrats should stop criticizing Hillary Clinton for refusing to say she made a mistake by voting for the Iraq war.

His wife, Maria Shriver, will "absolutely not" run for governor of California or any other public office, quashing speculation that a Schwarzenegger dynasty was in the making.

Schwarzenegger, a Republican who favors abortion rights, stem-cell research, gay rights and gun control, will give a speech at the National Press Club on Monday stressing the importance of centrism in American politics.

In my interview with him Thursday, he decried excessive partisanship and said the current system of political gerrymandering in which the vast majority of seats in the House of Representatives are heavily weighted in favor of one party or the other "creates extremism."

He said he favors redistricting such seats and also said he favors open primaries in every state so that Republicans can vote for Democrats and vice versa.

John McCain and Rudy Giuliani, he said, symbolize the kind of political positioning that he thinks can win his state 2008. "Both of them are very appealing for Californians, I think, because they are in the center," he said.

He also said: "I don't know as much about [Mitt] Romney yet. I've never had time to really hang with him and to really talk with him and get a feel about how much we have in common."

There is some feeling among those close to Schwarzenegger that Romney may be avoiding "hanging" with Schwarzenegger because Romney is wooing Republican conservatives who think Schwarzenegger is too moderate.

Although Schwarzenegger employs Democrats on his staff and has been working closely with California's Democratic legislature, he said he would definitely endorse the Republican nominee for president. (That would also mean that New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg, a friend and political ally of Schwarzenegger, would not get his endorsement should Bloomberg run for president as an independent.)

"I am very glad we have Republican candidates that are very much in the center and can appeal to both Republicans and Democrats," Schwarzenegger said.

During the interview, Schwarzenegger sat in a leather chair at the end of a long oak table in his cabinet room. He still uses a cane to walk, the result of a skiing accident in which he broke his right femur last December. He said that while he was no longer on painkillers, full recovery was going to be "a long, long process."

Schwarzenegger said that he believes politicians should be honest about admitting their mistakes but that "people are too tied down with analyzing" whether Hillary Clinton's vote to authorize the Iraq war was a mistake.

"Is that what makes the country operate well, if she becomes president?" he asked. "How you twist that or spin that? We should look at what has she done as senator. What has Barack Obama done as a U.S. senator or [a state] senator. What has Rudy Giuliani done? What has McCain done? You've got to judge people not by this one little thing."

Schwarzenegger also said candidates should not be judged on a single issue like abortion. No pro-life presidential candidate has carried California since George H.W. Bush did so in 1988. So I asked Schwarzenegger if he thought McCain, who is also pro-life, could possibly win the state in 2008.

"I think he can," Schwarzenegger said. "What is important is that you look at overall picture, what does he have to offer California and the country. It will be hard. I am not saying it is not a challenge. But the bottom line is I would not, because of one issue, discount anybody."

Regarding Iraq, Schwarzenegger said: "I think what is important is that we support the war, but we need to have a timeline to let the Iraqis know it is not an open-ended thing. It shouldn't be another Vietnam or Korea where we are there for decades."

Schwarzenegger said he supports President Bush in the "need to do everything that we can to come out of it with a victory" but he disagrees with Bush's refusal to set a deadline for U.S. support.

"We've got to say [to the Iraqis] you guys got to get this [done] next year and got to get your act together and after that we start pulling the troops back," Schwarzenegger said.

Schwarzenegger, 59, is term-limited and is in his second and final term as governor. When I asked him if he might run for the Senate or mayor of Los Angeles, both of which have been the subject of speculation, he said: "If you serve the people well, your options are open and you can decide at the last minute anything. If you want to go back to show business, or just go into business or to run for another office, all those options are available."

Schwarzenegger's wife, Maria Shriver, played a crucial role in Schwarzenegger's re-election campaign and is said to be his chief political adviser.

So does Schwarzenegger think she would make a good governor?

"My wife has no interest in that," he said flatly. "Absolutely not. She grew up in a political family, she has tremendous instincts when it comes to politics. But she has no interest in being in the political arena or run for office or anything like that or to manage the state."

DOJ_NMG_0137059

Schwarzenegger said he wanted his own legacy as governor, aside from specific achievements, to be his bipartisan approach to "fighting for the people."

"That is my primary goal," he said. "That's why sometimes Republicans are up in arms and saying this is not our philosophy or sometimes Democrats are up in arms. That's OK."

Schwarzenegger concluded the interview by saying with some emotion, "Remember one thing: You will never hear me complain that I can't run for president. I look at the things I was able to do rather than the things I am not able to do. I am very, very happy about how America has received me and the kind of things I was able to accomplish here."

Panel Calls Adult Stem-cell Study Flawed, Wrong (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, February 24, 2007

MINNEAPOLIS (AP) -- A scientific panel says a 2002 study that suggested adult stem cells might be as useful as embryonic ones was flawed and its conclusions may be wrong, a finding that raises questions about the promise of a less-controversial source for stem cells.

The research by Catherine Verfaillie at the University of Minnesota concluded that adult stem cells taken from the bone marrow of mice could grow into an array of biological tissues, including brain, heart, lung and liver.

So far only embryonic stem cells, which are commonly retrieved by destroying embryos at an early stage of development, are known to hold such regenerative promise. Many scientists think these cells might one day be used to treat certain diseases and other conditions.

Opponents of stem-cell research seized on the 2002 findings as evidence that stem-cell science could move forward without destroying embryos. But Miss Verfaillie has acknowledged flaws in parts of the study after inquiries from the British magazine New Scientist, which first publicized the questions last week.

A panel of specialists commissioned by the university concluded that the process used to identify tissue derived from the adult stem cells was "significantly flawed, and that the interpretations based on these data, expressed in the manuscript, are potentially incorrect," according to a portion of the panel's findings released by the university.

The panel concluded that it wasn't clear whether the flaws mean Miss Verfaillie's conclusions were wrong. It also determined that the flaws were mistakes, not falsifications.

Tim Mulcahy, vice president of research at the university, said it would be up to the scientific community to decide whether Miss Verfaillie's study still stands up.

Other researchers have been unable to duplicate Miss Verfaillie's results since the 2002 publications, increasing their skepticism about her claims. But that may only be an indication of how difficult the cells are to work with, said Amy Wagers, a Harvard University stem-cell researcher who was not involved in the investigation.

Miss Verfaillie did not respond to a phone message left with her current employer, the Catholic University of Leuven in Belgium. She told the Star Tribune of Minneapolis in a story published yesterday that the problem was "an honest mistake" that did not affect the study's conclusions about the potential of adult stem cells.

Her research was scrutinized after a writer for New Scientist noticed that some data from the original 2002 article in the journal Nature duplicated data in a second paper by Miss Verfaillie around the same time in a different journal, even though they supposedly referred to different cells. Miss Verfaillie told the Star Tribune that the duplication was an oversight and said she notified the University of Minnesota, which convened the panel to take a closer look at the research.

Diane Krause of Yale University, who (like Miss Verfaillie) has studied using bone marrow as an alternative to embryonic stem cells, said she thinks Miss Verfaillie's research will hold up, despite being hard to repeat.

Nigel Cameron, who runs the Institute on Biotechnology and the Human Future and is a bioethics professor at Chicago-Kent College of Law in the Illinois Institute of Technology, said scientists who have been trying to find a middle way on stem cells have seen their work seized by one side or the other for their own advantages.

"This is a fascinating example of the way in which science is becoming politicized, on both sides of this debate," said Mr. Cameron, who supported President Bush's 2001 ban on federal dollars spent on deriving new stem cells from fertilized embryos. "It's no longer scientists in white coats coming up with facts. There are uses being made of the facts on all sides, and I think it's quite problematic."

Cheney Tackles Beijing On Military Expansion (FT)

By Raphael Minder, Demetri Sevastopulo And Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, February 24, 2007

US Vice-president Dick Cheney on Friday accused China of pursuing military policies that were at odds with its stated ambitions of a "peaceful rise".

DOJ_NMG_0137060

Mr Cheney welcomed Beijing's role in securing the six-party agreement with North Korea towards denuclearising the Korean peninsula.

But he said China's recent anti-satellite missile test and the rapid expansion in its military budget was sending mixed signals.

"[They] are not consistent with China's stated goal of a peaceful rise," said Mr Cheney during a visit to Australia. "We hope China will join us in our efforts to prevent the deployment and the proliferation of deadly technologies, whether in Asia or in the Middle East."

His comments about Chinese military spending come just weeks after the White House unveiled a military budget of $623bn (€473bn, £317bn) for 2008. While the US criticised the Chinese anti-satellite missile test, critics have pointed out that Beijing has been urging the US to work towards a treaty banning space weapons.

Mr Cheney, one of the leading hawks in the Bush administration, who has previously resisted any deal with North Korea that did not involved complete disarmament, expressed support for the six-party deal but said Pyongyang still had "much to prove".

Chris Hill, the chief US negotiator in the talks, this week was highly complimentary about China's role. He said Beijing had no interest in a situation of "strategic ambiguity" over North Korea's nuclear arsenal, where Pyongyang would be "pretending to disarm" and the rest "pretending to believe".

The visit of Mr Cheney to Sydney comes at a difficult time for John Howard, the prime minister, who is under pressure to justify his decision to maintain Australia's military involvement in the US-led coalition in Iraq, while the UK announced this week that it would reduce its contingent.

Mr Howard has also faced criticism over his inability to speed up legal proceedings against David Hicks, an Australian detained in Guan-tánamo Bay.

But Mr Howard rejected as "absurd" suggestions the US visit and the strong endorsement received yesterday from Mr Cheney was a political liability in the run-up to federal elections this year.

He said: "America and Australia are close allies and people should look beyond their personal prejudices and understand how fundamental the American alliance is to the security of Australia in our own region, and how important it is to have an engaged, committed America in our part of the world."

North Korea on Friday asked Mohamed ElBaradei, the head of the International Atomic Energy Agency, to visit more than three years after expelling his experts and quitting the nuclear non-proliferation treaty. in an encouraging signal about its willingness to ultimately renounce nuclear weapons.

Mr ElBaradei said the visit was likely to occur in the second week of March.

Cheney: 'All Options' Available For Iran (AP)

By Rohan Sullivan, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 24, 2007

Vice President Dick Cheney renewed Washington's criticism of Iran on Saturday, saying "all options" remained on the table to deal with that country's regime after it ignored a U.N. deadline to halt uranium enrichment and said it would defy foreign pressure.

At a joint news conference with Australian Prime Minister John Howard, Cheney also said that Washington was "comfortable" with Britain's decision to withdraw troops from Iraq and that it was up to Australia to decide if it would do the same.

Cheney said the United States remained "deeply concerned" about Iran's activities, including the "aggressive" sponsoring of terrorist group Hezbollah and inflammatory statements by President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

He said top U.S. officials would meet soon with European allies to decide the next step toward planned tough sanctions against Iran for its pursuit of nuclear weapons.

"We worked with the European community and the United Nations to put together a set of policies to persuade the Iranians to give up their aspirations and resolve the matter peacefully, and that is still our preference," Cheney said.

"But I've also made the point, and the president has made the point, that all options are on the table," he said.

The White House has previously made similar comments.

"We believe it would be a serious mistake if a nation such as Iran became a nuclear power," he said.

Iran says its atomic program is aimed solely at generating energy, but the United States and some of its allies suspect it is geared toward making nuclear weapons.

The International Atomic Energy Agency reported on Thursday that Iran had not only ignored a U.N. Security Council ultimatum to freeze the enrichment program, but had expanded that program by setting up hundreds of centrifuges. Enriched uranium fuels nuclear reactors but, enriched further, is used in nuclear bombs.

DOJ_NMG_0137061

The IAEA report came after the expiration Wednesday of a 60-day grace period for Iran to halt uranium enrichment.

Ahmadinejad said on Thursday that Iran would resist "all bullies," and appeared to dismiss the IAEA report, saying it was of no importance if countries did not believe Iran's nuclear activities were peaceful.

On Iraq, Cheney sidestepped a question about whether the White House had asked the British government to redeploy troops into another part of Iraq rather than withdraw them.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair has outlined a plan to withdraw about 1,600 troops from southern Iraq in the coming months, and to reduce Britain's 7,100-strong contingent further by late summer.

"They have to make decisions with respect to their forces based upon what they think makes sense," Cheney said.

"They are going to continue to have a major presence there. They are also, I believe, beefing up their operations in Afghanistan," Cheney said. "So we are very comfortable with that decision."

Britain said Friday it will increase its troop strength in Afghanistan to bolster NATO forces battling Taliban militants. British media reported 1,000 additional soldiers would join the more than 5,000 British troops already in Afghanistan.

Cheney declined to say if he had asked Howard during talks held Saturday to add to the 1,400 troops Australian has in and around Iraq.

"Those decisions are obviously to be made by the Australian government based on their considerations as well as ... the conditions on the ground in that part of the world," Cheney said. "It's not for us to stress to our allies what their appropriate response might be."

West Aims To Agree New Iran Sanctions (FT)

By Daniel Dombey And Mark Turner

Financial Times, February 24, 2007

Western countries said on Friday they would seek to agree new sanctions against Iran involving a travel ban, possibly an arms embargo, and a crackdown on export credits because of Tehran's failure this week to meet a United Nations deadline to curb its nuclear programme.

But they acknowledged some measures, such as the export credits, could be difficult to agree among the UN Security Council's five permanent members, which meet on Monday with Germany to discuss next steps.

The US and the European Union hope that by setting more modest goals, they will avoid the four-month long wrangle at the Security Council that preceded the imposition of previous sanctions against Iran last December.

"The question of export credits . . . is likely to be discussed but it is not an easy issue," said a senior British official. "Arms exports is another question – again, it's not straightforward. Identifying further entities and officials [for an asset freeze and a travel ban] is a third area."

Other EU diplomats said they had a similar agenda for Monday's talks.

The British official said the EU as a whole had outstanding guarantees supporting $20bn (€15bn) of exports to Iran, with Germany and Italy accounting for the biggest shares. But the EU will find it difficult to agree to phase out such support entirely.

Germany, which has more than $5bn in credits outstanding, has taken a political decision to grant fewer new credits but is unwilling to leave its exporters at a disadvantage by completely eliminating them. "EU countries will only end these export credits if there's a decision at the UN," said a western diplomat.

The British official also differed with Mohamed El-Baradei, director-general of the International Atomic Energy Agency, who says Iran has already learnt almost all it can from operating "research" centrifuges to enrich uranium. Mr ElBaradei concludes from this that Iran might have to be allowed to continue operating some centrifuges if it is to save face, and agree to a deal.

The official countered: "They haven't yet mastered the basic technology." There had also been signs of debate among Tehran's ruling elite. "President [Mahmoud] Ahmadi-Nejad's standing seems to have diminished and I think that's helpful for rational discussion and debate," he said.

The British official said the goal of the international community was still a complete suspension of Iran's uranium enrichment-related activities, but several countries wanted to give greater emphasis to the benefits to Iran of negotiations.

Leaving The Options Open With Iran (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 23 — As the Bush administration tries to rally allies to tighten sanctions on Iran yet again, it is sending mixed messages to Tehran about its commitment to a diplomatic solution, trying to create new openings for negotiations even while holding open, ever so vaguely, the possibility that the United States might some day resort to force.

DOJ_NMG_0137062

In Australia on Friday, Vice President Dick Cheney, one of the strongest advocates of pressing for a "regime change" in Iran, reiterated his belief that a diplomatic solution was possible. But Mr. Cheney noted that "the president has also made it clear that we haven't taken any options off the table," a phrase that President Bush frequently uses but has conspicuously avoided in recent weeks while discussing the issue.

At the same time, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice restated her willingness to meet the Iranians anyplace to talk about anything as long as they first agree to stop producing nuclear fuel, even temporarily.

White House officials insist that there is no contradiction.

"The idea that we are ginning up another war — there is no evidence for that," one senior administration official said Friday. The official added that Iran needed to know that it could not let negotiations drag on forever, and that any talk of military options was a signal that Washington would not negotiate endlessly while Tehran used the time to continue its work on uranium enrichment.

But, so far, the White House has declined to say at what point the Iranians will have pushed the United States too far — in other words, how many working centrifuges in Iran would be too many, or at what point it would be impossible to guarantee that Iran could not achieve a "nuclear option," the ability to turn ostensibly civilian nuclear facilities into bomb-making ones.

For now, administration officials say, Mr. Bush is happy to leave the Iranians guessing. He ordered an additional aircraft carrier into waters within striking distance of Iran and its nuclear facilities last month, a step that senior officials say they believe took the Iranian leadership by surprise. He has issued warnings to the Iranians not to meddle in Iraq and has focused on intelligence findings that the most deadly bombs used against Americans in Iraq bear marks of Iranian origins.

But Mr. Bush has denied that he is trying to provoke Iran into a response that would provide a pretext for direct confrontation. "To say it is provoking Iran is just a wrong way to characterize the commander in chief's decision to do what is necessary to protect our soldiers in harm's way," Mr. Bush said at a news conference on Feb. 15, shortly after accusing Iranian forces, but not necessarily the country's leadership, of worsening the violence in Iraq.

In interviews in recent days, three administration officials, all of whom insisted on anonymity because they were speaking about a strategy still being developed, said the carrier movements, the accusations about weapons in Iraq and the use of sanctions against the government were all intended to provide Mr. Bush with some leverage in dealing with Iran.

The officials have made little secret of their desire to fuel dissatisfaction inside Iran with the country's fiery president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who on Friday vowed anew to continue enriching uranium, saying, "If we show weakness in front of the enemies, they will increase their expectations."

R. Nicholas Burns, the under secretary of state for policy and the lead negotiator on Iran, said Thursday that the multipronged approach was showing an effect. "We've roiled their government, and I think we've shocked them a bit," he said.

Mr. Burns is headed to London for a meeting on Monday with France, Germany, Britain, Russia and China about devising a new, tighter set of sanctions against the Iranian government — one that might include a further crackdown on export credits or conventional arms sales.

Mr. Burns will undoubtedly run into more resistance from the Russians and the Chinese, who told American officials flatly in December that they would not put additional economic pressure on the Iranians. But Mr. Burns said he was not looking for a major escalation of sanctions, and other administration officials say that modest steps would be fine for now.

"The most important thing about the last resolution was that we achieved a consensus, we kept the Russians and Chinese on board," one senior administration official said. "And in the end, that's what has serious impact in Iran."

Administration officials say that the need to hold that consensus together is overriding the differences on Iran that roiled the administration in its first term. Back in 2002 and 2003, when the prospect of a nuclear-capable Iran was more distant, the administration decided not to explore several offers through intermediaries to open discussions. Mr. Cheney and others argued that the success they anticipated in Iraq would chasten the Iranians, bringing them to the table on more favorable terms.

Mr. Cheney, however, appears increasingly isolated now that many of his protégés have departed the Defense Department, the State Department and other corners of the administration. He was described by several top officials as only a minor player in the president's decision in May to offer incentives to Iran if it agreed to suspend its fuel production.

But the Iranians did not accept last year's offer, and if the administration and the Europeans are unable to find a formula that works for all sides, the talk of military options is bound to persist.

"No one has defined where the red line is that we can't let the Iranians step over," one senior official said. But Mr. Bush, the official said, is determined "not to let them get one lugnut turn away from having a bomb."

Some diplomats who are trying to bridge the differences between Washington and Tehran insist that Mr. Bush is going to have to give some ground. "To focus only on suspension in my view is not the right approach," Mohamed ElBaradei, the director general of the International Atomic Energy Agency, said early this week to The Financial Times.

DOJ_NMG_0137063

In Vienna on Friday, Dr. ElBaradei repeated his idea of a “time out” to allow talks, with Tehran halting uranium enrichment and the United Nations suspending sanctions. And he has consistently preferred to allow a modest amount of face-saving “research and development” in Iran, and focus instead on preventing the country from having an industrial capacity to produce nuclear fuel.

So far, though, Mr. Bush has said that even that much nuclear knowledge cannot be allowed in a country he does not trust.

Iranian Leaders Decry Critics' 'Bullying' Over Nuke Program (WT/AP)

By Nasser Karimi, Associated Press

The Washington Times, February 24, 2007

TEHRAN -- Critics of its nuclear program are "bullying" Iran, its current president and a former president said yesterday in response to a report by the U.N. nuclear watchdog that opens the way for additional sanctions against Iran.

The comments from President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and influential former President Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, in separate speeches, appeared to show that the Iranian ruling establishment is closing ranks ahead of the possible new measures.

The International Atomic Energy Agency report Thursday said Iran has ignored a U.N. Security Council ultimatum to freeze uranium enrichment -- a possible pathway to nuclear arms -- and instead has expanded its program by setting up hundreds of centrifuges.

Hours later, the United States said key countries would meet next week to try to develop a new U.N. resolution on the standoff.

In Washington, Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns said he will travel to London on Monday to meet with the United States' negotiating partners to try to draft a new resolution regarding Iran.

"It is effectively thumbing its nose at the international community," he said of Iran.

Mr. Burns said he hopes the United States and other permanent members of the U.N. Security Council, plus Germany, can quickly draft a resolution to "see Iran repudiated again." He said it was too soon to say what provisions the resolution might contain.

Among the permanent council members, Britain and France are likely to join the United States in a call for harsher sanctions than Russia and China will accept.

Chinese Foreign Minister Li Zhaoxing told his Iranian counterpart that his country hoped "to peacefully resolve" the nuclear issue, the Xinhua news agency reported yesterday. Russian U.N. Ambassador Vitaly Churkin likewise reiterated his country's desire for a negotiated solution.

Divisions had emerged within the Iranian leadership over Mr. Ahmadinejad's handling of the nuclear standoff since the council's adoption of limited economic sanctions against Iran in December.

Some Iranians think Mr. Ahmadinejad has been too antagonistic toward the United States and its allies. Mr. Rafsanjani in recent weeks has emerged as a high-level advocate of a more conciliatory stance toward the West in the nuclear dispute.

But Mr. Rafsanjani told worshippers gathered for Friday prayers in Tehran that Western countries would fail to achieve anything by pressuring Iran about its nuclear activities.

And state television quoted Mr. Ahmadinejad as telling a gathering of thousands in northern Iran: "The Iranian nation has resisted all bullies and corrupt powers, and it will fully defend all its rights.

"If a few states do not believe that Iran's nuclear activities are peaceful, this is of no importance whatsoever," he said at the rally in Fuman.

In a warning to the United States and its Western allies who want Iran to roll back its nuclear program, Mr. Rafsanjani, a high-ranking cleric who holds seats on two of Iran's most important government bodies, said, "If you continue this bullying way, you will definitely make many troubles for yourselves, the world and the region."

But he also reiterated Iran's offer for talks. "We -- all of us, our officials, our leader -- are ready to provide you full assurances." He did not elaborate.

Diplomacy, Not War, With Iran (WP)

By Bill Richardson

The Washington Post, February 24, 2007

The recent tentative agreement with North Korea over its nuclear program illustrates how diplomacy can work even with the most unsavory of regimes. Unfortunately, it took the Bush administration more than six years to commit to diplomacy. During that needless delay North Korea developed and tested nuclear weapons -- weapons its leaders still have not agreed to dismantle. Had we engaged the North Koreans earlier, instead of calling them "evil" and talking about "regime change," we might have prevented them from going nuclear. We could have, and should have, negotiated a better agreement, and sooner.

DOJ_NMG_0137064

As the International Atomic Energy Agency just confirmed, Iran has once again defied the international community and is moving forward with its nuclear program, yet the Bush administration seems committed to repeating the mistakes it made with North Korea. Rather than directly engaging the Iranians about their nuclear program, President Bush refuses to talk, except to make threats. He has moved ships to the Persian Gulf region and claims, with scant evidence, that Iran is helping Iraqi insurgents kill Americans. This is not a strategy for peace. It is a strategy for war -- a war that Congress has not authorized. Most of our allies, and most Americans, don't believe this president, who has repeatedly cried wolf.

Saber-rattling is not a good way to get the Iranians to cooperate. But it is a good way to start a new war -- a war that would be a disaster for the Middle East, for the United States and for the world. A war that, furthermore, would destroy what little remains of U.S. credibility in the community of nations.

A better approach would be for the United States to engage directly with the Iranians and to lead a global diplomatic offensive to prevent them from building nuclear weapons. We need tough, direct negotiations, not just with Iran but also with our allies, especially Russia, to get them to support us in presenting Iran with credible carrots and sticks.

No nation has ever been forced to renounce nuclear weapons, but many have chosen to do so. The Iranians will not end their nuclear program because we threaten them and call them names. They will renounce nukes because we convince them that they will be safer and more prosperous if they do that than if they don't. This feat will take more than threats and insults. It will take skillful American diplomatic leadership.

Diplomacy is more than just talking to people. It requires speaking credibly from a position of strength. As the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, as energy secretary, as a member of Congress and as a diplomatic envoy, I have always believed in and worked to achieve tough, credible and direct negotiations with adversaries. To be tough, you need strong alliances and a strong military. And to be credible, you need a record of meaning what you say. By alienating our allies, overextending our military, making idle threats and antagonizing just about everyone, the Bush administration has undermined our diplomatic leverage.

We need to change course. Iran's nuclear program is a threat to peace, but it also presents an opportunity to start rebuilding America's credibility and leadership, which have been weakened by six years of incompetence.

This is no time for chest-beating and dangerous brinkmanship. It is time for alliance-building, direct engagement and tough face-to-face negotiations. For the United States to attack Iran without exhausting all diplomatic options would be a terrible mistake.

The writer, a Democrat, is governor of New Mexico and a presidential candidate.

N. Korea Invites U.N. Inspector (WT/AP)

By George Jahn, Associated Press

The Washington Times, February 24, 2007

VIENNA, Austria -- North Korea yesterday asked the chief U.N. atomic inspector to visit -- four years after expelling his monitors and dropping out of the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty -- an encouraging sign the reclusive regime is serious about freezing its weapons program.

Mohamed ElBaradei, the head of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), offered few details about his upcoming trip, which other agency officials said would likely occur in the second week of March.

The announcement signaled the North's willingness to subject its nuclear program to outside scrutiny for the first time since withdrawing from the Non-Proliferation Treaty in January 2003, just weeks after ordering nuclear inspectors to leave.

U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon hailed the invitation -- which came five months after the North conducted its first nuclear weapon test -- as a "good beginning," an interpretation shared by the U.S. administration.

"We are really very pleased that the IAEA is now receiving the initial steps to be able to go back into North Korea to be able to verify compliance. It is indeed a good sign that it has happened as quickly as it has," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in the Canadian capital, Ottawa.

White House spokesman Tony Fratto said the invitation shows North Korea is willing to begin executing the terms of the six-nation deal reached Feb. 13, under which the North said it would dismantle its nuclear facilities and normalize relations with South Korea, Japan and the United States in exchange for oil shipments and security guarantees.

"We'll be interested in hearing his report when he gets back," Mr. Fratto said.

Amid the news reports on North Korea's apparent new attitude, South Korean newspapers and wire services announced today that North Korea's chief nuclear negotiator plans to visit the United States next week for follow-up talks on the recent nuclear deal.

DOJ_NMG_0137065

Vice Foreign Minister Kim Kye-gwan is expected to arrive in San Francisco Thursday en route to New York for meetings with his U.S. counterpart, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, South Korea's Yonhap news agency reported.

Mr. Hill said at the end of the negotiations that he had invited Mr. Kim to New York for normalization discussions.

Mr. ElBaradei's trip to North Korea will mark only an initial step in the long and complex process that the international community hopes will result in stripping the North of its nuclear weapons capabilities and ensuring that the communist country remains without such arms.

In a process that one U.N. official said "could take years," IAEA inspectors would be tasked with re-establishing the monitoring of the plutonium-producing Yongbyon nuclear facility, and then being on site while it is closed and eventually dismantled.

Conservatives in Washington have berated the Bush administration for caving in on its tough stance against the North. The United States agreed to resolve financial restrictions it placed on a Macau bank -- accused of complicity in counterfeiting and money laundering by North Korea -- to pave the way for the nuclear disarmament-for-aid deal.

Yesterday during a visit to Australia, Vice President Dick Cheney expressed caution about the agreement, but called it a "first hopeful step."

"We go into this deal with our eyes open," Mr. Cheney said. "In light of North Korea's missile test last July, its nuclear test in October and its record of proliferation and human rights abuses, the regime in Pyongyang has much to prove."

The Feb. 13 agreement signed by the two Koreas, the United States, Japan, China and Russia specifies only that IAEA inspectors should be tasked with supervising the closing of the Yongbyon reactor.

Mr. ElBaradei said he and North Korean authorities would meet on how to "implement the freeze of [nuclear] facilities" and the "eventual dismantlement of these facilities."

Mr. Ban, who was visiting U.N. agencies in Vienna, said he hoped the ElBaradei invitation would translate into concrete steps toward denuclearizing the Korean Peninsula.

The Feb. 13 deal requires North Korea to first shut down and seal its main nuclear reactor within 60 days of the agreement, accept international monitors and begin discussions with the United States on other nuclear facilities. In return, the nations would ship the North an initial load of fuel oil.

If North Korea reveals all its nuclear programs and begins to disable its nuclear facilities, it then would get a much larger shipment of fuel oil and aid. The United States also would begin the process of removing North Korea from its designation as a terror-sponsoring state and ending trade sanctions.

US 'Very Pleased' About North Korean Invitation To UN Watchdog: Rice (AFP)

AFP, February 24, 2007

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Friday the US administration is "very pleased" about an invitation to the chief UN atomic watchdog to visit North Korea and discuss a landmark deal to curb Pyongyang's nuclear arms program.

Mohamed ElBaradei, head of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), announced in Vienna the trip to the North Korean capital, expected to take place in mid-March.

"We are really very pleased that the IAEA (will) ... be able to go back into North Korea to be able to verify compliance with the agreement that is to take place over the next 60 days that would shut down the Pyongyang reactor and would seal it," Rice told reporters during a visit to Ottawa.

This would allow a next phase, "which is the disablement of the nuclear facilities of North Korea on the way to the full denuclearization of the Korean peninsula," she said.

"It is indeed a good sign it has happened as quickly as it has."

In Washington, White House spokesman Tony Fratto earlier described the North Korean invitation as a step forward toward implementing a February 13 deal whereby Pyongyang would shut down a key nuclear facility in exchange for energy aid.

"It's a positive sign," Fratto told reporters. "It shows that we're beginning to execute the terms of the agreement.

"We'll be interested in hearing his (ElBaradei's) report when he gets back," the spokesman said. "But certainly, our view is positive on that."

N. Korea, U.N. To Develop Plan To Dismantle Nukes (LAT)

By Bob Drogin

The Los Angeles Times, February 24, 2007

VIENNA, Austria -- In a fresh sign of easing tensions, North Korean officials on Friday invited the chief of the United Nations' nuclear watchdog agency to come to their capital, Pyongyang, next month to develop plans aimed at dismantling the nation's nuclear weapons program, officials said here.

DOJ_NMG_0137066

Mohamed ElBaradei, director of the International Atomic Energy Agency, said that he hopes to discuss the "shut-down and eventual abandonment" of the plutonium-producing reactor facility at Yongbyon, ending its ability to produce fuel for additional nuclear weapons.

North Korea, which tested its first nuclear device in October, pledged earlier this month to stop, seal and ultimately disable operations at Yongbyon. It also agreed to let IAEA inspectors return to examine its bombs, nuclear fuel stores and other nuclear facilities. Inspectors were ordered out in December 2002 when the reclusive regime withdrew from the Nonproliferation Treaty.

Pyongyang did not promise to relinquish its current arsenal, believed to be up to six bombs or the fissionable material to make them, but agreed to further negotiations in the future.

"I see this as a step toward the denuclearization of the North Korean Peninsula," ElBaradei told reporters in a joint briefing with U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon, who is visiting Vienna. A spokeswoman said ElBaradei probably will visit in the second week of March.

The White House, which is eager to see North Korea disarm, applauded the invitation as a sign of progress. "It's a positive sign," said White House spokesman Tony Fratto. "It shows that we're beginning to execute the terms of the agreement."

The breakthrough came a day after ElBaradei reported that Iran had defied a U.N. Security Council order to suspend its nuclear enrichment program. The report said Iran instead steadily has expanded low-grade enrichment of uranium, has installed further equipment used for enrichment, and continued construction of related facilities. The report cited numerous cases where Tehran has ignored IAEA requests for additional access or information.

In an interview Friday, Ali Asghar Soltanieh, Iran's representative to the IAEA, claimed that the report supported Iran because IAEA experts "found no evidence," he said, of diverted nuclear material that could be used for weapons. "It is a clean bill of health," he said.

The report, however, states that the IAEA "is unable to verify the absence of undeclared nuclear material and activities" unless Tehran provides additional cooperation to solve a series of outstanding concerns. Inspectors are restricted in their travel in Iran, and may visit only sites that Iran has declared formally.

Soltanieh said that the IAEA report disproved concerns in Washington, D.C., that Iran secretly is planning to use a civilian nuclear fuel program to build nuclear arms.

"All these allegations have been proved by Mr. ElBaradei to be baseless," he said. "The report proves that all activities of Iran are for peaceful purposes."

Soltanieh repeated Iran's offer to start negotiations if Washington and its allies drop U.N. sanctions and their demands for an immediate freeze of nuclear activities as a precondition to talks. "We are a great nation and preconditions are a humiliation," he said.

Bush administration officials will meet other Security Council members in London on Monday to draft further U.N. sanctions proposals. The talks are expected to focus on European export guarantees that help prop up Iran's economy.

Ban, the new U.N. chief, urged Iran to follow North Korea's example and return to talks with the international community.

"I very much hope that the Iranian authorities learn from the case of the North Korean nuclear example," he said. "It should emphasize the better future of the nuclear issue through dialogue."

North Korea agreed Feb. 13 to freeze its production of plutonium at its five-megawatt facility at Yongbyon and to allow inspectors to monitor and verify its compliance. In return, the United States, China, South Korea and Russia agreed to provide about $400 million in food and fuel aid, plus security guarantees.

The United States also agreed to start the process of removing North Korea from its designation as a state that sponsors terrorism, and to discuss terms for normalizing relations and ending economic sanctions.

The pact defers several more difficult issues, including denuclearization of the Korean peninsula, a complete declaration of North Korea's nuclear activities. Some of President Bush's supporters have criticized the arrangement, saying the White House had rewarded Kim Jong-Il's government for testing a bomb.

Report: North Korea's Main Nuclear Envoy To Visit US Within Days (AP)

AP, February 23, 2007

SEOUL (AP) — North Korea's chief nuclear negotiator plans to visit the United States within days for follow-up talks on a recent disarmament deal, a South Korean news report said Saturday.

IAEA: Nation invites U.N. to discuss denuclearization

The North's Vice Foreign Minister Kim Kye Gwan is expected to arrive in San Francisco on Thursday en route to New York for meetings with his U.S. counterpart, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, South Korea's Yonhap news agency reported.

DOJ_NMG_0137067

If Kim's trip takes place, it would be the first U.S. visit by North Korea's main nuclear envoy since the international standoff over the North's nuclear ambitions flared in late 2002.

Kim plans to spend one night in San Francisco to deliver a lecture at Stanford University, the report said, citing multiple unidentified individuals in the U.S.

The North Korean diplomat may also give a lecture at New York's Korea Society, Yonhap said.

Major South Korean newspapers carried similar reports. None of the reports said how long Kim was expected to stay in the U.S.

North Korea agreed at six-nation nuclear talks in Beijing days ago to shutter and disable its nuclear facilities in exchange for energy aid and political incentives, including the opening of two-way talks with the U.S. on establishing diplomatic relations.

Hill said at the end of the negotiations that he had invited Kim to New York for normalization discussions.

The breakthrough deal put a cap on rising tensions in the region since North Korea's nuclear test in October. But it also faced criticism for allegedly rewarding the communist nation for bad behavior.

The countries involved in the six-nation talks are the two Koreas, the United States, Japan, China and Russia.

Blast That Killed U.S. Diplomat Tied To Qaeda (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

KARACHI, Pakistan, Feb. 22 — The suicide bombing that killed an American diplomat here last March, just before a visit by President Bush, was organized by a small cell of Pakistani militants and masterminded by an operative of Al Qaeda based in the Pakistan's tribal areas, Pakistan says.

The charge is being made by Pakistani officials as they present evidence — the result of months of investigations by the police, assisted by F.B.I. investigators — at the trial of two men accused in the plot.

The men, Anwar ul-Haq, 27, and Usman Ghani, 26, both ethnic Pashtuns from Pakistan's North-West Frontier Province, grew up in the teeming working-class neighborhoods of Karachi and fought with the Taliban in Afghanistan, the investigators say. On Thursday, they sat behind bars, wearing long beards and knitted prayer caps, at the back of a courtroom in Karachi's central jail, listening intently to an investigator outline the evidence against them.

The case is one of the first in Pakistan to underline in court the links between splinter cells of Pakistani jihad groups and Qaeda operatives in Waziristan, part of Pakistan's tribal areas, which have come under increasing scrutiny as a staging area for suicide bombers and Taliban insurgents battling NATO and American forces in Afghanistan.

Publicly, Pakistani leaders have sought to play down the importance of the tribal areas as havens for militants. But the evidence being presented by Pakistani investigators makes clear the threat contained in Waziristan, not only for Afghanistan but for Pakistan itself, which has suffered six suicide bombings in the last five weeks.

Two assassination attempts against President Pervez Musharraf in December 2003 were also traced to Qaeda and militants who enjoyed a haven in the same region, where the government has little control and foreign and Pakistani militants operate almost unimpeded, according to the home secretary of Sindh Province, Ghulam Mohatarem, a retired army brigadier.

"They mostly come from the north," he said of the bombers that have plagued Karachi and other cities. "But they are provided with logistics from small local cells that come up and then disappear." United States officials in Pakistan declined to be interviewed for this article.

The investigators' conclusions, which are largely drawn from a confession by Mr. Haq and from the infiltration of terrorist cells, are the latest indication that Al Qaeda and its local operatives are still able to operate from Waziristan.

Brigadier Mohatarem, the home secretary, said that the police in Karachi, a sprawling and violent city of about 16 million, tracked down and disrupted the activities of numerous terrorist splinter groups in recent months.

Although Karachi has seen some of the worst terrorist attacks in Pakistan since 2001, there have been no Qaeda-linked attacks here for nearly a year since the consulate bombing.

"We are slightly more confident because the logistics have become more difficult for them," Brigadier Mohatarem said. Yet the threat of terrorism remains, he and others agreed. "We cannot say it has been wiped out," a senior police official said of Al Qaeda.

Family members denied in interviews that the two defendants had gone to Afghanistan, knew the bomber, Raja Tahir, 23, also from Karachi, or had any jihad links. Both men are pleading not guilty, their lawyers said.

But the police say there is little doubt that the suicide bombing of March 2, 2006, which killed the diplomat David Foy, his driver and three others, had a Qaeda connection because of the timing, just two days before Mr. Bush's visit to Pakistan.

Investigators say they have traced other leads to Waziristan as well. The stolen car used in the attack was packed with explosives there and driven down to Karachi, according to one police report.

DOJ_NMG_0137068

The police say all the suspects had spent time in Taliban ranks fighting the Northern Alliance in Afghanistan, and all three had links with the now banned Pakistani jihadi group, Jaish-e-Mohammed.

The mastermind of the plot, Qari Mohammed Zafar, a man from Karachi with known links to Al Qaeda, remains at large in Waziristan, the home secretary said. "Behind him we don't know who is there, if he is a puppet in a chain," he added.

Mr. Zafar is a local leader of Lashkar-e-Jhangvi, an outlawed militant group that has been found to provide the manpower for Qaeda bomb attacks in Pakistan in the past.

He bears the religious title of Qari, meaning he has memorized the Koran. He fought in Afghanistan with the Taliban in the 1990s, and forged links there with Al Qaeda, officials said, some of them speaking on condition of anonymity because of their work in counterterrorism.

After the Taliban government fell, Mr. Zafar took refuge in South Waziristan and sometimes has ventured into rural parts of Sindh Province, Brigadier Mohatarem, the home secretary, said. Three men arrested in Karachi this week with weapons and a suicide vest were also a splinter cell sent by Mr. Zafar, he said.

Mr. Zafar is accused of recruiting the three men who carried out the consulate bombing, in which Mr. Tahir reversed his car into a diplomatic convoy, detonating an enormous blast that tore through the armored plating of the diplomat's car, killing him and his driver immediately.

F.B.I. investigators calculated that there were 880 pounds of C4 explosive packed into the car, Brigadier Mohatarem said. The security cars in front and behind the diplomat's vehicle were blown apart.

Three security men in the car behind were thrown up the street, one some 75 yards, but all survived. A police ranger posted on the street was killed, and two other security guards later died of their wounds. Mr. Haq stands accused as the main logistics organizer. On the day of the bombing, the police charge, he arrived with Mr. Tahir in his car, stood as a lookout and signaled Mr. Tahir by cellphone as the convoy approached.

Mr. Tahir was caught on security cameras in the area parking his car and crossing a nearby parking lot, dressed trendily in a long Pakistani shirt over jeans to allay suspicion, a senior police official familiar with the case said. His car, a two-year-old Toyota Corolla, was stolen, but also intended to give the impression of affluence, the official said.

Mr. Haq has confessed to being present near the consulate that day and to his connection with the bombing, the police said. His brother, Imanullah, 26, who like many Pakistanis uses one name, denied that that his brother was involved, or was acquainted with the bomber.

Mr. Haq's lawyer, Mohammed Ilyas Khan, said he was accused of prompting Mr. Tahir to carry out the bomb attack, and of paying money to the bomber's family. "He has made a confession due to threats and torture but he has told me he will retract that in court," he said.

That confession has also implicated Mr. Ghani, along with the testimony of two witnesses, neither of whom are convincing, according to Mr. Ghani's lawyer, Mushtaq Ahmed. Mr. Ghani's role is less clear.

Mr. Ghani's father, Abdul Rauf, a community social worker, said in an interview that the family knew Mr. Haq well and had rented a shop premises to him, but denied that his son was mixed up in militancy, or was anywhere near the bomb blast that day.

Mr. Rauf also denied that his son knew the bomber, or had ever been to Afghanistan.

But the police say the two were friends and imprisoned together in Afghanistan after they were captured along with thousands of other Taliban soldiers in northern Afghanistan in 2001, as the United States bombing helped topple the Taliban government.

Their incarceration in the notorious Shiberghan prison, run by the Uzbek general, Abdul Rashid Dostum, in northern Afghanistan — where scores of Taliban prisoners died from asphyxiation as they were transported in containers, or from disease and malnutrition — further radicalized the young men, Brigadier Mohatarem said.

Mr. Tahir was only 18 and Mr. Ghani 21 at the time of their capture, and Mr. Tahir contracted tuberculosis in the overcrowded prison before the Afghan government released him a year later. Mr. Ghani was held even longer.

The motivation behind the bomb attack was not hard to see. "The motive was hate for Americans," Brigadier Mohatarem said.

Pakistan Successfully Tests Nuclear-capable Missile (AFP)

AFP, February 23, 2007

Pakistan Friday test-fired its longest range nuclear-capable ballistic missile, two days after signing a deal with rival India to cut the risk of atomic weapons accidents, the military said.

The Shaheen II, or Hatf VI, missile with a range of 2,000 kilometres (1,240 miles) was launched from an undisclosed location, military spokesman Major General Shaukat Sultan told AFP.

DOJ_NMG_0137069

"The test was very successful. It was carried out to validate technical parameters and it hit the target with 100 percent accuracy," Sultan said.

"It is a two-stage solid-fuel-based missile capable of carrying all types of warhead including nuclear."

Pakistan had informed "neighbouring countries" in advance about the missile test, foreign office spokeswoman Tasnim Aslam said. Pakistan is bordered by India, Afghanistan, China and Iran.

"We conduct these tests from time to time according to our requirement and defence needs. It was not meant to convey any message to anyone. It was not any country-specific," she said.

Pakistan President Pervez Musharraf and Prime Minister Shaukat Aziz congratulated the missile's technical team "on its outstanding success," a military statement said.

"The missile test was part of (a) continuous process of validation and technical improvement, which Pakistan follows to consolidate and verify its various land-based strategic missile systems," the statement said.

The test comes at a key time in relations between New Delhi and Islamabad following the firebombing of a cross-border train at midnight Sunday, which killed 68 Pakistanis and Indians.

Pakistan Foreign Minister Khurshid Kasuri went ahead with a visit to India starting on Tuesday, during which the two countries signed the nuclear weapon safeguard agreement.

Friday's missile launch was watched by Pakistan's Chairman of Joint Chiefs of Staff General Ehsan Ul Haq, who said the test was "an important milestone in Pakistan's quest for sustaining strategic balance in South Asia."

India and Pakistan carried out tit-for-tat nuclear detonations in May 1998 and have routinely conducted missile tests since, even after the start of a slow-moving peace process in January 2004.

The neighbours have fought three wars since independence from Britain in 1947, two of them over the disputed Himalayan territory of Kashmir, which is divided between the two and claimed by both in its entirety.

Turks Charge Kurd With Inciting Hatred (WP/AP)

Associated Press

The Washington Post, February 24, 2007

Politician Made Remarks About Iraq

ANKARA, Turkey, Feb. 23 -- A politician was charged Friday with inciting hatred and threatening public safety after suggesting that fellow Kurds would rise against the state and fight if Turkey ever attacked their Kurdish brethren in neighboring Iraq.

Police detained Hilmi Aydogdu, leader of the Democratic Society Party's branch in the mainly Kurdish city of Diyarbakir, as he left a conference and questioned him over the remarks, said Nazmi Gur, a party spokesman.

Prosecutors later formally arrested Aydogdu and charged him with threatening public safety by inciting racial enmity and hatred. The charge carries a maximum three-year prison sentence.

In remarks published in several newspapers, Aydogdu had warned Turkey against taking action in the oil-rich Iraqi city of Kirkuk.

Turkey, which has been trying to quell a domestic Kurdish insurgency for more than two decades, fears that Iraqi Kurdish groups could seize control of the northern city and incorporate it into their semiautonomous region.

Some in Turkey have suggested that Ankara could take military action to prevent that from happening.

"The two sides in this war would be Turkey and the Kurds in Iraq. There are some 20 million Kurds in Turkey, and the 20 million Kurds would regard such a war as an attack against them," newspapers quoted Aydogdu as saying.

"Any attack on Kirkuk would be considered an attack on Diyarbakir," the politician was also quoted as saying.

Turkish leaders are concerned that Iraq's Kurds want Kirkuk's oil revenue to fund a bid for independence that could encourage separatist Kurdish guerrillas in Turkey who have been fighting for autonomy since 1984. The conflict has killed 37,000 people.

Turkey has not ruled out military incursions into Iraq to hunt separatist Kurds, despite warnings from the United States, which fears that such moves could lead to tensions with the Iraqi Kurdish groups allied with Washington.

Turkish authorities frequently accuse the Democratic Society Party of having links to an outlawed Kurdish guerrilla group, the Kurdistan Workers' Party, or PKK, which the United States and European Union consider a terrorist group.

Party members frequently are detained and branch offices raided.

46 Nations Push For Cluster Bomb Ban (WT/AP)

By Doug Mellgren

The Washington Times, February 24, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0137070

OSLO -- Forty-six nations adopted a declaration yesterday calling for a 2008 treaty banning cluster bombs, saying the weapons kill and maim long after conflicts end and inflict "unacceptable harm" on civilians, particularly children.

Some key arms makers -- including the United States, Russia, Israel and China -- snubbed the conference. Of the 49 nations attending, Poland, Romania and Japan did not approve the final text.

But organizers said the declaration was needed despite the absence of key nations to avoid a potential humanitarian disaster posed by unexploded cluster munitions.

Cluster bomblets are packed by the hundreds into artillery shells, bombs or missiles, which scatter them over vast areas, with some failing to explode immediately. The unexploded bomblets can then lie dormant for years after conflicts end until they are disturbed, often by civilians.

As many as 60 percent of the victims in Southeast Asia are children, the Cluster Munition Coalition campaign group said. The weapons have recently been used in Iraq, Kosovo, Afghanistan and Lebanon, it said. The United Nations estimated that Israel dropped as many as 4 million bomblets in southern Lebanon during last year's war with Hezbollah, with as many as 40 percent failing to explode on impact.

Children can be attracted to the unexploded bombs by their small size, shape and bright colors, activists say.

Mark Regev, spokesman for Israel's Foreign Ministry said: "During the recent conflict in Lebanon, Israel used no munitions that were outlawed by international treaties or international law."

Mr. Regev said if the declaration ever evolves into a treaty, then Israel would examine it and decide then how to respond.

While the document is not binding, organizers and activists hope it will pressure nations into halting the use of cluster bombs. Norway hopes the treaty would be similar to one outlawing anti-personnel mines, negotiated in Oslo in 1997.

"If you need proof that you can conclude a treaty without the United States, Russia and China, look at the land mine treaty," said Steve Goose of Human Rights Watch. Despite rejecting that treaty, Mr. Goose said, the major powers have stopped deploying land mines and the number of civilian casualties has been cut in half since 1997.

The declaration urged nations to "conclude by 2008 a legally binding international instrument" to ban cluster bombs. The treaty would "prohibit the use, production, transfer and stockpiling of those cluster munitions that cause unacceptable harm to civilians," the declaration said.

It urged countries take steps at a national level before the treaty takes effect. Norway has already done so, while Austria announced a moratorium on cluster bombs at the start of the conference.

The United States, China and Russia have refused to sign the land mine treaty and oppose the Norwegian initiative on cluster bombs. They did not send representatives to the meeting. Australia, Israel, India and Pakistan also did not attend. Those nations say the weapons should be dealt with in other arenas, such as the U.N. Convention on Conventional Weapons.

U.S. In Talks With Britain On Installing Missile Defense System (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

LONDON, Feb. 23 — Britain and the United States said Friday that they were discussing the stationing of an American antiballistic missile defense system on British soil.

The United States previously offered to locate the missile system in the Czech Republic and Poland, drawing furious objections from Russia, though Washington argues that the system is not built to defend against Russia but against Iran, principally, and other potential threats.

Prime Minister Tony Blair's spokeswoman said Friday that Britain had been secretly lobbying for inclusion in the system for some time. "It is our intention that whilst the United States are in the decision-making process, the U.K. should be considered as part of that," the spokeswoman said.

"The prime minister thinks it is a good idea that we are part of the consideration by the United States" she said, speaking on the condition of anonymity, which the British civil service requires. "We believe it is an important step toward providing missile defense coverage for Europe, of which we are part."

The possible step, first mentioned in The Economist magazine, seems sure to prove contentious in Britain, and to cloud Mr. Blair's final months in office, along with two other events that surfaced Friday.

In one, relatives of British soldiers slain in Iraq began a peace vigil in blue nylon tents near Mr. Blair's office, and in the other, Mr. Blair pondered a new military deployment in Afghanistan.

Just two days after Mr. Blair announced a withdrawal of 1,600 of the 7,100 British soldiers in southern Iraq, Defense Secretary Des Browne said "some additional forces" — possibly about 1,000 soldiers — would be sent to join the 5,600 Britons who are part of NATO forces confronting an expected spring offensive by the Taliban in Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0137071

Word of the missile defense negotiations followed remarks in Washington on Thursday by Gen. Henry Obering III, who discussed the deployment of missile defenses in Britain, saying, "We are always looking for new ways to partner with the United Kingdom, whether that be co-development or a hosting, or any of the activities of that nature." He also said that radar systems were already in final testing in Britain.

At first the American Embassy in London made remarks that the British news media seized on as a rebuff of Mr. Blair's interest. David Johnson, the deputy chief of mission at the United States Embassy in London, told a BBC radio interviewer: "I would see as we go forward. There may be opportunities for us to talk to other countries about other needs, but right now we're concentrating on the Czech Republic and on Poland as the primary sites where we would be looking for this."

In a subsequent statement, Mr. Johnson said any suggestion that his remarks "were a rebuff to the British government is nonsense. We have been and will be in discussions with the British government as we develop our missile defense system and be open to opportunities for joint work as we go forward."

The negotiations are most likely to raise political hackles at a time when many in Mr. Blair's Labor Party and in the opposition Conservatives are pressing for Britain to distance itself from the United States after their close and sometimes unpopular alliance in Iraq.

The Conservatives said the government had given no information about its discussions with the United States. "If there is a request to base part of the U.S. National Missile Defense system in the U.K., we would need to see the exact nature of that request before taking a decision," said Liam Fox, the Conservative spokesman on defense. The government, he said, needs "to be more honest with the opposition" to secure bipartisan support for the proposed missile deployment.

Mr. Fox also took issue with the plan to deploy more troops to Afghanistan, saying other European countries, including Germany, France, Italy and Spain, should commit troops in the hazardous Helmand Province of southern Afghanistan, where many British soldiers are based.

"It is clear that the government has failed to get our NATO allies to carry their share of the burden in Afghanistan," he said, complaining that, with deployments in Iraq and Afghanistan, "it is clear now that our army is so overstretched we can't carry two conflicts."

Apart from Iraq and Afghanistan, British troops are deployed in the Balkans and in Northern Ireland.

The political hazards of Mr. Blair's military ventures were underlined by the protest on Whitehall, the broad boulevard running by the gated and closely guarded entrance to Downing Street, where Mr. Blair has his office and residence.

Rose Gentle, whose 19-year-old son Gordon was killed in Basra, Iraq, in 2004, led a small group of protesters who pitched camp and submitted a letter addressed to Mr. Blair calling for a meeting with him.

"This is our sixth such visit, and each time you have not seen fit to give us a few minutes of your time," the letter said. "We have a number of questions that we need answered about the deaths of our sons in Iraq, and we insist that you meet us."

"Please believe us, Mr. Blair, that neither we nor these questions will go away," the letter said.

UK Wants US Missile Defence Sites (FT)

By Stephen Fidler, Christopher Adams, Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, February 24, 2007

Britain has pressed Washington to site important elements of the US missile defence system in the UK, British officials said on Friday.

The US, which says the system is designed to shoot down missiles from problem states such as Iran and North Korea, is building a multi-layered missile defence system aimed at protecting the US.

Part of the programme is aimed at building a system to shoot down missiles during the middle of their trajectory.

An elementary version of this "mid-course system" has already been set up in the Pacific to protect the US west coast, and the US is now holding talks with Poland and the Czech Republic with a view to protecting the east coast.

Washington is discussing siting missile interceptors in Poland, near the Baltic Sea, and a high definition X-band radar in the Czech Republic.

UK officials say Tony Blair has pressed Washington to place at least some of those interceptors on British soil. The UK prime minister is said to share US concerns about the threat posed by missiles from states of concern.

"In the face of rogue states, this is something that can assist in Britain's defence," a UK official said on Friday. The official added: "The fact that the Poles and Czechs were involved prior to us does not diminish our wish for discussions to continue. The prime minister is keen discussions continue to see if we can be part of the outcome. "The UK position was first reported on Friday by The Economist magazine.

DOJ_NMG_0137072

The discussions with Warsaw and Prague have brought protests from Russia, which claims to feel threatened by US expansionism. The US insists that the system is not directed against Moscow, and could not handle in any case the number and sophistication of Russia's many intercontinental ballistic missiles.

The possibility that the interceptors could be on UK soil will raise questions about whether it will make Britain safer. Some US scientists argue the early warning radar could not pick up Iranian missiles fired at Poland and the Czech Republic, because their trajectory would be hidden by the curvature of the earth.

Philip Coyle, a senior adviser to the US-based Center for Defense Information, said that the missile interceptors were close to the size of an inter-continental ballistic missile and their deployment at short notice could make the Russians nervous. "When they first take off, you can't be quite sure where they are headed if you're a Russian."

Mr Coyle and others also say that, contrary to US official claims, the system has not been shown to work under realistic conditions.

Ian Davis, director of the British American Security Information Council, described the system as a "Maginot Line in the sky". He said the system "has very low probability of functioning effectively, even lower relevance to contemporary security risks, and a danger of provoking long-term missile escalation with Russia and China".

Britain agreed in 2003 to an upgrading of the early-warning radar facility at Fylingdales in Yorkshire, which US officials say should be complete later this year. Any UK-based interceptors would not be located near the early warning radar.

In a January 23 letter to Washington's US Nato allies outlining US intentions for missile defence, Victoria Nuland, US ambassador to Nato, mentions UK offers of assistance for the programme. It also refers to Denmark, which is responsible for a radar facility on Greenland that may be upgraded, and says other nations may be approached for assistance.

Misguided Missiles (NYT)

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

Fifteen years after the cold war's end, it would seem that everyone involved should know better. But the Bush administration's tone-deaf plan to station parts of a missile defense system in Eastern Europe and Moscow's snarling response show that all sides could use a refresher course in diplomatic sense and civility.

American officials insist that the 10 interceptors it is planning to place in Poland and the early warning radar for the Czech Republic are supposed to defend Europe from Iran's missiles — not Russia's. And there is no doubt they're telling the truth. The untested system could be easily overwhelmed by Russia's huge nuclear arsenal.

It is unlikely, however, that more military posturing against Iran is going to persuade Tehran to give up its nuclear ambitions. Russia's furious reaction to the stationing of even weak missile defenses near its borders (and on the territory of its former satellites), while wildly out of proportion, was also utterly predictable. A top Russian general — who sounded as if he'd slept through the last 15 years — warned the Poles and the Czechs that if they went along with America's plans, Russia's missiles "will be capable of targeting the facilities."

The mixture of crocodile tears and threats from Russian officials seems overly dramatic — and very much in character for President Vladimir Putin, who is hoping to divert attention from his own thuggery at home, not to mention his desire to reassert power in Russia's old neighborhood.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who cut her teeth on Kremlinology, should have expected Moscow's reaction. And Ms. Rice, who's been counting on Russia to help keep up the pressure against Iran's nuclear efforts, should have known that provoking Moscow this way could be especially counterproductive. Add to that the fact that the move has annoyed "old European" allies, like Germany, which are central to efforts to contain Iran, and it seems like another example of diplomatic negligence.

In any case, this is a fight that should be quickly reined in. Washington has wisely chosen to respond calmly to Russia's vitriol, and Russia's foreign minister, Sergey Lavrov, has taken some welcome steps to moderate Moscow's stance.

A few interceptors in Europe may or may not work against "rogue states," but they are counterproductive if all they do is to provoke Russia and irk NATO allies.

Fear Of Return Of Berlusconi Reunites Left Behind Prodi (NYT)

By Ian Fisher

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

ROME, Feb. 23 — It wasn't love or even any real faith that they could stick together long. Rather, it seems, a singular frightening thought pushed nine bickering parties to agree late on Thursday to come together again: that Silvio Berlusconi might soon lead Italy again.

DOJ_NMG_0137073

"They have seen what can happen, and they are very frightened," said Renato Mannheimer, one of Italy's top pollsters. "They are afraid of Berlusconi."

On Friday, two days after the center-left government of Romano Prodi fell, Mr. Mannheimer released a poll making that threat clear. It showed that Mr. Berlusconi's center-right coalition would probably win if elections were called now.

New elections seem unlikely at the moment. President Giorgio Napolitano ended two days of consultations on how to move ahead on Friday, and said he would announce his decision on Saturday morning.

But the real worry that the center-left could again lose power, only nine months after wresting it from Mr. Berlusconi, seemed to concentrate minds overnight Thursday as the fractured parties in Mr. Prodi's coalition came together behind his demands: 12 nonnegotiable points for leading a new government.

Those points essentially rein in the coalition's far left, which had come into increasing conflict with more centrist forces in the government. On Wednesday, two far-left senators abstained from a crucial vote on the government's foreign policy. When the vote failed, Mr. Prodi submitted his resignation.

On Friday, the far left could not do enough penance. The Refounded Communists expelled one of the senators who voted against the measure for "a breach that could not be healed," and declared themselves strongly behind Mr. Prodi.

"We reaffirm our faith in the prime minister," the party said in a statement, "and confirm a loyal and effective collaboration."

By Friday evening, it was not yet certain that Mr. Prodi would be given the chance to form another government, though the possibility looked more and more likely. By the rules, Mr. Napolitano must ask Mr. Prodi to form a government, following his consultations with the nation's political parties and important institutions.

That government would then face a confidence vote in Parliament. There also remained a possibility that Mr. Prodi could peel off several opposition politicians to enlarge his majority and make governing easier.

The president has other options: asking someone else to try to form a government, for example, or calling for a caretaker government as a transition toward elections. He could also simply call new elections.

That last option dimmed still further after Mr. Berlusconi, who had been quoted in the news media as calling for immediate elections, failed to advocate them in his meeting with Mr. Napolitano on Friday. Political experts note that, despite his standing in the polls, a victory is not certain so soon after his loss last year and, at any rate, his own coalition is also divided.

But he strongly urged that Mr. Prodi not be given a new mandate, advocating instead a temporary government of neutral technocrats and a relatively quick election.

"We asked the head of state to keep in mind that this government was not, and never will be, capable of governing," Mr. Berlusconi said.

Despite Mr. Berlusconi's hesitancy, the Italian news media reported Friday that Mr. Prodi's supporters successfully leveraged worry about Mr. Berlusconi's return to office to gain support for Mr. Prodi's 12 points. Those points aimed to give Mr. Prodi more autonomy, declaring unanimity on foreign affairs and making his spokesman the public voice for the entire government.

But the points were notable also for what was left out and so, to many experts, underscored that any new Prodi government was likely to remain divided. He did not include one of the most contentious initiatives, a proposal to grant rights to unmarried couples, including homosexuals.

By leaving it out, Mr. Prodi seemed to sidestep another bruising fight in Parliament, given the strong opposition to the measure by the Vatican and an influential conservative minister. But the measure was a central campaign promise, and left-leaning members of Parliament expressed much disappointment that Mr. Prodi had left it unmentioned.

For the moment, though, they preferred to say that was the cost of staying in power, noting that the measure could still be raised in Parliament.

Prodi Aims To Secure Centre-left Vote (FT)

By Tony Barber

Financial Times, February 24, 2007

Italian political leaders continued their search for a new government on Friday as Romano Prodi, the caretaker prime minister, tried to strengthen his centre-left coalition and secure it a second term of office.

Mr Prodi won agreement from the nine parties in the coalition on Thursday to support a 12-point political programme, including public spending cuts, measures to help the south of Italy and liberalisation of professions and the service sector.

Mr Prodi's aim is to ensure that if Giorgio Napolitano, Italy's head of state, asks him to form a new government, he will be able to count on the support of every single centre-left legislator in a subsequent vote of confidence.

It was the centre-left's lack of a majority in the Senate, parliament's upper house, that forced Mr Prodi's resignation on Wednesday when the government unexpectedly lost a vote on foreign policy.

DOJ_NMG_0137074

The centre-left is hoping to strengthen its numerical position in parliament by wooing several moderate opposition politicians, including Marco Follini, a former deputy premier, and some of his associates.

However, the Union of Christian Democrats (UDC), the main moderate opposition party, indicated on Friday that it was unlikely to switch sides and join the centre-left, saying it wanted "a government of national responsibility".

"Italy needs a serious and authoritative government. It is necessary to recognise that the [centre-left] majority is not self-sufficient, neither politically nor numerically," said Lorenzo Cesa, the UDC leader.

The 12-point programme agreed by the centre-left has some glaring omissions, compared with the policies pursued by the Prodi government up to last Wednesday.

The new programme contains no commitment to extend the legal rights of unwed couples, including gays. This was a divisive issue for Mr Prodi's coalition, and when the government finally agreed to a modest measure in favour of unwed couples, it came under vociferous attack from Italy's Roman Catholic Church.

The new programme also contains no commitment to electoral reform, a measure that many politicians and commentators regard as essential to giving Italy more stable governments.

The programme promises a "reordering" of Italy's welfare system, but says that any reform of the overburdened state pension system would favour the young and those on low pensions.

Italian President Weighs Prodi's Support (AP)

By Alessandra Rizzo, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 24, 2007

Center-left leaders rallied behind Romano Prodi on Friday, boosting his chances of returning to office just days after he resigned as premier.

The politicians told the Italian president, who has been holding talks aimed at solving the political crisis, that they were ready to support any bids by Prodi to return to the premiership. Earlier, they all signed up to a new 12-point government program that Prodi said would be "nonnegotiable."

Prodi stepped down Wednesday evening after an embarrassing parliamentary defeat over foreign policy, including the government's plan to keep troops in Afghanistan. He is staying on in a caretaker role.

"We are convinced that this experience served as a lesson to all of us," said Antonio Di Pietro, who serves as infrastructure minister. "This renewed sense of responsibility and political maturity ... can lead us to do our job better."

Among those who also expressed their support were leaders of Communist parties and other radical leftists.

But even with the full backing of his coalition, Prodi's majority at the Senate remains minimal, raising fears that any further rebellion by his often-insubordinate allies might bring him down again.

Seeking to quell these fears, Prodi has been scrambling to widen his support by luring in a handful of moderate senators. He is also trying to ensure the support of at least some of the seven honorary senators appointed for life.

The 12-point plan calls for respecting Italy's international commitments in Afghanistan and elsewhere, and for the construction of a high-speed rail line linking Turin with Lyon, France.

In an apparent nod to Catholic moderate lawmakers, the new government program made no mention of a proposal to grant legal rights to unmarried couples, including gay partners. The proposal has angered the Vatican and drawn the opposition of Catholic politicians.

The plan also gives the premier the final word on any disagreement in the squabbling coalition.

"On this basis, we can start over," Foreign Minister Massimo D'Alema said.

It will now be up to President Giorgio Napolitano to decide what to do next. The president said he will announce his decision on Saturday.

Napolitano might reject Prodi's resignation, asking him to stay on and seek a new vote of confidence in parliament. Or he might ask Prodi or another leader from his coalition to form a new center-left government. Alternatively he might tap an institutional figure above the political fray to form a Cabinet — possibly with broad support from both coalitions — or might call early elections.

Chávez Ends Busy Week Aiding Venezuela's Latin Neighbors (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, February 24, 2007

CARACAS, Venezuela, Feb. 23 — President Hugo Chávez met here on Friday with President Daniel Ortega of Nicaragua to discuss an array of Venezuelan assistance programs, capping an unusually frenetic week for this country's efforts to enhance its political and economic influence in parts of Latin America.

DOJ_NMG_0137075

At the heart of many of the agreements reached this week — with Nicaragua, Ecuador and Argentina — is Venezuela's use of its windfall from historically high oil prices, and sometimes its own reserves and exports of oil, to lift its regional profile.

Mr. Chávez is using Venezuela's oil revenues, valued at more than $50 billion a year, to counter the influence of the United States and multilateral lending organizations like the International Monetary Fund.

The Venezuelan aid for Nicaragua has been a godsend for Mr. Ortega, the former Sandinista guerrilla leader who was elected president last year. Venezuela has already agreed to forgive more than $30 million in Nicaraguan debt, provide more than two dozen generating plants to alleviate an electricity shortage and open an office of Venezuela's development bank in Managua to offer low-interest loans to small businesses.

Venezuela is also considering building an oil refinery in Nicaragua and a pipeline across that country from the Caribbean to the Pacific to transport Venezuelan crude oil to refineries in China and Japan, part of an effort to move away from exporting oil to the United States.

"Nicaragua can forget about fuel problems," Mr. Chávez said during a recent visit to Managua.

The talks with Nicaragua were preceded in recent days by an offer from Venezuela of $500 million in financial assistance to Ecuador, where the administration of President Rafael Correa has been considering efforts to restructure part of its foreign debt.

On Friday, Rafael Ramírez, Venezuela's energy minister, was in Ecuador for the arrival of a Venezuelan tanker carrying 220,000 barrels of diesel fuel, part of a fuel swapping deal aimed at saving Ecuador millions of dollars in foreign exchange.

This week, Mr. Chávez's government said it would provide $135 million in financing for an Argentine dairy cooperative. Venezuela and Argentina also said they would create a regional development bank and carry out a joint $1.5 billion bond issue.

The bonds are intended to offer Argentina an alternative to the monetary fund and to give investors in Venezuela a way of acquiring dollar-denominated securities at a time when hard currency is increasingly sought after here.

Elsewhere, Venezuela has revealed how it deals with countries with governments that speak critically of Mr. Chávez. Venezuela shut an aluminum plant in Costa Rica with 400 employees last week after Óscar Arias, Costa Rica's president, criticized Mr. Chávez's recently acquired power to govern by decree.

Is Citgo Program For Poor, Or For Chávez? (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum, Steven Mufson

The Washington Post, February 24, 2007

Citgo, the Venezuela-owned oil company, is running television commercials across the United States promoting the discounted heating oil it provides to low-income people -- but some are wondering whether the ads are really promoting the South American country's leader.

The company said the ads, some of which feature former Massachusetts congressman Joseph P. Kennedy II, are designed to persuade families to sign up for the charitable program. Critics of Venezuela, however, see both political and economic motives -- primarily to enhance the image of the country's leftist leader, Hugo Chávez, and thereby improve the company's standing with U.S. consumers.

A new wave of ads shows Americans expressing gratitude for the program.

Citgo said it is giving a 40 percent discount on 100 million gallons of heating oil to up to 1.2 million Americans this winter. Last winter, U.S. households that used heating oil consumed an average of 585 gallons, according to Department of Energy figures.

Citgo spokesman Fernando Garay said the program was part of Citgo's "very strong tradition of giving back to the community." The current effort was particularly motivated, he said, by the recent spate of hurricanes and other weather-related disasters in the United States, which have boosted oil prices.

"It's a good thing to provide concessionary oil to the people in the United States," said Bernard Aronson, former assistant secretary of state for inter-American affairs. "But if the price of that is to rationalize the loss of political liberty for the people in Venezuela, that's not a fair price and it's a betrayal of the people of Venezuela."

An unusual aspect of the program is its widely seen commercials. Garay declined to say how much the company was spending on the ads, but said they are running in 16 markets around the nation where the heating oil is being distributed, including the Washington area. The ads started in mid-November and will continue until mid-March, he said.

Some observers, while praising the program's generosity, believe that more is involved than good deeds. Chávez, who recently won reelection and then said he intends to exert state control over strategic industries, has allied himself with such U.S. enemies as Iran and Cuba. He also has been outspoken in his opposition to the Bush administration's foreign policy.

"It's naive to think that there's not a political motive behind the ads by the Chávez government," said Michael E. Shifter, vice president for policy at the Inter-American Dialogue, a policy forum on Latin America and U.S. relations. "Chávez wants to be seen as the good guy and also to needle and embarrass the Bush administration that the richest country in the world can't take care of its own people."

DOJ_NMG_0137076

Otto Reich, a former U.S. special envoy to the Western Hemisphere, said he believes the company hopes to benefit as well: "Citgo is probably concerned that the Chávez image will affect its image."

In a telephone interview in November, Kennedy, who heads Citizens Energy, a nonprofit group that helps poor people grapple with higher energy costs, said that in 27 years of providing heating oil assistance, he had never received a price break from an OPEC country or major oil company.

"I have tried and written every single member of OPEC and every single major oil company and asked for a little bit of a price break," Kennedy said. "Shouldn't we be encouraging people to be doing this sort of thing? Isn't this the sort of compassionate conservative movement we thought would be taking over the world at this point?"

Kennedy added that there was an element of good business sense about Venezuela's assistance.

"It's not only morally righteous, it's good business," he said, "when you're selling the world's largest market a gigantic percentage of your overall sales in crude oil, to take a little percentage and show that . . . you have concerns about how low-income people are going to keep up with the enormous price of keeping warm."

Tsangfroid (WSJ)

By Mary Kissel

The Wall Street Journal, February 24, 2007

HONG KONG -- Remember June 30, 1997? That afternoon, the city's last colonial governor, Chris Patten, blinked back tears as the British flag was lowered from its flagpole at Government House. At 8:00 that night, red fireworks exploded over Victoria Harbor while Hong Kong's good and great sat down to dine in a grand hall; China's Jiang Zemin arrived later, glowing as Asia's "world city" was returned to its mainland mother. After the stroke of midnight, a 500-strong People's Liberation Army contingent marched over the border, soon followed by 4,000 more -- a brutish touch, a hint of things to come? No one knew.

Nearly 10 years later, Donald Tsang, the current chief executive, knows. He's part of a grand juggling act, protecting Hong Kong's cherished freedoms while integrating the place -- carefully, it's hard work, doing the best that we can, he'll tell you -- into the mainland's booming economy. Nowhere is this more evident than from Mr. Tsang's campaign office, from which the chief executive is steering another bid for high office next month.

Tucked on an upper floor of one of Hong Kong's soaring office towers, the entrance to Mr. Tsang's nerve center boasts no campaign photographs of the bow-tied, impeccably attired Cantonese civil servant; the walls are bare, and not a single policy leaflet graces the shelves. Granted, the office had been opened only two weeks prior to our interview. But the sterility of what should be a raucous debate in a democracy only reinforces the reality: Mr. Tsang is "running" for "re-election" in a rigged campaign where Beijing still picks the winner.

"Here's my card," he says, entering the windowless conference room where I and my colleague from New York, Melanie Kirkpatrick, are seated. A tidy little number, the specially printed campaign business card ("Donald Tsang, Candidate") boasts contact details in English and Chinese, plus a cursive slogan that seems scrawled as an afterthought: "I'll Get the Job Done!" "It will be a collector's item someday," Mr. Tsang jokes, settling into his chair.

The slogan is apt. Mr. Tsang has spent nearly 40 years in the civil service preparing to bridge East and West. Knighted in 1997 (he no longer uses the "Sir"), he was appointed by Beijing in 2005 to serve out the term of the former chief executive, Tung Chee Hwa, whom Beijing's Party elders encouraged to resign when the Hong Kong people marched through the streets for full democracy. Hong Kong can do what it likes, the thinking goes, so long as it doesn't make a fuss. China's leadership has far more pressing problems to worry about -- rioting peasants in the countryside, corruption permeating its ranks, a nuclear North Korea -- than the humming, affluent dot on its southeastern flank.

Mr. Tsang, a former financial secretary, has focused his energies on the economy. And that's a good place, we agree, to start our discussion, given that Hong Kong just rolled up the No. 1 slot -- for the 13th year running -- in the Heritage Foundation/Wall Street Journal's "Index of Economic Freedom." So how has Hong Kong influenced -- maybe even led -- the mainland down the capitalist road since 1997?

Hands clasped, Mr. Tsang thinks for a moment on these "serious and deep" questions. "Opening up is the answer, following the road map charted out by Deng Xiaoping," Mr. Tsang says. "So in the context of Hong Kong, it will be wrong to assume that this little tail is wagging the big dog. It is not." But Hong Kong, he explains, is the most effective "broker, the bridge, the gateway for the nation as a whole."

Surely last year proved his point. For the first time, the flood of mainland Chinese companies selling stock on Hong Kong's stock exchange pushed volumes above those of New York and London. Hedge funds poured into the city, eager to base themselves in a place with civil law (in more ways than one, when compared to the mainland's corrupted bench) and an English-speaking labor force.

DOJ_NMG_0137077

Most important, Hong Kong cemented its place as a testing ground for China's capital account liberalization. The mainland's domestic currency, the renminbi, circulates in a limited way in Hong Kong. Shops accept it; Hong Kongers can open savings accounts in it; and mainland companies can issue renminbi-denominated bonds in the territory.

"All this is taking place! It's the only place outside the mainland of China where these activities are allowed!" the chief executive emphasizes, in a rare moment of emotion. "Right here!" In Hong Kong today, "you see how renminbi, on a limited scale, can move in the free-market environment of Hong Kong."

The chief executive dreams of the day when the floodgates will open up and the cash gushes out of China into Hong Kong's banks, mutual funds and businesses. "This will come, this will come," he affirms.

All this adds to up to a vision for Hong Kong as a nexus for capital not unlike that of London for Europe, or New York for the Americas -- a city in the South China Sea devoted to servicing China's rising middle classes. "We need three [financial centers] . . . because most of us agree that we have to work eight hours a day!" Mr. Tsang quips.

That plan is already being echoed by China's rubber-stamp legislature, the National People's Congress, which included Hong Kong in its five-year plan for the first time last year. Mr. Tsang recites the text verbatim: the leadership, he says, sees Hong Kong as "a center for international finance, trade and shipping/aviation" (the Chinese-language characters for shipping and aviation are, conveniently, the same).

Mr. Tsang's eagerness to bet Hong Kong's future on the mainland is genuine: He is undoubtedly a Chinese patriot. But why should this capitalist city scramble to join the Communist Party's five-year industrial plan? Other actions, too, hint that the Hong Kong government is starting to stray from the free-market policies that made it so rich.

Last year, Mr. Tsang's administration proposed a new consumption tax, started debating a minimum wage, and embarked on rhetoric of leveling societal "inequalities." The chief executive himself publicly disavowed the policy of "positive noninterventionism," the term coined by one of Hong Kong's financial secretaries to describe the territory's famously laissez-faire approach -- an action for which this newspaper, and the late economics Nobel Laureate Milton Friedman -- chastised him.

"You were wrong," Mr. Tsang replied, staring me right in the eye. "It's a slogan." Hong Kong still has the freest economy by a mile -- its public sector takes up 18% of total GDP; total public spending isn't allowed to exceed 20% of GDP. Even if the government tried to impose European-like safety nets on the public, the rise in taxes would never be tolerated; the 5% consumption tax proposal was met with a public outcry.

"We want small government and a big market," Mr. Tsang explains. "We facilitate what the market does." And what does facilitate mean, exactly? "When, for instance, people believe, Mary [emphasis on my name], the mainland should be the next target of action . . . I will lead a delegation into the mainland, making sure that any . . . trade barriers could be removed for them . . . I go in there and try to do things for them."

Why, I wonder, is the same zeal for sealing business deals not applied to the Hong Kong people's wish for universal suffrage? In 2003 and 2004, over a half million of them marched for the full democracy promised to them by the mini-constitution, called the Basic Law, that Mr. Patton and the British left behind. The current setup is far from perfect; it includes a twisted system for electing the legislative branch and the chief executive that effectively gives Beijing veto power over the latter. But regardless of the silent overlord, this year a challenger to Mr. Tsang managed to garner enough official nominations to stand for chief executive -- an event that has given an electric charge to the democracy movement.

How does it feel to have a challenger? "It's allowed for in our electoral arrangements," Mr. Tsang answers dryly. "And it's giving our people a little more fun, a little more fireworks. But it doesn't mean that even if I were the only candidate running that I would not be providing a manifesto." The chief executive is a list man, focused on process; he dismisses opposition candidate Alan Leong as a "single issue man" who "just says universal suffrage, universal suffrage, universal suffrage."

Mr. Tsang seems perplexed by such a stance, noting that his city already enjoys freedoms other democracies have, such as freedom of assembly, freedom of religion, and freedom of the press. "In Hong Kong, we've got all those things." Mr. Tsang declares. "We want democracy for the sake of political participation. So, as a purist form, we should consider it carefully . . . but it must not be achieved at the expense of what they already got."

Why would universal suffrage threaten freedoms? Wouldn't a degree of public accountability impel the chief executive to follow the "will of the people" (a favorite phrase) more closely?

Mr. Tsang answers immediately: Beijing "supports [democracy] as a principal enshrined in the constitution, but I think they want to be sure they're not doing it at the expense of stability and prosperity." Read: Authoritarian regimes are afraid of placing control in the hands of the people. They could publicly protest, or elect an independently minded chief executive, or -- as Mr. Tsang notes -- they could declare independence, as in the case of Taiwan.

DOJ_NMG_0137078

Mr. Tsang has now spent almost a decade working under the Chinese flag, versus 30 under the Union Jack. How is it different? Surprisingly, interactions with the mother ship are "less than before," he confides. "No faxes, no telegrams." He may consult closely on political reform with the local representative office of the central government, but for now, Mr. Tsang's administration operates the territory's economy independently from that of the mainland -- so there's less reason to call for advice.

"The style of operation is very different," Mr. Tsang says. "We are dealing with people in the same nation, but it requires a perquisite of mutual trust and faith. But once we have built up a sense of trust, between ourselves and the mainland, it seems that you can achieve quite a lot -- a lot more than before."

Within limits, that is. As we wait for the elevator next to those empty shelves where election campaign pamphlets might sit, the limits of Mr. Tsang's ability to "get the job done" seem clear.

Ms. Kissel is editorial page editor of The Wall Street Journal Asia.

DOJ_NMG_0137079

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Tuesday, February 27, 2007 8:13 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Tuesday, February 27, 2007
Attachments:	dojclips070227.pdf; dojclips070227.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Prison Doc: Terror Suspect OK For Trial (AP)....4
Psychologist Says Padilla Is Fit To Stand Trial (NYT/AP)....5
Terror Allegations Detailed At Detention Hearing (CHIT)....5
Judge Rejects New Trial For Albany Mosque Leaders (AP)....6
UK Muslim Cleric Loses Deportation Appeal (FT)....7
British Court Affirms Order To Deport Cleric To Jordan (NYT)....7
Cleric Faces Deportation To Jordan (WP)....8
Canada's Move To Restore Rights (NYT)....9

Homeland Response:

Biological And Chemical Safety Nets (WSJ)....10
EDITORIAL Drop The 'L.A. 8' Case (LAT)....12
Hundreds Scramble To Beat Deadline For Filing Katrina Claim (AP)....12

War News:

Cheney Unhurt In Blast Outside Afghan Base (CNN/AP)....13
Blast Occurs While Cheney Visits (LAT)....14
Cheney Warns Pakistan To Act Against Terrorists (NYT)....15
Insurgent Activity Spurs Cheney Trip To Pakistan (WP)....16
Cheney Pressures Musharraf On Taliban (FT)....18
Cheney Visit Turns Up Heat On Pakistan (LAT)....18
Cheney Urges Pakistan To Help Fight Terrorism (USAT)....20
Cheney Presses Musharraf Over Border Control (WT/AP)....20
Pakistan Lobbies Against Sanctions As The Senate Takes Up 9/11 Bill (HILL)....21
Britain To Send 1,400 Troops To Afghanistan (FT)....23
Democrats Back Away From Iraq Plan (AP)....23
Reid Looks For Edge On Iraq (RC)....25
Dems' Iraq Quagmire (HILL)....26
Democrats Battle Over Policy On Iraq (WSJ)....26
Majority In Poll Favor Deadline For Iraq Pullout (WP)....28
A Democrat On Everything But Iraq (POL)....29
Rep. Marshall's Iraq Vote Could Help Inoculate Him For 2008 House Race (HILL)....31
Gen. Pace: Military Capability Eroding (AP)....31
Bomb Inside Iraqi Ministry Kills 5 (LAT)....32
Iraqi Vice President Injured In Blast At Government Office (USAT/AP)....33
Bombing At Iraqi Ministry Wounds 2 Top Officials (NYT)....33
Insurgents Aim For Wider-scale Attacks (USAT)....35
US Task: Fight To End Four Wars In Iraq (CSM)....35
Oil Plan Includes More Production, Sharing (LAT)....37
Iraq's Cabinet Backs Contentious Oil Measure (WP)....38
Iraq Cabinet Backs Oil Proposal (WSJ)....39
Iraqis Reach An Accord On Oil Revenues (NYT)....40
Iraq Approves Draft Oil Legislation (FT)....42
With Iraqi Boy's Surgery, A Time For Healing (WP)....42
Billions Over Baghdad (NYT)....43
"Allies" (WSJ)....45

DOJ:

Sen. Feinstein Seizes On DoJ Documents (HILL)....46
U.S. Attorneys Should Be Confirmed (SCRIPPS)....46
Congress Wary Of Justice Department Firings (PBS)....47
Ashcroft Pizza Party Raises Ethics Eyebrows (USNEWS)....50

Corporate Scandals:

Judge Dismisses Suit Over Transfer Agent (WSJ)....51
S.E.C. Says Firm Traded On Information Stolen From Computers (NYT)....51
Review Clears Bristol-Myers (NYT)....52

Criminal Law:

Deliberations In Libby Trial Proceed With Only 11 Jurors (USAT)....52
No Verdict Yet From Remaining Libby Jury (AP)....53
Libby Juror Dismissed; Panel Of 11 Continues Deliberations (LAT)....54
Juror Dismissed At CIA Leak Trial (CBS)....54

Judge Dismisses Juror In Libby Trial (NYT) 55
Judge Dismisses Libby Juror After Reports Of Media Exposure (WSJ) 56
Juror Is Dismissed From Libby Trial (WP) 57
Ex-Ney Aide Pleads Guilty To Conspiracy (AP) 58
Ney's Former Chief Of Staff Agrees To Plead Guilty (HILL) ... 59
Former Aide To Ex-Congressman Ney Pleads Guilty In Abramoff Case (WP) 60
How High-Living Founder Of BetonSports Fell, Fled (WSJ) ... 61
Prosecutors Ask For 5 Year Max For Professor Cuba Spying Case (AP) 62
Feds Push For Maximum Sentence In Cuba Spy Case (WFOR) 63
U.S.: Couple Shared Vital Data With Cuba (MIH) 64
Many Knew Of FBI Probe (MIH) 65
Arrests Of Hollywood Officers Jeopardize 61 Criminal Cases They Handled (FLSUNSEN) 67
'Waltz' Sting's Newton Leaves Halfway House (KNOXNS/AP) 68
SoCal Woman Pleads Guilty To Leading $12M Fraud Scheme (MERCN) 68
Technology Aids Credit-card Crooks (MINNST) 68
Justices Take Up Police Use Of Lethal Force (NYT) 70
Court Ponders Police Chase Liability (LAT) 71
Justices Weigh Police Chase Video (WP) 72
High Court Case Could Change Car-chase Rules (USAT) 73
Chase Video Steals Show As High Court Hears Case On Police Force (LAW) 74
Court Turns Away Appeal By Mohawk Industries (WSJ) 75
Justices Decline Case On 200-Year Sentence For Man Who Possessed Child Pornography (NYT) 76
Supreme Court Declines Polygamy Case (CSM) 78
Local Law Enforcement Says Crime Fighting Here Needs Federal Money (SEATIMES) 79
Ex-CIA Official Urges Silence After Spy 'Sting' (WT) 80
More Counterfeit Money Changed Hands In '06 (USAT) 81

Civil Law:

Probe Sought Of Collins & Aikman Fees (AP) 82
Court To Hear NYC Case On Special Ed School Reimbursement (AP) 82
High Court To Hear Case For Autistic Boy (AP) 83

Civil Rights:

Center Helps FBI With List Of Potential Victims Of Racial Violence (AP) 84
Cincinnati Landlord Accused Of Harassing Female Tenants (AP) 85
Boca Zoning Ordinance For Sober Houses Is Discriminatory, Judge Rules (FLSUNSEN) 85
Judge: Law Discriminates Against Disabled (AP) 86
NY Village Wants To Keep Voting System, Let Hispanic Power Evolve (AP) 86
Task Force Report A `step Forward' In Fighting Human Trafficking (AP) 87
In Brief (WSJ) 88
Supreme Court To Review 'Top Two' Primary System (WP/AP) 88
Security Study Urges Changes At Iowa Prison (DMR) 89
EDITORIAL Redraw Congressional Districts (LAT) 90

Antitrust:

Regulatory Clearance Seen As Slow But Sure (NYT) 90
In TXU Deal, Texas Regulator Has Few Levers To Pull (WSJ) 92
TXU Sets Out Benefits Of $45bn Buy-out (FT) 93
Private Equity Buyout Of TXU Is Enormous In Size And In Its Complexity (NYT) 94
The New Greenmail (WSJ) 95
Proposed Satellite Radio Merger Could Set Off Sparks At Hearing (PLTCO) 96
XM's Losses Narrowed In 4th Quarter (WP) 97
XM Cuts Its Loss To $263m For Quarter (FT) 98
Editorial: A Monopoly -- Not (SFC) 98
CME, CBOT Shareholders To Vote On $8B Deal On April 4 (AP) 99
Regulators OK GE Purchase Of Abbott Unit (AP) 99
Caremark Rx Downgraded Amid Bidding War (MRKTWTCH) 100
Linux Camp Rages Over Novell Pact (BOS) 100
Feds OK Coke's Purchase Of Fuze Beverage (AJC) 102
Insurers Prepare A Battle Strategy To Protect A Key Exemption (column) (WP) 102
EU Takeover Law In Tatters (FT) 104

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Western States Agree To Cut Greenhouse Gases (WP) 104
Carbon Curbs Gain Backers (WSJ) 105
Wall Street Adds Climate Change To Bottom Line (CSM) 107
Global Warming A Hot Spot For Investors (USAT) 108
Wildlife Refuges Lack Means To Survive (LAT) 111
Honeybees Vanish, Leaving Crops And Keepers In Peril (NYT) 113
Show On The Road (WSJ) 115
Tribes Get Funds To Help In Meth (BG) 116

DOJ_NMG_0137082

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI Unsure If Missing Notebook PCs Contain Sensitive Data (GCN) 118
News Area Man Sentenced For Role In Meth Conspiracy (DRR)....118
Maine Coast Guard Crew Seizes $14 Million In Drugs During Caribbean Patrol (AP)....119
Local Coast Guard Cutter Tahoma Seizes Drugs In Carribean (FDD)....119
Fehr Says Union Will Advise Players On Mitchell Probe If Asked (AP)....120
Ore. Medical Marijuana Users Ask Lawmakers To Protect Jobs (AP)....120
Democrats Spar Over Medical Pot For Workers (OREG) 121
Hillman To Be Hired As Marshal (BOS)....122

Immigration:

Texas Could Pull The Welcome Mat (LAT)....122
TEST CASE Immigration Crackdown Targets Bosses This Time (WSJ)....124
Growing Demand For English Lessons Outstrips Supply (NYT)....126
Cashing In On Immigrants (USAT)....129
Game With No Winner (NYT)....130
Minuteman Founder Wants Reins Back (LAT)....130
Semi-Truths (WSJ)....131

Tax:

Orem Man Sentenced In Federal Tax Fraud Case (AP)....131
Appraisers' Valuations For Tax Filings Come Under Microscope With New Law (WSJ)....132
'Living Souls' Admit To Tax Evasion In Plea Deal (KNOXNS)132
IRS To The Rescue (WSJ)....133

Congress-Administration:

Bush Urges Governors To Back Tax Reforms (AP)....134
Child Health Care Splits White House And States (NYT)....135
Governors, Critical Of Bush, Seeking More Help From Congress For Children's Health Care (USAT/AP)....136
Bush Seeks Governors' Support For Health Plan (USAT)....137
Bush Vows To Fight Democrats On War Funds (WT)....138
O'Malley: Governors' Concerns Not Addressed (BSUN)....139
Analysis: Health Reform Unites, Divides (UPI)....140
Bush Launches Fundraising Campaign (AP)....141
Lawmakers To Scrutinize Walter Reed (HILL)....141
A Firsthand Report On The Wounds Of War (WP)....142
'I'm Lucky,' ABC's Bob Woodruff Says (USAT)....144
One Man's Survival Story Becomes A Rallying Cry (NYT)....145
Vietnam Pilot Honored After Deferring To Wingman (USAT)146
Honor For Vietnam War Pilot (NYT/AP)....146
Business And Labor Square Off On Bills (HILL)....147
Labor Votes To Intrude On War, 9/11 Debates (RC)....148
A Shield Against Corporate Bullying (WP)....149
An Assault On Corporate Speech (WP)....150
Budget Strain (WSJ)....151
Fight Over Fiscal Discipline Begins With Bush's Budget (RC)153
Women's Health Office Funds Cut (WP)....154
GSA Chief Seeks Probe Of Inspector General's Office (GOVEXEC)....155
Pelosi Falls Short On Election Promises (POL)....156
For Hoyer, A Life Of Quiet Victories, Redefined Purpose (WP)157
Accusations Of Agency Error In Disaster Loans (NYT)....160
Hearing Urged On Guard Woes (WT)....161
Honoring The Stars Of Government (WP)....162

Other News:

No Worries: Banks Keeping Less Money In Reserve (WSJ) .163
Greenspan, Even Out Of Fed, Still Steals The Stock Show (WSJ)....165
Gasoline Prices Continue Climbing (USAT)....166
A Lawyer's Speech Opens A New Venue In Ongoing Battle (WSJ)....167
Judge Rejects Cap On Awards In Ferry Crash (NYT)....169
Schwarzenegger Urges End To Divisiveness In Washington (MCT)....170
Arnold Pushes 'Centrist' Immigration Approach (WT)....170
Democrats May Try To Curb 527s (HILL)....171
States Work On Proposals To Make Voting Easier (USAT)..173
McCain Firm On Iraq War Despite Cost To Candidacy (USAT)....174
McCain Strategy Courts Middle (WT)....176
Warner Endorses Possible McCain '08 Bid (AP)....178
Giuliani Keys On The Economy And Taxes (AP)....179
Rudy Defends Foreign Policy Capacity (NSDY)....180
Giuliani's Mouth Is Running, But His Meter Isn't (WP)....181
Some Fans Clamor For Gore Sequel, But He Says No (USAT)....182
Gore's Oscar Fuels Call For Late Run (POL)....183
Oscars Add Lustre To Idea Of Gore Candidacy (FT)....185
Oscar Victory May Prove Inconvenient For Gore (WT)....186
Gore Shut The Door On '08. What If Someone Opens A Window? (RC)....187
An Oscar For His Second Act (WP)....188
Gore To Bring Eco-friendly Message To UMBC (BSUN)....189

DOJ_NMG_0137083

Clintons' Charity Not Listed On Senate Disclosure Forms (WP) 189
A Bundle Of Good Moves (WP) 191
Obama And The Illinois Political Machine (AP) 192
They Rush For California's Gold (LAT) 193
Liberal Lobbying Groups Target 'Power Corridor' (WT) 195
Court Upholds Calif. Stem Cell Agency (USAT) 196
School Lawsuit Gets Green Light (KCS) 197
States Consider Tobacco Tax Hikes (USAT) 198
GOP Firm Bucks Lobbying Trend (POL) 198
Halliburton Moves To Cast Off Rest Of KBR, Become Pure Play (WSJ) 200
Halliburton To Complete Split With KBR (NYT) 200
Philanthropy Hits Record As Number Of $100 Million Donations Increase (USAT) 201
Backing Abortion Rights While Keeping The Faith (NYT) 201
Senior Slump (WP) 203
A Bad Report Card (NYT) 203
U.S. Displays Bomb Parts Said To Be Made In Iran (NYT) ..204
U.S. Find Stokes Fears Of Iraqis' Bomb-Making Ability (WSJ)205
Army Officers Say Iran Made Bomb Components (LAT) 206
Diplomats To Begin Drafting New U.N. Sanctions On Iran (NYT) 207
Major Powers Work On Iran Resolution (AP) 208
Diplomats Seek Way To 'Reengage' Iran (WP) 209
UN Action On Iran 'Still Has Time To Work' (FT) 209
US Presses For More Sanctions On Iran (FT) 210
Iran's Pursuit Of Nuclear Power Raises Alarms (CSM) 211
Iran Demonized By U.S. And U.N. (WSJ) 213
Iranian Leader's Rhetoric Criticized (WT/AP) 213
Iranian Scholars Denounce Conference That Denied Holocaust (NYT) 214
Persian Shrug (WSJ) 215
Germany's Iran Trade (WSJ) 216
Palestinian Killed In Israeli Sweep Of West Bank City (NYT)216
3 French Sightseers Killed Near Saudi Holy City (NYT) 217
French Nationals Killed On Saudi Tour (FT) 218
Millions In Aid Linked To Yemeni Reform (CSM) 219
Court Declares Bosnia Killings Were Genocide (NYT) 220
U.N. Court Clears Serbia Of Genocide (WP/AP) 221
Grim Mystery Unfolds In Central America (LAT) 222
Negroponte Expected To Make Mark In China (AP) 224
Broadcast Media In China Put On Notice (WP) 224
Chinese County Reins In Birth-rate – Without A One-child Limit (CSM) 225
U.S. Sends Warship Against Sea Pirates (WT) 227
A Land Of Camel Milk And Honey (NYT) 228
The Gall To Speak Her Mind (WP) 229
When It Comes To Gay Rights, Is Cuba Inching Ahead Of USA? (USAT) 230

Online Version
Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Prison Doc: Terror Suspect OK For Trial (AP)

By Curt Anderson
AP, February 27, 2007

MIAMI -- Alleged al-Qaida operative Jose Padilla has mild anxiety and personality disorders but is mentally able to stand trial, a prison psychologist said Monday in testimony that contradicted two defense experts.

Rodolfo Buigas, the supervisory forensic psychologist at the federal detention center in downtown Miami, rejected the defense experts' diagnosis that Padilla cannot help with his defense because he suffers from post-traumatic stress disorder. Buigas said Padilla's anxiety and anti-social personality are minor problems.

"The nature and severity of the symptoms were not sufficient to interfere with some basic capabilities," Buigas told federal Judge Marcia Cooke, who must decide Padilla's mental fitness.

The question is crucial in determining whether Padilla, 36, and two co-defendants will stand trial in April on charges of being part of a North American terror support cell that provided finances, recruits and supplies to Islamic extremists around the world. All three face up to life in prison if convicted.

DOJ_NMG_0137084

Padilla, a U.S. citizen and former gang member, has been held in isolation during his 3 1/2 years in military confinement. He was arrested in May 2002 at Chicago's O'Hare International Airport. Officials initially claimed he was on a mission to detonate a radioactive "dirty bomb" in a major U.S. city, but the dirty-bomb allegations are not part of the Miami case.

Padilla was designated an "enemy combatant" and imprisoned by the military without criminal charges.

Padilla has claimed in court filings that he was tortured at the Navy brig in Charleston, S.C., which officials have denied. Cooke ordered officials from the brig to appear at the hearing Monday.

Buigas testified that the affidavit Padilla signed alleging mistreatment at the brig was evidence of his mental competence.

One of Padilla's lawyers, Andrew Patel, testified that he has never been able to get meaningful information from his client. Patel also said that Padilla seems to think his lawyers are part of a government plot against him.

"He has expounded the belief that we are part of the continuing interrogation," Patel said.

Psychologist Says Padilla Is Fit To Stand Trial (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, February 27, 2007

MIAMI, Feb. 26 (AP) — Jose Padilla, who is accused of being an operative for Al Qaeda, has mild anxiety and personality disorders but is mentally able to stand trial, a prison psychologist said Monday in testimony that contradicted two defense experts.

The psychologist, Rodolfo Buigas of the Federal Detention Center in downtown Miami, rejected the defense experts' diagnosis that Mr. Padilla could not help with his defense because he had post-traumatic stress disorder. Dr. Buigas said Mr. Padilla's anxiety and antisocial personality were minor problems.

"The nature and severity of the symptoms were not sufficient to interfere with some basic capabilities," Dr. Buigas told Judge Marcia G. Cooke of Federal District Court, who is to decide Mr. Padilla's mental fitness.

The question is crucial in determining if Mr. Padilla, 36, and two co-defendants will stand trial in April on charges of being part of a North American terrorism support cell that provided finances, recruits and supplies to Islamic extremists around the world. All three face up to life in prison if convicted.

Mr. Padilla, an American citizen, has been held in isolation during his three-and-a-half years in military confinement. He was arrested in May 2002 at O'Hare International Airport in Chicago. Officials initially said he was on a mission to detonate a radioactive "dirty bomb" in a major American city, but those accusations are not part of the Miami case.

Mr. Padilla was designated an enemy combatant and imprisoned by the military without criminal charges.

He has said in court filings that he was tortured at the Navy brig in Charleston, S.C., which officials have denied. Defense lawyers had planned to question brig officials on Tuesday, but Judge Cooke will not allow it. She said she wanted to limit the inquiry to Mr. Padilla's "present state of mind."

Dr. Buigas testified that the affidavit Mr. Padilla signed alleging mistreatment at the brig was evidence of his mental competence.

One of Mr. Padilla's lawyers, Andrew Patel, testified that he had not been able to get meaningful information from his client. Mr. Patel also said Mr. Padilla seemed to think his lawyers were part of a government plot against him.

"He has expounded the belief that we are part of the continuing interrogation," Mr. Patel said.

Terror Allegations Detailed At Detention Hearing (CHIT)

By Jeff Coen

Chicago Tribune, February 27, 2007

Two Chicago-area cousins linked last week to a terrorism conspiracy traveled to Egypt in 2004 and planned to head to Pakistan for military training, federal prosecutors told a judge Monday.

Zubair A. Ahmed, 27, and Khaleel Ahmed, 26, were seeking "training in jihad," prosecutors said during a detention hearing on whether Khaleel Ahmed should be kept in custody as he is transferred to Ohio to face the charges.

The trip was not a vacation as the Ahmeds have maintained, Assistant U.S. Atty. Vickie Peters said.

"It was intended as the first stop of a trip that would land him on the battlefield of Iraq fighting U.S. servicemen," Peters told U.S. Magistrate Judge Geraldine Soat Brown.

DOJ_NMG_0137085

The cousins were indicted by an Ohio grand jury last week, charged with conspiracy to murder Americans outside the U.S., including troops in Iraq. A detention hearing for Zubair Ahmed, of North Chicago, was delayed until Monday.

The judge ruled that there was no way the defense could rebut the argument that Khaleel Ahmed is a danger to the community given the charges, and ordered him held. He is expected to be taken to Ohio to join several co-defendants in the case.

Three Toledo men—Mohammad Zaki Amawi, Marwan Othman El-Hindi, and Wassim Mazloum—were charged in the conspiracy last year and have pleaded not guilty.

Peters told the judge that Zubair Ahmed's father and El-Hindi were able to bring the cousins back from Egypt. El-Hindi believed they needed more training and allegedly was able to link the men to someone who could provide it.

He did not know that person—identified as "The Trainer" in the indictment—actually was working for the FBI. Peters said the Ahmeds traveled to Ohio, and Khaleel Ahmed allegedly was recorded saying he wanted weapons and sniper training.

Khaleel Ahmed's defense attorney, Brian Sieve, argued that his client is not a danger, is employed and has been living with his family. Ahmed has no criminal history and no drug use in his past, Sieve said.

The trip to Egypt allegedly took place more than two years ago, and the government was not eager to arrest him, he said. Instead the government is relying on the "emotional appeal of the charges" to detain Ahmed now, Sieve said.

"Mr. Khaleel Ahmed is barely mentioned in the indictment and certainly is not a key player in the conspiracy," he told the judge.

Judge Rejects New Trial For Albany Mosque Leaders (AP)

By Michael Virtanen, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 27, 2007

ALBANY, N.Y. -- A federal judge has refused to grant a new trial for two leaders of an Albany mosque convicted of conspiring to support terrorism through money laundering in what turned out to be an FBI sting.

In a 61-page ruling, U.S. District Judge Thomas McAvoy refused to throw out the Oct. 10 convictions of Yassin Aref, who was imam at the mosque, and Mohammed Hossain, a pizzeria owner who attended Masjid as-Salam. Both men are in jail awaiting sentencing March 8.

The nature of the transactions _ where an FBI informant gave Hossain cash and got checks in return, with Aref acting as notary _ "render hollow" defense arguments that it was a legitimate business loan, according to McAvoy.

"There was ample evidence from which the jury could have inferred that Hossain entered into the money laundering scheme with full awareness of its illegality and the need for secrecy to allow the scheme to continue," McAvoy wrote. The transactions spanned eight months. The trial lasted four weeks.

FBI tapes showed informant Shahed Hussain, a Pakistani emigre businessman, telling the Albany men a few times that he sometimes imported arms and ammunition and mentioning that a shoulder-fired missile would be used by Muslim extremists against a Pakistani diplomat in New York City.

McAvoy rejected defense arguments that the Albany men didn't know illicit arms money was involved in their transactions, that they clearly didn't support the Pakistani terrorist group Jaish e-Mohammed, or that the case involved entrapment.

Defense attorneys argued the transactions were innocent _ that since Islam prohibits charging or receiving interest, Muslims often loan money to each other, and clerics serve as witnesses. Both Aref and Hossain said they didn't believe any talk about a missile in New York.

The judge acknowledged that when the informant first mentioned JEM, Hossain replied that he thought it was a singing group. He also noted that taken in isolation, some of the pizzeria owner's secretly taped statements "seem to express a lawful and pacifist attitude," but in context they are open to an opposite interpretation.

McAvoy likewise acknowledged Aref disavowing support for JEM objectives, but concluded that shouldn't change the jury's verdict.

DOJ_NMG_0137086

"Whether Aref agreed with the goals of the CW (informant) or JEM is not the issue, but instead whether he knowingly or intentionally provided material support or resources to a group he knew was a foreign terrorist organization," McAvoy wrote. "The evidence was sufficient to support the jury's conclusion that he did."

Hossain, 52, a naturalized U.S. citizen from Bangladesh, was convicted Oct. 10 on all 27 charges against him, including three counts of conspiracy. The jury, which deliberated over four days, found Aref guilty of 10 of the 30 charges against him.

Aref, a 36-year-old Kurdish refugee from northern Iraq, was also found guilty of lying to FBI agents about having known a terrorist leader, Mullah Krekar, when Aref worked for a Kurdish political organization in Damascus, Syria.

An appeal to the 2nd Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals is expected.

Assistant U.S. Attorney William Pericak said both men face 30 years under federal sentencing guidelines. Defense attorneys Terence Kindlon and Kevin Luibrand proposed much shorter sentences for the family men of only a few years or even no prison time.

UK Muslim Cleric Loses Deportation Appeal (FT)

By Nikki Tait

Financial Times, February 27, 2007

Abu Qatada, the Islamic cleric who has been described as Osama bin Laden's "spiritual ambassador" in Europe, on Monday lost a legal battle against deportation from the UK to Jordan.

The Special Immigration Appeals Tribunal rejected his appeal. "We have concluded that there is no real risk of persecution of the appellant were he now to be returned with the safeguards and in the circumstances which now apply to him", it ruled

The Jordanian national's case had been seen as a test of the government's plan to deport alleged terror suspects even if it involves returning them to countries where human rights records are poor, by securing formal diplomatic agreements that their human rights will not be breached.

John Reid, Britain's home secretary, welcomed the SIAC decision. "We are also pleased that the court has recognized the value of memoranda of understanding," he added, referring to the rights protection pact.

"It is our firm belief that these agreements strike the right balance between allowing us to deport individuals who threaten the security of this country and safeguarding the rights of these individuals on their return," he added.

Abu Qatada has denied support for terrorist activities, and claimed that he would not face a fair trial if returned to Jordan, where he has already been convicted in his absence over a series of explosions in the 1990s.

Mr Qatada claimed asylum for himself, his wife and three children in 1993. He is one of a number of men made subject to anti-terror "control orders" - in effect, house arrest - by the British authorities after he was arrested and held in the Belmarsh high-security prison for two years without charge.

British Court Affirms Order To Deport Cleric To Jordan (NYT)

By Jane Perlez

The New York Times, February 27, 2007

LONDON, Feb. 26 — A British court ruled Monday that the government could deport a radical Islamic cleric to Jordan, setting the stage for the deportation of other foreign terrorism suspects in Britain to countries with poor human rights records.

The case of the cleric, Abu Qatada, which has been watched closely in Washington, is the first involving foreigners in Britain accused of posing threats to national security whom the government wants to deport rather than put on trial. Mr. Qatada, a Jordanian citizen of Palestinian background who has been living in Britain since 1994, has been convicted in absentia by a Jordanian court on bombing and conspiracy charges.

Mr. Qatada has been described by the British authorities as a spiritual guide to Al Qaeda. Tapes of his preaching encouraging violence against the West were found among the belongings of Mohamed Atta, the leader of the Sept. 11 hijackers, and he met with Richard C. Reid, the failed shoe bomber, the police say.

He is regarded as one of 10 foreign-born extremists who, the British government says, have helped to radicalize young British Muslims, encouraging them to carry out terrorism attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0137087

The ruling on Monday by the Special Immigration Appeals Court rejected an appeal by Mr. Qatada that argued that the cleric would be subjected to torture while in prison in Jordan.

Mr. Qatada's lawyers said they would appeal the decision. Human rights advocates criticized the ruling on the ground that it set a precedent for allowing suspects to be turned over to countries where torture is used to extract evidence.

A lawyer for Human Rights Watch, Julia Hall, said a memorandum of understanding between Britain and Jordan that torture would not be used on terrorism suspects returned to Jordan was an insufficient guarantee.

The British government has negotiated agreements that are intended to prevent the torture of suspects returned to their homeland with Lebanon and Libya as well as Jordan.

Ms. Hall said an August 2005 agreement between Britain and Jordan empowered a private Jordanian organization to monitor the conditions under which Mr. Qatada is held in prison once he returned to Jordan and to report on any abuses against him.

But Ms. Hall described the group assigned to monitor him, Al Adaleh Human Rights Center, as "a tiny organization, a local organization that has no influence with the government."

In documents presented to a parliamentary committee, the British government said it was working with the Adaleh center, established in 2003, to improve its "capacity."

Ms. Hall said the British government had "poured tens of thousands of pounds" to strengthen the fledgling group. But that investment would not overcome what Manfred Nowak, the United Nations special investigator on torture, found to be "institutional impunity" of the Jordanian intelligence services regarding torture, Ms. Hall said.

Mr. Nowak's report on torture in Jordan was issued by the United Nations in January.

The British government praised the court decision, saying it upheld a policy to deport foreign terrorism suspects after the subway and bus terror attacks in 2005 that killed 56 people, including 4 bombers.

"We welcome the decision of the Special Immigration Appeals Commission that Abu Qatada presents a threat to our national security and can be deported," said John Reid, the home secretary. "We are also pleased that the court has recognized the value of memoranda of understanding."

The court concluded its ruling, saying, "There is no real risk of persecution of the appellant were he now to be returned with the safeguards."

For the Bush administration, Mr. Qatada's deportation to Jordan would mean easier access to a prisoner with potentially valuable information.

The issue of torture to extract evidence from terrorism suspects returned to their home countries for interrogation became an issue last year when the Canadian government found that Maher Arar, a Canadian citizen, who was sent to Syria by American officials because of suspected links to Al Qaeda, was tortured while in a Syrian prison for 10 months.

Mr. Arar was cleared of all terrorism charges by a Canadian commission of inquiry last year. The commission found that even though a Canadian diplomat visited Mr. Arar during his imprisonment in Syria, Mr. Arar was too afraid of retribution from prison officials to discuss the torture against him.

Cleric Faces Deportation To Jordan (WP)

By Mary Jordan

The Washington Post, February 27, 2007

LONDON, Feb. 26 -- A British court ruled Monday that Abu Qatada, a radical Islamic cleric believed to have close links to al-Qaeda, faces no risk of abuse if sent to Jordan, opening the way for his deportation.

"We have concluded that there is no real risk of persecution," a special immigration court said, noting that Jordan had signed a memorandum affirming that Abu Qatada's human rights would be upheld.

The case of Abu Qatada, whose real name is Omar Mahmoud Mohammed Othman, had been closely watched by rights groups and terrorism analysts. Past attempts to deport terrorism suspects to countries accused of torture had been blocked on human rights grounds.

DOJ_NMG_0137088

The decision was lauded by British authorities, who have argued that radicals -- often fugitives from justice in their homelands -- have been using Britain as a base, knowing it would be difficult to deport them because of human rights laws.

The government had accused Abu Qatada of offering "spiritual advice and religious legitimacy" to extremists planning terrorist attacks. His taped sermons were found in the apartment in Hamburg used by several of the men involved in the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

Home Secretary John Reid welcomed the court decision.

"It is our firm belief that these agreements strike the right balance between allowing us to deport individuals who threaten the security of this country and safeguarding the rights of these individuals on their return," Reid said, referring to the memorandum signed by Jordan.

"This is a very significant decision," said M.J. Gohel of the Asia-Pacific Foundation, a London-based security research organization. He said radicals and fugitives here are "abusing the privileges" of the government, even living on government subsidies, while they "propagate hate."

Gohel said Abu Qatada's "legacy for European terrorism is profound and perhaps everlasting -- practically a Who's Who list of terrorism had a connection to him."

Abu Qatada has been convicted twice in absentia in Jordan and sentenced to life imprisonment for plotting to bomb Jewish and American sites. He is on the U.S. government list of terrorism suspects. British authorities said he had links to Richard C. Reid, the British citizen who tried to blow up an American jetliner in December 2001 with explosives hidden in his shoes, and Zacarias Moussaoui, who pleaded guilty to conspiring with the Sept. 11 attackers.

Abu Qatada was taken into custody in 2002 under emergency laws passed by the British government following the Sept. 11 attacks. British officials sought to deport him to Jordan, but because of laws that prohibit sending people to a country where they could face mistreatment or the death penalty, the government held Abu Qatada and 10 other men without charge.

The emergency anti-terrorism procedures led human rights activists to describe Belmarsh prison, where the men were detained, as "Britain's Guantanamo," a reference to the U.S. military detention facility in Cuba.

After spending 2 1/2 years in prison, Abu Qatada was freed but put under "control orders," a type of house arrest.

Abu Qatada, who has denied supporting terrorism, argues that he would not receive a fair trial in Jordan.

His attorney, Gareth Peirce, said she would appeal the ruling. She said there is no way to ensure that Jordan will uphold the agreement and "no sanction if it is breached."

Amnesty International issued a statement condemning the court decision, saying there is "ample evidence" that Abu Qatada now risks being subjected to repeated beatings, as well as "being burned with cigarettes, and being threatened with extreme violence including rape."

Canada's Move To Restore Rights (NYT)

The New York Times, February 27, 2007

The United States was not the only country to respond to the horror of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks with policies that went much too far in curtailing basic rights and civil liberties in the name of public safety. Now we see that a nation can regain its senses after calm reflection and begin to rein back such excesses, but that heartening news comes from Canada and not the United States.

Canada's Supreme Court has struck down a law that the government used to detain foreign-born terrorism suspects indefinitely — employing secret evidence and not filing charges — while orders to deport them were reviewed. The law was actually passed in 1978, but was primarily employed to detain and deport foreign spies. After the 2001 attacks, the Canadian government began using it aggressively to hold terrorism suspects, claiming that it was an important tool for keeping Canada safe.

That is just the sort of argument the Bush administration used to ram the excesses of the Patriot Act and the 2006 Military Commissions Act through Congress, and offered as an excuse for other abusive policies, like President Bush's illegal wiretapping of international calls and e-mail.

DOJ_NMG_0137089

The Canadian justices rejected their government's specious national security claim with a forceful 9-to-0 ruling that upheld every person's right to fair treatment. "The overarching principle of fundamental justice that applies here is this: before the state can detain people for significant periods of time, it must accord them a fair judicial process," Chief Justice Beverley McLachlin wrote.

The contrast with the United States could not be more disturbing. The Canadian court ruling came just days after a federal appeals court in Washington ruled that Congress could deny inmates of the Guantánamo Bay detention camp the ancient right to challenge their confinement in court. The 2006 military tribunals law revoked that right for a select group who had been designated "illegal enemy combatants" without a semblance of judicial process.

In late January, Canada created another unflattering contrast with United States policy when it offered a formal apology and financial compensation to Maher Arar, a Canadian citizen who was a victim of Mr. Bush's decision to approve open-ended detentions, summary deportations and even torture after 9/11. Mr. Arar was detained in the United States and deported to Syria, where he was held for nearly a year and tortured.

Instead of apologizing to Mr. Arar, who was cleared of any connection to terrorism by a Canadian investigatory panel, Justice Department lawyers are fighting a lawsuit he has brought in this country, using their usual flimsy claim of state secrets. The Bush administration still refuses to remove Mr. Arar from its terrorist watch list.

The United States Supreme Court has ruled twice in favor of Guantánamo detainees on statutory grounds, but it has yet to address the profound constitutional issues presented by American practices, including the abuses Congress authorized when it passed the Military Commissions Act. Such a showdown does not seem far off, but Congress also has a duty to revoke or rewrite the laws that have been abused in the name of national security, starting with the 2006 tribunals law.

Lawmakers have only to look to the Canadian court for easy-to-follow directions back to the high ground on basic human rights and civil liberties.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Biological And Chemical Safety Nets (WSJ)

By Lawrence M. Wein

The Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

As Congress revisits homeland security, now is a good time to assess the government's progress in preventing or mitigating another, more catastrophic attack -- 100,000 or more deaths -- from biological, chemical or nuclear threats. Setting aside genetically engineered agents which may take years for terrorists to master, most experts agree on the three most dangerous bioterror agents: smallpox, anthrax and botulinum toxin.

Smallpox is the only agent of the three that results in a contagious disease; thankfully a smallpox attack appears to be the least likely due to the difficulty of obtaining the virus. Here we can point to one of the biggest homeland security achievements: the stockpiling of enough smallpox vaccine for every American, and the plans that are in place for widespread mass vaccination in the event of an attack.

It is true that the response is likely to be delayed, because there are only 40,000 first responders vaccinated nationwide (in contrast to the original government goal of 500,000). And an uncontrolled smallpox epidemic would be disastrous. Nevertheless, widespread mass vaccination (e.g., one million people vaccinated per day per afflicted city), coupled with the difficulty of initially infecting large numbers of people (the virus does not survive long in the air) and the slow speed of disease spread (each generation of the disease is approximately two weeks), precludes a situation in which tens of thousands of U.S. citizens will die.

What about anthrax? Late last year the government cancelled a $877 million contract with VaxGen Inc. for developing and stockpiling a new generation of anthrax vaccine suitable for civilian use. Consequently, the number of deaths in a large-scale aerosol anthrax attack would depend largely on the response, or lack thereof, during the first several days. For anthrax, the single most important post-attack capability is rapid antibiotic distribution.

Unfortunately, this has been left to individual cities and states, whose capabilities vary widely. Based on a suggestion I made along with Edward Kaplan of Yale, Washington, D.C. will, in the event of a large attack, use postal workers to deliver antibiotics door-to-door to minimize the mayhem and the time required for distribution. The federal government should roll out this program nationwide.

DOJ_NMG_0137090

The third bioterror agent of grave concern is botulinum toxin, the deadliest substance known to humans. The obvious mode of attack is via the water or food supply; but fortunately, reservoirs are too large and their treatment systems too harsh to make it workable.

To their credit, after 9/11 the government and dairy industry intensified the heat pasteurization formula for milk -- the most obvious food target, because the toxin mixes well in liquids, and seven billion gallons of milk are consumed annually in the U.S. The inactivation efficacy of the new pasteurization formula is classified, however, so it is not clear whether this is sufficient to prevent a large number of casualties in the event. But a post-pasteurization attack would be inefficient for terrorists because milk is bottled soon after pasteurization.

That's the good news. The bad news is that the government has made no other perceptible move to prevent deliberate food contamination. Just as the 1990 Clean Air Act led to consequence analyses to estimate the number of casualties from an accident at chemical facilities, legislation is now required to estimate the number of casualties from a terrorist attack at food and beverage facilities. This undertaking would allow for an effective allocation of counterterrorism resources -- such as security upgrades, process changes (as in the dairy industry), and testing for botulinum toxin during food production -- targeted at the food facilities, and perhaps their upstream supply chains, that could generate a huge death toll if attacked.

Chemical security is not much farther along than food security. We do know which specific facilities -- the ones that store or produce heavier-than-air chemicals that can travel 10 to 20 miles -- could generate the most casualties if attacked. And we know there are 700 plants nationwide that, if attacked, could result in the death or serious injury of over 100,000 people. But the only progress toward prevention thus far are voluntary security investments made by the private sector.

Fences and background checks on workers might deter or thwart an attack by an unsophisticated or under-resourced terrorist group. But a determined group can compromise any chemical facility or shipment that it puts its mind to. Consequently, what is needed is a redesign of the processes or products of the most dangerous facilities, such as replacing hydrofluoric acid with sulfuric acid or modified hydrofluoric acid (neither of which pose nearly as dangerous a risk) in the alkylation process at large oil refineries in urban areas, where immense amounts of this acid are currently stored.

Although both houses of Congress last autumn produced chemical security bills with some teeth, there was no vote. Rather, a watered-down version was attached as a rider to the Department of Homeland Security's budget appropriation, which does not require high-risk facilities such as oil refineries to consider or use safer chemicals or processes.

Both houses of Congress are currently considering a chemical plant security bill. But it is not yet clear whether it will improve real security by mandating process changes, or merely produce a façade in the form of fences and background checks.

The biggest chemical threat may be the transport of the 100,000 90-ton tank cars containing toxic gases such as chlorine or anhydrous ammonia that are shipped each year in the U.S. Attacks on these well-marked cars in a densely populated area could also harm 100,000 people.

Tank cars cannot currently be designed to weather a suicide attack or a bombing. We therefore need to ban these hazardous shipments through populated areas, and not simply require their continuous tracking, as the Department of Homeland Security recently proposed. Incredibly, when Washington attempted to block hazardous rail shipments through its municipality, the federal government sided with the rail industry in court and had the ban overturned.

The worst-case scenario is a nuclear weapon detonated in a major U.S. city. The most effective way to deal with this threat is to secure all the nuclear weapons and materials in the former Soviet Union. This has not been done; hence we must resort to keeping this material from entering the country.

A second-line-of-defense program has put in place detection systems at some critical roads leading out of the former Soviet Union. But the Bush administration's approach to preventing nuclear weapons and materials from coming through our ports has been dismal -- essentially amounting to radiation testing of shipping containers that are flagged by the deeply flawed targeting system of U.S. Customs.

Radiation testing and two-dimensional scanning (which detects heavy-metal shielding) of all U.S.-bound containers, and human analysis of enough of these scans to provide a deterrent effect, is possible without increasing port congestion. It should be undertaken immediately at overseas ports. True, President Bush signed the Safe Port Act last October, which requires radiation testing at 22 domestic ports. But terrorists can detonate a bomb remotely at a U.S. port and shield a weapon's emissions with heavy material. Thus the law provides only the illusion of security.

DOJ_NMG_0137091

We are today safer from a smallpox or a botulinum-in-milk attack, but only marginally safer from an anthrax, botulinum-in-food, chemical or nuclear attack. Most of the cost to secure the latter three scenarios can be passed on to consumers, but the federal government needs to lead the way.

Let us hope that during the next five years, these gaping holes are fixed so that terrorists are forced to use much less dangerous methods.

Mr. Wein is Paul E. Holden professor of management science at Stanford's Graduate School of Business.

EDITORIAL Drop The 'L.A. 8' Case (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 27, 2007

FOR TWO DECADES, the U.S. government has been trying to deport two Palestinians living in Southern California — middle-aged men who have been lawful permanent residents of this country for three decades. The Department of Homeland Security, which must soon make a decision on the matter, should drop the case and allow Khader Hamide and Michel Shehadeh to continue to live their American lives.

The two men are the remnant, for legal purposes, of the "L.A. 8." That was the term used to describe seven Palestinian men and a Kenyan woman who were arrested at gunpoint at their homes in 1987 for their alleged association with the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, or PFLP, a Marxist-Leninist faction of the Palestine Liberation Organization. The government began proceedings to deport them on the theory that the faction advocated "world communism through written or printed publications."

Hamide and Shehadeh were originally slated for deportation under the McCarran-Walter Act, a noxious Cold War law that was substantially overturned in 1988. "The government is trying to stifle certain ideas from entering our society through certain aliens through its immigration power," wrote the federal judge at the time.

Undaunted, the government filed charges against Hamide and Shehadeh, accusing them of ties with "an organization that advocates or teaches the duty or necessity or propriety of the unlawful assaulting or killing of government officials." The deportation effort was later justified under a provision of the Patriot Act enacted after 9/11.

Throughout the tortuous litigation, the government argued that the L.A. 8 provided support that found its way to the PFLP and its terrorist activities, while the members of the L.A. 8 insisted that they raised funds only for the building of hospitals and other humanitarian purposes.

In terminating the deportation proceedings last month, federal immigration Judge Bruce J. Einhorn embraced neither of these conflicting narratives. Instead, he cited the government's refusal to comply with his order seeking any evidence that had the potential to exonerate the men and emphasized that the case had lingered so long as to violate due process. He referred to the case as "a festering wound" on Hamide and Shehadeh and said it was "an embarrassment to the rule of law."

The judge's prose may be purple, but his conclusion is correct. Hamide and Shehadeh are well-integrated members of the community. They have not been convicted of any crime. The government's unrelenting effort to deport them smacks of bureaucratic face-saving. Einhorn has offered the government a graceful exit from this litigation — and the government should take it.

Hundreds Scramble To Beat Deadline For Filing Katrina Claim (AP)

By Michael Kunzelman, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 27, 2007

Hundreds of residents scrambled Monday to beat a deadline for filing court claims against the federal government and U.S. Army Corps of Engineers for damage resulting from the failure of levees and flood walls following Hurricane Katrina.

The corps says Thursday at 4 p.m. is the deadline for it to receive the Katrina litigation claims at its Uptown office. Roughly 30,000 residents already had filed a claim as of late last week, but Thursday's deadline surprised many more people whose homes and businesses were damaged or destroyed in the flooding following the storm.

On Friday, lawyers representing thousands of plaintiffs accused federal officials of reneging on an agreement to set Aug. 29, 2007 - the two-year anniversary of Katrina - as the deadline for claims to be filed or else risk exclusion from class-action litigation.

Joe Bruno, one of the plaintiffs' attorneys, said the U.S. Department of Justice stunned his legal team this week by informing them that certain claims must be filed by this week, 18 months after the storm.

On Monday, Bruno asked a federal judge to consider postponing the deadline until after the court decides whether to certify a class action against the corps and federal government.

Bruno asked U.S. District Judge Stanwood Duval to hold a hearing on his request "because there is much anguish and uncertainty among all Hurricane Katrina victims concerning their rights."

"The court can bring a sense of calm by deciding plaintiffs motion right away," Bruno wrote.

Duval didn't immediately rule on Bruno's request.

On Monday, meanwhile, a steady procession of people stopped by the corps' Leake Avenue office to drop off their claims. Charles Brown, 47, said he didn't know about the deadline until Sunday.

"A lot of people aren't going to get their claims in," said Brown, who has been living in a government-issued trailer since his Gentilly home was damaged by the Aug. 29, 2005 storm.

To prove that she filed a claim on her mother's behalf, Janet Long, 45, used the camera in her cellular phone to photograph herself inserting the form in the drop box.

"It's aggravating, but it's worth it," said Long, whose mother's home in the city's Lakeview neighborhood was flooded with seven feet of water after the levees failed.

The corps' drop box will be open this week from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m., through Thursday afternoon. "They are taking a chance if they put it in the mailbox because it may not get here in time," corps spokesman Vic Harris said.

The failure of the levees has spawned a mountain of litigation in Louisiana.

Earlier this month, a legal team led by Bruno sued the federal government and Army Corps of Engineers in a lawsuit that alleges flooding during Katrina was the fault of a corps decision to allow dredging of the 17th Street Canal.

Also this month, Duval allowed to go forward a suit charging the corps with liability for flooding of eastern New Orleans and St. Bernard Parish from the Mississippi River-Gulf Outlet. The ship channel, maintained by the corps, connects New Orleans' inner harbor with the Gulf of Mexico.

WAR NEWS:

Cheney Unhurt In Blast Outside Afghan Base (CNN/AP)

CNN/AP, February 27, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan (AP) -- A suicide bomber killed 19 people and wounded 11 outside the main U.S. military base in Afghanistan on Tuesday during a visit by Vice President Dick Cheney, officials said. The Taliban claimed responsibility and said Cheney was the target.

The blast happened near the first security gate outside the base at Bagram, said Khoja Mohammad Qasim Sayedi, chief of the province's public health department. Gov. Abdul Jabar Taqwa said "18 to 20 dead bodies" lay on the ground after the blast.

Maj. William Mitchell said it did not appear the explosion was intended as a threat to the vice president.

"He wasn't near the site of the explosion," Mitchell said. "He was safely within the base at the time of the explosion."

However, a purported Taliban spokesman, Qari Yousef Ahmadi, said Cheney was the target of the attack.

"We knew that Dick Cheney would be staying inside the base," Ahmadi told The Associated Press by telephone. "The attacker was trying to reach Cheney."

Cheney, who spent the night at Bagram, ate breakfast with U.S. soldiers Tuesday morning, Mitchell said. The vice president later left Bagram for a meeting with President Hamid Karzai.

Cheney traveled to Afghanistan after a stop in Pakistan.

DOJ_NMG_0137093

On Monday, Cheney -- underscoring growing alarm in the West at how militants have regained ground in Afghanistan and Pakistan -- sought Pakistani aid to help counter al Qaeda's efforts to regroup, officials said.

However, Pakistani President Gen. Pervez Musharraf insisted his forces have already "done the maximum" possible against extremists in their territory -- and insisted that other allies also shoulder responsibility in the U.S.-led war on terrorism.

Cheney, accompanied by CIA deputy director Steve Kappes, made an unannounced stop in Pakistan Monday en route to Afghanistan.

The vice president made no public comment in Pakistan, but a senior aide to Musharraf said they held detailed talks, including a one-on-one lunch of more than an hour.

"Cheney expressed U.S. apprehensions of regrouping of al Qaeda in the tribal areas and called for concerted efforts in countering the threat," Musharraf's office said.

He also "expressed serious U.S. concerns on the intelligence being picked up of an impending Taliban and al Qaeda 'spring offensive' against allied forces in Afghanistan," the statement said.

The Musharraf aide, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he is not an official spokesman, said the two men "exchanged ideas and suggestions" on improving cooperation against terrorism. However, he said Cheney made no specific demands.

U.S. and British officials have praised Pakistan publicly for its role in arresting al Qaeda suspects after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in the United States and for a string of bloody operations against militants along the border.

Five years after the Taliban's ouster from power, however, militants have regained ground in Afghanistan and Pakistan.

There are signs of U.S. and NATO frustration at Musharraf's limited success in disrupting Pakistan-based Taliban fighters, who are expected to step up raids into Afghanistan in coming months, and in trapping Taliban and al Qaeda leaders suspected of holing up in tribal areas of Pakistan near the border.

The Bush administration wants Musharraf to be more aggressive in hunting al Qaeda operatives, and has raised the possibility that the U.S. Congress could cut aid to Pakistan unless it takes tougher steps.

Musharraf told Cheney that Pakistan "has done the maximum in the fight against terrorism and "joint efforts" were needed if the fight was to succeed.

"The president emphasized that most of the Taliban activities originated from Afghanistan and the solution of the issue also lies within that country," his office said. The more than 50,000 NATO and U.S. troops in Afghanistan as well as Afghan security forces also share responsibility for policing the border, Musharraf added.

Cheney and Karzai are expected to talk about security along the Afghan-Pakistan border and the expected increase in violence by militants as spring thaws mountain snows.

The United States has 27,000 troops in Afghanistan. About 14,000 are part of the 35,000-member NATO force commanded by U.S. Gen. Dan McNeill. At Bagram, Cheney met with McNeill and Maj. Gen. David M. Rodriguez -- the commander of U.S. troops -- to discuss military operations, the security situation and reconstruction, said Maj. William G. Mitchell, a U.S. military spokesman.

Copyright 2007 The Associated Press. All rights reserved.This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten, or redistributed.

Blast Occurs While Cheney Visits (LAT)

By Shafiqullah Azimi And Laura King

The Los Angeles Times, February 27, 2007

KABUL, AFGHANISTAN — Suspected insurgents set off a blast early today outside the main U.S. base in Afghanistan while Vice President Dick Cheney was visiting, killing as many as 20 people, officials said.

Cheney was not injured in the explosion outside Bagram air base, north of Kabul, the capital, the U.S. military said.

But the blast was seen as a brazen effort on the part of insurgents to show they could cause disruption during Cheney's visit, and strike close to a heavily fortified area.

The vice president arrived at Bagram on Monday night after a brief, unscheduled stop in Pakistan to meet with President Pervez Musharraf.

News agencies cited local Afghan authorities as saying the explosion occurred near the outermost gate of the base, which is the principal entrance. Several more inner gates and checkpoints separate the area from the main part of the installation, which is a former Soviet military base.

Just outside the gate lies a makeshift market with a cluster of small, ramshackle shops, some of them housed in metal shipping containers. At midmorning, the time of the blast, the area is usually crowded with merchants and shoppers.

The governor of Bagram, Abdul Jabar Taqwa, was quoted by the Associated Press as saying as many as 20 bodies were on the ground after the explosion. Earlier, witnesses had put the death toll much lower.

Cheney had planned to travel to Kabul by military helicopter to meet with Afghan President Hamid Karzai on Monday evening, but a snowstorm made it too dangerous to fly.

The vice president instead met with senior U.S. military officials and breakfasted this morning with American troops at the Bagram base.

A meeting with Karzai was to be held today in the capital.

Officials in Cheney's entourage said earlier that he intended to consult with the Afghan leader about the spring offensive that Taliban fighters are expected to mount in coming weeks against allied troops.

Cheney Warns Pakistan To Act Against Terrorists (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, February 27, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 26 — Just hours after Vice President Dick Cheney delivered a stiff private message to President Pervez Musharraf in Pakistan, the Pakistani government lashed out Monday with a series of statements insisting that "Pakistan does not accept dictation from any side or any source."

The unusual outburst, later toned down, revealed the depth of tensions between General Musharraf and Washington over what administration officials say have been inadequate efforts by Pakistan in combating Al Qaeda and the Taliban.

By the time of the Pakistani response, Mr. Cheney had left Pakistan to make a second secret trip, this time across the border to Afghanistan, where a meeting with President Hamid Karzai was suddenly delayed. American officials said a snowstorm prevented helicopter flights between Kabul and Bagram Air Base, where Mr. Cheney had landed, and neither leader seemed inclined to take a risky drive to meet the other.

Mr. Cheney's trip to Pakistan was shrouded in unusual secrecy. In trips to Pakistan last year, President Bush and Secretary State Condoleezza Rice announced their plans days in advance, and reporters filed articles on their visits as soon as they landed. But Mr. Cheney's traveling press pool was sworn to secrecy, and allowed to report only the barest details just before he left.

News organizations that knew of Mr. Cheney's travels, including The New York Times, were asked to withhold any mention of the trip until he had left Pakistan. That appeared to be a reflection of growing concern about the strength of Qaeda and Taliban forces in the area, and continuing questions about the loyalties of Mr. Musharraf's own intelligence services.

The White House would say little on Monday about the message Mr. Cheney was sent to deliver, though it did not deny reports that it included a tough warning that American aid to Pakistan could be in jeopardy. Democrats have threatened to link aid to Pakistan to its effectiveness in combating both Al Qaeda and the Taliban. Pakistan's response, delivered by a Foreign Ministry spokesman, expressed concern about "proposed discriminatory legislation" in Congress to curb the aid.

The sensitivities of Mr. Cheney's trip were particularly evident as the White House spokesman, Tony Snow, parried detailed questions about the vice president's message to Pakistan, a country that Mr. Bush has hailed as a close American ally.

Referring to Mr. Cheney, Mr. Snow said that "the precise nature of his comments and the tenor of comments to the president would be the sort of things that would be confidential," and then reaffirmed Mr. Bush's confidence that General Musharraf was committed to fighting terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0137095

When asked about comments by senior administration officials who fear that General Musharraf's peace plan with tribal leaders in the area bordering Afghanistan has allowed Qaeda and Taliban forces to move with more impunity in that region, Mr. Snow said: "We're often asked to give out report cards on other heads of state. I'm not going to play."

Mr. Cheney's trip was one of a series to Pakistan by senior members of the administration, part of what administration officials have said is a plan by the Bush administration to keep the pressure on General Musharraf. To some outside analysts, that is a sign of increasing concern that American efforts to coax along the sometimes prickly Pakistani leader has hit its limits.

"There is a growing consensus that our Pakistan policy is not working," said Derek Chollet, a fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington who estimates that over the past five years the United States has sent $10 billion in aid to Pakistan — and perhaps as much in covert funds.

Mr. Musharraf alluded to those payments in his recently published memoir, in which he wrote, "Those who habitually accuse us of 'not doing enough' in the war on terror should simply ask the C.I.A. how much prize money it has paid to the government of Pakistan." When asked about that assertion, C.I.A. officials have declined to answer.

Mr. Cheney's trip to Pakistan and then to Afghanistan appeared to be part of an effort to resolve a continuing dispute between the two countries over who is more responsible for the failure to stop cross-border attacks. Mr. Musharraf and Mr. Karzai have made no secret of their mutual dislike. President Bush held a dinner with the two men in Washington last fall, in hopes of encouraging them to work together. As soon as the two leaders returned to their respective capitals, however, the sniping resumed.

A particular source of concern is Mr. Musharraf's peace accord giving tribal leaders greater sovereignty — a deal that he has assured Mr. Bush would not diminish Pakistan's commitment to fighting extremists. Mr. Bush noted in September that Mr. Musharraf had looked him "in the eye" and said, "There won't be a Taliban and won't be Al Qaeda." Now, American officials contend those groups have gained ground.

Mr. Cheney traveled with the deputy director of the Central Intelligence Agency, Stephen R. Kappes, an indication that the conversation probably included discussion of American intelligence agency contentions that Qaeda camps have been reconstituted along the border with Afghanistan.

Speaking in Islamabad on Monday, Pakistani officials acknowledged that Mr. Cheney had expressed concern about the regrouping of Al Qaeda in the tribal areas and that he had called for concerted efforts in countering the threat. Then, at a news briefing, the Pakistani Foreign Ministry protested the "dictation" that the country was being offered, a clear reference to Mr. Cheney's visit. Later in the day the ministry toned down its comments, saying that Mr. Cheney had "shared U.S. concerns and assessments in the context of intelligence and security cooperation."

American officials did not explain the extraordinary secrecy surrounding Mr. Cheney's visit to Pakistan, a country the administration has cast as a stable nation moving gradually toward democracy. Mr. Cheney's aides told The Times and other news organizations that the Secret Service had imposed the requirement that there be no mention of his trip until he had left Pakistan.

Mark Silva of the Chicago Tribune, who is traveling as the sole newspaper "pool" reporter with Mr. Cheney, reported in an e-mail message: "These all were explained as security measures for the protection of the vice president, and ostensibly us as well. There was no indication of any particular threat that would lead to these measures."

Such caution is not unprecedented. In 2000, President Clinton flew into Islamabad on an unmarked Air Force plane rather than on Air Force One. President Bush's trip last year was marked with siege-like security and unusual maneuvers during takeoff.

Insurgent Activity Spurs Cheney Trip To Pakistan (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz And Griff Witte

The Washington Post, February 27, 2007

The White House signaled its growing impatience with Pakistan's failure to crack down on Islamic extremists, dispatching Vice President Cheney for an unannounced visit yesterday to pressure President Pervez Musharraf to do more against a resurgent Taliban and al-Qaeda fighters.

DOJ_NMG_0137096

Following visits to Japan and Australia last week, Cheney stopped off in Islamabad for consultations with Musharraf before flying on to Bagram air base in Afghanistan. His four-hour presence in Pakistan, kept secret until after he left the country, was perhaps the strongest indication of administration concern over the presence of radical Islamic fighters in the unruly border area between the two South Asian countries.

While Iraq continues to consume the administration's attention, U.S. officials are increasingly worried that the Taliban is making a comeback in Afghanistan, using parts of Pakistan to stage cross-border raids and undermine the authority of Afghan President Hamid Karzai. Officials also fear that al-Qaeda is becoming more active in Pakistani tribal areas close to the border and that Musharraf has been insufficiently aggressive about taking action -- despite promises to President Bush and other senior officials that he would address the situation.

"We don't want Afghanistan to return to being -- nor the border provinces in Pakistan to become -- safe havens for al-Qaeda, where they can plan attacks on the United States and other Western countries," said one senior administration official who discussed Cheney's mission on the condition of anonymity.

Administration officials declined to offer many details of the vice president's trip, which has been in the works for several weeks, but privately officials have said they would like to see Musharraf do more.

The administration is also under new pressure on Capitol Hill, where Democrats have pushed through legislation in the House that would end U.S. military assistance to Islamabad unless Bush certifies that the Pakistani government is making all possible efforts to curtail Taliban activity in Pakistan. The president has proposed $785 million in assistance to Pakistan next year, including $300 million in military aid.

While the fate of such legislation in the Senate is uncertain, administration officials are using the prospect of congressional intervention as leverage to encourage Islamabad to crack down on militants. While Musharraf has deployed tens of thousands of troops to the border area and vowed action against terrorists, his hold on power also depends on the support of military and intelligence officials more sympathetic to Islamic extremists.

"Cheney doesn't go someplace unless it's very serious," said Barnett R. Rubin, a New York University scholar of South Asia who has been critical of the Musharraf government. "The government of Pakistan is paralyzed, and Cheney is there to give them a shove."

Mahmud Ali Durrani, Pakistan's ambassador to the United States, said Cheney and Musharraf had "a pleasant meeting," and he rejected the idea that the vice president came down hard on Pakistan's counterterrorism record.

"They looked at ways and means that the upcoming spring Taliban offensive can be defeated, and they came to some conclusions," Durrani said. "They agreed on the need to work jointly."

Durrani said that a representative from Pakistan's intelligence service was present to meet with counterparts from the CIA and that any intelligence offered by the United States would be taken seriously. "Pakistan has always said, 'If you know something, tell us,' " he said. "If you tell us, we take action. The perception that Pakistan is staying back and ignoring things, that's not right."

Britain announced yesterday that it is sending 1,400 more troops to Afghanistan, where NATO has placed about 33,000 soldiers to help the Karzai government secure the country. The move follows a recent announcement from the Bush administration that it is sending an additional 3,200 U.S. troops to help blunt the Taliban's expected spring offensive.

Cheney was accompanied on his trip to Islamabad by Stephen R. Kappes, deputy director of the CIA and a Middle East expert who has served in Pakistan. Intelligence officials said Kappes's presence was a sign of U.S. interest in increasing intelligence operations with Pakistan. They said there are indications that the al-Qaeda leadership, though moving constantly, has resumed training of outsiders in some areas of Pakistan, though it is nowhere near the extent that occurred in Afghanistan under the Taliban.

Afghan officials have long accused Pakistan of feeding the Taliban insurgency. Musharraf's government, many Afghan officials believe, has either looked the other way or covertly supported the Taliban's cause as a way to capture U.S. aid, gaining strategic leverage in Pakistan's competition with India and undermining Karzai's government in Kabul.

Musharraf and Karzai, both U.S. allies, have a stormy relationship, with deep mistrust on both sides. Cheney was supposed to meet with Karzai in Afghanistan yesterday, but the meeting was postponed, the vice president's office said.

DOJ_NMG_0137097

Cheney Pressures Musharraf On Taliban (FT)

By Farhan Bokhari And Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, February 27, 2007

Dick Cheney, US vice-president, on Monday flew to Pakistan and Afghanistan to convey US concerns over a resurgence of the Taliban and al-Qaeda and to impress on General Pervez Musharraf, Pakistan's military ruler, the need for tougher action before an expected spring offensive by militants.

With the stability of Afghanistan's weak central government at stake, strains are emerging in the US relationship with Gen Musharraf.

Analysts said Mr Cheney was in a good position to gain leverage for stronger military co-operation by using threats by Democrats in the US Congress to cut assistance to Pakistan.

Statements from Washington and Islamabad reflected the US desire to increase pressure on Gen Musharraf while not endangering the relationship.

"The Pakistanis remain committed to doing everything possible to fight al-Qaeda but, having said that, we also know that there's a lot more that needs to be done," said Tony Snow, White House spokesman.

A Pakistan official said: "Nobody's talking of a divorce here."

Western diplomats in Islamabad said the US message was driven mainly by recent intelligence reports concluding that al-Qaeda, forced out of Afghanistan by US forces in 2001, was regrouping in Pakistan's Waziristan tribal region along the Afghan border following a controversial agreement made by Gen Musharraf with tribal leaders last year.

A diplomat commented: "This agreement has not helped the US. Last year alone there were well over 100 suicide attacks in Afghanistan. The message from the vice-president was therefore blunt."

Separately, Margaret Beckett, UK foreign secretary, also met Gen Musharraf to discuss securing the border with Afghanistan. Des Browne, UK defence secretary, later confirmed to parliament that Britain would send 1,400 more troops to Afghanistan to join the 6,300 already there.

Mr Cheney's visits to two key US allies were not previously announced. However, his office said talks with Hamid Karzai, the Afghan president, were delayed because of bad weather on arrival at Bagram air base.

Gen Musharraf's office said Mr Cheney praised Pakistan's contribution to the war against terror but also "expressed US apprehensions of regrouping of al-Qaeda in the tribal areas and called for concerted efforts in countering the threat". Mr Cheney was said to have expressed "serious concern" over the impending offensive by the Taliban and al-Qaeda in Afghanistan.

Tariq Fatemi, a former senior Pakistani diplomat, said: "One key contradiction is that Gen Musharraf had appeared unwilling to completely marginalise the Taliban and al-Qaeda while still wanting to satisfy the US. This is not possible anymore."

In Washington, Alexis Debat, analyst with the Nixon Center think-tank, said it was likely Mr Cheney had offered Pakistan more military assistance, such as training with US forces, to operate in such a hostile environment as Waziristan, or even joint operations.

Cheney Visit Turns Up Heat On Pakistan (LAT)

By Laura King

The Los Angeles Times, February 27, 2007

ISLAMABAD, PAKISTAN — Vice President Dick Cheney's unannounced visit to this capital Monday was the latest and most visible sign of renewed American pressure on President Pervez Musharraf to crack down on Islamic militants in Pakistan's lawless tribal areas bordering Afghanistan.

But complex domestic considerations in Pakistan, and a keen awareness on Musharraf's part that the Bush administration sees no palatable alternative to his leadership, diminish the prospect of any dramatic Pakistani move against the militants, diplomats and analysts said.

"There is only so far that he is prepared to go," said Rahul Roy-Chaudhury of the International Institute for Strategic Studies, a leading British think tank on security matters. "Some of this is dictated by the [Pakistani] military's view of things, and some by the fact that this is not politically popular in large parts of Pakistan."

DOJ_NMG_0137098

Cheney became the latest high-ranking U.S. official to press Musharraf to rein in what American officials characterize as a volatile mix of homegrown militant groups, Taliban strategists and Al Qaeda elements, all operating with increasing freedom in the tribal zones along the Afghan-Pakistani border.

The issue has been central to U.S.-Pakistani relations since the Sept. 11 attacks, but seldom has the Bush administration been as blunt or as public in its pressure on Musharraf, a key ally in the region. The stepped-up pressure also comes as Congress threatens to cut aid to Pakistan unless it sees more concrete results from the nation in combating militants' cross-border infiltration of Afghanistan.

Neither Cheney nor Musharraf spoke publicly before or after their meeting at the presidential palace, which lasted more than two hours. They appeared before cameras for a handshake only.

In a written statement, however, the Pakistani leader's office acknowledged that Musharraf had come under at least indirect criticism. Cheney "expressed U.S. apprehensions of [the] regrouping of Al Qaeda in the tribal areas and called for concerted efforts in countering the threat," the statement said.

Cheney was accompanied by Stephen Kappes, the deputy CIA director, whose presence underscored U.S. concern over intelligence assessments that indicate a deteriorating situation in the tribal areas.

For his part, Musharraf hewed to what has become his government's scripted reply to such concerns: that Pakistan already is doing all it can, and that the burden of confronting the Taliban and its allies must be shared by others, including Afghanistan and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

The Pakistani president told Cheney that the international community was "collectively responsible for defeating the scourge of terrorism," adding that "Pakistan has done the maximum," the government statement said.

And in a protest against any move to cut aid to his government, the fifth-largest recipient of U.S. foreign assistance, Musharraf decried "proposed discriminatory legislation regarding U.S. aid to Pakistan," said the Pakistani statement.

The New York Times reported Monday that President Bush intended to warn Musharraf that congressional Democrats might seek such cuts in response to the Pakistani leader's perceived reluctance to confront the militant threat.

In Washington, White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said, "The Pakistanis remain committed to doing everything possible to fight Al Qaeda, but having said that, we also know that there's a lot more that needs to be done."

Much of the recent Western criticism of Musharraf has centered on a deal struck last year with tribal elders in the North Waziristan area, under which Pakistani troops pulled back to their barracks in exchange for a pledge that the Taliban and other insurgents would not use the area as a springboard for attacks against NATO forces. Coalition military officials say cross-border attacks have increased sharply in the wake of the pact.

But Musharraf, whose government is reported to be contemplating a similar deal in the Bajur tribal agency, defended the Waziristan accord, telling Cheney that economic incentives and political moves were the best way to counter insurgents' influence in the tribal areas.

Pakistani Foreign Minister Mian Khursheed Mehmood Kasuri, meanwhile, made similar arguments after a meeting Monday with British Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett.

Kasuri declared that Pakistan was being criticized unfairly, and blamed NATO and Afghan troops for failing to halt cross-border infiltration.

"We've got 1,000 checkposts; they've only got 100," he said.

Several Western diplomats, speaking on condition of anonymity, said there was a gap between Western expectations and what Musharraf was in a position to accomplish.

Pakistan has been hit by a spate of suicide bombings that began after a government air raid aimed at Islamic militants in the tribal areas late last year. Some analysts suggested that Musharraf risked being blamed if such raids triggered a backlash in Pakistani towns and cities.

"If he goes back to a more robust military intervention, the view here will be that he is toeing the American line," said Talat Masood, a retired Pakistani general. "I think it will give rise to a lot of spillover effect, in terms of violence and suicide bombings."

And Musharraf is unlikely to let his own domestic political agenda be dictated by Washington, Roy-Chaudhury said.

DOJ_NMG_0137099

"We've seen a ratcheting up of pressure on Musharraf, certainly, but his No. 1 priority is that this is an election year, and he wants to stay in power," he said.

Cheney Urges Pakistan To Help Fight Terrorism (USAT)

USA Today, February 27, 2007

Vice President Cheney warned Monday that al-Qaeda was regrouping in Pakistan's remote tribal areas and sought President Pervez Musharraf's help in a push against Taliban and al-Qaeda militants, Musharraf's office said. Musharraf told Cheney, who made an unannounced stop in Islamabad, that Pakistan "has done the maximum" in the fight against terrorism.

The Bush administration has raised the possibility of cutting aid to Pakistan unless tougher steps are taken. "There's a lot more that needs to be done," White House spokesman Tony Snow said in Washington.

After his visit to Pakistan, Cheney flew to Afghanistan. He had planned a meeting with President Hamid Karzai, but it was canceled because of bad weather.

In London, British Defense Secretary Des Browne announced the deployment of 1,400 additional troops to Afghanistan, bringing British troop levels to 7,700. The United States has about 27,000 troops there.

U.N. court acquits Serbia in genocide

The United Nations' highest court acquitted Serbia of direct responsibility for genocide in Bosnia in the 1990s but ruled that it should have prevented the1995 slaughter of Bosnian Muslims in Srebrenica. The International Court of Justice in The Hague, Netherlands, found that Serbia didn't control the Bosnian Serb army or the paramilitary units that massacred more than 7,000 Bosnian Muslim men and boys. The Bosnian Serb army captured the U.N.-protected Srebrenica enclave in July 1995. The court ordered Serbia to hand over suspects for trial by the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia.

Madrid bombing suspect denies confession

An Egyptian accused of being a mastermind of the Madrid train bombings denied that his voice is the one heard in a wiretapped phone conversation in which prosecutors say he claimed the attacks were his idea.

"I'm not the person speaking," Rabei Osman said as he testified a second time in the trial of 29 suspects. They are accused in the March 2004 attacks, which killed 191 people and wounded more than 1,800. Italian prosecutors say it is Osman telling an associate in Italy, "I'm the thread to Madrid; it's my work."

Cheney Presses Musharraf Over Border Control (WT/AP)

By Stephen Graham

The Washington Times, February 27, 2007

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan -- Vice President Dick Cheney made a surprise visit to Pakistan yesterday to press President Pervez Musharraf to step up the campaign to counter increased attacks by al Qaeda and Taliban forces against neighboring Afghanistan, officials said.

The stop was the latest sign of growing U.S. unease over resurgent Islamic terrorism in the region, but Gen. Musharraf insisted his forces have "done the maximum" possible against extremists in their territory.

Mr. Cheney, accompanied by CIA Deputy Director Steve Kappes on a tour of several Asian allies, made an unannounced stop in Pakistan en route to Afghanistan, where snow prevented him from reaching Kabul for talks with Afghan President Hamid Karzai.

The vice president made no public comment in Pakistan, but a senior aide to Gen. Musharraf said they held detailed talks, including a private lunch of more than an hour.

"Cheney expressed U.S. apprehensions of regrouping of al Qaeda in the tribal areas and called for concerted efforts in countering the threat," Gen. Musharraf's office said.

President Bush recently announced an increase in U.S. forces in Afghanistan, and officials in Britain and Turkey said yesterday they would be adding a combined 1,600 troops to the NATO-led mission in the country. The alliance about 33,000 troops in Afghanistan.

"Put simply, the alternative is unacceptable," British Defense Minister Des Browne told Parliament. He said Britain also would be sending four more Harrier jets, four Sea King helicopters and a C-130 Hercules transport plane.

DOJ_NMG_0137100

U.S. and NATO officials praise Pakistan publicly for its role in arresting al Qaeda suspects after the September 11 attacks in 2001 and for a string of bloody operations against militants along the border. But U.S. and Afghan leaders are increasingly critical of Pakistan's efforts to curb al Qaeda and Taliban cross-border operations.

U.S. military officials said last month that attacks from Pakistan have increased fourfold since Gen. Musharraf struck a widely criticized deal last fall that put local tribes in charge of much of the security in the border area of North Waziristan.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said yesterday, "The Pakistanis remain committed to doing everything possible to fight al Qaeda, but having said that, we also know that there's a lot more that needs to be done."

U.S. officials have been reluctant to press Gen. Musharraf too hard for fear of undermining his political standing at home and encouraging Pakistan's own militant Islamic factions.

Mr. Cheney's visit was kept secret until the last moment for security reasons. He landed at a military base outside Islamabad and took a helicopter to the presidential palace.

Gen. Musharraf has argued that Pakistan is being unfairly singled out for problems rooted in the U.S.-sponsored battle against the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan in the 1980s. He also says there is no evidence that al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden or the Taliban's Mullah Mohammed Omar are on Pakistani soil.

The Pakistani leader also expressed concern about proposed U.S. legislation that would link U.S. military aid to Pakistan's record in containing militant attacks. U.S. officials have said they hope to persuade congressional Democrats to drop the link before the bill, which passed the House in January, becomes law.

Pakistani officials acknowledge the North Waziristan deal has not been properly implemented, but argue that large-scale military action by the government would only alienate moderate tribal groups.

